Jeremiah describes himself, therefore, as a lamb led to slaughter. Neither the context nor the terminology necessarily implies the sacrificial imagery of the temple cult. The language may simply reflect the profane practice of slaughter for consumption. It does, however, strongly imply that Jeremiah is innocent of any wrongdoing. A lamb led to slaughter carries with it the imagery of nonaggression and nonculpability on the part of the lamb. Jeremiah's predicament is not God's judgment on him but the plot of others (including some inhabitants of Anathoth, cf. 11:21–23; 12:6) who oppose his message and seek to harm him. They want him to stop prophesying as he has been in the name of the Lord.

The short prayer of the prophet in verse 20 is based on the conviction that God is a righteous Judge. Jeremiah asks not only for deliverance²—which is one task a judge can perform—but also for God to judge those who persecute him unjustly. God, who is able to assess the motives of heart, mind, and will, reveals that persecution of Jeremiah comes because he has sought to deliver God's word to Judah.

Verses 21–23 reveal a judgment on those who seek Jeremiah's life. Both verses 21 and 22 contain the formula "This is what the LORD says," giving a double emphasis to the judgment to come on the persecutors of the prophet.

12:1–6. Jeremiah again addresses the Lord in prayer, stating a premise about God's righteousness similar to that expressed in 11:20. The NIV translation of 12:1 may be rendered differently, "(Because) you are righteous, O LORD, I would plead a case³ with you." The case or issue that Jeremiah brings is not just that of threat to his life (although this is a primary element); it is also the question of why a righteous God allows the way of the wicked to prosper. If God is so clearly opposed to the activity of the wicked, then why not judge them and be done with it? Jeremiah prays for the destruction of the wicked because of the harm they have brought to the land and asks that they (instead of he) be taken off like sheep for the slaughter. Readers can see why this passage follows that of the description of Jeremiah's persecution in 11:18–23.

God's reply (12:5–6) does not deal with the larger question of evil's prosperity or even the more restricted question of immediate judgment on those who oppose Jeremiah and ruin the land. Instead, God speaks to Jeremiah as the one called to be a prophet to the nations. This reply is couched in terms of the conflict at hand in Judah and the heavy task of prophetic work that remains. Jeremiah may be weary already by the strain of prophetic duty, but there is yet more difficulty ahead. There is no way around either persecution or the wearying strain of prophetic work, yet there will be a way through it. Jeremiah is not to trust even his relatives; rather, he is to look to the Lord for his strength and to the vindication the Lord will reveal in the future.

Jeremiah offers a quotation of the people in 12:4 to the effect that they doubt that God sees what is happening to them since he fails to act. They too (according to Jeremiah's prayer of frustration) see a God of inactivity. God does not "take the bait" and offer a defense of his providence. He simply calls the prophet to keep on the task at hand.

12:7–13. God sets forth his own complaint and announcement of judgment over the loss of his people. Here is evidence that the Lord is pained by the folly of his house. The previously revealed reply to Jeremiah in 12:5–6 does not reflect God's indifference to the prophet's precarious circumstances but recognizes the advanced state of decay in Judah and Jerusalem, the consequences of which neither Jeremiah nor God can avoid.

Verse 7 describes Judah as God's house, as his inheritance, and as the one whom God loves. All of this is family imagery and metaphor. As the head of his household, God experiences pain at its ruination and at the perversion of his inheritance. Verse 8 describes the city as transformed into an animal against God, and God's comment is that he "hates" her. Behind the reference to "her" is the metaphor of "daughter Jerusalem," a precious member of God's household. This is the language of a betrayed father and husband grappling with the enormity of treachery in the family. In this case the hatred is not the opposite of love, which is indifference, but the sad effects of betrayed and wounded love.

12:14–17. This word about the neighboring states around Judah anticipates elements in the oracles concerning foreign nations in chapters 25, 46–51. It sits somewhat surprisingly in this context, but it offers important perspective on the function of judgmental prophecies. The announcement of judgment may be in service to a larger design for blessing and reconciliation.

According to 2 Kings 24:2, bands of Arameans, Ammonites, and Moabites were marauders against Judah and Jerusalem. Psalm 137:7 quotes Edomite voices who urged the destruction of Jerusalem. The Edomites are the object of bitter feelings in Lamentations 4:21–22 and in the prophecy of Obadiah (cf. Mal. 1:2–5). The neighbors who are against Judah and who taught God's people to swear by Baal will be judged and exiled ("uprooted") along with Judah, but they may yet have a future if they should learn the ways of the Lord. This is in line with the restoration prophecy of Amos 9:11–12, that the remnants of Edom may be incorporated in the booth of David that God will rebuild.

Bridging Contexts

THE LANGUAGE OF LAMENT/COMPLAINT. Jeremiah's anxiety about life and his distress over his persecution are expressed in the language of lamentation or complaint. Put differently, his prayers are similar to the individual complaints in the Psalter, from which he has drawn his vocabulary and spiritual sustenance. This is a clue to their appropriation for today.

In recent decades scholars have debated the extent to which the prayers in Jer. 11:20 and 12:1–4 (and others) reflect the personal experiences of Jeremiah. Older commentators, especially nineteenth-and twentieth-century liberals, found in these prayers the key to the inner life and religious experience of the prophet. With the advent of form-critical analysis (genre identification), it became clear that Jeremiah's prayers are "typical" in that they represent the faith posture and the language of the Psalms. In reaction to the almost romantic reading of liberal individualism, some scholars have argued that the prophet's own experience is almost completely submerged behind the standard form of typical prayers.

However one assesses this issue, Jeremiah clearly prays to God as Israelites before him had done in times of crisis and self-doubt. More particularly, not only has Jeremiah been instructed by the classical prayers of his ancestors; his own adoption of them become instruction for his readers and hearers. Perhaps this issue is more crucial for modern appropriation than a rehash of the debate over his personal experience. Jeremiah chooses a vehicle that expresses his personal experience, and that vehicle gives shape to his words. The prophet's prayers, his personal experience, his public acts, and so on are all vehicles for proclamation and instruction rather a simple reporting of his feelings.

When we affirm that Jeremiah's own particular experience is mediated through the text, we also affirm that it paradigmatic; it is the result of his being called to the prophetic office (see comments below). Jeremiah finds "his voice" among the prayers of David and other ancestors in the faith, and we are told as much about the trials of the office as of the inner life of the person.

Since these prayers do not preserve a specific public setting in the book, later readers do not know how (or even if) these words were given to Jeremiah's contemporaries in Judah. While this remains a mystery, they are obviously meant to be instructive to readers of the book since they are preserved in the book. This is their primary function, although it is certainly plausible that Jeremiah looked for ways to make his prayers a teaching device for his contemporaries.

The individual and corporate laments/complaints of the Psalter, the largest single "type" (genre) in that book, reflect the personal crises of people of faith, including even the king. They can be model prayers for the faithful, but this is not required for them to be instructive for either ancient or modern readers. They provide a vocabulary through which to articulate trial and anguish, and they point to God as sympathetic Shepherd and righteous Judge.

The majority of the psalms deal with the power of the forces arrayed against God's servant(s), the plea to the Lord for vindication and deliverance through his judging the wicked, and confidence in God's power to redeem the circumstances of those who pray. Less often they are concerned with the effects of personal transgression (e.g., Ps. 51). Jeremiah prays to God, who knows the heart and mind and who judges righteously; in boldness he reminds God of his (God's) righteousness while at the same time bringing before him observations concerning the ascendancy of evil. In all this Jeremiah prays like the saints of previous generations, including David himself, who clung to the God of righteousness in spite of outward circumstances.

The prophetic office and persecution. A second contextual reading of the prayers sees them as reflective of a dual setting: the prophetic office to which Jeremiah was called and an illustration of the persecution announced at his call as sure to come against his prophetic activity. These two elements are related. In Jeremiah 1, a variety of opponents was noted who would stand against Jeremiah and his prophetic message (1:8, 17–19). His persecution, while real and personal, came to him as a result of his prophetic work.

Jeremiah is not the only servant of God to be opposed and persecuted, for he stands in a line of suffering prophetic figures reaching back to Moses and continuing past Jeremiah to Jesus. He was granted what Jesus calls a prophet's reward (Matt. 5:11–12). Jeremiah is also one of the great cloud of scriptural witnesses, one from the line of faithful servants who endured hostility for the sake of God's call (Heb. 11). Thus, Jeremiah's persecution is linked precisely to his call as a prophet, and its intensity of degree is pronounced because of the office. One bridge from Jeremiah's world to ours runs through the exercise of prophetic ministry and its consequences.

Christological reading. A Christological reading of this section begins with this recognition that Jeremiah's opposition is linked to his role as God's prophet. On the one hand, opposition to Jeremiah was ultimately opposition to God, who sent him. Thus Jeremiah's anguish is humanly indicative of God's own anguish over rejection. This point comes out in God's own complaint over the failure of his house in Jer. 12:7–13. On the other hand, the prophetic suffering of Jeremiah was a step along the way of God's dealings with Israel that in the fullness of time would bring forth God's Son, Jesus, his suffering representative and the Messiah of Israel. Jeremiah's suffering is not redemptive as is that of Jesus, but it is representative of the prophetic office and thereby "prophetic" for the suffering of Christ.

Jesus brought the prophetic office to culmination in his call to repentance and in his suffering on behalf of righteousness. In a mysterious way Jesus learned obedience from the things he suffered (Heb. 2:10; 5:8); his persecution became the way of salvation for those for whom he died. In his innocence Jesus had every right to call for judgment on those who persecuted him (as Jeremiah did), but his dependence on God's righteousness meant that he left judgment to him (1 Peter 2:20–25).

The lamb led to slaughter is Jeremiah's self-designation. John describes Jesus as "the Lamb of God, who takes away the sin of the world" (John 1:29). Scripture is rich with imagery of the lamb or sheep for slaughter (e.g., Gen. 22; Ex. 12–13), and Jeremiah's innocent prophetic suffering is one element of the biblical tapestry related to suffering and redemption. In his self-offering, Christ's redemptive work includes forgiveness of the evildoers—a miracle of grace that moves beyond Jeremiah's own words but not beyond the reach of the God who inspires the prophet.

Israel's neighbors. The word about the neighbors (Jer. 12:14–17) is related both to God's concern for the nations' salvation and God's intention to judge them with righteousness. These matters are of broad interest to the biblical writers, with the New Testament emphasizing as of first importance the concern that the gospel be preached to all the nations. Jeremiah's word relates first of all to temporal judgment, but it holds out the possibility that the neighbors will be restored in their homeland and related to the Lord. It remains for the New Testament to spell out in more detail just what a glorious inheritance the nations may have in God's Son.

Contemporary Significance

THE COST OF DISCIPLESHIP. Jeremiah's words about his persecution come from the discharge of his prophetic office. They also raise for Christians the issue of the cost of discipleship, what might be termed the relationship between Christian vocation and suffering when disciples take up their cross and follow Christ. Family and friends alike apparently opposed Jeremiah's prophetic activity. His opposition, his despair, and even the threats to his life came not from his sinfulness but from the exercise of his faith in responding to God's call. This is a perennial issue for Christians, more likely in some cultures and settings than in others, but a perennial issue nevertheless.

In the Bridging Contexts section we have already noted the fellowship of suffering that the prophet represents and in which he has a well-deserved place. To name just three current examples, Christians in Indonesia, in the Philippines, and in Sudan have been attacked simply because they believe in Christ. The treatment of some of them is horribly close to that of a lamb led to slaughter. To be fair, one should cite also the despicable treatment of Jews in the country of Iran, where many were put on trial in the summer months of 2000 and charged with being agents for the state of Israel. There is no evidence, of course, to support these charges. Their only crime seems to be that they held to their faith in the God of Israel in spite of overwhelming pressure to do otherwise.

God's righteousness. We should take note of Jeremiah's words to the Lord about God's righteousness. That righteousness is the presupposition to all that is uttered in this section, even the questioning of God's judging that comes in 12:1–2. It is the anchor to which the prophet clings in spite of his circumstances. Jeremiah will not be able to depend on his own righteousness; this is clear even though these prayers presume that Jeremiah is innocent of any wrongdoing with respect to the charges of his opponents.

Jeremiah will not be able to depend on his own patience or resourcefulness. He knows full well that his life means little except that God has made certain promises to him, and it is only because of his belief in God's righteousness (God's integrity) that he has any hope. Because of what Jeremiah believes about God's integrity, he can pray both bluntly and expectantly about the exercise of God's righteousness. In faith he can even note its seeming absence.

Jeremiah also prays for God's vindication because of what he believes about God's righteousness. Vindication for Jeremiah means deliverance from the plots of his opponents and God's judgment on them. Christians should listen carefully for what Jeremiah actually prays. He seeks the exercise of God's righteousness, not the fulfillment of his wish list for vengeance. Jeremiah has no vendetta against his opponents, and he does not seek to judge them himself; he simply holds up their activities in persecuting God's prophet before the judgment seat of God. For God to be faithful to his promise to Jeremiah as prophet to the nations, those who persecute him will fail at their task to silence him. For them to persist in persecution is to invite the very judgment of God on themselves that they have mistakenly sought to perpetrate on Jeremiah. This does not make Jeremiah invulnerable; he remains a man whose only security resides in his trust of God's righteousness.

When Christians pray for their enemies and those who persecute them, they pray that God will grant the persecutors the ability to recognize their errors and see the way to a forgiveness that is ultimately God's to give.

Their deeds deserve his judgment, yet by his grace that judgment has been borne by someone else. If God's grace is spurned, then nothing else in all of creation can save them. The prayer "Your kingdom come" includes the assumption that judgment as well as mercy are part of the exercise of God's righteousness. Because Christ met suffering in a way that Jeremiah could not, there is the marvelous possibility that his enemies will meet with a transforming judgment and restoration that Jeremiah could not completely foresee.

Does this make Jeremiah's prayer for vindication and judgment wrong for Christians to use? No. But what they should pray for is the vindication of the gospel and the frustration of plans for its subversion. This is consistent with Jeremiah's own plea for the exercise of God's righteousness and the vindication of the message he has been given by God.

The ultimate answer. God's "answer" to Jeremiah in 12:5–6 is not an explanation of why evil may have its ascendant day any more than the book of Job provides an answer to evil and suffering. God's reply does not even tell Jeremiah how God will vindicate him. It is less an answer and more a somber indication that to run the race of prophetic office before him, Jeremiah will be stretched more than he can yet imagine. So he must be prepared! This is also a word about the life of discipleship, about the process of refinement and growth in grace, and about trust in God in spite of difficult circumstances. It is not a philosophical discussion about the justification of God's ways and timing to the prophet.

Christian faith is well instructed by this surprising word from Jeremiah. At most points along the journey of faith, we cannot see the twists and turns that will make up our witness. And why should we know more than that our life is hid in Christ and that our ultimate vindication rests with him? Our relationship with God is not a panacea for life's problems but the basis on which we face those problems. Our strength is not our own. Should we seek to run the race with our own resources, we will ultimately fail. Should we run the race in dependence on God, we are not guaranteed victory according to worldly standards either, only that we belong to God.

In considering this surprising word in Jer. 12:5–6, therefore, one is forcefully reminded that God has not abandoned Jeremiah. His timing and purpose are simply not revealed completely to the prophet, who is told that he must be prepared for more difficult days ahead. This is not so different from the words that the apostle Paul spoke to the Philippians about pressing on toward the goal of God's call in Christ Jesus (Phil. 3:12–14). It is an arduous journey with twists and turns throughout, but the pioneer of salvation, Jesus Christ himself (Heb. 12:2), has pointed us to the journey's end and offers his companionship along the way.

Jeremiah 13:1–27

This is what the LORD said to me: "Go and buy a linen belt and put it around your waist, but do not let it touch water." ²So I bought a belt, as the LORD directed, and put it around my waist.

³Then the word of the LORD came to me a second time: ⁴"Take the belt you bought and are wearing around your waist, and go now to Perath and hide it there in a crevice in the rocks." ⁵So I went and hid it at Perath, as the LORD told me.

⁶Many days later the LORD said to me, "Go now to Perath and get the belt I told you to hide there."

⁷So I went to Perath and dug up the belt and took it from the place where I had hidden it, but now it was ruined and completely useless.

⁸Then the word of the LORD came to me: ⁹"This is what the LORD says: 'In the same way I will ruin the pride of Judah and the great pride of Jerusalem. ¹⁰These wicked people, who refuse to listen to my words, who follow the stubbornness of their hearts and go after other gods to serve and worship them, will be like this belt—completely useless! ¹¹For as a belt is bound around a man's waist, so I bound the whole house of Israel and the whole house of Judah to me,' declares the LORD, 'to be my people for my renown and praise and honor. But they have not listened.'

priests, the prophets and all those living in Jerusalem. ¹⁴I will smash them one against the other, fathers and sons alike, declares the LORD. I will allow no pity or mercy or compassion to keep me from destroying them."

¹⁵Hear and pay attention, do not be arrogant, for the LORD has spoken. ¹⁶Give glory to the LORD your God before he brings the darkness, before your feet stumble on the darkening hills. You hope for light, but he will turn it to thick darkness and change it to deep gloom. ¹⁷But if you do not listen, I will weep in secret because of your pride; my eyes will weep bitterly, overflowing with tears, because the LORD's flock will be taken captive.

¹⁸Say to the king and to the queen mother, "Come down from your thrones, for your glorious crowns will fall from your heads."
¹⁹The cities in the Negev will be shut up, and there will be no one to open them.
All Judah will be carried into exile, carried completely away.
²⁰Lift up your eyes and see those who are coming from the north.
Where is the flock that was entrusted to you, the sheep of which you boasted?

What will you say when the LORD sets over you those you cultivated as your special allies?
Will not pain grip you like that of a woman in labor?
And if you ask yourself, "Why has this happened to me?"—it is because of your many sins that your skirts have been torn off and your body mistreated.
Can the Ethiopian change his skin or the leopard its spots?
Neither can you do good who are accustomed to doing evil.

²⁴"I will scatter you like chaff driven by the desert wind.
 ²⁵This is your lot, the portion I have decreed for you," declares the LORD, "because you have forgotten me and trusted in false gods.

26 I will pull up your skirts over your face that your shame may be seen—

27 your adulteries and lustful neighings, your shameless prostitution!

I have seen your detestable acts on the hills and in the fields.

Woe to you, O Jerusalem!

How long will you be unclean?"

Original Meaning

This chapter contains a collection of judgment prophecies, each intended to expose the failure of Judah and Jerusalem before the Lord and to indicate the historical form of judgment to come as a consequence of that failure. As with most of the first half of the book, the text provides no dates in Jeremiah's ministry for either the symbolic act in 13:1–11 or the oracles that follow. Judgment appears to be looming on the historical horizon (one of the assaults by Nebuchadnezzar on Judah?). In 13:18–19 some form of destruction and depopulation is assumed.

13:1–11. This prophecy, a prose account with an autobiographical element, takes the form of a symbolic act accompanied by commentary from the Lord. The prophets often carried out symbolic acts as illustrations or reinforcements of their proclamation. This is the first of several acts Jeremiah performs to portray his message.

God commands Jeremiah to take a linen waistcloth, clothe himself with it, then remove it and take it to the bank of the Perath and leave it. Scholars have debated whether the river or stream named Perath is the well-known Euphrates (ca. 300 miles from Jerusalem) or the seasonal stream near Anathoth with a similar name (cf. Josh. 18:23). In Hebrew perat can refer to either entity. The difficulty with concluding that Perath is the Euphrates comes when we recognize that considerable time and expense would be required for two round trips to the banks of the Euphrates River. What purpose does such a long trip have, either for the prophet who would make the trek or for the hearers/readers? If there is significance attached to the river in this symbolic act, it is implicit and not explicit in the text. The textual emphasis falls on the linen waistcloth, not on the river.

In response to these considerations, however, note that convenience of access is not a primary consideration when considering prophetic motivation. It was not convenient for Hosea to marry a prostitute or for Ezekiel to lie on his side for weeks. If the closer-but-lesser-known stream near Anathoth is the location of the discarded waistcloth, then it is almost certainly chosen because its name reminds Jeremiah (and the audience) of the Euphrates and the mighty powers coming from the north (cf. Jer. 13:20), powers long associated with Assyria and Babylon. One can make a case in context that the allies courted by Jerusalem and mentioned in 13:21 are the Assyrians and Babylonians from across the great River Euphrates.

Just as the waistcloth was to be bound to its wearer, so Israel and Judah have been formed by God to be bound to him. The verb "be bound" (dabaq) in verse 11 is the same word used in Genesis 2:24 to describe the man who leaves his parents to "be united" (in Elizabethan English, "cleave") to his wife and to become "one flesh." Israel was enjoined to be united to the Lord (Deut. 10:20; 11:22; 13:4; 30:20). The soiling of the waistcloth came because Jeremiah removed it and buried it near the bank of the water. So Israel and Judah—whose separation from the Lord was caused by their faithlessness—were like the ruined waistcloth.

The conclusion in verse 11 uses the daring metaphor of bound clothing as a way of emphasizing the fall from grace of Israel and Judah. Their sad description is emphatic and corporate—the "whole house" of Israel and that of Judah have fallen away. They are ruined as surely as the waistcloth was fouled from its exposure to the elements on the riverbank. Israel and Judah were formed for God's "renown and praise and honor," but they are no better than dirty underwear.

13:12–14. The prophecy about wineskins contains a command to Jeremiah to repeat a proverbial saying: "Every wineskin should be filled with wine." Of course, this is the expectation for wineskins—they are created to hold wine. The punch line, however, is that God will fill the land's inhabitants with drunkenness so that they will crash against one another. In this scenario the intended function of the wineskins is ruined in similar fashion to the waistcloth. Neither waistcloth nor wine jars fulfill their intended functions and thus are failures.

13:15–19. Jeremiah utters judgments against the pride that leads to a fall. Verse 16 employs the unusual command to "give glory to the LORD your God" before the darkness of judgment falls on the people. Perhaps this command functions like that given to Achan in Joshua 7:19. There Achan is brought forward for execution, but before the sentence is carried out, he is asked to "give glory to the LORD." That command to Achan seems to play two roles: (1) a call to tell or admit the truth in public, and (2) an acknowledgment that God's ways and judgments are just. If these two roles lie behind the command to the people in Jer. 13:16, then it is not meant as a way to spare the people from the coming judgment; rather, it is a call for them to admit the justice of the judgment about to befall them.

It is possible, however, that the call to "give glory to the LORD" is a way to avert the disaster to come. If so, then Jeremiah's message functions as a call for repentance and change on the part of the people. Jeremiah reports that he will weep over the folly of the people whose pride is such that they are heedless of their dire circumstances.

Verses 18–19 point to a particular source of pride, the king and queen mother. Their crowns will fall from their heads as a sign of the fall of the people. These two royal figures are not specifically named. Jeremiah contains a section elsewhere (chs. 21–22) in which Judean royalty is the object of his judgmental oracles. In that section the monarchs are named. This short section is the only one in Jeremiah in which the role of the queen mother is taken up.

13:20–27. Jerusalem is called to see the foe from the north who comes in judgment. Should she wonder why destruction has come to her, Jeremiah quotes a proverbial saying (v. 23). Just as neither Ethiopians (Africans) nor leopards can change the distinctive color of their skin, so the evil propensity of God's people cannot be removed by their own hand. The evil of Jerusalem is also personified as a prostitute, whose private parts are shamefully exposed.

The concluding question, "How long will you be unclean?" (v. 27), assumes that even though Jerusalem is incapable of righting herself, she could at least recognize her plight and seek the Lord, who alone can heal her failures. The imagery of this section is similar to that of the prophecies against Jerusalem in chapters 2–3.

Bridging Contexts

AUDIENCE. THERE ARE two audiences who initially heard these judgment prophecies: (1) those who heard the oral proclamation of Jeremiah, and (2) the exilic audience to whom the written prophecies were directed. We have no clue as to how the symbolic act/ interpretation of Jer. 13:1–11 may have been communicated in oral form to Jeremiah's contemporaries. Did he, for example, wear the fouled waistcloth as a sign to the people, offering oral commentary when opportunity presented itself? This is possible and consistent with the enactment of other such messages. Isaiah, for example, gave his son a symbolic name, and when he sought an audience with King Ahaz, he took his son with him (Isa. 7:1–17). The account only makes sense if the name of the child (Shear-Jashub, "a remnant will return") was meant to communicate to King Ahaz. If Jeremiah wore the fouled clothing, we are not told so directly.

This silence suggests that we should begin an interpretation based on the perspective of the reading audience, who hear the account as a way to confirm God's judgment to come and as indications of behavior to avoid. All the prophecies in Jeremiah 13 are part of a chorus line of scriptural texts (Old and New Testament) indicating the righteous judgments of the Lord. As such these prophecies invite readers to examine themselves and their communities in light of God's call to holiness and obedience.

Enacted illustrations. For the sequential reader of the book, the enacted parable of the waistcloth is Jeremiah's first example of a symbolic act. He is one of several biblical persons whose acts illustrate concretely their message and even embody the gist of their oral communication. Jeremiah later wears a yoke (chs. 27–28) and purchases property (ch. 32) as symbolic acts; the first indicated judgment to come in the historical process, and the second foreshadowed restoration from exile.

Likewise, Isaiah and Hosea enacted parables. Both named children as embodiments of their message. Ezekiel lay on his side and burned his shorn hair to act out the siege and destruction of Jerusalem (Ezek. 4–5). In the New Testament the priest Zechariah was struck dumb to embody his impertinence before the angelic messenger (Luke 1:5–25). His son John urged the embodiment of a new relationship with God based on repentance by baptizing people in the Jordan River. Jesus' miracles were the embodiment of God's kingdom made manifest; his works of power were signs of his divine Sonship.

From a slightly different angle, Jeremiah's symbolic act illustrates the connection between word and deed. On numerous occasions Jeremiah announced God's judgment. His personal engagement with his message was such that it led him to lamentations and tears. In the symbolic act not only did his soul internalize the message, but his very actions were a physical demonstration to his audience (for those with ears to hear and eyes to see) of his prophecy. There is even a sense in which God's word is incarnate in Jeremiah's actions, so close is the connection between human activity and the portrayal of the divine message.

Clothing metaphors. The waistcloth of Jer. 13:1–11 is also part of the larger scriptural appropriation of clothing metaphors to depict the life of God's people. Since clothing was (and often remains) a recognized symbol of identity, the Bible occasionally uses it as a means of instruction. To illustrate his care for the first couple after their act of rebellion, God made them clothing of animal skin (Gen. 3:21). The rich symbolism of the priestly office is seen in the description of Aaron's vestments (Ex. 28). A believer, confident in God's grace, can exult in the "clothing" of salvation and righteousness (Isa. 61:10).

In the New Testament, Jesus declared that worry over clothing can divert attention from God's good gifts, noting that not even the finery of Solomon compares to the lilies of the field as clothed by God. Paul indicated that those baptized into Christ have clothed themselves with the risen Lord (Gal. 3:27). The righteousness of God's saints is symbolized as clean linen garments (Rev. 19:8). Indeed, John sees the risen Christ in finery like that of royalty and the priesthood, including a golden girdle or outer waistband (Rev. 1:13; 3:5; 7:9).

Modern cultures are capable of understanding the symbolism of clothing and acting as a medium of communication (plays, television, movies). The symbolic acts in Jeremiah are similar to a play, a pantomime, or street theater. Indeed, the increasing popularity of skits as part of a contemporary worship experience suggests the ability of role-playing to communicate effectively. A careful reader cannot help but notice how much Jeremiah carries his oral communication with elements of role-play and acting. How else can the change in voices be portrayed? In the modern age, this illustrative activity makes sense. The issue of God's judgment on the disobedience of his people, however, is the more difficult matter for modern Christians (below).

Giving God glory. Among the words of judgment in Jeremiah 13 is the imperative to give God glory (13:16) rather than continue in a self-deceiving pride. As noted above, perhaps this specific word is linked to the wider scriptural injunction to acknowledge the rightness (the justice) of God's judgment. Joshua urged Achan, the soldier who had violated the ban on trophies of battle, "to give glory to the LORD" and to confess what he had done (Josh. 7:19). His confession was an integral part of giving glory to God; in acknowledging his wrong Achan also affirmed the justness of God's standards. In Acts 5 Peter accuses Ananias and Sapphira of lying before God. True, the injunction "to give God the glory" is not quoted there, but the public character of their interrogation was designed to underscore their guilt and the justness of the Lord's standards.

Contemporary Significance

As OFTEN WITH PROPHETIC JUDGMENTS, contemporary readers may seek instruction either in the announced judgment itself or in the judgment's mirror image—those hoped-for characteristics of faithfulness and obedience. God's announced judgment on the faithlessness of Judah for idolatry (Jer. 13:10) is a familiar refrain in this book, and any generation of God's people must examine themselves for evidence that they have lost their first love, squandered their inheritance, or spurned the Lord. The same examination is relevant for individuals as well, even though Jeremiah's own critique is corporately based.

The unusual illustration of the waistcloth brings to consideration the claim in 13:11 that God made all of Israel and Judah to be bound to him. The qualification "whole house" is intended to describe all the people in their God-intended unity. Here one meets the mirror image of judgment. God's purpose for Israel and Judah was to be united to him as Lord, "my people for my renown and praise and honor." God's people in the Old Testament may be used as negative examples (i.e., as examples of what not to do), but their fundamental identity resides in their election by God as his people. These two things make them the spiritual ancestors of Christians today. The very oddity of comparison with a bound waistcloth helps drive one to see this glorious identity amidst the failures of that generation.

Finally, perhaps modern Christians should give more consideration to the impact of symbolic acts as part of their discipleship. The president of a North American seminary remarked recently that he had not realized the extent to which his various acts were evaluated for what they might represent with respect to his policies and commitments. After some consideration he concluded that there is justification in seeing a connection between his acts and his commitments. It made him reconsider the way in which his institution took public action, for communication is not just words but deeds.

Is not this true on both an individual and a corporate scale? A church that refuses to move from a changing neighborhood is making a statement as surely as is the church that moves. A Christian who volunteers in the nursery program "speaks" as surely as the teacher of a class. The church that refuses to play the insidious games of nationalism or racism speaks, no matter what it prints on paper.

This is the word of the LORD to Jeremiah concerning the drought:

²"Judah mourns, her cities languish; they wail for the land, and a cry goes up from Jerusalem. ³The nobles send their servants for water; they go to the cisterns but find no water. They return with their jars unfilled; dismayed and despairing, they cover their heads. ⁴The ground is cracked because there is no rain in the land; the farmers are dismayed and cover their heads. ⁵Even the doe in the field deserts her newborn fawn because there is no grass. ⁶Wild donkeys stand on the barren heights and pant like jackals; their eyesight fails for lack of pasture."

⁷Although our sins testify against us, O LORD, do something for the sake of your name.
For our backsliding is great;
we have sinned against you.
⁸O Hope of Israel,
its Savior in times of distress,
why are you like a stranger in the land, like a traveler who stays only a night?

⁹Why are you like a man taken by surprise, like a warrior powerless to save?
You are among us, O LORD, and we bear your name; do not forsake us!

¹⁰This is what the LORD says about this people:

"They greatly love to wander; they do not restrain their feet. So the LORD does not accept them; he will now remember their wickedness and punish them for their sins."

¹¹Then the LORD said to me, "Do not pray for the well-being of this people. ¹²Although they fast, I will not listen to their cry; though they offer burnt offerings and grain offerings, I will not accept them. Instead, I will destroy them with the sword, famine and plague."

¹³But I said, "Ah, Sovereign LORD, the prophets keep telling them, 'You will not see the sword or suffer famine. Indeed, I will give you lasting peace in this place."

14Then the LORD said to me, "The prophets are prophesying lies in my name. I have not sent them or appointed them or spoken to them. They are prophesying to you false visions, divinations, idolatries and the delusions of their own minds.

15Therefore, this is what the LORD says about the prophets who are prophesying in my name: I did not send them, yet they are saying, 'No sword or famine will touch this land.' Those same prophets will perish by sword and famine. 16And the people they are prophesying to will be thrown out into the streets of Jerusalem because of the famine and sword.

There will be no one to bury them or their wives, their sons or their daughters. I will pour out on them the calamity they deserve.

14:17"Speak this word to them:

"'Let my eyes overflow with tears night and day without ceasing; for my virgin daughter—my people—has suffered a grievous wound, a crushing blow.

18 If I go into the country, I see those slain by the sword; if I go into the city, I see the ravages of famine.

Both prophet and priest have gone to a land they know not.""

¹⁹Have you rejected Judah completely? Do you despise Zion? Why have you afflicted us so that we cannot be healed? We hoped for peace but no good has come, for a time of healing but there is only terror. ²⁰O LORD, we acknowledge our wickedness and the guilt of our fathers; we have indeed sinned against you. ²¹For the sake of your name do not despise us: do not dishonor your glorious throne. Remember your covenant with us and do not break it. ²²Do any of the worthless idols of the nations bring rain?

Do the skies themselves send down showers?
No, it is you, O LORD our God.
Therefore our hope is in you, for you are the one who does all this.

^{15:1}Then the LORD said to me: "Even if Moses and Samuel were to stand before me, my heart would not go out to this people. Send them away from my presence! Let them go!

²And if they ask you, 'Where shall we go?' tell them, 'This is what the LORD says:

"Those destined for death, to death; those for the sword, to the sword; those for starvation, to starvation; those for captivity, to captivity.'

³"I will send four kinds of destroyers against them," declares the LORD, "the sword to kill and the dogs to drag away and the birds of the air and the beasts of the earth to devour and destroy. ⁴I will make them abhorrent to all the kingdoms of the earth because of what Manasseh son of Hezekiah king of Judah did in Jerusalem.

5"Who will have pity on you, O Jerusalem?
Who will mourn for you?
Who will stop to ask how you are?

6You have rejected me," declares the LORD.

"You keep on backsliding.
So I will lay hands on you and destroy you;
I can no longer show compassion.

I will bring bereavement and destruction on my people, for they have not changed their ways. ⁸I will make their widows more numerous than the sand of the sea. At midday I will bring a destroyer against the mothers of their young suddenly I will bring down on them anguish and terror. ⁹The mother of seven will grow faint and breathe her last. Her sun will set while it is still day; she will be disgraced and humiliated. I will put the survivors to the sword before their enemies." declares the LORD.

Original Meaning

CHAPTER 14 (and perhaps the two chapters that follow) is occasioned by the threatening circumstances of drought. As is typical in the first half of Jeremiah, we have no idea when the prophet utters these prophecies since no king is mentioned, though the reference to a fast in 14:12 may hint at the historical setting. The only other reference to fasting in Jeremiah is in 36:6, 9, which is set during the reign of Jehoiakim—more specifically, the ninth month of the fifth year of his reign (Nov./Dec., 604 B.C.). At this time Nebuchadnezzar's army was campaigning in the region. This threat may be in the background, though the primary concern of chapter 14 is that of drought. If the context is indeed November or December and the fall rains have not yet come, a fast would be appropriate. In the Mediterranean climate there is no rain during the summer months. But without rain at some point in the fall, drought conditions become severe.

The different speaking voices in 14:1–15:9 comprise a pattern of oracle from the prophet, followed by words from the people. The prophet, speaking for God, has the first and last word:

- A. 14:2–6: The prophet speaks of Judah's mourning.
- B. 14:7–9: The people as a whole confess sin and offer a petition.
- C. 14:10–16: The Lord speaks to Jeremiah about judgment on the people and other prophets.
- D. 14:17–18: At God's command, Jeremiah delivers a lament over the fate of the people.
- E. 14:19–22: The people as a whole confess sin and offer a petition again.
- F. 15:1–9: The Lord speaks to Jeremiah about judgment on the people.

It is difficult to know how one should read the two corporate confessions/petitions of the people (14:7–9, 19–22). Nothing appears wrong with the sentiments expressed in them, but after both comes language of divine judgment. These units include confession of sin (14:7, 20). We have at least two options in seeking to make sense of this section in the context of Jeremiah's ministry. (1) The corporate confessions/petitions of the people, which offer the appropriate words of confession and repentance, are actually insincere. This view accords with the aims of the book as a whole, since one of its primary functions is to explain the culpability of the people in facing defeat and exile. (2) These confessions/petitions are confessions that Jeremiah is offering to the people, if only they would take the confessional content to heart.

- 14:2–6. Judah and Jerusalem mourn over the devastating effects of a drought. Nothing in these verses links the drought with divine judgment; instead, they rehearse the pitiful circumstances of the people and animals in a common quest for water.
- 14:7–9. Only here do we see a link between the terrible circumstances of the people and their sinfulness before God. Jeremiah implores God to act because his name is great and because his people bear that name. The people confess that their "backsliding is great," seemingly a frank acknowledgment of sin against God. In confessional terms God is described as Israel's Hope (miqweh) and Savior (mošia) in troubled times (v. 8). Verse 9 reflects the tradition of God as a valiant warrior who defends and delivers his people (cf. Ex. 15:3).

Taken as a whole, this section has parallels with the Psalter and other biblical prayers. As noted above, either the people are guilty of rank insincerity in praying this way, or this prayer is Jeremiah's advice to them on how to pray appropriately in the context of a drought used in judgment against them.

14:10–16. This mostly prose section records the "give and take" between God and the prophet. Verse 10 contains a poetic oracle that God does not accept the people. He will remember their wickedness and punish them. Jeremiah 31:34 is essentially a reversal of this sentiment. When God forgives, he "forgets."

In verses 11 and 14 come autobiographical introductions: "Then the LORD said to me." As in other occasions, Jeremiah is bidden not to pray for the people (e.g., 7:16). Prophets who have led the people astray receive sustained attention. God denies having appointed them or sending them. They are obviously making Jeremiah's life more difficult by speaking in the Lord's name and contradicting his own prophecies of judgment.

- 14:17–18. These two verses offer an example of lament in which it is difficult to know who is speaking, Jeremiah or God. Jeremiah, of course, is commanded to speak these words to the people, but in doing so he represents God. "My virgin daughter—my people" (NIV) reflects more naturally on God as speaker than the prophet. The familiar metaphor of daughter applies to Jerusalem or the people as members of God's household.
- 14:19–22. The second corporate confession/petition of the people asks plaintively if God has completely rejected Judah and Zion. The sad comment, "We hoped for peace," is the prayer of all right-thinking people. With the confession of sin also comes the refrain, "for the sake of your name do not despise us" (cf. 14:7, 9), and a plea for God to remember his covenant with them and not to annul it.
- 15:1–9. As with the first corporate confession/petition in 14:7–9, this second one is also followed by an emphatic rejection of the people. If possible, this second rejection is even stronger than the one in 14:10–16. The text indicates the frightfulness of God's judgment in more than one way.

The reference to Moses and Samuel as mediators and intercessors (Jer. 15:1) evokes memory of past events in Israel's history. When God was angry with Israel in the desert, Moses interposed himself between God and the sinful community (Ex. 32:30–35; 34:1–27); moreover, Moses was a prophet who knew God "face to face" (Ex. 33:11; Num. 12:8; Deut. 34:10), mediating God's laws to his people and guiding two generations of them toward the Promised Land.

In the period before monarchy, when the word of God was rare in the land (1 Sam. 3:1), God raised up Samuel to be prophet, priest, and judge to Israel. It was Samuel who reorganized Israel after the debacle of defeat by the Philistines at Aphek and the subsequent loss of the ark of the covenant (4–6). The people entreated Samuel to cry out to the Lord on their behalf, and eventually the Philistine threat was subdued (7:8–17). Even after the appointment of a king, the people entreated Samuel to pray for them to the Lord (12:19–25; cf. 12:7). In the work of Moses and Samuel, one finds models of intercessory prayers and accounts of the preservation of the people in spite of the divine judgment that had fallen on them.

For God to dismiss the work of Moses and Samuel as efficacious in the present moment of Judah's sin is, in effect, to say that no prophetic mediator will be accepted and that judgment cannot be averted. Judgment came on Israel during the prophetic ministries of these two leaders, but total destruction had been averted through their mediation. Now, however, it will be different. Judgment to come is announced and described graphically in verse 2. Captivity is explicitly mentioned, as are four kinds of affliction. Jeremiah cites the lingering effects of Manasseh as reasons for the inevitability of judgment. This accusation has parallels in 2 Kings 21:1–18; 23:26; 24:3–4, where the judgment to come on Judah and Jerusalem in Jeremiah's day derives from the overflowing wickedness of Manasseh's reign.⁴

JUDGMENT THROUGH DROUGHT. The common theme of Judah and Jerusalem's plight before God is given the specific coloring of the devastation of drought. Along with it will come sword, famine, and pestilence (Jer. 14:12). Apart from the emphasis on the drought, the reader encounters a familiar aspect of the book of Jeremiah.

During Jeremiah's time, lack of water was a persistent experience. The weather pattern in the eastern Mediterranean is such that from late spring through mid-fall, there is no rain. Thus, the later fall and winter rains are necessary for the spring planting. Not only was drought a crippling phenomenon, it was a graphic reminder of how dependent life is on forces outside of human control. Even today, water rights and distribution are major issues in the Middle East. One of the sorest points in the peace agreement between Israel and Jordan has been the distribution of water from the Jordan River to the two countries. Israel is seeking agreements with Turkey for fresh water supplies.

In 2:13 the prophet proclaimed that Judah's sin was forsaking God (who is living water) in the vain effort to preserve water in broken cisterns (other gods). In chapter 14 the reality of drought is used to chasten and judge Judah. The failure of Judah's other prophets to interpret God's judgment is indicated in 2:8, a claim also elaborated in chapter 14.

Amos, one of Jeremiah's predecessors in the prophetic office, announced drought and famine as God's judgments on Israel (Amos 4:6–13). God's word through the prophet's refrain in Jer. 4:8–11, "yet you have not returned to me," is similar to God's word to Jeremiah that he will not respond to Judah's fast or sacrifices because they have not returned wholeheartedly to him. Amos also spoke forebodingly about the ultimate famine and thirst—the lack of a life-giving word from God (8:11–14). This was a word of judgment, so that when at last people would recognize their needs and seek to assuage them, it would be too late. Such is the intention also behind Jeremiah's words in Jeremiah 14.

In the New Testament John the seer sees God's judgments poured out on the land as the seals of the prophetic scroll are broken (Rev. 6). These judgments are depicted as different horsemen, and among them are the sword, famine, and pestilence. John's vision is very much in the mode of Old Testament prophecy, but it was also intended to instruct the church so that it could see behind the temporal judgments the hand of God moving toward an even larger deliverance. Likewise, Jeremiah's contemporaries are to see God's hand moving in judgment, but beyond judgment Jeremiah's readers should recognize that God moves toward deliverance.

God and the weather. The last line of Jeremiah 14 ends the lament with the confession that the people will "hope ... in" (or "wait for") God, who has done all these things. This confession is both problematic and a key link between Jeremiah's world and modernity. It is problematic because many people recoil from the belief that God causes things like droughts and famines. Weather forecasters daily explain atmospheric conditions through various media, and the connection between God and weather conditions is not clear for many people.

Perhaps it is best to distinguish between the claims of a particular passage and the continuing interplay of forces in seasonal change. Jeremiah's claim is not that God sends all droughts to chastise and judge people. Instead, his claim is more particular: God used the specific drought described in chapter 14 as a means to address and chastise his people. It is as perilous to universalize from the specifics of a particular text as it is to ignore the possibility that a moral and sovereign God makes use of climactic forces. Jeremiah 14 is essentially a claim that God so used the circumstances of the prophet's day to instruct Judah.

It is the same issue with the divine claim in 14:11 that Jeremiah should no longer pray for the people because God will not listen. This is not a universal affirmation about how God treats the prayers of his prophets or his people; rather, 14:11 is a specific instruction about God's intentions in bringing Judah to judgment. God's disposition toward prayer and his employment of drought are particular approaches in his approach to Judah. God had most certainly listened to the prayers of Moses and Samuel—they were renowned as intercessors. Modern readers are confronted with the claim that this is God's prerogative and that it will ultimately serve his broader purpose of (re)forming a people for himself.⁵

Admittedly, some people will recoil in horror and deny that God will ever refuse to hear the prayer of Judah or send drought on its land. Such a denial, however, is different from the error of universalizing; it is the error of assuming that they know better than God how to achieve his purposes within history. Does the thought that God is indifferent about climactic conditions provide more comfort? It is not likely that those who refuse God the avenue of drought will allow God the freedom to judge at all. It would be no different with a cross and the death of a righteous man. Why, God forbid such a thing!

THE TRUE JUDGE. The confessions/petitions of chapter 14 continue to have significance for God's people because they remind us that God alone is the true Judge of our deeds and the true Savior of our lives (14:8). Modern people act wisely when they acknowledge that they are neither masters of their destiny nor spiritually self-sufficient. This is a fundamental point for modernity: How can the chastening hand of God be recognized? How might God grasp the attention of people and seek to remove the intellectual and emotional barriers to his approach set up by the modern mindset?

Indeed, the confessions/petitions are uncomfortable reminders that people are ultimately unable to avoid an encounter with the living God. Nevertheless, the One who evoked tears in the prophet is the ultimate Hope of Israel, and it is the larger design of Jeremiah's book (as it is the larger design of God Almighty) to move the people in the direction of praise and good works.

In the first half of 1996 the author experienced a prolonged drought in central Texas. It was a humbling experience to stand on the bank of the Pedernales River that typically has flowing water and excited people engaged in recreational activities to see only a dry and cracked stream bed. It was frightening to watch things wilt, animals die, and people lose their vitality because of the scarcity of water. It was a powerful illustration of the connectedness of corporate existence. The lack of water was the impetus to a variety of changes in central Texas, both physical and emotional. It is true that people will change their lifestyle and assumptions about reality when circumstances force it! They will usually do so grudgingly, however, and more often than not they will find someone or something else responsible for the debilitating circumstances. Is this dynamic a clue to the harsh reception of the corporate confessions/petitions in 14:7–9, 19–22?

Many prayers for rain are heard frequently during months of drought. Arid conditions are an effective reminder of how easily life can get out of balance and how circumstances of drought can only be ameliorated from above. Nevertheless, when rain finally comes (as it did in August 1996), drought conditions are quickly forgotten. Jeremiah 14 is a salutary reminder of the true source of life and of the One who calls a people into existence for his glory and praise.

10 Alas, my mother, that you gave me birth, a man with whom the whole land strives and contends!
I have neither lent nor borrowed, yet everyone curses me.

¹¹The LORD said,

"Surely I will deliver you for a good purpose; surely I will make your enemies plead with you in times of disaster and times of distress.

12"Can a man break iron—iron from the north—or bronze?
13Your wealth and your treasures
I will give as plunder, without charge, because of all your sins throughout your country.
14I will enslave you to your enemies in a land you do not know, for my anger will kindle a fire that will burn against you."

15 You understand, O LORD; remember me and care for me. Avenge me on my persecutors.
You are long-suffering—do not take me away; think of how I suffer reproach for your sake.
16 When your words came, I ate them;

they were my joy and my heart's delight, for I bear your name, O LORD God Almighty.

¹⁷I never sat in the company of revelers, never made merry with them;

I sat alone because your hand was on me and you had filled me with indignation.

¹⁸Why is my pain unending and my wound grievous and incurable?

Will you be to me like a deceptive brook, like a spring that fails?

¹⁹Therefore this is what the LORD says:

"If you repent, I will restore you that you may serve me; if you utter worthy, not worthless, words, you will be my spokesman.

Let this people turn to you, but you must not turn to them.

20 I will make you a wall to this people, a fortified wall of bronze; they will fight against you but will not overcome you, for I am with you to rescue and save you,"

declares the LORD.

²¹"I will save you from the hands of the wicked and redeem you from the grasp of the cruel."

Original Meaning

JEREMIAH 15:10–18 contain a lament/complaint on the part of the prophet with reference to divine judgment in verses 12–14, while verses 19–21 are a reply from God. In literary context this material follows upon the oracles presented in 14:1–15:9, where the people offered two corporate confessions/petitions (14:7–9, 19–22) and Jeremiah responded with a lament on behalf of God (14:17–18). One way to interpret the bitter lament/complaint in 15:10–18, therefore, is to see it as a culminating reaction to the people's failures, the impact of the drought, and the pressure on Jeremiah from prophets who were offering oracles of peace to a desperate nation—all of which are depicted in 14:1–15:9.

This section is actually structured around a give-and-take conversation between prophet and God, which unfolds as follows:

- A. 15:10: Jeremiah laments the day of his birth and the curses of people that are now directed at him.
- B. 15:11: God replies that he will deliver Jeremiah for a good purpose.
- C. 15:12–14: God pronounces judgment on the people.
- D. 15:15–18: Jeremiah expresses his frustrations to God.
- E. 15:19–21: God replies to Jeremiah.

There are difficult textual and syntactical issues involved in the translation of this section, particularly with verse 12, a verse that has a significant role in the way the lament/complaint is interpreted. Parts A and B, and then parts D and E, show the pattern of prophetic lament/complaint followed by divine reply. The middle portion (15:12–14), however, both interrupts the pattern and appears addressed to Judah. Perhaps the best option is to interpret verses 12–14 as a word from the Lord pronouncing judgment on Judah.

15:10. In this verse Jeremiah laments his birth (cf. also 20:14–18, as well as the first lament of Job in Job 3:1–26). This provides another, somewhat broader context in which to hear the language of personal woe. Jeremiah is similar to Job. His contemporaries curse him, and the pain of his ostracism has made even God seem deceitful and unreliable to him.

In lamenting the day of his birth, Jeremiah offers an evaluation of his life and prophetic ministry. He feels as if there is no purpose for him to continue to live. The parallel with the lament of Job suggests that we are dealing with a recognized literary motif. It is tantamount to the conclusion of the Teacher in Ecclesiastes that it would be better not to have been born (Eccl. 4:1–3). Such language should be taken seriously as an indication of despair, though not literally as the announcement of suicide. Jeremiah describes the "curses" that have come to him, even though he has neither lent nor borrowed. The troubles that come from either activity are legendary. Again, Jeremiah employs a traditional motif to make his point (cf. Job 6:22; Ps. 15:5).

- 15:11. God replies that he will deliver Jeremiah for a "good purpose" and will bring his enemies to a place where they will need to plead with him. This last comment perhaps leads to the further pronouncement of judgment on Judah in verses 12–14.
- 15:12–14. As noted above, the text of verse 12 and the interpretation of these three verses is difficult. The best overall option is to see all three verses as a judgment speech on Judah. They repeat material found in 17:3–4, where the context is clearly judgment on the people.
- 15:15–18. Jeremiah turns once again to the Lord. As part of his lament/complaint he notes that his enemies are also God's enemies. Jeremiah suffers his reproach because he represents God's word to the people. In verse 16 he describes his encountering of God's word with the surprising claim that he "ate" them and they became his joy. This may refer to his willing acceptance of God's previous revelation to him (cf. 1:9). Possibly verse 16 refers to a literal "finding" of a text, for the verb that the NIV translates as "came" literally means to be found. Whether this means that Jeremiah was instructed by a document like the book of the covenant discovered during Josiah's reign or another preserved text (Hosea?) cannot be known. The emphasis falls on the prophet's joy at that time as opposed to the despair and rejection he now encounters.

Jeremiah confesses that it is God's hand that he feels on him, that God is the source of the indignation he experiences. As his emotions boil over, the prophet asks God why his (Jeremiah's) pain is unending and why he (God) has become like failing water. 15:19–21. God's reply is not to deal with the particulars of Jeremiah's anger but to remind him that the path of the faithful and obedient prophet is still open to him. One should not conclude that Jeremiah has failed or that God has failed the prophet, but rather that God has called him to prophesy in this historical hour of judgment. Jeremiah has received the reward typical for a prophet who announces judgment (i.e., persecution; cf. Matt. 5:10–11).

Verse 19 has two plays on the verb "turn/return" (šub). If Jeremiah will "repent" (i.e., change his tune and direction), then God will "restore" him. These are the NIV renderings of šub in both cases. Moreover, using the same verb, God states that the people should "turn" to Jeremiah, but that Jeremiah should not "turn" to them. Verses 20–21 are reminiscent of Jeremiah's initial "call" in 1:18–19. He still has the same task ahead of him and the same assurance that God is with him.

JEREMIAH'S LAMENTATION IN 15:10, 15–18 has many echoes in Scripture, including several places elsewhere in Jeremiah. Being rejected by one's contemporaries is deeply painful, and the human toll it takes is evident in the prophet's candid language. The joining of this lament with the announcement of judgment in 15:1–9 shows the link between the people's rejection of God (15:6) and their rejection of God's prophet (15:16–17). These rejections are two sides of the same coin.

Jeremiah's plea for judgment on his accusers and tormentors is a prayer for justice. If God intends to judge his people for their failures, then Jeremiah prays for a just verdict on those who slander God through attacking his prophet. Jeremiah's reproach results from his role as one called by God's name and one who delights in God's Word (cf. Ezek. 3:3). Suffering comes to one who stands for God's Word in evil times.

God does not reply directly to the prayer for judgment on the oppressors; instead, he reminds Jeremiah that his restoration from humiliating circumstances is simply to return to his role as mouthpiece for the Lord.⁵ There is no warrant in the prophet's lament to carry out personal retribution. The jarring language of the lament is the humanness of the prophet stretched almost to the breaking point. It is a reminder that ministry is not about success or happiness but about faithfulness. Even in his despair Jeremiah's lament is evidence that he still "fought the good fight" (1 Tim. 6:12).

Contemporary Significance

ACCOUNTABILITY. Instruction for God's people today comes in various ways from these somber verses. It is necessary, first of all, to face the scriptural claim that God holds his covenant people (and ultimately all people) accountable for their actions. This is as true in the case of individuals as it is in corporate terms. Jeremiah 15:1–9 contained words of judgment in historical terms (e.g., the sword, captivity) for corporate failure. This is the context in which to read the lament of 15:10–21. They should be a lesson for any subsequent generation of God's people. A secular historian might explain Judah's demise in terms of ancient Near Eastern power politics and tragic miscalculations; the eyes of faith discern divine chastisement and discipline in the tragic events of the Babylonian assault and the Exile.

Should believers today ask about trends in the life of the church today that bode ill for the future? Are there signs even now that God has given (will soon give?) individuals or communities over to the folly of their actions? Does this include the maligning of persons who carry out their discipleship in controversial ways?

The references to Moses and Samuel in 15:1–9 served as a reminder of the great privilege of intercessory prayer, even if their prayers would not have helped the people of Jeremiah's day. Mention of these two great prophets is of no value were it not for the claim that they had, in fact, led God's people through tumultuous times and that they were valiant in prayer on behalf of the people. We should listen to Jeremiah's own prayers about himself in light of their witness. In a time of despair the prophet is inclined to think his life is a total failure, and he sees little evidence that God is with him supportively. Yet God hears all his frustration and replies.

The prophet's pain. Ministry can be painful and costly. Jeremiah's lament shows one of God's chosen vessels suffering because of his service to God. His life is an Old Testament form of Jesus' call to discipleship: Take up your cross and follow me. Even when stretched seemingly to the breaking point, God reminds Jeremiah of his call to prophetic ministry. For the prophet there is no alternative but to turn (return) once again to the Lord, who called him and promised him protection.

Jeremiah's lament is an understandably human response to mistreatment. Likely it was therapeutic for him to cry out. God does not answer directly his plea for vengeance, at least on Jeremiah's own scale of justice (15:15), any more than God will answer our own pleas for judgment according to our scale of judgment. Judgment must be left to him (Rom. 12:17–21). Jeremiah can at least understand that much; that is why he prays for God to vanquish the oppressors.

Christians can see in Jeremiah a prophetic mediator whose office points forward to a suffering Savior, the author and perfecter of our faith, who for the joy set before him endured the cross, scorning its shame (Heb. 12:2). Christ's prayers included intercession even for the oppressor, although he too experienced the mysterious absence of God as he poured out his life on the cross. Jeremiah's own prayer for vindication and judgment on the oppressor is part of his plea to God that he not violate his promise of protection to him. It takes seriously God's prerogative to deal sovereignly with evil; yet his prayer can be reframed in light of Jesus' own example of intercessory prayer.

Perhaps one of the ways to grasp the significance of Jeremiah's lament(s) for modern appropriation in North America is to take seriously the tone. His laments are not like a majestic hymn of praise from the Psalter or the enthusiastic praise music so popular in segments of the church today. They have more of a point of contact with the "blues music" spawned in the African American culture. The blues have been an important contributor to both traditional soul music and vibrant gospel singing in African American churches. With the blues comes an articulate voice for the range of human experience, particularly the down times. A classic blues composition is "The Thrill Is Gone," by the legendary B. B. King. For over thirty years that song has been a catalyst for those who have sought a voice to express their despair or grief. The tone of the song is a mournful one, and the words lament a relationship gone wrong.

Singing the blues or hearing them sung is similar to pouring out one's heart in prayer to God. That is why there is such a strong connection between blues and gospel music. King himself has stated that he wants to record a gospel album before he retires because he is convinced that the blues lead one to gospel. The same can be said for a lament like Jeremiah's. He faces his doubts and tormentors, gives voice to unease and anger, and gives all of it to God.

Adult Sunday school classes usually discuss the Lord's Prayer as a standard model for Christian prayer. One of its petitions is that God will deliver the disciple from evil. There are times in which following the claims of the gospel and practicing one's faith will lead directly into encounters with evil. One of the marvelous gifts of Jeremiah's book is the humanness of his prayers when wearied and depressed by the struggle with rejection and persecution. Zeal for the path of discipleship (in the case of Jeremiah, zeal to carry out his prophetic commission) is no guarantee of smooth sailing in life. God will hear the prayers of his disciples—unlike those prayers from the dark hour of Judah's judgment—just as God heard Jeremiah's cries.

THEN THE WORD of the LORD came to me: ²"You must not marry and have sons or daughters in this place." ³For this is what the LORD says about the sons and daughters born in this land and about the women who are their mothers and the men who are their fathers: ⁴"They will die of deadly diseases. They will not be mourned or buried but will be like refuse lying on the ground. They will perish by sword and famine, and their dead bodies will become food for the birds of the air and the beasts of the earth."

⁵For this is what the LORD says: "Do not enter a house where there is a funeral meal; do not go to mourn or show sympathy, because I have withdrawn my blessing, my love and my pity from this people," declares the LORD. ⁶"Both high and low will die in this land. They will not be buried or mourned, and no one will cut himself or shave his head for them.

⁷No one will offer food to comfort those who mourn for the dead—not even for a father or a mother—nor will anyone give them a drink to console them.

8"And do not enter a house where there is feasting and sit down to eat and drink. ⁹For this is what the LORD Almighty, the God of Israel, says: Before your eyes and in your days I will bring an end to the sounds of joy and gladness and to the voices of bride and bridegroom in this place.

10"When you tell these people all this and they ask you, 'Why has the LORD decreed such a great disaster against us? What wrong have we done? What sin have we committed against the LORD our God?' 11 then say to them, 'It is because your fathers for sook me,' declares the LORD, 'and followed other gods and served and worshiped them. They forsook me and did not keep my law. ¹²But you have behaved more wickedly than your fathers. See how each of you is following the stubbornness of his evil heart instead of obeying me. ¹³So I will throw you out of this land into a land neither you nor your fathers have known, and there you will serve other gods day and night, for I will show you no favor.'

¹⁴"However, the days are coming," declares the LORD, "when men will no longer say, 'As surely as the LORD lives, who brought the Israelites up out of Egypt,' ¹⁵but they will say, 'As surely as the LORD lives, who brought the Israelites up out of the land of the north and out of all the countries where he had banished them.' For I will restore them to the land I gave their forefathers.

¹⁶"But now I will send for many fishermen," declares the LORD, "and they will catch them. After that I will send for many hunters, and they will hunt them down on every mountain and hill and from the crevices of the rocks. ¹⁷My eyes are on all their ways; they are not hidden from me, nor is their sin concealed from my eyes. ¹⁸I will repay them double for their wickedness and their sin, because they have defiled my land with the lifeless forms of their vile images and have filled my inheritance with their detestable idols."

¹⁹O LORD, my strength and my fortress, my refuge in time of distress, to you the nations will come from the ends of the earth and say,
"Our fathers possessed nothing but false gods, worthless idols that did them no good.
²⁰Do men make their own gods?

Yes, but they are not gods!"

21"Therefore I will teach them—this time I will teach them my power and might.

Then they will know that my name is the LORD.

Original Meaning

THIS CHAPTER RANGES widely over the themes of sin, judgment, and restoration. Jeremiah's own life is to be a prophetic witness to the historical judgment soon to strike the land. As is common in the first half of the book, no regnal dates are provided by which one can set these instructions in a more particular context of the prophet's life.

- 16:1–9. God commands Jeremiah not to marry or have children (v. 2), since judgment is coming soon and many parents and children in Judah will die. There are, perhaps, at least two reasons for including this command as part of the book. (1) In a society where marriages were arranged between families, celibacy was comparatively rare. Thus, Jeremiah's celibacy might surface as a "hot-button" issue for his detractors to seize upon. They can portray him as crazed and out of touch with reality. But Jeremiah's celibacy is not a denial of the goodness of marriage or even the voicing of his own preferences in the matter. For all we know, he may well have desired a wife and children. Yet his desires, like much about his personal circumstances, recede behind the presentation of his prophetic work.
- (2) Since destruction is imminent, this is no time for marriage (vv. 3–5). His celibacy is part of his embodiment of the message he proclaims; it is a symbolic act as surely as was Hosea's marriage of a prostitute (Hos. 1–3) or Ezekiel's refusal to mourn publicly the death of his wife (Ezek. 24:15–27). Note Paul's similar statement in 1 Corinthians 7:25–35.

Jeremiah is not to enter a house for feasting or celebration either (Jer. 16:8–9), for the joy of bride and groom will also be silenced in the coming devastation. Here again he bears the mark of his ministry. Perhaps the lament of 15:17–18 reflects the personal cost to the prophet of his "sitting alone."

- 16:10–13. This text presupposes that Jeremiah passes on the substance of the Lord's messages to him about constricting his social activities. Judgment is at hand. "Why such judgment?" the people ask. The answer is the familiar (to readers of the book) and crushing reply that both ancestors and the current generation have forsaken the Lord, been disobedient to his instruction, and served other deities. The current generation is particularly recalcitrant and motivated by an evil heart (cf. 17:1, 9). The punishment for "defiling" (v. 18) God's land is to be cast from the land and humiliated in exile by worshiping other deities. Crime and punishment in this case are linked like sowing and reaping.
- 16:14–15. These verses announce an abrupt change through the rhetorical formula, "The days are coming." God announces that the judgment of the Exile will be matched by the saving exodus from foreign territory and back to the Promised Land. Here succinctly is the same wondrous claim as given in Isaiah 40–55. These two verses predict the formation of a new proverbial saying about God: He "who brought the Israelites up out of Egypt" will bring back the banished from their exile in the north (cf. Jer. 23:7–8).
- 16:16–18. These verses are difficult to interpret in context. Verse 18 makes it clear that God is speaking about bringing judgment upon the failures of Judah, so that we see a return to the language of historical judgment. The announcement of fishing and hunting for offenders in foreign lands, however, is obscure. Perhaps they are a reply to the sarcasm of people who say that in exile God will not see and judge them for their sins. Certainly Jeremiah affirms that God is not limited by geography or spatial distance in bringing to pass what he desires.
- 16:19–21. The chapter concludes with the voice of one who prays on behalf of himself and his sinful people. Contextually this must be Jeremiah, for the concluding verse makes it clear that God is behind the sentiments expressed and that he intends to teach his people a lesson about his power. Along with the confession of the people's sinfulness is an affirmation that "the nations will come" to God. God is the prophet's refuge and strength—characteristics that separate him from the folly of idols. This in turn leads to the declaration that God has acted in history in order that people may know that his name is Yahweh (cf. Ex. 6:3).

PATTERN. Jeremiah 16 contains the classical pattern of this book: God announces judgment on Jeremiah's contemporaries as his righteous response to Judah's spiritual corruption; the future, however, contains the promise of redemption from the land of exile, where Judeans surviving the Babylonian onslaught will be taken. For subsequent generations these words of judgment become words of instruction on what to avoid. The prophecy about redemption provides hope for Judeans in exile (one of the first groups to read/hear parts of the written collection of Jeremiah's prophecies). For generations of God's people after the Babylonian exile, the "second exodus" of the people from Babylonian captivity was testimony to the faithfulness and forgiveness of God. It would indeed become proverbial, as 16:14–15 indicate.

In 16:18 there is a connection with the proclamation of the prophet in Isaiah 40:1–2. The vocabulary is different but the content is similar: The Exile is a complete punishment for the sinfulness of Judah and Jerusalem, a double payment for her failure to obey. The prayer of Jer. 16:19–20 draws on the spiritual resources now preserved in the book of Psalms. God the Judge is also a Fortress and Protection to his people, who have learned the folly of idolatry and who find security in the Lord, their Redeemer.

Marriage. Marriage was a mark of adulthood in ancient Israel, and families routinely arranged the marriages of their sons and daughters. The Old Testament provides no evidence of celibacy as an institution of society, although Jesus validates it as a part of discipleship (Matt. 19:10–12). Jeremiah's celibacy is wrapped up in his prophetic office and his call to embody his message. To hear that word in a modern context could mean foregoing marriage for the sake of ministry (as have priests and orders in the Catholic tradition and some missionaries in the Protestant tradition) or giving up something else as a sign of Christian faith. This can be taken on an individual level (as is required for marriage!) or on a corporate level, when a body of Christians "gives up" something for the sake of its ministry and witness.

God's will. Verse 21 emphasizes God's will to make his name known. Probably the claim is not for simple cognition, as if neither Judah nor neighboring people had previously known that God had a personal name (YHWH, usually pronounced Yahweh).² The personal name Yahweh was first emphasized in the saving events of the Exodus (Ex. 3:1–15; 6:1–3)—events that revealed God's commitment to his promises and his people in ways that amazed both Israelite and Egyptian. In the proclamation of Judah's demise and the bold announcement that there is redemption beyond demise, readers encounter the claim that God's name indicates his identity as God of the future and that the Lord's self-manifestation in historical events is for his honor and glory.

Typology. These verses set up a typology between ancient Israel and the church, based on their respective callings as God's people. More particularly, the expectation about the future provides a bridging mechanism for subsequent generations who find themselves in an analogous situation to the Judean remnants of Jeremiah's day. In light of Christ's first advent, Christians look in faith to a future revelation of God's glory. The companionship that God provides through the Holy Spirit and the life of the church is an interim period, like that of saints in the Old Testament who lived in eschatological hope.

Contemporary Significance

TRUE KNOWLEDGE OF GOD. Interpreters can take 16:21 and find in it an angle of vision that unites the chapter. God desires to make himself known, which gives shape ultimately both to world history and the life story of an individual Christian. As noted elsewhere, knowledge of God is not mere intellectual comprehension or cognition—the devil and his minions believe that God exists (James 2:19). True knowledge of God is formed in relationship with him and in obedience to his claims of exclusive worship. God serves as a fortress and refuge to those who trust him and who humbly seek to follow his revealed will. God is also a righteous Judge, whose timing in judging iniquity should not be confused with either indifference or caprice.

John Calvin proposed in his Institutes of the Christian Religion that true knowledge of one's self is bound together with the relational knowledge of who God is. Many subsequent interpreters have followed his viewpoint, and it is certainly consistent with the claim of Jeremiah 16. The fall of Judah and the subsequent exile of many Judeans were not simply events of power politics in the late seventh/early sixth centuries B.C.; they were part of a judging and refining process undertaken by God the Lord, who sought to make himself known to his people.

God is both Judge and Redeemer. Knowledge of him impels one to recognize our sinfulness just as knowledge of our sinfulness can—by God's grace—lead us to know God as both Judge and Redeemer. Christians recognize a similar pattern in the events of the cross and resurrection. Through these events God made himself known as Judge of all the world and Redeemer of those who trust in him through Jesus Christ, his Son, who also bore the name Lord. "Everyone who calls on the name of the Lord will be saved" (Rom. 10:13; cf. Phil. 2:9–11).

The cost of discipleship. Jeremiah's celibacy reminds Christians of the cost of discipleship. In certain circles of the church, the family has taken on nearly idolatrous status. The good news is that Christians are rightly concerned about the dissolution of the primary social unit of society (= the family), but marriage and family are not ultimate in the life of faith. God uses those who are widowed or never married, or even those who are married and without children, in special ministries. God's kingdom is full of servants whose celibacy and/or childlessness have become more than a social mark; they have become occasions for God's kingdom to grow.

Protestants can learn something from their brothers and sisters in the Catholic tradition. The call of ministry may include celibacy. Those who answer the call are in a sense "married" to the Lord and his larger family of disciples. They are whole persons who have chosen a different "symbolic act" through which to exercise their faith.

One of the most distinguished evangelical spokesmen in the twentieth century, John R. W. Stott, never married. His personal views on the goodness of marriage and family are well known. The fruit of his rich ministry as an Anglican clergyman, including valuable publications and a long series of public travels for preaching and lectures, is testimony to the use of the time he had as a single person. He continues to embody his ministry.

Calvin's prayer at the end of his meditation on Jeremiah 16 is worth quoting and pondering.

All-powerful God, you are not content to give only one small corner of the earth to your servants; you are pleased to extend your kingdom to the ends of the earth and make your home with us through your only Son in whatever place we are. Give us the grace that we may offer ourselves to you in sacrifice. Give us the grace to arrange our lives in obedience to your Word, that your name be glorified in us and by us, until finally we are made participants in the eternal celestial glory acquired through your Son, our Lord, Jesus Christ.³

1"Judah's sin is engraved with an iron tool, inscribed with a flint point, on the tablets of their hearts and on the horns of their altars.
 2Even their children remember their altars and Asherah poles beside the spreading trees and on the high hills.
 3My mountain in the land and your wealth and all your treasures I will give away as plunder, together with your high places, because of sin throughout your country.

⁴Through your own fault you will lose the inheritance I gave you.

I will enslave you to your enemies in a land you do not know, for you have kindled my anger, and it will burn forever."

⁵This is what the LORD says:

"Cursed is the one who trusts in man, who depends on flesh for his strength and whose heart turns away from the LORD.

⁶He will be like a bush in the wastelands; he will not see prosperity when it comes.

He will dwell in the parched places of the desert, in a salt land where no one lives.

7"But blessed is the man who trusts in the LORD, whose confidence is in him.

⁸He will be like a tree planted by the water that sends out its roots by the stream.

It does not fear when heat comes; its leaves are always green.

It has no worries in a year of drought and never fails to bear fruit."

⁹The heart is deceitful above all things and beyond cure.

Who can understand it?

to reward a man according to his conduct, according to what his deeds deserve."

¹¹Like a partridge that hatches eggs it did not lay is the man who gains riches by unjust means.

When his life is half gone, they will desert him, and in the end he will prove to be a fool.

¹²A glorious throne, exalted from the beginning, is the place of our sanctuary.

¹³O LORD, the hope of Israel, all who forsake you will be put to shame.

Those who turn away from you will be written in the dust because they have forsaken the LORD, the spring of living water.

¹⁴Heal me, O LORD, and I will be healed; save me and I will be saved, for you are the one I praise.

15They keep saying to me,
"Where is the word of the LORD?
Let it now be fulfilled!"

¹⁶I have not run away from being your shepherd;

you know I have not desired the day of despair.

What passes my lips is open before you.

¹⁷Do not be a terror to me; you are my refuge in the day of disaster.

18Let my persecutors be put to shame, but keep me from shame;
let them be terrified, but keep me from terror.
Bring on them the day of disaster; destroy them with double destruction.

¹⁹This is what the LORD said to me: "Go and stand at the gate of the people, through which the kings of Judah go in and out; stand also at all the other gates of Jerusalem. ²⁰Say to them, 'Hear the word of the LORD, O kings of Judah and all people of Judah and everyone living in Jerusalem who come through these gates. ²¹This is what the LORD says: Be careful not to carry a load on the Sabbath day or bring it through the gates of Jerusalem. ²²Do not bring a load out of your houses or do any work on the Sabbath, but keep the Sabbath day holy, as I commanded your forefathers. ²³Yet they did not listen or pay attention; they were stiff-necked and would not listen or respond to discipline. ²⁴But if you are careful to obey me, declares the LORD, and bring no load through the gates of this city on the Sabbath, but keep the Sabbath day holy by not doing any work on it, ²⁵then kings who sit on David's throne will come through the gates of this city with their officials. They and their officials will come riding in chariots and on horses, accompanied by the men of Judah and those living in Jerusalem, and this city will be inhabited forever. ²⁶People will come from the towns of Judah and the villages around Jerusalem, from the territory of Benjamin and the western foothills, from the hill country and the Negev, bringing burnt offerings and sacrifices, grain offerings, incense and thank offerings to the house of the LORD. ²⁷But if you do not obey me to keep the Sabbath day holy by not carrying any load as you come through the gates of Jerusalem on the Sabbath day, then I will kindle an unquenchable fire in the gates of Jerusalem that will consume her fortresses."

Original Meaning

JEREMIAH 17 CONTINUES the pattern of collecting the prophet's disparate sayings according to topics. Readers will find more than one theme or subject matter in these verses, although they are concerned primarily to communicate the reasons for the failure of Judah and Jerusalem, primarily its sinful condition. This chapter offers no indication of a precise setting in Jeremiah's life for this report or any of the poetic material.

The prophet has adopted and adapted some well-known traditions in both poetry and prose to make his case. One theme is the corruption of the human heart (17:1, 5, 9). Another appears to be an adaptation of Psalm 1 to indicate the self-incurred failure of human pride (Jer. 17:5–8). Verses 9–11 are almost proverbial in form and draw on the sapiential traditions (cf. Prov.

16:1–9). There is even praise of God in this chapter (Jer. 17:12–14), which leads the prophet to lament his circumstances and to pray for judgment on his persecutors (17:15–18). Finally, in a prose report the Lord urges Jeremiah to stand in public and proclaim the significance of the Sabbath as a means of honoring God and preserving a form of spiritual order to public life (17:19–27). Failure to keep the Sabbath will result in judgment on Judah and Jerusalem; thus the chapter ends with the familiar claim of divine judgment to come.

17:1–4. This brief passage—that Judah has rejected God's instruction and will be judged accordingly—is similar to many preceding parts. For example, Jeremiah spoke metaphorically about the heart before. Judah's heart is in need of circumcision (4:4; 9:25). The people are "senseless" (5:21; lit., "without heart"); they have "stubborn and rebellious hearts" (5:23; 7:24; 9:14; 11:8). Here the metaphor is also a play on the formulation of the Decalogue as the content of God's covenant with Israel: "He declared to you his covenant, the Ten Commandments, which he commanded you to follow and then wrote them on two stone tablets" (Deut. 4:13). Judah's sinfulness is described as "engraved with an iron tool ... on the tablets of their hearts." This metaphor underscores the indelible nature of sin and its corrosive effects on the people.

Verse 2 mentions the "Asherah poles" (NIV) as evidence for Judah's defection from the Lord, along with the people's embracing of false worship. The Hebrew word is 'ašerim, a plural word literally meaning Asherahs. The NIV assumes that the plural refers to a cultic implement, and this is likely correct, whether a pole or tree or some other totem object. Asherah is also the name of a goddess worshiped in the ancient world. In recent years several inscriptions have been discovered in and around the ancient territory of Judah that mention Asherah in the singular. On more than one occasion there is the reference to "YHWH and his Asherah." These texts demonstrate a kind of unhealthy syncretism, if not outright polytheism, from the time of Jeremiah and other prophets. According to 2 Kings 23:4–7, part of King Josiah's reforming measures in the temple precincts were the destruction of vessels made for Baal and Asherah, the removal of the Asherah (an idol? NIV "Asherah pole"), and the tearing down of weaving areas for Asherah.

Once more the prophet employs the familiar metaphor of inheritance (nah^ala) to speak of judgment. Canaan is actually the Lord's inheritance, but the people were granted a life in it as part of God's covenant promises to them. Punishment means they will lose their place in his inheritance.³ This is tantamount to saying they have lost their place in the household (i.e., family) of the Lord.

- 17:5–8. This passage reads like a "play" (i.e., a serious pun) on Psalm 1. Jeremiah draws a contrast between the one who is cursed ('arur') and the one who is blessed (baruk). These two terms are used in the great listings of curses and blessings in Deuteronomy 27–28. The contrast is between trust in human effort and design, and reliance on God.
- 17:9–13. These verses elaborate on the theme of the previous unit. Human commitments, and especially the deeds that proceed from them, have consequences that an observant person should take to heart. Two verses are like a proverb in their brief "systems analysis." (1) Verse 9 represents the heart as the seat of human deceitfulness. The depths of its possible depravity are difficult to measure. Indeed, only God can accurately measure it. According to verse 10, this knowledge, which belongs to God, enables him to "reward a man according to his conduct." The connection between act and consequence is important in the wisdom traditions of the Old Testament (e.g., Proverbs). Such a connection is further elaboration of the blessing-and-curse contrast presented in the previous unit. Part of what God does in overseeing blessings and curses is to connect the disposition of the human heart and the deeds that flow from it. This is not a law of physics but the operation of a sovereign God, who cannot be bound rigidly by a formula.
- (2) Verse 11 is another proverbial statement: Riches gained unjustly are like a bird hatching eggs it did not lay. Here again the connection between act and consequence is set out. Jeremiah's use of this proverb suggests a connection between Judah's "gains" from idolatry and the sad loss of its land and freedom. Only a fool (nabal) would want such gains.
- 17:12–13. These two verses join the blessing of the sanctuary (almost certainly the one in Jerusalem) with God's presence as "the spring of living water" (cf. 2:13). That God is "the hope of Israel" has been used by Jeremiah before (14:8).

17:14–18. Here is another of Jeremiah's laments. Verse 14 draws a connection between healing and saving. Healing likely means the kind of restoration of emotional spirit and physical well-being that only God can grant. Since Jeremiah has been the object of scorn and ridicule as well as physical oppression (e.g., 20:1–6; 38:1–13), his acceptance by God is crucial to his survival. In verse 15 the prophet reports to God that he has been verbally abused by those who ridicule his prophecies. Their question ("Where is the word of the LORD?") points to the as-yet unfulfilled prophecies of disaster.

In poignant fashion the prophet reminds God that he has walked the path of discipleship. He has taken no joy in announcing a day of despair. It is almost as if waiting for the prophecies of disaster to be fulfilled has made Jeremiah feel separated from God, so he prays that God will be his "refuge" when disaster falls. He also prays that God will deal strictly with his persecutors, so that they will know for certain that the prophecies Jeremiah delivered have come to pass and that in opposing Jeremiah they were opposing the word and prophet sent by God.

17:19–29. This is an autobiographical report in prose. It functions like a sermon on the fourth commandment of the Decalogue (Deut. 5:12–15) to keep the Sabbath day holy. Some scholars see in this section an example of editorial work, whereby the compilers of Jeremiah's prophecies added a statement on the importance of the Sabbath for exilic or early postexilic readers. Since it is generally acknowledged that the institution of the Sabbath grew in importance in the exilic and postexilic periods, there is a certain plausibility to this conclusion.

It is just as plausible, however, that one of Jeremiah's own forms of prophetic indictment includes a reference to the people's failure to maintain the integrity of the Sabbath day and that this indictment is intended to instruct the communities in exile, who had questions about the status of their covenant relationship with the Lord. In his temple sermon, Jeremiah charged the people with several failures, including theft, murder, and perjury (Jer. 7:9). These terms come from the Decalogue. The charge of violating the Sabbath is simply another example of his using normative covenant traditions in his critique of the people.

Jeremiah's minisermon on the Sabbath, furthermore, has the familiar "two-way" formulation. This is entirely in keeping with the poetic texts that precede it. For example, the blessing or curse formulation in 17:5–8 is a brief exposition of the two-way paradigm. Here, keeping the Sabbath holy will result in receiving God's blessing, while failure to do so will bring destruction on Jerusalem.

Note that Jeremiah's specific accusation concerns carrying loads on the Sabbath, (i.e., working rather than refraining from labor). Resting from work helped make the Sabbath day holy. If God's people honor him by keeping the Sabbath, then not only Jerusalem but the various regions of Judah will be inhabited, and right worship will be offered to the Lord. This is the one place in the chapter that suggests a role for repentance and renewed obedience to God's law.

Bridging Contexts

THE SINFUL HUMAN CONDITION. The repeated references to the corruption of the heart in chapter 17 indicate the seriousness of Judah's predicament; this failure is deeply rooted in the essence of Judah's identity before God. The same sense of corruption and failure is true in the broader critique in 17:5–11. Jeremiah's portrayal of human fallibility has links with other biblical writers (Old and New Testament), who in varying degrees see sinfulness not just as a harmful deed or process but as a condition of human existence.

The prophetic critique, generally speaking, saw human sinfulness as a condition that mitigated against Israel or Judah's ability to reform themselves. If the human heart was corrupt and seemingly incapable of reformation, then Ezekiel, Jeremiah's younger contemporary, would proclaim nevertheless that Judah should make for itself a new heart and new spirit (Ezek. 18:31). But can reformation be done adequately from the human side? Note how this same prophet proclaimed that God would be the One to give his people a new heart and spirit so that they might walk in obedience to his commandments (Ezek. 11:19; 36:26; cf. Deut. 30:6; Jer. 24:7).

Corruption is not something to be defined in rational terms, for it can manifest itself in mysterious ways, nor is it amenable to easy explanation or removal. Indeed, sinfulness as a condition of human existence is not something to be "fixed" by human effort. Jesus noted that it is not what goes into a person that causes permanent defilement (such as a particular food), but what proceeds from the human heart (i.e., the volitional center of an individual) that demonstrates corruption (Mark 7:20–23). Paul assumed the moral and spiritual bankruptcy of the human species, and he understood the advent of Christ as God's decisive countermeasure (Rom. 1:16–3:26).

Modern Western people begin from a doctrine of individuality that makes the corporate thinking of biblical writers more difficult to grasp. One of the necessary bridges from Jeremiah's world to modernity is to work with the more individualistic mentality of the present so that people can affirm the truths of a common humanity (before God!) and the insights of someone like Reinhold Niebuhr, whose classic work on *Moral Man and Immoral Society*⁷ points out how all people participate in a social identity that defines, at least in part, who they are.

A primary reason why human sinfulness is so devastating is that the condition is terminal. Corruption and sin beget more of the same, and that vicious cycle can only be broken from God's side. The rhetorical question of Paul, "Who will rescue me from this body of death?" (Rom. 7:24), has been answered from God's side. Jeremiah's own proclamation fits this orientation: Only God can heal Judah's brokenness. In Jeremiah's world (or that of the New Testament), people did not think in modern psychological terms, and such concepts as repentance or new birth were not submerged into a therapeutic model (as is often the case in modernity). It is not necessarily wrong to cast the human plight in behavioral terms such as addiction or compulsion as long as one acknowledges the terminal condition and human culpability (the scriptural claim of sinfulness).

The Sabbath. Jeremiah's words about the Sabbath partake of the larger biblical teaching about the sanctity of the seventh day and the requirement that Israel be holy as the Lord their God is holy (Lev. 19:2). The sanctification of the Sabbath is the bridge commandment in the Decalogue (Ex. 20:8–11), mediating between those commands to relate rightly to God (20:3–7) and those commands to relate rightly to one's family and neighbor (20:12–17). Sabbath-keeping is a pattern rooted in divine disclosure (Gen. 2:1–3) and an activity blessed by God. Although Jesus offered severe criticism of a legalistic interpretation of the Sabbath (e.g., Mark 2:24–3:6), he acknowledged its divine origin and purpose.

The shift on the part of most churches to worship on the first day of the week (Sunday) is an example of bridging the gap between Jeremiah's world and Christian affirmation. Christ's resurrection on the Sunday morning of the first Easter has given a new orientation to the Sabbath injunctions for rest and holiness.

Contemporary Significance

THOUGHTS ON HUMAN SINFULNESS. Jeremiah's assumptions about human sinfulness contribute to a fuller biblical doctrine of sin. In contemporary Western culture, where individual culpability is seldom discussed apart from the decision of law courts, a concept of corporate human failure has also waned as a significant issue for discussion. Recovering the doctrine of the corporate nature of sin and its universal effects on individuals is a necessary condition for the proclamation that God has spoken decisively to the world in Jesus Christ.

In the modern West, among the places perhaps to start a conversation is the prevalence of addictive behavior, racism, and random violence. All three of these phenomena in Western societies are symptomatic of larger issues of human existence, and they stand under the judgment of God's Word. Nevertheless, they defy easy explanation or cure. They are irrational, and they lead to more of the same in spirals of self-destruction.

Perhaps another way to hear these words of Jeremiah for today is to see the increasing secularization of society as a judgment rooted in the hubris of the human heart. Most versions of secularization in the West (myths of progress and technological security) are ultimately foolish attempts at selfdeification. Their fruits will not be technological emancipation from human problems, but like the partridge with eggs it did not hatch, humankind will find that it does not possess the key to its own salvation.

Keeping the Sabbath. Jeremiah informs his contemporaries that keeping the Sabbath is one of the keys to honoring God. In essence he says: "Don't work." There is nothing explicit about worshiping on the Sabbath in Jeremiah's minisermon. In fact, one can search the whole Bible and find little about worshiping on the Sabbath. This fact should not be misunderstood; the Bible has a lot to say about the worship of God, but the Sabbath day is not the place for that discussion. "Don't work," Jeremiah says. If you go to the Decalogue, it is the same. There is nothing direct about worship in the fourth commandment; rather, it is to set the Sabbath day apart. That is what holiness means. Even God followed that pattern in creation (Gen. 1:24–31).

For many people, it is easy to draw a negative image from the insistence on "no work," and even easier to think immediately of Jesus' reply to the Pharisees: "The Sabbath was made for man, not man for the Sabbath" (Mark 2:27). Many sermons have been preached about Jewish legalism and the Sabbath with the goal of convincing Christians that Sunday (the Christian "Sabbath") should not fall prey to Pharisaical legalism. Of course Christians don't want to be legalists, but isn't it ironic that the Sabbath commandment not to work has become identified in the minds of some Christians with works righteousness and legalism, a kind of external religion? Christians don't want to make the Sabbath rest a negative institution, but does this commendable goal also inevitably blunt the force of the Sabbath commandment for modern appropriation?

Christians don't have to identify the Sabbath day with Saturday or Sunday nor think of a Sabbath rest in a legalistic way as a twenty-four-hour period (Col. 2:16–17). But what should they do? This will vary somewhat from culture to culture, but for many middle-class Christians in North America, perhaps the Sabbath commandment can point to a way of living that says work and busy schedules do not define us. Rather than thinking about the Sabbath as a legalistic prop for works righteousness, perhaps one should think of the Sabbath rest as a supreme example of God's grace. What could be more grace oriented than a refusal to live by work and through human achievement? Perhaps a Christian Sabbath can become a sign in a busy, tension-packed world that disciples will not live by work alone but through the rest and renewal that comes from God. Perhaps the sanctifying of a day or period in the week for rest can become a provisional illustration to the world of faithful Christian existence, where one is initiated in the process of loving God and enjoying him forever.

THIS IS THE word that came to Jeremiah from the LORD: ²"Go down to the potter's house, and there I will give you my message." ³So I went down to the potter's house, and I saw him working at the wheel. ⁴But the pot he was shaping from the clay was marred in his hands; so the potter formed it into another pot, shaping it as seemed best to him.

5Then the word of the LORD came to me: 6"O house of Israel, can I not do with you as this potter does?" declares the LORD. "Like clay in the hand of the potter, so are you in my hand, O house of Israel. ⁷If at any time I announce that a nation or kingdom is to be uprooted, torn down and destroyed, ⁸and if that nation I warned repents of its evil, then I will relent and not inflict on it the disaster I had planned. ⁹And if at another time I announce that a nation or kingdom is to be built up and planted, ¹⁰and if it does evil in my sight and does not obey me, then I will reconsider the good I had intended to do for it.

¹¹"Now therefore say to the people of Judah and those living in Jerusalem, 'This is what the LORD says: Look! I am preparing a disaster for you and devising a plan against you. So turn from your evil ways, each one of you, and reform your ways and your actions.' ¹²But they will reply, 'It's no use. We will continue with our own plans; each of us will follow the stubbornness of his evil heart.'"

¹³Therefore this is what the Lord says:

"Inquire among the nations:
Who has ever heard anything like this?

A most horrible thing has been done by Virgin Israel.

14Does the snow of Lebanon ever vanish from its rocky slopes?

Do its cool waters from distant sources ever cease to flow?

15Yet my people have forgotten me;
they burn incense to worthless idols, which made them stumble in their ways and in the ancient paths.

They made them walk in bypaths and on roads not built up.

¹⁶Their land will be laid waste, an object of lasting scorn; all who pass by will be appalled and will shake their heads.

¹⁷Like a wind from the east, I will scatter them before their enemies:

I will show them my back and not my face in the day of their disaster."

¹⁸They said, "Come, let's make plans against Jeremiah; for the teaching of the law by the priest will not be lost, nor will counsel from the wise, nor the word from the prophets. So come, let's attack him with our tongues and pay no attention to anything he says."

19 Listen to me, O LORD;
 hear what my accusers are saying!
 20 Should good be repaid with evil?
 Yet they have dug a pit for me.
 Remember that I stood before you and spoke in their behalf to turn your wrath away from them.
 21 So give their children over to famine; hand them over to the power of the sword.

Let their wives be made childless and widows; let their men be put to death, their young men slain by the sword in ²²Let a cry be heard from their houses when you suddenly bring invaders against them, battle.

for they have dug a pit to capture me and have hidden snares for my feet.

23But you know, O LORD,
all their plots to kill me.
Do not forgive their crimes or blot out their sins from your sight.
Let them be overthrown before you; deal with them in the time of your anger.

19:1This is what the LORD says: "Go and buy a clay jar from a potter. Take along some of the elders of the people and of the priests ² and go out to the Valley of Ben Hinnom, near the entrance of the Potsherd Gate. There proclaim the words I tell you, ³and say, 'Hear the word of the LORD, O kings of Judah and people of Jerusalem. This is what the LORD Almighty, the God of Israel, says: Listen! I am going to bring a disaster on this place that will make the ears of everyone who hears of it tingle.

⁴For they have forsaken me and made this a place of foreign gods; they have burned sacrifices in it to gods that neither they nor their fathers nor the kings of Judah ever knew, and they have filled this place with the blood of the innocent. ⁵They have built the high places of Baal to burn their sons in the fire as offerings to Baal—something I did not command or mention, nor did it enter my mind. ⁶So beware, the days are coming, declares the LORD, when people will no longer call this place Topheth or the Valley of Ben Hinnom, but the Valley of Slaughter.

⁷"In this place I will ruin the plans of Judah and Jerusalem. I will make them fall by the sword before their enemies, at the hands of those who seek their lives, and I will give their carcasses as food to the birds of the air and the beasts of the earth. ⁸I will devastate this city and make it an object of scorn; all who pass by will be appalled and will scoff because of all its wounds. ⁹I will make them eat the flesh of their sons and daughters, and they will eat one another's flesh during the stress of the siege imposed on them by the enemies who seek their lives.'

10"Then break the jar while those who go with you are watching, ¹¹ and say to them, 'This is what the LORD Almighty says: I will smash this nation and this city just as this potter's jar is smashed and cannot be repaired. They will bury the dead in Topheth until there is no more room. ¹²This is what I will do to this place and to those who live here, declares the LORD. I will make this city like Topheth. ¹³The houses in Jerusalem and those of the kings of Judah will be defiled like this place, Topheth—all the houses where they burned incense on the roofs to all the starry hosts and poured out drink offerings to other gods."

¹⁴Jeremiah then returned from Topheth, where the LORD had sent him to prophesy, and stood in the court of the LORD's temple and said to all the people, ¹⁵"This is what the LORD Almighty, the God of Israel, says: 'Listen! I am going to bring on this city and the villages around it every disaster I pronounced against them, because they were stiffnecked and would not listen to my words.'"

Original Meaning

THESE TWO CHAPTERS do not preserve dates in Jeremiah's career, and it is possible, but not necessary, to interpret them as recording two successive acts of the prophet. But it is also possible that the events of visiting a potter and visiting the Valley of Ben Hinnom to break a pot are separated by months or even years. Probably the two accounts are placed together as part of a catchword principle or the habit of topical collection (both deal with prophetic signs using pottery). In any case, there is much to be said for taking the two chapters together. Both function in this book as a means of illustrating the slide of Judah into irreversible failure. They are linked, furthermore, with chapter 20, where Jeremiah is publicly humiliated (cf. 20:1).

The basic literary units of the two chapters may be set out as follows:

- A. 18:1–17: The prose description of a visit to the potter's house (vv. 1–12) is followed by a poetic oracle of God's response (vv. 13–17).
- B. 18:18: Jeremiah's opponents plan an attack on him.
- C. 18:19–22: Jeremiah laments his circumstances and prays for vindication.
- D. 19:1–13: Jeremiah takes a pot to the Valley of Ben Hinnom and breaks it as a symbol of God's judgment to come.
- E. 19:14–15: Jeremiah goes to the temple to announce God's judgment on the land.
- 18:1–17. Readers receive an account of Jeremiah's visit to a potter's workshop and commentary on its significance. Verse 1 is clearly the work of Jeremiah's editor(s). What is reported, however, has an autobiographical element still preserved (the "I" of 18:3; the "me" of 18:5). For his contemporaries, Jeremiah's visit to the workshop and his announcement of God's word have the profile of a symbolic act, what might be termed a parable in action. Jeremiah's readers and hearers can use their imagination to envisage the workshop and the efforts of a potter to shape wet clay into a vessel ready to be fired and then used as a container.

God (the potter) has the sovereign right to make and remake the clay as he sees fit. Wet clay is malleable, which means it is capable of being formed in a variety of shapes. But it is also capable of collapsing its shape or of being ill-mixed and thus unsuitable for firing. Not just any wet clay will do, and not just any individual can shape a vessel properly. It takes a correct mixture of clay and the skills of a trained artisan to form² a pot for successful firing.

The meaning of this illustration is clear. Just as the potter may form and reform the same clay until he is either satisfied or decides to dump the clay completely, so God can form and reform the house of Israel. "Like clay in the hand of the potter, so are you in my hand, O house of Israel" (v. 6). This affirmation of God's sovereign right over the people he has formed is followed by the "two-way" formulation of God's dealings with any nation. If God announces judgment on a nation and that nation repents, then that judgment can be reversed or simply canceled. Correspondingly, if God has announced goodness for a kingdom and it acts faithlessly, then that good can also be reversed. The Hebrew verbs used for "uproot," "tear down," and "destroy" in verse 7 and those for "build" and "plant" in verse 9 are the same ones used in the call of Jeremiah to be a prophet to the nations (1:10).

The two-way formulation implies that a wholehearted repentance on the part of Judah can avert the judgment that looms over them. If so, it seems likely that this passage comes from an earlier period in the prophet's public ministry, when he held out the hope that Judah and Jerusalem could make the necessary changes in public life.³ Verse 12, however, puts a quote in the mouth of the people to the effect that they will follow their own stubborn heart. This quote, of course, is Jeremiah's portrait of them, based on their actions and (non-)reception of his prophecies. Judah will not repent, and irrevocable judgment will come.

God does not take "no" for an answer easily. The poetic reply in verses 13–17 begins with an indignant question: "Who has ever heard anything like this?" (cf. also the incredulous charge in 2:10). An appalling thing has happened; God's people have forgotten him and worshiped other deities, worthless idols unable to help them. Verse 17 has a surprising metaphorical "turn" to it: In the coming day of judgment, God will show his "back" ('orep)⁴ to the people and not his face.

18:18–23. Jeremiah's opponents are again the issue. In verse 18 they intend to attack him verbally and pay no attention to anything he says. Their persecution of the prophet shows that they have also rejected God's word to them (and to Judah) that Jeremiah represents. They prefer the words of other mediators of God's will to the judgmental pronouncements of Jeremiah. Note the three forms of mediating God's will: the priest with tora (NIV "law"), counsel from the wise, and the word from the prophet. The point seems to be that although they reject Jeremiah, they will not lack for other sources of guidance.

In verses 19–23, in another personal lament, Jeremiah prays for God's judgment on his enemies. His harsh words come in the context of a prayer for vindication from God and for a temporal judicial sentence by God on those who malign him. The metaphor he uses is that of a pit dug by his opponents (18:20, 22), a pit designed to catch him. It is a hunting image, a trap laid to catch prey, but also a proverbial symbol. Jeremiah prays, in essence, that his enemies may fall into the pit they have dug. He asks God to oversee the consequences of their acts rather than for a personal opportunity to judge them. Since they have committed an evil in attacking an innocent person, may the evil they intend fall back on them.

19:1–13. God now instructs Jeremiah to perform another symbolic act (a parable in action), also with a pottery jar. Presumably the actions described were carried out, though only the instructions and a brief report in 19:14–15 remain. God commands Jeremiah to buy an earthenware jar and to take a group of elders and priests to the Valley of Ben Hinnom where the Topheth, a place for human sacrificial rites, is located. This valley is situated immediately south of the temple mount area and continues to the western side of the old city of Jerusalem. Before he breaks the jar in the valley of slaughter and burial, Jeremiah must prophesy judgment on the kings of Judah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem. The failures of these addressees are listed as the worship of other gods, the spilling of innocent blood, and especially the worship of Baal through the burning of children in a sacrificial fire.

With the breaking of the jar, Jeremiah indicates the irrevocable judgment to come. Just as the smashed earthenware cannot be repaired, Judah cannot be reformed. For original hearers and readers there is likely added significance to the earthenware pot. The Topheth was not only the place of ceremonial slaughter; it likely also contained a section where earthenware jars with the charred remains of sacrificial victims were collected. Similar places are known in Phoenicia (Tyre and Achzib) and among Phoenician colonies in the western Mediterranean (e.g., Carthage).

Jeremiah understands the Topheth as a place of defilement and its earthenware jars as symbolic of slaughter. Indeed, he gives the valley a devastating nickname—"the Valley of Slaughter" (cf. 7:32, where the same name change is given). Judgment will come on Jerusalem in such a way that there will be no other place to bury the dead except in the Topheth, the place of ritual slaughter and cultic defilement. One of the characteristics of Topheth is the crowded nature of the burial section, where pots full of bones and charred remains are stacked together.

19:14–15. Jeremiah leaves the Topheth and goes to the courtyard of the temple to proclaim that God will "bring on this city and the villages around it every disaster I pronounced against them, because they were stiff-necked and would not listen to my words." His presence in the temple courtyard is tantamount to bringing the defilement of the Topheth into the temple, as any reader familiar with the purity laws of the Old Testament would recognize (a cemetery or a corpse rendered a person ceremonially unclean). Furthermore, the reference to "stiff-necked" people catches up the failure of the people to recognize the possibility of repentance that was announced as possible in 18:7–11.

Bridging Contexts

THE EDITORIAL ARRANGEMENT of chapters 18–19 is a key to how the original acts and words of Jeremiah are to instruct later readers. From the potter's workshop, through the prophetic lament of persecution, to the shattering scene at the Topheth, the progression of the accounts confirms Judah's guilt and the irrevocable judgment on the historical horizon. Later readers are told in no uncertain terms why Judah fell to the Babylonians. It was God's just judgment. With the enumeration of Judah's sins, later readers are also asked to search their own lives to see if they too are guilty of these failings.

On interpreting prophecies. In addition to the instruction about the past, later readers are confronted with a teaching about the prophetic word that opens their present and future to God (18:7–11). How should they interpret unconditional prophecies of judgment or peace? Concerning judgment, Jeremiah announces that God will "relent" when people repent of their evil deeds. Correspondingly, God will "reconsider" the good when a people fall into sinful behavior. Some prophecies explicitly contain conditional elements within their formal structure. The issue for later readers, however, is whether unconditional prophecies should be understood as determinism (as unalterable) or as an expression of God's resolve to act in light of particular circumstances, a resolve that may change as historical circumstances themselves change and as God moves toward the fulfillment of his temporal purposes to a yet grander design.

With respect to the word "relent" (Heb. nḥm) in Jer. 18:8, some translations render it as "repent." The theological issue at stake is not God's repentance from evil or whether God is fickle; rather, the issue is how to account for the personal activity of God who responds as Judge and Deliverer in the historical process. Jonah, for example, did not understand God as fickle when God "relented" over Nineveh's changed circumstances. The prophet believed all along that God was slow to anger and abundant in mercy—and for that reason, he knew that God might use Jonah's own unconditional prophecy of judgment as a means by which to effect change in Nineveh (Jonah 3:1–4:11).

The question of interpreting prophecies about the future is a fundamental one for interpreters who wish to bring God's announcements about the future from the Old Testament into the present: How is God the final interpreter of his own Word? Some interpreters will see in prophecy a blueprint for things as yet unrealized; others will see primarily a teaching about God's moral resolve that preserves his freedom to act in surprising ways.

In Jer. 18:12 the indictment of the people because of their stubborn and evil heart catches up the theme of the heart's corruption in the larger context. The saying also sets the stage for the portrayal of the people as "stiff-necked" in 19:15. God will hold true to his announced judgment where an ingrained evil is in evidence; but even so, the possibility of change is open to the descendants of the evil generation as God uses even the harsh words of a previous judgment to call his people to repentance.

Potter and clay. The potter's workshop takes up the theme of God's sovereignty over the things he has made. It is the right of the potter (who knows what potential the clay has) to remake and to reform a vessel until it is suitable. At an interpretive level, this analogy of potter and clay fits the question of God and unconditional prophecy. Theological reflection begins by asking the purpose for which God sent a prophetic word in the past. God may reshape his future dealings with his people in light of what that Word accomplishes among them or among those who read it (even much later). It is not so much a single fulfillment of prophecy that Christians should look for as a constant encounter with prophecy and with the God who makes sovereign use of prophecy in different contexts.

Paul took up this analogy of potter and clay in his reflection on the state of Israel according to the flesh and God's larger design in calling the Gentiles to new life in Christ (Rom. 9–11). It is God's sovereign right as the "potter" to make a common vessel (and to judge it) as it is to select one for special service (9:19–21). The apostle saw in God's sending of Christ the outworking of a plan to bind all over "to disobedience so that he may have mercy on them all" (11:32). God's sovereign mercy is the foundation of the apostle's wrestling with the difficult subject of Israel's disobedience and her future. He was convinced that Israel's rejection of Christ as the Messiah was a hardening of the heart that God could use. It would not mean the final rejection of Israel but the opportunity for the Gentiles. God is a merciful and righteous "potter," not a puppet master pulling chains.

Persecution and vindication. In his lament over his circumstances Jeremiah once again finds himself in the setting reserved for prophets and disciples. He is persecuted and rejected by contemporaries because of his words and deeds. As a result he prays for God's judgment on the persecutors. Readers do well to remember that what Jeremiah seeks is judicial sentencing, not personal vengeance. At the same time, we see the amazing grace of the Christ who prays for his enemies when we recognize the legitimacy of Jeremiah's lament and his desire for vindication. Grace is indeed unmerited favor when someone is faced with the legitimacy of judgment.

Contemporary Significance

WORDS OF JUDGMENT. As with the previous words of judgment in Jeremiah, one avenue of appropriation moves along the way of demonstrating God's righteousness in the face of ingrained evil. Since the book is filled with passages proclaiming judgment, modern readers are given many opportunities to reflect on God's ways with the world. If, for example, we see the hand of God judging the failures of communism in the fall of the Berlin Wall, are we able to see any correcting hand in the Vietnam War and its tragic aftermath or in the continuing struggles over civil rights? Some, perhaps many, North American Christians may want to equivocate in assessing these last two matters, but Christians from other cultures may want to encourage North Americans to take a second, prayerful look for a judging and correcting hand. The emphasis on judgment and on Judah's failure to repent can be instructive to modern readers, if only to remind them that it is an awesome thing to fall into the hands of the living God.

The symbolic acts of the prophet (potter's workshop, broken jar) remind us that ministry calls for the embracing of society and even the embodiment of God's message through acts of service. Jesus' own ministry, whether in judgment or deliverance, was replete with symbolic acts and signs that conveyed the essence of his message. Jeremiah's confession that he had stood before God and prayed for the people (Jer. 18:20) is testimony to the cost of discipleship. A community that has not prayed for the lost and has not interceded for the wicked will not be able to have a prophetic ministry.

God's word of judgment is not unalterable for those with ears to hear and eyes to see. The wonder of Jeremiah's announcement that God can "relent" and "reconsider" is not that God can change approaches to bring about his purposes. It is the wonder that God opens up ways of transformation and change in the midst of sinful and painful circumstances. What is resistant to change is not God's messages about the future but people stuck in self-destructive activities.

God's sovereignty. Jeremiah's description of the potter opens up avenues to explore the classical doctrine of God's sovereignty. It is usually fruitless to discuss God's power and purpose in the abstract. Power for what and about whom? A philosophical description can constrict and thereby control, since it is anthropologically generated. God's power, what is often called God's omnipotence, is known in relationship. Similarly with respect to God's goodness and predestination, his power and goodness are discovered in relationship and only acknowledged adequately by those who have committed themselves to know God. The proclamation that God judged Judah is not news of interest to later readers unless it somehow instructs them about the ways of God, to whom they too are related by confession.

Confidence in the potter comes finally in knowing the potter, not in observing him spin the wheel and shape the clay from the vantage point of a supposed neutrality. The Pauline reflection on the potter (Rom. 9:18–24) develops this point profoundly and in a manner consistent with the book of Jeremiah. The clay does not have the right to question the potter; but much more significant is the claim that the potter has intentions of preparing vessels for his glory and fit for his mercy. In the process of fulfilling these purposes, vessels can be shaped and reshaped and used in ways not understood by the vessels themselves. Their "essence" is not thereby violated but taken up and used by the God of grace.

In authentic discussions about God's purpose and goodness, there is an inherent reference to a future entrusted to God; it is a future not completely understood from a finite human perspective. One is called to trust in the work of the potter, to walk by faith and not by sight, and to accept God's judgment in the present in the hope that the Potter will reshape the future.

Certainly one of the stupendous events of the twentieth century happened with the collapse of Soviet domination of Eastern Europe, beginning with the fall of the Berlin Wall in November 1989. The impact of this collapse is still being worked out. Each state has its own version of the impact as do the churches in the region. Can anyone say for sure where the collapse will lead? No Christian should doubt the role of God in this process; the contribution of the churches to the collapse is widely recognized. Here is a paradigm of the surprising providence of God being worked out. Was the collapse predicted in the Old Testament? Not precisely, but the God who reshapes history and speaks authoritatively is revealed in the Old Testament, and he is still at work.

WHEN THE PRIEST Pashhur son of Immer, the chief officer in the temple of the LORD, heard Jeremiah prophesying these things, ²he had Jeremiah the prophet beaten and put in the stocks at the Upper Gate of Benjamin at the LORD's temple. ³The next day, when Pashhur released him from the stocks, Jeremiah said to him, "The LORD's name for you is not Pashhur, but Magor-Missabib. ⁴For this is what the LORD says: 'I will make you a terror to yourself and to all your friends; with your own eyes you will see them fall by the sword of their enemies. I will hand all Judah over to the king of Babylon, who will carry them away to Babylon or put them to the sword. ⁵I will hand over to their enemies all the wealth of this city—all its products, all its valuables and all the treasures of the kings of Judah. They will take it away as plunder and carry it off to Babylon. ⁶And you, Pashhur, and all who live in your house will go into exile to Babylon. There you will die and be buried, you and all your friends to whom you have prophesied lies."

⁷O LORD, you deceived me, and I was deceived; you overpowered me and prevailed. I am ridiculed all day long; everyone mocks me.
⁸Whenever I speak, I cry out proclaiming violence and destruction.
So the word of the LORD has brought me insult and reproach all day long.
⁹But if I say, "I will not mention him or speak any more in his name," his word is in my heart like a fire, a fire shut up in my bones.

I am weary of holding it in; indeed, I cannot.

10 I hear many whispering, "Terror on every side! Report him! Let's report him!" All my friends are waiting for me to slip, saying, "Perhaps he will be deceived; then we will prevail over him and take our revenge on him."

11 But the LORD is with me like a mighty warrior; so my persecutors will stumble and not prevail.
They will fail and be thoroughly disgraced; their dishonor will never be forgotten.
12 O LORD Almighty, you who examine the righteous and probe the heart and mind, let me see your vengeance upon them, for to you I have committed my cause.

13Sing to the LORD!

Give praise to the LORD!

He rescues the life of the needy from the hands of the wicked.

14Cursed be the day I was born!
May the day my mother bore me not be blessed!
15Cursed be the man who brought my father the news, who made him very glad, saying, "A child is born to you—a son!"
16May that man be like the towns the LORD overthrew without pity.

May he hear wailing in the morning, a battle cry at noon.

¹⁷For he did not kill me in the womb, with my mother as my grave, her womb enlarged forever.

¹⁸Why did I ever come out of the womb to see trouble and sorrow and to end my days in shame?

Original Meaning

THE CHAPTER MAY BE DIVIDED into two parts: a prose account of Jeremiah's arrest and public humiliation (20:1–6), and a lengthy and poignant personal lament/complaint (20:7–18). The poetic lament perhaps combines material from two different settings, put together with the account of his humiliating incarceration to illustrate his emotional response. There is no reason to doubt, of course, that the bitter words of the lament reflect the way a person might react to human indignities. Nevertheless, it may not have been first composed by Jeremiah while in the stocks but something he took (and adapted?) from the traditional forms of lament/complaint and applied to his circumstances. Whatever the origin(s) of these verses, they serve to illustrate the pain and frustration of the prophet as he suffers abuse at the hands of the religious establishment.

No date is provided for the chapter, but there is indirect evidence for the events in the reign of Jehoiakim (609–598 B.C.). The prediction that Pashhur will die in captivity in Babylon implies a date before 597. The majority of narrative accounts that are set in the period before Zedekiah's reign come from Jehoiakim's time as ruler. One cannot make too much of this, however, since the next chapter (which refers to a second Pashhur) dates to the reign of Zedekiah. Possibly the word against Pashhur the priest anticipates the fall of the city in 587/586. In either case, chapter 20 sums up a decisive period in Jeremiah's prophetic career as it is now laid out in the prophetic book; the painful prayer in 20:7–18 is the last in a series of personal laments/complaints, and it brings the wounded feelings of the prophet to a boiling point.

20:1–6. Pashhur, the priest who orders Jeremiah beaten and placed in the stocks, is from a well-known priestly division (Immer, 1 Chron. 24:14). He represents the religious establishment, especially the priests who care for and officiate at the temple. In fact, he is described as the "chief officer" at the temple. This probably means among other things that he heads the security detail for the large complex, providing oversight for the levitical personnel who keep the gates and who restrict access to and activities within the temple courts. Perhaps his role as chief officer explains his choice of the Upper Gate of Benjamin for the place of Jeremiah's temporary incarceration in the stocks. He controls that area; moreover, that location (likely on the north side of the temple complex) bears a lot of traffic.

Pashhur is from a segment of the population who prove to be some of Jeremiah's most persistent persecutors. The humiliation of being placed in the stocks² and beaten by a priest may have been especially galling for Jeremiah, since he too is from a priestly family. With the temple looming in the background, Jeremiah's treatment is portrayed as God's judgment on him, carried out by the priests who care for God's house. Upon his release, Jeremiah gives Pashhur a new name, "Magor-Missabib," which in Hebrew means "terror all around." This term occurs elsewhere in Jeremiah to describe the plight of Judah when the foe from the north comes against the state and its capital city (Jer. 6:25; cf. 46:5; 49:29).

Jeremiah announces in the name of the Lord that Pashhur has "prophesied lies" and that he will enter Babylon as a captive (v. 6). This is an interesting use of the verb "to prophesy." Pashhur is by profession a priest; there is no record about his speaking. Perhaps his actions against Jeremiah are a form of prophecy; they were most definitely "symbolic," in a sense not unlike Jeremiah's visit to the Valley of Hinnom and his coming to the temple complex to prophesy (19:14–15). Indeed, Jeremiah's prophetic witness in the temple may have prompted his arrest and thrashing. As a priest, however, Pashhur almost certainly took the opportunity to speak a word of judgment in public about Jeremiah and his actions. These would take the form of repudiating Jeremiah's words and actions and claiming divine judgment on him.

20:7–18. Jeremiah's lament is linked contextually to his humiliating and painful experience in the stocks. His words are by now (for sequential readers of the book) familiar, yet at the same time shocking.³ The prophet is persecuted because of "the word of the LORD" (20:8). His persecutors lie in wait to ambush him and ridicule him with his own phrase, "terror on every side" (20:10), as if to say that Jeremiah is a deluded madman who speaks incessantly about terror to come. In his frustration and bitterness Jeremiah accuses God of "deceiving" him (20:7), a strong term that can also refer to seduction.⁴ The prophet has reached his wits' end and is unable to articulate a sense that God will rescue him from this situation.

This dilemma is excruciating for Jeremiah. God's word is like a fire within him, and he is unable to resist the urge to speak, even if the "violence and destruction" of which he speaks brings ridicule and physical harassment. His frustration with God comes in the fact that Pashhur, a priest of God(!), had spoken against him and humiliated him in public. Had not God promised to be with Jeremiah and to protect him? Yet God's own official representative has carried out this attack on him.

Verse 11 affirms that God is indeed strong to save. In context this means that the prophet's persecutors will fail. The next verse affirms that God is an infallible Judge and will see to the judgment of the persecutors. Jeremiah's prayer in this respect takes on the form of setting his "cause" (rib) before God.

The prophet also rues the day he was born (20:14–18; cf. 15:10), as he, like Job, suffers unjustly. It is difficult to know whether the lament/complaint of 20:7–18 should be read sequentially, as if the movement of the prayer/complaint is significant. If so, it suggests that Jeremiah goes back and forth in his confidence and on his resolve to carry out his prophetic work. That should surprise no one who takes seriously the humiliation suffered in the Upper Gate.

Bridging Contexts

Persecution of the righteous. The account of Pashhur's humiliation of Jeremiah is but one in a long series of scriptural accounts of the persecution of the righteous. It is important to be clear here: Jeremiah is righteous, not perfect. There is a difference. He seeks to be faithful to the prophetic call given him by God. To this extent he is righteous. He is also innocent of criminal activity. In ancient Israel, someone who was innocent when accused of a crime was called righteous (saddiq).

Yet when Jeremiah is ridiculed and persecuted because of his prophetic calling, he becomes moody, seeking vindication in the public's eye because of his humiliation. His laments (including 20:7–13) make clear the reason for his persecution. From Joseph to David, and in a prophetic line from Elijah straight to Jeremiah, God's servants have faced opposition and persecution. David complained to God about his circumstances with respect to Saul's irrational persecution of him. Elijah fled to Mount Horeb to inform the Lord that he was the only one left who was zealous for the Lord, and Jezebel was after him (1 Kings 19:1–18). Disciples cry to God for sustenance and deliverance because their circumstances may require it!

Indeed, one can move forward through the line of faithful witnesses to John the Baptizer and the early Christian martyrs. The English term martyr is based on the Greek word for those who "bear witness" in times of persecution. This Greek word was applied to early Christians who gave testimony to their faith, often at the point of the sword. Christ himself is the greatest example of the phenomenon of righteous suffering, although his suffering is redemptive in a way that the others are not (see further under Contemporary Significance).

Jeremiah's lament/complaint takes up the voice of the innocent sufferer, whose words are common in the book of Psalms. To whom else can one turn with the burdens of the heart, if not to God? Jeremiah prays like the saints of the Psalter, who pour out their hearts to God. That Jeremiah's lament/complaint turns accusatory toward God probably results from two additional factors. (1) The more certain factor is the call of Jeremiah (Jer. 1:5–19), where the young prophet-to-be is assured of God's protection and ultimate vindication. "Where is God's vindication?" he must have wondered while in the stocks and the object of ridicule. (2) More subjectively perhaps, Jeremiah's human frailty makes him feel that God is finally responsible for his fate. Close to the end of his endurance, he wonders why God has led him down this path; and if God has so led him, will he be stretched beyond his limits and be abandoned after all?

Shame. Shame was a powerful mechanism in the ancient world, and Jeremiah suffers public shame for his attempt to be faithful to his prophetic call. In moving to a modern context, it may be important to explore the different ways in which shame is or (increasingly) is not influential. Is there a modern counterpart to the social force of shame in antiquity? It remains more or less in force in many non-Western settings, but it appears increasingly less influential in the modern West. In any case, Jeremiah's humanity is exposed for what it is: a condition where physical and emotional pain reach intense levels and he is in need of divine grace. Can God know how Jeremiah feels? Here is a bridge to Christology and a point of contact for all generations.

Contemporary Significance

REDEMPTIVE SUFFERING. It should not take much imagination on the part of Christians to see the parallels between Jeremiah's suffering and that of Christ's humiliation and suffering. Religious leaders complained about Christ and sought to trap him. He was humiliated in public and ultimately crucified. His cry of dereliction from the cross was taken directly from a psalm of lament/complaint (Ps. 22:1; Matt. 27:46; Mark 15:34). Perhaps most important, even the fate of the Son of God was cast into the hands of the Father, who seemed withdrawn at the moment.

But we should not rob Jeremiah of his humanity and the poignancy of his life by simply jumping to the New Testament and comparing him with Christ. He and other righteous sufferers are not "just like Christ." Their suffering, however poignant and unjust, is not redemptive for other people, although it can be instructive. One may, however, describe the prophet's life as a via dolorosa precisely because his public life and that of Christ are part of a larger pattern. Jeremiah suffers because he is a prophet of God. His suffering shares the suffering of God's people, and it is prophetic in the sense that it points to the perfect Mediator, whose suffering is representative of guilty and innocent suffering alike.

Those who oppose God's Word will oppose Jeremiah. It is the prophetic office that adorns Jeremiah's life and leads him down the path of suffering. In his public ministry Jesus brings the prophetic office of the Old Testament to fruition, and through his Sonship fills out the significance of a prophetic ministry in profound ways.

There is much to learn from the frank expression of Jeremiah's human limitations. One may—with Christ's help—bear innocent suffering with a certain grace. But it is no failure of Jeremiah's that he feels crushed by the burdens of the prophetic office. What he gets finally is a taste of the insidious opposition to the Word of God that cloaks itself in all manner of religiosity and patriotism. He experiences the sinking feeling that not only is all lost but that God seems involved in his pain. It will take the humiliation of Christ for the redemptive element of suffering to emerge, but in his own way Jeremiah suffers on our behalf. He demonstrates what it is like to feel the burdens of human failure and personal frustration as a part of his calling, and he does so to instruct us about the cost of discipleship and also for a testimony that God is faithful still—beyond our finite comprehension and in spite of our complaints.

Recently Carlos Lavernia, a Texan convicted of rape, had his conviction overturned after having served fifteen years in prison. Because some supporters kept pestering the relevant court system, DNA testing was finally done on the semen and blood samples taken from the scene of the rape, and the tests proved his innocence with respect to the crime. Two things stood out in his statement upon the release of the findings. (1) He expressed thankfulness to God for finally being set free from responsibility for this crime. (2) But he also felt deep anger at the cost (in terms of time, emotions, reputation) inflicted on him by a wrong conviction and punishment. He recounted briefly how many times during his incarceration he doubted whether he would ever be vindicated. He questioned God's goodness too. Time and time again he wrote letters to protest his innocence. But he never gave up on his hope or on God.

Mr. Lavernia has been convicted of other crimes, so he has not been freed from incarceration. There is a lot about him still unknown to the public; nevertheless, he has served fifteen years in jail for a crime he did not commit. For fifteen years he wrote letters and offered prayers. At times he thought no one heard them, but he was wrong. So may it be with the heartfelt laments of God's children.

Jeremiah 21:1–10

THE WORD CAME to Jeremiah from the LORD when King Zedekiah sent to him Pashhur son of Malkijah and the priest Zephaniah son of Maaseiah. They said: ²"Inquire now of the LORD for us because Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon is attacking us. Perhaps the LORD will perform wonders for us as in times past so that he will withdraw from us."

³But Jeremiah answered them, "Tell Zedekiah, ⁴ This is what the LORD, the God of Israel, says: I am about to turn against you the weapons of war that are in your hands, which you are using to fight the king of Babylon and the Babylonians who are outside the wall besieging you. And I will gather them inside this city. ⁵I myself will fight against you with an outstretched hand and a mighty arm in anger and fury and great wrath. ⁶I will strike down those who live in this city—both men and animals and they will die of a terrible plague. ⁷After that, declares the LORD, I will hand over Zedekiah king of Judah, his officials and the people in this city who survive the plague, sword and famine, to Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon and to their enemies who seek their lives. He will put them to the sword; he will show them no mercy or pity or compassion.'

8"Furthermore, tell the people, 'This is what the LORD says: See, I am setting before you the way of life and the way of death. 9Whoever stays in this city will die by the sword, famine or plague. But whoever goes out and surrenders to the Babylonians who are besieging you will live; he will escape with his life. ¹⁰I have determined to do this city harm and not good, declares the LORD. It will be given into the hands of the king of Babylon, and he will destroy it with fire.'

Original Meaning

READERS ARE PROVIDED here with a date in Judah's anguished history—one of the few dates given in the first half of the book. Zedekiah is king—the first reference to the last king of Judah since the superscription to the book (1:3)—and the date is ca. 588 B.C. With the Babylonian army surrounding Jerusalem, a royal official named Pashhur the son of Malkijah and a priest named Zephaniah are sent to Jeremiah for him to inquire of the Lord. Perhaps God will work one of his "wonders," so that the Babylonians will withdraw. There is, of course, historical precedent for this hope. In a previous century God had sent a judging angel among the besieging Assyrians (2 Kings 18–19; Isa. 36–39).

The name of one of the officials (Pashhur) is the same as that of the priest in Jeremiah 20, although they are two different people. In the proximity of the two accounts, readers will find something of the catchword principle at work in the compilation of Jeremiah's book. The two episodes are collected together through the common name of Pashhur rather than because they necessarily follow each other chronologically in Jeremiah's public acts.

Pashhur and Zephaniah ask Jeremiah to inquire of the Lord and to intercede for the nation. This is something that King Zedekiah would seek from Jeremiah on more than one occasion (37:3; 38:14). The Lord's reply is full of the judgmental language seen in virtually every previous chapter. What is new (for those reading through Jeremiah) is a specific reference to Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, and the specifics of the siege of Jerusalem. Babylon itself is mentioned specifically for the first time only in the previous chapter (20:4–6). Elsewhere the agent of judgment to come was merely described as the foe or enemy from the north.

According to the divine oracle, God will not war against the Babylonian army but against Judah for its faithlessness and wickedness. Yes, God is a valiant warrior, but the enemy at the moment is Judah, not Babylon! The fall of the city, therefore, is certain. God's resolve to judge the city is described in Hebrew as "the setting of his face," an idiom for single-minded determination (21:10). The NIV paraphrases accurately with its rendering of God's "determination" to judge the city.

Jeremiah mediates part of God's reply to the state officials in language reminiscent of Deuteronomy 30:11–20. In Deuteronomy Moses set before the people "life and prosperity" or "death and destruction." Jeremiah spoke similarly in a previous context with reference to curse or blessing as part of the "two-way" formulation of wisdom theology (Jer. 17:5–13). Now Jeremiah tells the people that God is setting before them the way of life and death (21:8–9). Death is the fate of those who stay in the city; those who leave and are taken captive by the Babylonians will escape with their lives. Ominously, there is no call for repentance in the text of the divine oracle. God is on the side of the Babylonians for the historical moment, and the best that can be done for the Judeans is to convince them to capitulate to the Babylonians and thereby save their lives. There is specific reference to the destruction of Jerusalem by fire.

Bridging Contexts

Two ways. The allusion in 21:9 to the covenant proclamation of Deuteronomy 30:19—"I have set before you life and death"—helps modern readers set the announcement of Jerusalem's doom in a broader biblical context. The inhabitants of Jerusalem have a choice of "ways" set before them. Thus, the terrible announcement of doom is placed in the context of covenantal faith with its requirement of obedience and its acknowledgment that judgment will come on the disobedient. In this hour of crisis, Judah is reminded by a prophet like Moses that it is not the only generation of God's people to face hard choices or to see the bitter fruit of wrong decisions.

The New Testament picks up on this pattern of the two ways. Jesus' admonition about the way of life and the way of destruction (Matt. 7:13–14) follows the pattern exactly. It was even delivered at a time and place that reminds us of Moses—at the end of the Sermon on the Mount, delivered by the new and greater Moses. A bridge between then and now can be built on the typological correspondence of God's people from generation to generation; for in every generation there is the call to exercise obedience to the Lord, who brought it into existence. Each generation, as with each believer, ought to embark on the right way and avoid the wrong path.

God as warrior. The language of God as warrior in Jer. 21:5–6 also evokes in hearers a broader biblical context. In defeating Pharaoh and subsequently the Canaanites in the Promised Land, God revealed himself as a warrior on behalf of his people—a God who is "mighty to save," according to the great confession of Zephaniah 3:17.² There is, however, no partiality with God in judging iniquity. God can enter the fight against his own people, employing the Babylonians and their mighty king in the historical process to effect temporal judgment.

Contemporary Significance

THE WAY THAT LEADS TO LIFE. Christians may see in Jeremiah's hard words here an example of the "razor edge" of biblical theism. God fights against the powers of evil and corruption—and as with every fight, the results are not pretty. God will fight the powers of evil when they oppress his people, but God can also use the powers of evil in this world to judge his people. God is not indifferent to the sins of his people.

It is a remarkable word, therefore, that in the midst of hard words about Judah's doom the prophet in God's name sets forth a way of life and a way of death. In spite of the harsh language, annihilation of his people is not God's goal no matter how much it appears to be a necessary option. Historical judgment can be combined with the saving of a remnant, and they can become the seeds of renewal and hope. What is spoken here to the inhabitants is repeated in Jer. 38:2. It is spoken again to Jeremiah and to Baruch (38:19; 45:5)—two people who would witness divine judgment, but also two people whose work would spawn spiritual renewal among the survivors of the Babylonian onslaught.

The book of Jeremiah and the ongoing faith of the exilic communities are the evidence that these two were successful. By God's grace they found that the way to life came as a gift. In a paradox known to the faithful, the way to life is found in the giving over of one's life to the Lord. The way to life is a gift of God whose timing cannot be forced. It is often found only after several alternate routes have proved incorrect. Such is the life of faith! There is a sense in which the whole book of Jeremiah is a long commentary on the way of life and the way of death.

Wherever there is judgment and tragedy among God's people, there will also be signs of hope for those with eyes to see and ears to hear. How hard it can be to hear what the Spirit is saying in the midst of peril. The church cannot depend on its own resources but finally must implore the Lord to open their hearts in time to the way that leads to life.

MOREOVER, SAY TO the royal house of Judah, 'Hear the word of the LORD; ¹²O house of David, this is what the LORD says:

"Administer justice every morning; rescue from the hand of his oppressor the one who has been robbed. or my wrath will break out and burn like fire because of the evil you have done burn with no one to quench it. ¹³I am against you, Jerusalem, vou who live above this valley on the rocky plateau, declares the LORD you who say, "Who can come against us? Who can enter our refuge?" ¹⁴I will punish you as your deeds deserve, declares the LORD. I will kindle a fire in your forests that will consume everything around you."

^{22:1}This is what the LORD says: "Go down to the palace of the king of Judah and proclaim this message there: ²'Hear the word of the LORD, O king of Judah, you who sit on David's throne—you, your officials and your people who come through these gates. ³This is what the LORD says: Do what is just and right. Rescue from the hand of his oppressor the one who has been robbed. Do no wrong or violence to the alien, the fatherless or the widow, and do not shed innocent blood in this place. ⁴For if you are careful to carry out these commands, then kings who sit on David's throne will come through the gates of this palace, riding in chariots and on horses, accompanied by their officials and their people. ⁵But if you do not obey these commands, declares the LORD, I swear by myself that this palace will become a ruin."

⁶For this is what the LORD says about the palace of the king of Judah:

"Though you are like Gilead to me, like the summit of Lebanon,
I will surely make you like a desert, like towns not inhabited.

To will send destroyers against you, each man with his weapons, and they will cut up your fine cedar beams and throw them into the fire.

8"People from many nations will pass by this city and will ask one another, 'Why has the LORD done such a thing to this great city?' 9And the answer will be: 'Because they have forsaken the covenant of the LORD their God and have worshiped and served other gods.'"

10Do not weep for the dead king or mourn his loss;
rather, weep bitterly for him who is exiled, because he will never return nor see his native land again.

¹¹For this is what the LORD says about Shallum son of Josiah, who succeeded his father as king of Judah but has gone from this place: "He will never return. ¹²He will die in the place where they have led him captive; he will not see this land again."

13"Woe to him who builds his palace by unrighteousness, his upper rooms by injustice, making his countrymen work for nothing, not paying them for their labor.
14He says, 'I will build myself a great palace with spacious upper rooms.'
So he makes large windows in it, panels it with cedar and decorates it in red.

15"Does it make you a king to have more and more cedar?
Did not your father have food and drink? He did what was right and just, so all went well with him.
16He defended the cause of the poor and needy, and so all went well.
Is that not what it means to know me?" declares the LORD.
17"But your eyes and your heart are set only on dishonest gain, on shedding innocent blood and on oppression and extortion."

¹⁸Therefore this is what the LORD says about Jehoiakim son of Josiah king of Judah:

"They will not mourn for him:
 'Alas, my brother! Alas, my sister!'
They will not mourn for him:
 'Alas, my master! Alas, his splendor!'

19 He will have the burial of a donkey—dragged away and thrown outside the gates of Jerusalem."

²⁰"Go up to Lebanon and cry out, let your voice be heard in Bashan, cry out from Abarim, for all your allies are crushed. ²¹I warned vou when you felt secure, but you said, 'I will not listen!' This has been your way from your youth; you have not obeyed me. ²²The wind will drive all your shepherds away, and your allies will go into exile. Then you will be ashamed and disgraced because of all your wickedness. ²³You who live in 'Lebanon,' who are nestled in cedar buildings, how you will groan when pangs come upon you, pain like that of a woman in labor!

²⁴"As surely as I live," declares the LORD, "even if you, Jehoiachin son of Jehoiakim king of Judah, were a signet ring on my right hand, I would still pull you off. ²⁵I will hand you over to those who seek your life, those you fear—to Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon and to the Babylonians. ²⁶I will hurl you and the mother who gave you birth into another country, where neither of you was born, and there you both will die. ²⁷You will never come back to the land you long to return to."

²⁸Is this man Jehoiachin a despised, broken pot, an object no one wants?
Why will he and his children be hurled out, cast into a land they do not know?
²⁹O land, land, land, hear the word of the LORD!

30 This is what the LORD says:

"Record this man as if childless, a man who will not prosper in his lifetime,
for none of his offspring will prosper, none will sit on the throne of David or rule anymore in Judah."

Original Meaning

THIS SECTION OF JEREMIAH contains several oracles directed to (against!) the royal family and its administration of affairs in Jerusalem. These prophecies are collected together because they share a common topic, not because they come from the same period in Jeremiah's ministry. Both the dynasty of David itself (21:12; 22:1, 6) and three of its kings are addressed (22:10–30): Shallum (also known as Jehoahaz), Jehoiakim, and Jehoiachin ("Coniah" in the Heb. of 22:24, 28). Josiah, the father of Jehoahaz and Jehoiakim as well as the grandfather of Jehoiachin, is referred to by way of contrast in 22:15–16. With the mention of Zedekiah⁴ in 21:1, readers have contextual references to all the kings of Judah who reigned during Jeremiah's ministry.

In the critical evaluation of the kings in this section, readers encounter an emphasis on royal social responsibilities. The king and his administration should "administer justice" (21:12) and "do what is just and right" (22:3). The Hebrew words for "just/justice" (mišpaṭ) and "right" (ṣedaqa) are recognized terms to describe social rectitude and a healthy communal life. They overlap much in their meaning and often occur together as a word pair in the Old Testament.

These two terms are derived from a social vision where institutions such as the monarchy and court system are responsible to curb oppression and to protect the more vulnerable members of society. Justice is primarily associated with administration. In doing justice one works through social institutions (e.g., court, state agencies). Righteousness is more a relational term. One is considered righteous when acting faithfully toward those with whom one is related in community. A monarchy and its administrative agents who do not act in accord with these standards face judgment in the historical process (21:12; 22:4–9). The failures of the royal administration are also attributed to rejection of the covenant with God and the worship of other deities (22:9).

21:11–14. These verses can be read as further commentary on Jeremiah's word to Zedekiah in 21:1–10. The NIV translation of verse 11, which begins with "moreover," implies this connection. The grammar and syntax of the verse do not require this translation, however, and the four verses in this section are more like the general assessment of the monarchy in 22:1–9, the next oracle in the section. This suggests that they are meant for any and all members of the house of David who live in the palace and assist in carrying out the affairs of state. In verse 13 comes a bitter criticism of those who live above the valley floors that surround Jerusalem. These persons would be royalty and other influential inhabitants who can afford the safer location of height in times of siege.

The command in Jer. 21:12 to "administer justice every morning" and to "rescue from the hand of his oppressor the one ... robbed" has a close parallel in Micah's critique preserved in Micah 2:1–2. Micah was from the Judean countryside, and his second chapter is a devastating critique of oppression that stems from Jerusalem. Early morning was the time when people in towns and villages rose and met one another on their way to perform daily tasks. When they met at the gate of the city or village, they also worked out administrative-judicial affairs and witnessed agreements. Micah complains about those who rise early and seize property because they have the "power" ('el; lit., God) in their hand. Jeremiah's charge to the royal house, therefore, is to be a court of appeal for the oppressed "every morning."

22:1–9. God commands the prophet to "go down to the palace of the king" to proclaim a message. Readers should not overlook the verb "go down." Since the palace of the king is located at one of the highest points of Jerusalem, about the only place from which Jeremiah can "go down" is from the temple mount. This incidental comment tells us much about one important place where Jeremiah receives his prompting from God. Readers learn from another incidental comment in verse 2 that the royal palace had gates. Since some matters of state and cult were carried out at the royal palace (likely located near the temple), the gates would be those entry points to a public courtyard or hall.

Monarchs and their servants should prevent the shedding of "innocent blood in this place" (22:3). The prophet offered a similar charge in his temple sermon (7:6; cf. 19:4), and it is a topic to which he comes again in the context of a critique of royalty (22:17). This is a foreboding topic since "innocent blood" required atonement and other ceremonies to deal with its expiation; otherwise, responsibility for the shedding of innocent blood fell on the whole community. Part of the duty of the royal house in doing justice and righteousness was to vindicate an innocent victim and to punish the murderers, even if the latter were from the elite strata of society.

Something of the "two-way" preaching is preserved in 22:4–5. In essence, the two ways set before the royal house are the same as those set before the people.

22:10–12. Of the three kings addressed directly, the briefest prophecy concerns Shallum, that is, Jehoahaz, the son and immediate successor to Josiah. He was placed on the throne after the death of his father but was subsequently removed by the Egyptian pharaoh after a brief reign. Jeremiah calls for bitter weeping (mourning) on his behalf, although his personal evaluation of Jehoahaz is not clear (cf. 2 Kings 23:32). The fate of this king foreshadows that of the people. The call in Jeremiah 22:10 not to mourn the death of Josiah is intended only to call attention to the sad fate of Jehoahaz. According to 2 Chronicles 35:25, Jeremiah offered a lamentation for Josiah, which became a pattern for singers in Israel.

22:13–23. Jeremiah pronounces a judgmental "woe" on Jehoiakim, the older brother of Jehoahaz, who succeeded his younger brother on the throne (23:13–23). Apparently the people of the land (Judean property owners?) recognized Jehoiakim's unsuitability for rule when they initially bypassed him for Jehoahaz. They were loyal to the dynasty of David but did not want the eldest son to follow Josiah. The Egyptians, however, placed Jehoiakim on the throne, perhaps for the same reason that the people of the land had passed him over. Most certainly the Egyptians wanted someone from the royal family whom they could control. The Judeans would have preferred someone of a more independent nature.

Verse 13 describes Jehoiakim's activities as "unrighteous" and as examples of "injustice." These terms, of course, are the negative counterparts to justice and righteousness (cf. 22:3). Jehoiakim's arrogant building project is described as "his palace." Almost certainly this is not a primary residence, since the royal palace in Jerusalem had been in existence as long as the temple. According to 36:22 Jehoiakim had a winter house. Whether this is the house that Jeremiah describes in 22:13–14 cannot be known without further information.

By contrast with Jehoiakim, his father Josiah is described as one who lived the life of a king (he ate and drank), but who also did what was "right and just" (ṣedaqa and mišpaṭ, v. 15), defending the cause of the poor and needy. Jeremiah describes this activity as an example of what it means to "know" the Lord. Josiah is the only one of the monarchs from his day whom Jeremiah praises.

The fate of the arrogant and selfish king is that he will not be mourned at his death and will not receive a proper burial. Extant sources do not give details of Jehoiakim's burial or the precise circumstances of his death. The latter came apparently during the time of the Babylonians' siege of Jerusalem in 598/597 B.C.

22:24–30. This address to Jehoiachin has several grammatical complexities. The gist of the message is that he too falls under the judgment of the historical hour. His personal failings are not listed, and it may be that the query in verse 28 recognizes the incongruence of his circumstances. More precisely he and his family will go into Babylonian exile, and the young king will be reckoned as childless—although he has descendants—since his sons¹¹ will not sit on the throne of David and rule as kings in Judah.

Bridging Contexts

JUSTICE AND RIGHTEOUSNESS. This criticism of the Davidic dynasty and the enumeration of social crimes is but a part of a larger biblical concern to advocate justice and to oppose injustice. Several of the prophets before and during Jeremiah's day announced judgment on their contemporaries because of injustice and oppression. Amos, for example, castigated Israel for failing to uphold God's standards of justice and righteousness (Amos 5:7, 14–15, 21–24; 6:12). Leading citizens of Samaria oppressed weaker members of society (4:1; cf. 2:7–8), and a destructive greed was rampant (8:4–6). Amos declared God's judgment on Israel; subsequently the nation was overrun by the Assyrians, Samaria was destroyed, and many inhabitants were taken into exile.¹³ As noted above, Micah's social criticism of Judah has several things in common with Jeremiah. In his attitude toward the responsibilities of the royal house and their servants, Jeremiah stands in good prophetic company.

As with the other prophets, Jeremiah was not a political reformer in the modern sense of that term. His many harsh words of denunciation are not followed by a detailed blueprint for social reforms. There are at least three reasons for this. (1) Jeremiah was not a social architect or theorist; he was a prophet who spoke under the conviction that he lived in the historical hour of judgment.

- (2) There is no indication that Jeremiah believed a new political philosophy or platform should be put in place. His terminology of justice and righteousness comes directly from the normative traditions of Israel. It was not a new plan that needed implementation but the application of covenant ethics as known in the Sinai revelation or in the claim of prerogative for David's family as guardian of the social order (Ps. 72).
- (3) Jeremiah came to believe that Judah would be unable on its own to reconstitute itself as a just and compassionate society simply by changing a few programs. His preaching of repentance (where it is preserved in the book) seems to have convinced him that only God could reform Judah, which in turn would require a complete transformation of the people. Nor did Jeremiah have a secular ideal on which to draw for his concerns, since the "old paths" sufficed for instruction (Jer. 6:16), but he did not concentrate on the "old paths" of the covenant ethics known to him. His work was essentially a theological critique, based on God's revealed character as righteous and just and shaped by the conviction that historical judgment was irrevocable.

The New Testament also voices concerns for justice and righteousness in the church. Since the tiny church of the apostolic age had no privilege in society or institutional political influence, the emphasis of the New Testament letters is on the internal ethics of the Christian community. Nevertheless, the various writers there concur that both the church body and its leaders should reflect a gospel-oriented holiness in its administrative structures and in the witness of the church's common life.¹⁴

As part of his criticism of Jehoiakim, Jeremiah also recognizes that a king can be a king with all the trappings and symbolism of the office and yet reflect the required covenantal ethics. Josiah ate and drank, but he also did justice and righteousness. Jeremiah's assessment is not unlike that given in 2 Kings, where the ruler is described as one who turned to the Lord with all his heart (2 Kings 23:25). The prophet asks rhetorically if such activity is what it means to "know God" (Jer. 22:16). The answer, of course, is "yes!" Here is an intertextual echo with 9:23–24. The wise person is one who knows the Lord as the God who exercises loving-kindness, justice, and righteousness and the God who delights when others do these things. What God wants from the Davidic rulers or from any truly "wise" person is someone who knows him and who shares his delight in these attributes.

Jeremiah's prophecies concerning the royal house and its administration underscore the importance of leadership for God's people. As 1 and 2 Kings make clear, as the leadership of the people goes, so go the people. This is an important bridge between then and now. With great privilege comes great responsibility. In Judah there was no "separation of church and state," as is common in modern Western societies. Kings were responsible to use their position of influence as servants of the Lord. Christians today may hear these words and be instructed first that the church (the current generation of God's people) has responsibilities to nurture and to support those among us who are weak and mistreated. Moreover, it is incumbent particularly on the leadership to demonstrate this concern and encourage it among the people.

Christians today may also hear these words as a call to support humanitarian policies and those institutions in their society that are concerned with justice and righteousness. In this way God, the Lord of all creation, is honored, and his gifts of common grace for all peoples are acknowledged by his people.

The royal line. The sad words about Jehoiachin are a somber commentary that comes in the context of judgment on Judah as a whole. These words, however, should be heard in the larger biblical context of additional revelation about his family. Jehoiachin and his family represent the generation judged and sent into exile. The Babylonians cut short his brief reign as king, and he spent the rest of his life in Babylon. Since the monarchical rule of the Davidic house ceased with the destruction of Jerusalem, none of Jehoiachin's sons ever sat on the throne so briefly occupied by him. Nevertheless, the fact that Jehoiachin survived in captivity is recorded as a sign of hope (2 Kings 25:27–30; Jer. 52:31–34).

Moreover, his grandson Zerubbabel was appointed governor of the early postexilic community in Jerusalem (Hag. 1:1; Ezra 3:1–13).

Jehoiachin is part of the Davidic line that continues through Zerubbabel and leads to the birth of Christ (Matt. 1:1-17). When Zerubbabel is addressed by the prophet Haggai, he is told that he is a servant and a signet ring to the Lord (Hag. 2:20–23). This oracle likely reflects the judgmental against his grandfather in Jeremiah 22:24 prophecy ("if ... Jehoiachin ... were a signet ring ...") and shows, furthermore, that the historical word of judgment can be set in a larger framework of God's transhistorical intent to preserve and transform his people through the promises made to the Davidic house. Christians should see in these details the unfolding drama of the royal office into which Christ was born ("as to his human nature ... a descendant of David," Rom. 1:3). The great promises to and failures of the royal office provide the background to Jesus' fulfillment of it as the resurrected head of the church.¹⁵

MORAL COMMITMENTS. A maxim among modern Christians is that "truth is first in order to goodness." The truth of who God is and the truth of what God has called the church to be entail a commitment to moral character and social ethics in the church. Moral commitments start with its leadership.

Three kings in Jeremiah's time (Jehoahaz, Jehoiakim, Jehoiachin) are addressed as failures and as examples of the corporate failure of Judah. The flip side of a commitment to moral character and social rectitude is the disintegration of communal life when these qualities are absent. As the kings failed, so failed Judah. In current North American society, one can cite any number of statistics and trends that do not bode well for communal life (e.g., crime, family disintegration, etc.). Will they lead to a larger collapse of society? If so, are the churches immune from the fallout?

One should be careful in comparing the political leadership of a modern Western nation with the fate of Judah's leadership during Jeremiah's day. The president of the United States, for example, does not stand in the line of Davidic kings, nor is the president elected the head of the people of God (= the church). Christians may well argue the link between moral values and the health of a nation, but the first application of God's Word to ancient Judah concerning justice and righteousness is to the current generation of God's people.

Knowing God. The harsh word to Jehoiakim also contains an affirmation of what it means to know God. In his case, the contrast with his father, Josiah, is telling. The test of knowing God is the commitment of the person to the things of God—justice and righteousness for God's people. "If you love me," said Jesus, "you will obey what I command" (John 14:15). To know God is to be committed to his revealed will in the places of responsibility (ministry) where one lives and works. Of course, to know God means also to be rightly and personally related to him.

The affirmation that Josiah "turned to the LORD with all his heart and with all his soul" (2 Kings 23:25) is testimony to this truth, but Jeremiah's particular word relates to the practice of one's faith. Such an emphasis can be easily avoided by Christians claiming a cheap grace, but its truth cannot be evaded indefinitely. An orthodox theology leads to orthopraxis. Truth is first in order to goodness, not for self-justification but as service to the Lord.

God's faithfulness. The harsh words about Jehoiachin are a lesson about judgment and providence and a profound illustration of the "ups and downs" of the royal office ultimately fulfilled in Christ. As a young man and king for only three months, Jehoiachin was swept away into exile in 597. He spent the rest of his life in exile. He embodied the fate of his people. There was no escape from responsibility for failure. God's word of judgment to him in the historical hour came in service to God's larger intent to use the judgment of exile to chasten and redeem his people. God had bound himself by covenant oath to David's family as ruler over his people (2 Sam. 7; 23:5). Jehoiachin would see the discipline that God hands out to recalcitrant children (Jer. 7:12–16), and his own sons were included.

Nevertheless, God would remain true to his promise and through Jehoiachin's line would again raise up leaders for his people. His grandson Zerubbabel would play a crucial role in the early postexilic period, serving as governor in Jerusalem. From this family of many failures came the ultimate child of promise, Christ the Lord (Matt. 1:1–17). God's historical "no" to the sins of Jehoiachin and his generation was tempered by his great "yes" in Jesus Christ. In his wrath God had marked Jehoiachin down as childless—none of his sons would ever sit on the throne; nevertheless, one of his descendants has ascended the throne of rule over God's people in a far grander way than Jehoiachin would ever realize.

The word of judgment to Jehoiachin is a sobering prophecy. There are situations where historical ruin comes about or where one's hopes are never realized. His uncle Jehoahaz died in Egypt, he in Babylon. Christ, his descendant according to the flesh, died on the cross. But he was raised to new life, and Christ now demonstrates God's resolve to save that which is lost. As the Lord of the church, Christ rules now as King of kings and Lord of lords.

Jeremiah 23:1–40

WOE TO THE SHEPHERDS who are destroying and scattering the sheep of my pasture!" declares the LORD. ²Therefore this is what the LORD, the God of Israel, says to the shepherds who tend my people: "Because you have scattered my flock and driven them away and have not bestowed care on them, I will bestow punishment on you for the evil you have done," declares the LORD. ³"I myself will gather the remnant of my flock out of all the countries where I have driven them and will bring them back to their pasture, where they will be fruitful and increase in number. ⁴I will place shepherds over them who will tend them, and they will no longer be afraid or terrified, nor will any be missing," declares the LORD.

5"The days are coming," declares the LORD,
"when I will roise up to David a

"when I will raise up to David a righteous Branch, a King who will reign wisely and do what is just and right in the land.

⁶In his days Judah will be saved and Israel will live in safety.
This is the name by which he will be called:
The LORD Our Righteousness.

⁷"So then, the days are coming," declares the LORD, "when people will no longer say, 'As surely as the LORD lives, who brought the Israelites up out of Egypt,' ⁸but they will say, 'As surely as the LORD lives, who brought the descendants of Israel up out of the land of the north and out of all the countries where he had banished them.' Then they will live in their own land."

⁹Concerning the prophets:

My heart is broken within me; all my bones tremble.

I am like a drunken man, like a man overcome by wine, because of the LORD and his holy words.

10 The land is full of adulterers; because of the curse the land lies parched and the pastures in the desert are withered.

The prophets follow an evil course and use their power unjustly.

11"Both prophet and priest are godless; even in my temple I find their wickedness,"

declares the LORD.

12"Therefore their path will become slippery; they will be banished to darkness and there they will fall.

I will bring disaster on them in the year they are punished," declares the LORD.

13"Among the prophets of Samaria
I saw this repulsive thing:
They prophesied by Baal
and led my people Israel astray.
14And among the prophets of Jerusalem
I have seen something horrible:
They commit adultery and live a lie.

They strengthen the hands of evildoers, so that no one turns from his wickedness.

They are all like Sodom to me; the people of Jerusalem are like Gomorrah."

¹⁵Therefore, this is what the LORD Almighty says concerning the prophets:

"I will make them eat bitter food and drink poisoned water, because from the prophets of Jerusalem ungodliness has spread throughout the land."

¹⁶This is what the LORD Almighty says:

"Do not listen to what the prophets are prophesying to you; they fill you with false hopes.

They speak visions from their own minds, not from the mouth of the LORD.

¹⁷They keep saying to those who despise me,

'The LORD says: You will have peace.'

And to all who follow the stubbornness of their hearts

they say, 'No harm will come to you.'

18But which of them has stood in the council of the LORD to see or to hear his word?Who has listened and heard his word?

¹⁹See, the storm of the LORD will burst out in wrath, a whirlwind swirling down on the heads of the wicked. ²⁰The anger of the LORD will not turn back until he fully accomplishes the purposes of his heart. In days to come you will understand it clearly. ²¹I did not send these prophets, vet they have run with their message; I did not speak to them, yet they have prophesied. ²²But if they had stood in my council, they would have proclaimed my words to my people and would have turned them from their evil ways and from their evil deeds.

23"Am I only a God nearby,"
declares the LORD,
"and not a God far away?

24Can anyone hide in secret places so that I cannot see him?"
declares the LORD.
"Do not I fill heaven and earth?"
declares the LORD.

²⁵"I have heard what the prophets say who prophesy lies in my name. They say, 'I had a dream! I had a dream!' ²⁶How long will this continue in the hearts of these lying prophets, who prophesy the delusions of their own minds? ²⁷They think the dreams they tell one another will make my people forget my name, just as their fathers forgot my name through Baal worship. ²⁸Let the prophet who has a dream tell his dream, but let the one who has my word speak it faithfully. For what has straw to do with grain?" declares the LORD. ²⁹"Is not my word like fire," declares the LORD, "and like a hammer that breaks a rock in pieces?

³⁰"Therefore," declares the LORD, "I am against the prophets who steal from one another words supposedly from me. ³¹Yes," declares the LORD, "I am against the prophets who wag their own tongues and yet declare, 'The LORD declares.' ³²Indeed, I am against those who prophesy false dreams," declares the LORD. "They tell them and lead my people astray with their reckless lies, yet I did not send or appoint them. They do not benefit these people in the least," declares the LORD.

33"When these people, or a prophet or a priest, ask you, 'What is the oracle of the LORD?' say to them, 'What oracle? I will forsake you, declares the LORD.' ³⁴If a prophet or a priest or anyone else claims, 'This is the oracle of the LORD,' I will punish that man and his household. ³⁵This is what each of you keeps on saying to his friend or relative: 'What is the LORD's answer?' or 'What has the LORD spoken?' ³⁶But you must not mention 'the oracle of the LORD' again, because every man's own word becomes his oracle and so you distort the words of the living God, the LORD Almighty, our God. ³⁷This is what you keep saying to a prophet: 'What is the LORD's answer to you?' or 'What has the LORD spoken?' ³⁸Although you claim, 'This is the oracle of the LORD,' this is what the LORD says: You used the words, 'This is the oracle of the LORD,' even though I told you that you must not claim, 'This is the oracle of the LORD.' ³⁹Therefore, I will surely forget you and cast you out of my presence along with the city I gave to you and your fathers. ⁴⁰I will bring upon you everlasting disgrace —everlasting shame that will not be forgotten."

Original Meaning

JEREMIAH 23 COLLECTS a number of harsh sayings against the religious leaders who oppose Jeremiah in word and deed. As is common in the first half of the book, there are no dates associated with these prophecies. Included among the "shepherds" mentioned at the beginning of the chapter are almost certainly kings—perhaps the three kings (Jehoiakim, Jehoiachin, and Zedekiah) mentioned in the previous two chapters. Priests are also mentioned (23:11, 33–34), but the brunt of the criticism falls on prophets, who have not understood the Lord correctly and who have, therefore, misled the people (cf. Deut. 13; 18). Among these words of judgment are also claims that God intends to redeem his scattered people and to raise up a shepherd in whose days Judah and Israel will find security.

- 23:1–4. Punishment and crime are linked for the shepherds in this brief prose text. God will bring judgment on them because they have not cared for their flock. Verse 2 charges them more specifically with not caring for "my [i.e. God's] people." The scattered flock is identified as the exiled remnant of God's people, who will be brought back to their homeland (23:3, 7–8). This passage, therefore, probably originated after the first wave of exiles was taken away to Babylon in 597 B.C. Since the fall and destruction of Jerusalem are not mentioned, it is less likely that the prophecy originated after 587/586 B.C.
- 23:5–6. This passage begins with a typical formula about the future: "The days are coming." God will raise up for his scattered people a shepherd who will rule justly and wisely.² He will be a king from David's line. His wonderful name, "The LORD Our Righteousness" (yhwh sideqenu), is a pun on the name Zedekiah (= Righteous is Yahweh), the last king of Judah (who reigned from 597–587/586 B.C.). For the generation of Jeremiah, the symbolic name of this "righteous Branch" is probably a sarcastic judgment on Zedekiah; moreover, it points to God's resolve to restore his people and fulfill his promises to the Davidic line.

This prophecy, like the prose text that begins chapter 23, should be read in the context of the previous section (21:11–22:30) and its concern with the injustice and failures of the Davidic monarchs. The judgment to fall on the shepherds comes because they have failed to fulfill the duties of their office. As verse 5 proclaims, a king should "do what is just [mišpaṭ] and right [sedaqa] in the land." These are the normative terms, the expected attributes of kingship (see 22:15; also Ps. 72:1–4).

The name of the king ("The LORD Our Righteousness") represents significant claims about the work of God. (1) In his days Judah and Israel "will be saved" and will dwell securely. (2) The righteousness indicated in his name is for the people, even though it is not fully their own. The Lord is their righteousness. It is the integrity of the Lord, his fidelity to his promises, that is finally the people's righteousness.

23:7–8. Prophecy of a future change in the circumstances of the people continues in these two verses (see also 16:14–15). Just as something new and wonderful will emerge from David's line, so a second exodus will occur, and the exiled people will return to their land.

The criticisms of the prophets who are misleading the people are manifold. The rest of the chapter concerns their culpability in failing their office and the people. These prophecies come as part of an exchange between Jeremiah and God. The voices can be outlined as follows:

- A. 23:9–10: Jeremiah laments the evil course of his prophetic opponents.
- B. 23:11–12: God speaks of the wickedness he sees and announces judgment.
- C. 23:13–14: Jeremiah refers to prophets in Samaria and Jerusalem as repulsive.
- D. 23:15–24: God denies that he has sent these misleading prophets and affirms that nothing they do is secret to him.
- E. 23:25–40: In this prose section Jeremiah reports God's anger at the false dreams and oracles offered in his name.
- 23:9–10. Perhaps the first clause of verse 9 is a heading for the materials that follow and not just for Jeremiah's anguished comments in verses 9–10. Jeremiah reacts to the dire straits of his people and the power of his prophetic opponents to mislead them. He mentions drought conditions as one element of his horror (cf. ch. 14). The magnitude of God's words of judgment have rendered the prophet like a drunken man. It is not clear whether this is metaphorical language to describe Jeremiah's strong emotional reaction or if he actually manifests physical symptoms ("all my bones tremble").

23:11–12. God's first reply notes that the wickedness of prophet and priest is in "my temple" (lit., "my house"). These verses confirm that the prophets and priests who serve there are also offering oracles of assurance that the nation will not fall.

23:13–14. Jeremiah reports a repulsive thing he has observed about the earlier prophets of Samaria (the northern kingdom): They prophesied by Baal and led God's people astray (cf. 23:27). This historical comment interprets the fall of Israel and Samaria in 722/721 B.C. Something equally heinous is then reported with respect to the prophets in Jerusalem: They are adulterers and living a lie. These observations can be attributed either to God or to Jeremiah, but the introductory formula of verse 15—"Therefore, this is what the LORD Almighty says"—implies that Jeremiah is the speaker in verses 13–14 and that the divine oracle in verses 15–24 is God's response. Verse 14 offers a familiar analogy to describe the folly of Samaria and Jerusalem; the two cities are compared to Sodom and Gomorrah, the cities on the plain that God overthrew because of their wickedness (Gen. 18:16–19:29).

23:15–24. The introductory formula of verse 15 is like that of verse 9. Concerning the prophets, it seems to introduce several oracles from the Lord. There are additional rhetorical formulae in verses 16, 23, and 24. The command "do not listen to … the prophets" is addressed to the people. The prophets who prophesy "peace" is a familiar complaint in Jeremiah. There will be no peace or security for a people who "despise" God.

The oracle about judgment on the prophets notes that the people will better understand this matter in "days to come" (v. 20). It is the function of a book like Jeremiah, which was published in the aftermath of Judah's demise, to make clear that the people had trusted in lies.

God denies sending these prophets. The rhetorical question of verse 18—"Which of [the prophets] has stood in the council of the LORD?"—implies an emphatic negative for an answer. None of them has been privy to God's council.⁵ If they had been in God's council, then they would have proclaimed the evil deeds of the people and attempted to turn them from their acts and the consequences.

The rhetorical questions of verses 23–24 are also intended for the people's hearing. Whether near or far, the people and their deeds are known to God, who fills heaven and earth (with his presence).

23:25–40. These prose comments continue the criticism of Jerusalem's prophets. One of their modes of communicating is dream reports. Verse 28 makes a distinction between the faithful reporting of God's word and the reporting of a dream. The implication is that the reception of the word is a different form of experience, but it is not further defined. In effect, it is like the hammer that shatters rock.

Verses 33–40 begin with a play on one of the words for "oracle" (mas's'a'), which can also be translated as "burden" (cf. NIV note). Perhaps the link between the two meanings of the word comes from the concept of bearing or carrying something. The Greek translation of verse 33 reflects a different Hebrew text from the Masoretic Text. The question implied by the LXX reads: "What is the mas's'a' [oracle] of the LORD?" and it is answered by a statement directed to the people, "You are the mas's'a' [the burden]." The gist of these last verses is clear, however the wordplay is sorted out: God will judge the prophets and the people who listen to them.

It is important to note that in all the criticism of the prophets, the expression "false prophet" is not used. Some of these prophets probably deserved the description, for they looked to Baal for their inspiration or simply lied about their reception of a message from Yahweh. Some, however, might not deserve such a description. Perhaps they had been of service in the cause of the Lord in times past, and they sincerely hoped that their message of peace and security had its origin with the Lord.

These judgments against the religious leaders of the people are related to other passages in Jeremiah. Various narratives and oracles make it clear that Jehoiakim and Zedekiah failed as shepherds of the nation. That some members of the priesthood were hostile to Jeremiah is clear from 20:1–6. Jeremiah will have a memorable encounter with a prophet named Hananiah in chapter 28, and he will be involved (via letters) in debate with Judean prophets in Babylon (29:21–32). His prayers of lament are derived, in part, from his experiences of ridicule and humiliation at the hand of these leaders.

FALSE PROPHETS. The covenant-renewal document known as Deuteronomy has stipulations that parallel Jeremiah's criticisms of religious leaders and provide a broader biblical context in which to interpret the prophet's critique. One may point to the first two commandments of the Decalogue (Deut. 5:7–10), which forbid the worship of other deities. In elaboration, Deuteronomy 13 and 18 warn the people to avoid prophets who advocate the worship of other deities. They offer warnings about prophets and dreamers who will lead Israel astray. The penalty for such prophetic activity is death. Jeremiah's harsh words about the religious leaders apparently have their roots in this broader biblical context of a judicial judgment on "false prophets" for inciting a rebellion or turning people away from the Lord. Similarly, Jesus judges "false prophets" harshly because of the damage they do (Matt. 7:15–23).

Deuteronomy 17:14–20 requires that the king in Israel have a copy of the covenant law and that he live by its precepts. The integrity required of the ruler is missing among the indicted shepherds, whose lack of justice and righteousness and whose failure to cling to the Lord have resulted in the scattering of the Lord's flock.

Shepherding motif. The language of shepherd and shepherding is a part of the broader biblical theme of the character of leadership in Israel, taken from the cultural role of a shepherd who tends his flocks by providing sustenance and protection from harm. Israel offers praise to God, who is the ultimate Shepherd of his people (Ps. 23:1; 80:1). Ezekiel likewise uses the specific imagery of the shepherd for a ruler in his criticism of Judean leaders (Ezek. 34). Nathan, David's prophetic advisor, received a prophetic revelation to remind David that he was anointed to shepherd God's people (2 Sam. 7:7). Here is foundational material for the Davidic covenant and the royal office ultimately filled by Christ. In the New Testament Christ identifies himself as the "good shepherd" who lays down his life for the flock (John 10; cf. 1 Peter 2:25).

Jeremiah announces that God will raise up a faithful shepherd whose symbolic name indicates that the Lord is the people's righteousness. Christians recognize the truth of that prophecy in a way Jeremiah's contemporaries could not. Old Testament saints heard that prophecy as God's faithfulness to the Davidic line and his grace in saving a remnant of his people. The name, of course, is symbolic of the character of the future ruler. In Christ God has demonstrated his righteousness and also accepted Christ's righteousness on behalf of those who trust in his saving work. Christ thus fulfills the Davidic hopes and represents them in a faithful, yet also grander, way than anticipated by Jeremiah's contemporaries. Christ is, as noted in the previous chapter, the culmination of the hopes of the royal office. Even the failures of a Zedekiah (or any failures in the line of David) simply set Christ's headship over the church in bold relief.

Contemporary Significance

LEADERSHIP OF GOD'S PEOPLE. Jeremiah's criticism of religious leaders touches on a sensitive and central biblical theme: that of the spiritual and moral character of leadership among God's people. The history of the church is replete with examples of good and bad leadership. Saints of the past such as Augustine, Martin Luther, and William Booth (founder of the Salvation Army) provided visionary leadership and a piety combining moral character and devotion to Christ. On the other side were Gnostics, syncretists, and libertines, who diluted the faith and argued that morals do not matter.

It is a sobering exercise for modern Christians to ask who among the church's leadership downplay the issues of moral character and soft-pedal the spiritual characteristics needed to shepherd God's people. Who among the spokespersons for the faith downplay the distinctive character of Christian faith in return for an emphasis on greater commonality with the world? What leaders say one thing and yet represent another in their personal lives? The point is not to advocate moralism at all costs but to look carefully for the consistency of the prophetic voice with the faith it defends in controversial times.

Jeremiah criticizes the prophets who proclaim that all is well when the corporate life of the people shows desperate problems. In some Christian circles it is relatively easy to paint a sordid picture of parts of human existence but more difficult to strike a balance between a negative assessment of human failure and a positive proclamation of God's ability to heal and to transform. Correspondingly, some Christian communities find it too easy to ignore problems within their midst, and they look with disfavor on those who disturb the peace and purity of the church. Those who lead the church and claim to know the direction in which it should go have a great responsibility. "By their fruit you will recognize them," said Jesus (Matt. 7:16), a practical test that is consistent with Jeremiah's criticism of his prophetic contemporaries and a test that remains crucial in the present.

A true prophet. Jeremiah was a true prophet because the word he received from the Lord was vindicated in the events of history. Clearly, the timing of the fulfillment was a point of consternation for him. He spent years proclaiming a judgment that came only after much anguish on his part. That his word about the future eventually did occur is one of the tests for true prophecy (according to Deuteronomy). With the life of the people in crisis, Jeremiah announced that Judah had to change or judgment would come. Eventually he understood that any repentance would be too little and too late. Those prophets who disagreed with him were wrong historically and theologically. In essence, their denial of judgment was a denial of the Lord at work redemptively through historical judgment. Their words diverted the people's attention from seeking the Lord to a false assurance that he would protect them.

Is this not like the turmoil over Jesus' public ministry, where he continually called people to a life of commitment and spiritual discernment in counting the cost of discipleship? Discipleship (i.e., following Christ) is also a form of leadership, and vice versa. Christ came not to be served but to serve (Mark 10:45). That is the point of Christology; it is the point for all shepherds in the church.

AFTER JEHOIACHIN son of Jehoiakim king of Judah and the officials, the craftsmen and the artisans of Judah were carried into exile from Jerusalem to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, the LORD showed me two baskets of figs placed in front of the temple of the LORD. ²One basket had very good figs, like those that ripen early; the other basket had very poor figs, so bad they could not be eaten.

³Then the LORD asked me, "What do you see, Jeremiah?"

"Figs," I answered. "The good ones are very good, but the poor ones are so bad they cannot be eaten."

⁴Then the word of the LORD came to me: ⁵"This is what the LORD, the God of Israel, says: 'Like these good figs, I regard as good the exiles from Judah, whom I sent away from this place to the land of the Babylonians. ⁶My eyes will watch over them for their good, and I will bring them back to this land. I will build them up and not tear them down; I will plant them and not uproot them. ⁷I will give them a heart to know me, that I am the LORD. They will be my people, and I will be their God, for they will return to me with all their heart.

8""But like the poor figs, which are so bad they cannot be eaten,' says the LORD, 'so will I deal with Zedekiah king of Judah, his officials and the survivors from Jerusalem, whether they remain in this land or live in Egypt. 9I will make them abhorrent and an offense to all the kingdoms of the earth, a reproach and a byword, an object of ridicule and cursing, wherever I banish them. 10I will send the sword, famine and plague against them until they are destroyed from the land I gave to them and their fathers."

Original Meaning

JEREMIAH'S OBSERVATIONS AT the temple become a vehicle for God's address to the people. The setting is in Zedekiah's reign, sometime between 597 B.C., when Nebuchadnezzar took Jehoiachin and a number of the leading citizens of Judah into exile in Babylon, and 587/586, when the Babylonians besieged and destroyed Jerusalem. The date is probably close to 588, the beginning of the second Babylonian siege of Jerusalem.

Jeremiah observes two baskets of figs left as offerings at the temple, one of which contains ripe figs and the other rotten figs.² The Lord tells the prophet that the good figs are like the Judeans taken into exile, while the rotten figs represent Zedekiah and those who remain in Jerusalem and Judah. The Lord promises to do good to the exilic community, to bring them back from exile, and to give them a heart to know him. Concerning those remaining in Judah, however, the Lord promises judgment.

One finds in this autobiographic prophetic report a shorthand version of what the larger book of Jeremiah intends to accomplish. For those on whom the judgment of the Exile has fallen, God announces that he intends to "build them up" and to "plant" them again in the Promised Land.³ Return to the land is not all that God intends, although the return is a sign of something more fundamental, a wholehearted return to the Lord. Thus, there is also the promise of a heart prepared by God to know him as well as the reinstitution of the covenant relationship ("they will be my people, and I will be their God," 24:7).⁴ For those still mired in their failures, the announced judgments stand.

REMNANT THEOLOGY. Not only does this chapter reflect in brief the larger designs of the book of Jeremiah, but its claims of judgment and restoration are also part of a larger biblical pattern of remnant theology. Judgment upon iniquity and sociopolitical changes (e.g., statehood and monarchy; exile) brought divisions among the people of God. During the period of Elijah, for example, many in Israel fell to the seductions of the Phoenician culture and religion. God assured Elijah, however, that there were still seven thousand in Israel who had not bowed the knee to Baal (1 Kings 19:1–18).

With turmoil, intrigue, and injustice rampant, Isaiah was told not to believe what many of his contemporaries called conspiracy but to seal up his testimony among his disciples (Isa. 8:11–17). With his prophetic testimony and his disciples, Isaiah formed a remnant community in eighth-century Judah. In the postexilic community, Ezra and Nehemiah formed a remnant community centered in Jerusalem. Their opponents may have considered themselves part of God's people, but their actions disqualified them from membership.

In the New Testament, Jesus' choice of twelve disciples likely reflects a symbolic forming of a new Israel among the Jews of his day. The church of Jew and Gentile together is a fulfillment of the prophetic hope to raise up again the booth of David and to save remnants from among humankind (Acts 15:13–21). When Paul reflects on God's providence, he thinks of the church as a remnant saved by grace and as evidence that God's mercy will cast an even wider net (Rom. 11). A circular letter to Christians in dispersion interprets them typologically as an exiled remnant, who have been born anew to a living hope through Christ (1 Peter 1:1–9).

Christians, therefore, are part of the remnant saved by grace. This is one of the bridges linking Jeremiah's vision of the two baskets with the church. Another is typological and similar to the remnant link. In the return from exile God provides fulfillment of his concern for his people in Babylon. This does not exhaust the meaning of Jeremiah's prophecy, but it illumines the concern of God wherever and whenever his people are scattered and turn to him in faith.

Contemporary Significance

JUDGMENT AND RESTORATION. God is just in judgment and yet one who justifies (accepts as righteous) those who trust him for their salvation. This is a paraphrase of Romans 3:26; it also captures the intent of Jeremiah 24. God brings judgment on those who spurn him and reject his covenant. But he also seeks to save that which is lost and to give a new heart to those whom he calls into fellowship. The divided fate of the two communities in Jeremiah's day illustrates God's use of the historical process for judgment and restoration.

The heart. Jeremiah depicts the matter of relating to God as a matter of the heart. The heart is the inner core of a person that directs the will and prompts action. This is somewhat different from the modern Western emphasis on the heart as the seat of feelings and emotions. God desires wholehearted allegiance, and by his grace he offers a new heart to his people. In its original context, the physical circumstances concern the judgment of the Exile and the future gift of return to the Promised Land. But there is more even in the original context. The reaction to God's prophetic word is a matter of the heart as it prompts the spiritual allegiances and commitments of the people. That prophetic word concerns the possibility of spiritual change on a fundamental level, and it affirms the miraculous possibility that God will renew a covenant relationship with his people. What Jeremiah projects as God's future grace finds ultimate fulfillment in the coming of Christ and his offer of new life.

A few years ago the popular movie Places in the Heart concerned matters of injustice and hatred and the possibility that God would work through the lives of people for reconciliation and spiritual renewal. This film was a gripping drama because it demonstrated both the power of sin to keep people mired in tragic habits of mind and the power of the gospel to bring to life what was completely missing in personal lives and community relationships.

In its conclusion, the movie provided a powerful testimony to the work of God in human hearts and the possibilities of forgiveness and renewal. The scene depicted a worship service, where community members, both Caucasian and African American, sat in proximity to one another and partook of the one communion table. It depicted that reconciliation is more than a change of mind; it is sharing of space and common commitments to one another. It is something that requires the presence of God because God is its author.

Exile and alienation are geographic and historical entities, but they are also powerful emotional forces. Only through God's grace can either the historical realities of sin or their emotional aftermath be removed and the affections of "another" heart be set in motion.

Jeremiah 25:1–38

THE WORD CAME to Jeremiah concerning all the people of Judah in the fourth year of Jehoiakim son of Josiah king of Judah, which was the first year of Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon. ²So Jeremiah the prophet said to all the people of Judah and to all those living in Jerusalem: ³For twenty-three years—from the thirteenth year of Josiah son of Amon king of Judah until this very day—the word of the LORD has come to me and I have spoken to you again and again, but you have not listened.

⁴And though the LORD has sent all his servants the prophets to you again and again, you have not listened or paid any attention. ⁵They said, "Turn now, each of you, from your evil ways and your evil practices, and you can stay in the land the LORD gave to you and your fathers for ever and ever. ⁶Do not follow other gods to serve and worship them; do not provoke me to anger with what your hands have made. Then I will not harm you."

⁷"But you did not listen to me," declares the LORD, "and you have provoked me with what your hands have made, and you have brought harm to yourselves."

⁸Therefore the LORD Almighty says this: "Because you have not listened to my words, ⁹I will summon all the peoples of the north and my servant Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon," declares the LORD, "and I will bring them against this land and its inhabitants and against all the surrounding nations. I will completely destroy them and make them an object of horror and scorn, and an everlasting ruin. ¹⁰I will banish from them the sounds of joy and gladness, the voices of bride and bridegroom, the sound of millstones and the light of the lamp. ¹¹This whole country will become a desolate wasteland, and these nations will serve the king of Babylon seventy years.

12"But when the seventy years are fulfilled, I will punish the king of Babylon and his nation, the land of the Babylonians, for their guilt," declares the LORD, "and will make it desolate forever. ¹³I will bring upon that land all the things I have spoken against it, all that are written in this book and prophesied by Jeremiah against all the nations. ¹⁴They themselves will be enslaved by many nations and great kings; I will repay them according to their deeds and the work of their hands."

¹⁵This is what the LORD, the God of Israel, said to me: "Take from my hand this cup filled with the wine of my wrath and make all the nations to whom I send you drink it. ¹⁶When they drink it, they will stagger and go mad because of the sword I will send among them."

¹⁷So I took the cup from the LORD's hand and made all the nations to whom he sent me drink it: ¹⁸Jerusalem and the towns of Judah, its kings and officials, to make them a ruin and an object of horror and scorn and cursing, as they are today; ¹⁹Pharaoh king of Egypt, his attendants, his officials and all his people, ²⁰ and all the foreign people there; all the kings of Uz; all the kings of the Philistines (those of Ashkelon, Gaza, Ekron, and the people left at Ashdod); ²¹Edom, Moab and Ammon; ²²all the kings of Tyre and Sidon; the kings of the coastlands across the sea; ²³Dedan, Tema, Buz and all who are in distant places; ²⁴all the kings of Arabia and all the kings of the foreign people who live in the desert; ²⁵all the kings of Zimri. Elam and Media: ²⁶and all the kings of the north, near and far, one after the other—all the kingdoms on the face of the earth. And after all of them, the king of Sheshach will drink it too.

Almighty, the God of Israel, says: Drink, get drunk and vomit, and fall to rise no more because of the sword I will send among you.' ²⁸But if they refuse to take the cup from your hand and drink, tell them, 'This is what the LORD Almighty says: You must drink it! ²⁹See, I am beginning to bring disaster on the city that bears my Name, and will you indeed go unpunished? You will not go unpunished, for I am calling down a sword upon all who live on the earth, declares the LORD Almighty.'

³⁰"Now prophesy all these words against them and say to them:

""The LORD will roar from on high; he will thunder from his holy dwelling and roar mightily against his land. He will shout like those who tread the grapes, shout against all who live on the earth.

31 The tumult will resound to the ends of the earth, for the LORD will bring charges against the nations; he will bring judgment on all mankind and put the wicked to the sword," declares the LORD.

³²This is what the LORD Almighty says:

"Look! Disaster is spreading from nation to nation; a mighty storm is rising from the ends of the earth." ³³At that time those slain by the LORD will be everywhere—from one end of the earth to the other. They will not be mourned or gathered up or buried, but will be like refuse lying on the ground.

³⁴Weep and wail, you shepherds; roll in the dust, you leaders of the flock.

For your time to be slaughtered has come; you will fall and be shattered like fine pottery.

35The shepherds will have nowhere to flee, the leaders of the flock no place to escape.

³⁶Hear the cry of the shepherds, the wailing of the leaders of the flock, for the LORD is destroying their pasture.

³⁷The peaceful meadows will be laid waste because of the fierce anger of the LORD.

³⁸Like a lion he will leave his lair, and their land will become desolate because of the sword of the oppressor and because of the LORD's fierce anger.

Original Meaning

AT ONE STAGE in the collection of Jeremiah's prophecies, chapter 25 likely concluded the collection or, at least, ended a section on judgment of the nations. Beginning with chapter 26, the reader of Jeremiah is provided with a series of biographical prose accounts about the prophet, which make a somewhat different impression than the preceding collections of poetic oracles. One may summarize the literary placement issue somewhat differently by observing that chapter 25 brings to a conclusion the first half of the prophetic book. The material within it assists the reader in looking back to the poetic oracles or forward to the prose accounts.

It is possible that the early form of Jeremiah's prophecies recorded in Baruch's first scroll (ch. 36) ended with the almost apocalyptic portrayal of multinational judgment in chapter 25. Note the reference to Jeremiah's "book" in 25:13. In its current form chapter 25 in Hebrew has similarities to the oracles against the nations and Babylon in chapters 46–51, which now conclude the book. The initial verse of the chapter places the prophecy in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, which was also the first year of Nebuchadnezzar's kingship. This was a time of political change and uncertainty, when the political map was being redrawn by the Babylonians, and Jehoiakim, an Egyptian appointee, faced a dangerous and uncertain future. Jeremiah uses the opportunity to announce that the judgment to come on Judah is but a part of the administration of the Lord's justice in international affairs.

In the Greek version of Jeremiah's book, this chapter is much expanded to include additional oracles against the nations found elsewhere in the Hebrew version.² The peoples and nations named in 25:19–26 are contemporaries of Judah. They too have been assessed and founding wanting in the courts of the Lord. The language is stylized, and judgment is depicted on a universal scale. At points the depiction reflects a historical process in convulsion, as if to say that the decisive point in the judgment of the world has arrived (cf. 25:30–31). In other words, the chapter contains a combination of historical allusion and symbolic portrait, anticipating the apocalyptic language of Ezekiel, Zechariah, and Daniel and paving the way for the apocalyptic language in the New Testament.

25:1–14. This material reports oracular material that God gives to Jeremiah. That it is also a summary statement is clear from verse 3—a reference to twenty-three years of preaching on the part of the prophet. Jeremiah's work is set in the context of God's ongoing prophetic witness among the people carried out by his "servants the prophets" (26:5; cf. 2 Kings 9:7; 24:2). The refusal of the people to heed Jeremiah's warnings and earlier calls for repentance (cf. Jer. 25:5) has now led to the brink of judgment. Babylon, and more particularly Nebuchadnezzar, are identified as a foe from the north. The judgment to come on Judah and Jerusalem is only part of what Nebuchadnezzar will do. Other nations will also come under his domination.

Verse 9 describes Nebuchadnezzar as God's "servant." This is a shocking term to use but fully consistent with Jeremiah's message. The prophet portrays the historical judgment to come on Judah as God's work against his sinful people. Nebuchadnezzar is not a "loose cannon" but an agent in the employ of God. In Daniel Nebuchadnezzar will bear witness in his own frailty that God is sovereign (Dan. 4:1–37). The king's servanthood does not make him morally superior or grant him saving knowledge of God. One may compare the language of "anointed" used to describe Cyrus in his historical role of liberator from the Exile, where it is explicitly stated that the Persian king does not know the Lord (Isa. 45:1–7).

In the judgments against Judah, a servitude to Babylon of "seventy years" is projected (Jer. 25:11–12). The actual period was about sixty-six years, if one reckons from the first year of Nebuchadnezzar's kingship in 605 B.C. to the fall of Babylon in 539, or seventy years almost exactly³ if one reckons from the destruction of the temple in 586 to its rededication in 516 (cf. Ezra 6:15). More likely, seventy is a round number representing the fulfillment of an extended period (2 Chron. 36:21; Zech. 1:12–14). It should be contrasted with the short period predicted by Hananiah for Babylonian hegemony (Jer. 28:3–4).⁴

That Nebuchadnezzar and Babylon are the Lord's servants in the historical process does not make them immune from his standards of justice, however. Babylon too will be judged for its iniquities (25:12–14). This short prophecy anticipates elements in chapters 46–49 (judgment against nations) and 50–51 (judgment against Babylon). As noted above, the oracles against the nations in chapters 46–51 actually come in the Greek version after 25:13 and its reference to "things ... prophesied by Jeremiah against all the nations."

25:15–38. This section vividly depicts the imagery of the nations drinking from the Lord's "cup" of wrath. Such a cup, which presupposes the staggering of someone inebriated and out of control, is a metaphor for the turmoil to come among the nations, when God's sword of judgment is unleashed. As a prophetic symbol of judgment, God's cup of wrath is widespread. In 51:7 Babylon herself is described as the intoxicating cup, but the cup is more usually related directly to God and his judgment.⁶

A long listing of states and rulers comprises a summary for "all the kingdoms on the face of the earth" (25:26). The exaggerated imagery continues with the naming of Babylon as Sheshach, a cryptogram or symbolic name. In turn, Babylon too will drink the cup of wrath.

All the nations are caught up in the description of the judgment to come. It is not just Jerusalem, "the city that bears [God's] Name" (v. 29), who will bear judgment. God is depicted as cosmic Judge, and the imagery employed suggests a type of sweeping judgment beyond the circumstances of the late seventh/early sixth centuries B.C. The face of the earth is strewn about with the effects of destruction. Here is prophetic proclamation like that in Daniel and Zechariah, which depict cataclysmic change in apocalyptic form.

Bridging Contexts

ORACLES AGAINST NATIONS. Oracles against nations are a common part of prophetic books (e.g., Isa. 13–23; Amos 1–2). There does not seem to be one reason for the judgments announced against these peoples. Perhaps they oppressed Israel or Judah, or perhaps their inhumanity, broadly distributed in their neighbors' suffering, has provoked the Lord to anger. But common to all these oracles is the assumption that the Lord is sovereign over all the nations (including Babylon). Jeremiah 25 makes this assumption plain by the radical claim that Nebuchadnezzar is the Lord's "servant" (25:9). Nebuchadnezzar's work in subjecting Judah (or other nations) to his rule is not against God's designs but part of them. That is the extent of his servanthood; he is a tool to carry out God's larger designs.

That such oracles are part of prophetic books is also part of God's design. The reference to God's "servants the prophets" (25:4) reflects God's commitment to interpreting his acts for his people through appointed means. The broader message seems to be: Listen and learn the ways of the Lord, who shapes history, judges iniquity, and seeks to form a people for himself from among the nations. In the stylized language of judgment (e.g., the cup of wrath or judgment, 25:17, 28; cf. 51:7), one encounters a mode of prophecy that will find echoes at Gethsemane (Matt. 26:39) and in John's visions (Rev. 16–17).

Jeremiah and Nebuchadnezzar. One might see the relevance of these differing claims about servants by thinking of "a tale of two servants"

(Nebuchadnezzar and Jeremiah). With apologies to Charles Dickens, one might see in Nebuchadnezzar's role the "best of times" for him and in Jeremiah's prophetic service "the worst of times" for the prophet. But there is an important caveat here. Nebuchadnezzar's historical success is no reason to think that he labors to be faithful to God, nor is Jeremiah's rejection and seeming failure any reason to think he has been faithless to God. On the contrary, readers should note carefully that the chapter is intended to explain why disaster overtook Judah and also to demonstrate that God is Lord of all nations.

There is a pattern portrayed in Jeremiah 25 that will repeat itself in history. Injustice and infidelity on the part of God's people lead to historical judgment. Yet how things change when seen in the light of God's plan to use whatever means necessary to carry out his judgment amid his larger redemptive purposes! Nebuchadnezzar's kingdom is now in the trash bin of history, but the heirs of Jeremiah's word are still the recipient of God's grace.

Contemporary Significance

HISTORICAL PROVIDENCE. The claims of chapter 25 play a significant role in assessing what is meant by God's historical providence. (1) The prophetic perspective on God's historical judgments is not so much a blueprint about the future as it is a revelation about God's purpose. Judgment in the historical process can be self-incurred, but its moral dimension is shaped by the Creator in surprising ways.

- (2) While God's purpose in judging and reforming his people takes shape in the historical process, God's providence was not limited to Israel, nor is it now limited to the church. Other nations, as part of God's universal purpose are judged and shaped as well.
- (3) Judgment is not all that God intends for the future of nations (cf. Gen. 12:3) as his near and far purposes are worked out.
- (4) The work of God is a process and not just an occasional event. Historical events are part of his proximate designs and are used in service of his eternal designs, which no one fully grasps. God's judgments are unsearchable (Rom. 11:33); they stand, however, in the service of his undeserved mercy—the ultimate goal of his providence.

In light of these affirmations Christians cannot assume that the misfortune of every nation is God's judgment and that a period of relative peace is evidence of his favor. God's work through the historical process is more complicated than that. There is no time in world history when this confession lacks application. The larger pattern can only be glimpsed by faith, and that faith must allow for a transhistorical culmination that cannot be fully grasped at any one point in history.

The book of Revelation (like Jeremiah) portrays the suffering of God's people as something that does come on the church because of some failures. Persecution of the church, however, becomes even more insidious precisely because some Christians seek to serve the risen Christ rather than Rome (symbolized in Revelation as Babylon!). The bowls of God's wrath strike universally. Nevertheless, the community of saints in the heavenly Jerusalem is drawn universally from all nations and peoples. From what angle can one possibly see the final result of God's work? Certainly not from within the span of historical existence. The full significance of God as Lord and Judge of all history is better seen at the end of history, not at its midpoint.

Perhaps one way for modern Christians to read the judgments against the nations in Jeremiah is to hear them as announcements of God's reckoning in the midst of a process that still continues and as historical signs of what the future will hold for the impenitent and unrighteous. Pertinent illustrations abound in the surprising changes of the last twenty years. Who would have predicted the dissolution of the USSR, the changes in Eastern Europe, or those in South Africa? Only time will tell their full impact, but even now God is at work in those circumstances and in the churches of these regions.

Seventy years. The prophecy of the seventy years reminds believers that God's means of testing and refining take time. As with the issues of universal justice and the fate of nations, a process of refinement is best understood at the end. How many people have confessed a quick fix in their Christian lives only to realize that God is not through with them yet? Sometimes the education and desired changes are just beginning! So it can be in the life of a congregation as well as in that of a people. God's process of sanctification has a goal, but we may never see it fully realized in our lifetime. Such was the fate of many in Jeremiah's day who trudged into exile and died there. It was also the privilege of Jeremiah to say that the process did not end with the Exile. In the cross and resurrection, believers have seen that it does not end with death either.

A profound interpretation of the cup that sends the nations reeling comes with Jesus' wrestling prayer in the Garden of Gethsemane (Matt. 26:36–46). He knows that the manifestation of God's righteous judgment is at hand. Indeed, it is about to fall on him as a sacrificial lamb. In prayer he struggles to bring his emotions into line with what he knows to be God's will. He will trust God with the immediate events to come—though they entail much suffering on his part—because he trusts God with the future of all his creation.

¹EARLY IN THE REIGN of Jehoiakim son of Josiah king of Judah, this word came from the LORD: ²"This is what the LORD says: Stand in the courtyard of the LORD's house and speak to all the people of the towns of Judah who come to worship in the house of the LORD. Tell them everything I command you; do not omit a word. ³Perhaps they will listen and each will turn from his evil way. Then I will relent and not bring on them the disaster I was planning because of the evil they have done. ⁴Say to them, 'This is what the LORD says: If you do not listen to me and follow my law, which I have set before you, ⁵and if you do not listen to the words of my servants the prophets, whom I have sent to you again and again (though you have not listened), ⁶then I will make this house like Shiloh and this city an object of cursing among all the nations of the earth."

⁷The priests, the prophets and all the people heard Jeremiah speak these words in the house of the LORD. ⁸But as soon as Jeremiah finished telling all the people everything the LORD had commanded him to say, the priests, the prophets and all the people seized him and said, "You must die! ⁹Why do you prophesy in the LORD's name that this house will be like Shiloh and this city will be desolate and deserted?" And all the people crowded around Jeremiah in the house of the LORD.

¹⁰When the officials of Judah heard about these things, they went up from the royal palace to the house of the LORD and took their places at the entrance of the New Gate of the LORD's house. ¹¹Then the priests and the prophets said to the officials and all the people, "This man should be sentenced to death because he has prophesied against this city. You have heard it with your own ears!"

12Then Jeremiah said to all the officials and all the people: "The LORD sent me to prophesy against this house and this city all the things you have heard. ¹³Now reform your ways and your actions and obey the LORD your God. Then the LORD will relent and not bring the disaster he has pronounced against you. ¹⁴As for me, I am in your hands; do with me whatever you think is good and right. ¹⁵Be assured, however, that if you put me to death, you will bring the guilt of innocent blood on yourselves and on this city and on those who live in it, for in truth the LORD has sent me to you to speak all these words in your hearing."

¹⁶Then the officials and all the people said to the priests and the prophets, "This man should not be sentenced to death! He has spoken to us in the name of the LORD our God."

¹⁷Some of the elders of the land stepped forward and said to the entire assembly of people, ¹⁸"Micah of Moresheth prophesied in the days of Hezekiah king of Judah. He told all the people of Judah, 'This is what the LORD Almighty says:

""Zion will be plowed like a field,
Jerusalem will become a heap of rubble, the temple hill a mound overgrown with thickets."

¹⁹"Did Hezekiah king of Judah or anyone else in Judah put him to death? Did not Hezekiah fear the LORD and seek his favor? And did not the LORD relent, so that he did not bring the disaster he pronounced against them? We are about to bring a terrible disaster on ourselves!"

²¹When King Jehoiakim and all his officers and officials heard his words, the king sought to put him to death. But Uriah heard of it and fled in fear to Egypt. ²²King Jehoiakim, however, sent Elnathan son of Acbor to Egypt, along with some other men.
²³They brought Uriah out of Egypt and took him to King Jehoiakim, who had him struck down with a sword and his body thrown into the burial place of the common people.)

²⁴Furthermore, Ahikam son of Shaphan supported Jeremiah, and so he was not handed over to the people to be put to death.

Original Meaning

CHAPTER 25 IS prose and poetry; it served as a concluding portion to the first half of this book. Chapter 26 begins a series of narratives in chronological order about the prophet and his public ministry, along with references to specific kings and their reigns.

Chapter 26 contains a portion of a message delivered at the temple in the beginning of Jehoiakim's reign (609/608 B.C.), along with an extended account of the audience reaction. Jehoiakim was the third king to rule in less than a year's time. Upon Josiah's death, the people of the land had appointed Jehoahaz, the son of Josiah and younger brother of Jehoiakim, as king. The Egyptians removed him and put Jehoiakim on the throne (2 Kings 23:29–35). It was a time of uncertainty for the direction of the Judean state. The previous chapter concerns a message from the fourth year of Jehoiakim.

Jeremiah's oral message is summarized in Jer. 26:1–6. This sounds like an abbreviated form of the longer message delivered at the temple and recorded in Jeremiah 7. Whether or not chapter 26 and chapter 7 are two accounts of the same "sermon" is debated among interpreters. The primary difference between the chapters comes in the attention given to audience reaction. Here Jeremiah engages his audience in debate (26:7–19) over the validity of his prophetic word. A summary comment is appended in 26:20–24 that describes the martyrdom of the prophet Uriah and the crucial support given Jeremiah by Ahikam the son of Shaphan. In any case, chapter 7 preserves the longer form of the same message, whether or not it is the same incident.

26:1–6. Jeremiah warns the people that if they fail to follow the instruction (tora, v. 4)² of the Lord, they will bring calamity on themselves. This is a typical form of the act-consequence claim: Disobedience brings disaster. Not following the Lord's instruction is the same thing as not listening to the Lord and not heeding the words of his "servants the prophets." As Jeremiah will argue in the debate with his audience, he stands in this line of prophets sent (šlḥ) by the Lord because, like them, the Lord has also "sent" (šlḥ) him (26:12–15). The temple will be destroyed in the coming judgment, just like the destruction of the worship center at Shiloh during the days of the judges and the prophet Samuel.⁴

Jeremiah's words about the temple strike a chord with his audience. It is God's "house," and the assumption of many in the audience is that God will protect it no matter what. Also, for some in the audience, to speak against the temple is tantamount to speaking against God himself. This is blasphemy. The form of Jeremiah's proclamation, however, is a warning and a call for repentance. The historical fate of the temple is actually influenced by the actions of the people.

26:7–19. Opposition to the "temple sermon," with its prediction that the temple will be destroyed, is widespread and intense. Priests and prophets (cf. 26:16), as well as "the people," propose the death sentence for what appears to them as both blasphemy and treason. The essentials of a public trial ensue, when certain officials take their seat in the New Gate of the temple complex (26:10). Such a location lends gravity to the situation and the charges against the prophet. He will be judged in the context of the temple complex against which he himself has just announced the possibility of judgment (cf. also ch. 20).

Jeremiah defends himself as one in the line of prophets whom the Lord has sent to warn his people about the consequences of disobedience to his instruction (cf. 26:5). He recognizes that he is "in [their] hands" (26:14)—that is, he is on trial—but he warns them that if they execute him, they will incur the judgment of bringing "innocent blood on yourselves." There are two implications of this claim. (1) The shedding of innocent blood will bring guilt on the assembly and the place. The Old Testament is strongly oriented to the claim that unrequited blood brings a community or people into the sphere of guilt. (2) Jeremiah is thereby reminding the people indirectly that as "innocent" of their charges, he is one of the prophets sent by the Lord. To put it in a kind of syllogism: If Jeremiah speaks a word against the temple in the name of the Lord, yet is innocent of blasphemy, then the word he speaks must come from the Lord.

This second point, at least, gains a hearing for Jeremiah among some of the people. He has spoken to them in the name of the Lord (as opposed to the prompting of another deity or offering his own political commentary). He meets, therefore, at least one of Deuteronomy's criteria for judging prophecy (Deut. 13). Some elders of the land add that Jeremiah is no different from Micah of Moresheth, who prophesied in Hezekiah's reign that Jerusalem would be destroyed (26:18 = Mic. 3:12). Apparently they agree that Micah was one of God's servants the prophets. King Hezekiah, they remind the court, did not execute Micah; instead, he feared the Lord, and the Lord relented concerning the announced judgment. In an unintended prophecy, the elders conclude that by the present course of action (opposing Jeremiah rather than heeding his warning), the people are doing great harm to themselves. This is a tacit recognition of Jeremiah's claim that to execute him would bring guilt on the place.

In referring to the prophecy of Micah, the people engage in a type of exegesis or interpretation of their religious traditions. Just as Jeremiah drew a comparison between the Jerusalem of his day with the Shiloh of Samuel's day, so they draw a comparison of Jeremiah's message with that of Micah. The elders put the work of Micah and the response of Hezekiah together in a more explicit way than either 2 Kings or 2 Chronicles (the two narratives about Hezekiah's reign) or the book of Micah itself does. The elders do not quote Micah's prophecy about Jerusalem as part of a warning or a call to repentance. In Micah 3:12 the prophet announces judgment to come. The people understand, however, that Hezekiah's reaction to the prophecy was genuine repentance and that God used the unconditional prophecy to move the king and people toward change.

26:20–24. A prophet named Uriah, however, was not given the reprieve accorded Jeremiah. King Jehoiakim's anger against prophets who announced the Lord's judgment on Judah led to the extradition of Uriah from Egypt (where he had fled) and his execution. It should be remembered that Jehoiakim was appointed king by the Egyptians, so the Egyptian officials were likely to cooperate with him. The narrator notes incidentally that the body of Uriah was thrown in the burial place of the common people. This was intended as a further sign that Uriah was not a real prophet. In another context, Jeremiah prophesies that Jehoiakim's burial will be that of a donkey—tossed outside the gate of the city (22:19; cf. 36:30).

Jehoiakim's execution of Uriah thereby brings the judgment of "innocent blood" on himself and his administration. Jeremiah too might have been executed except that an important official, Ahikam' son of Shaphan, stood on his side. With Ahikam one gets a glimpse of someone who sympathized with Jeremiah and his prophetic task. His brother later lends to Baruch, Jeremiah's scribe, his office ("room") overlooking the temple complex (36:10).

Interpreting Scripture within Scripture. How does one deal with a prophecy of the Lord's judgment like this one? Such is the fascinating challenge of Jeremiah 26. Readers will see in the recorded response to Jeremiah's "sermon" an example of inner-scriptural interpretation, as hearers attempt to put Jeremiah's words in historical and theological contexts. Apparently the majority of the audience believe that Jeremiah has committed blasphemy and treason because they cannot fathom why God would announce the destruction of his own house. Perhaps they also feel that Jeremiah has overreacted to some minor spiritual failings regarding the covenant responsibilities of Judah.

The primary issue according to the prophet, however, is the comparison of Jerusalem with the worship center at Shiloh (26:9). Jeremiah offers a typological comparison between the days of the judges, when the corrupt worship center at Shiloh and the priestly line of Eli were destroyed, and the circumstances of Judah under Jehoiakim. To use an anachronistic phrase, what we have here is an example of Scripture interpreting Scripture.

In his defense before the assembled court and people, Jeremiah claims membership in the line of prophets whom the Lord has sent to warn his people about the consequences of their failure. Jeremiah's opponents cannot claim ignorance of such prophets or of the use God made of them in a previous generation; the questions are whether Jeremiah's diagnosis of the times is accurate and whether he himself stands in their succession.

Another example of bridging contexts comes in the elders' citation of Micah's prophecy concerning Jerusalem during the days of Hezekiah. This is a rare example in the Old Testament of a quote now contained in another prophetic book, complete with reference to time and place. It is a second example (to be anachronistic) of Scripture interpreting Scripture. Interpreters all recognize that Jeremiah has been influenced by the prophecies of Hosea. Here, however, his prophecy is compared to that of another eighth-century prophet, Micah, who announced judgment on Jerusalem. The elders assume that Micah was a prophet sent by the Lord; furthermore, Micah induced the fear of the Lord in Hezekiah, and the king's response to the prophetic word averted that word's announced wrath from God.

Here one encounters the claim that the predictions of a "true" prophet do not always come to pass literally; if the announced judgment provokes the fear of the Lord and evidence of faithful living, then it has served a divine purpose. The response of the people to Jeremiah and, above all, the response of Jehoiakim to Uriah demonstrate that the judgment predicted by Jeremiah will ultimately come. This is foreshadowed by the comment of the elders that the rejection of Jeremiah will result in great harm coming on the people (26:19).

Uriah was given a prophet's "reward" (Matt. 5:10–12) and executed. He was a martyr, whose witness would have gone unrecorded had it not been noted here. God sent a line of prophets, but the people have not listened. Uriah has an honored place in that line of witnesses.

The reform movement. Jeremiah's words have not fallen on completely deaf ears! Even if the disaster announced cannot be averted, the response of the elders is the beginnings of a reform movement and perhaps also an indication of the circles of people who "remember" his words. Ahikam too seems to be a supporter of Jeremiah's call for holy living and wholehearted obedience to the Lord's instructions. He is from a family of scribes with a distinguished record of service to Judah. He is another member of the (often unnamed and unmentioned) reform movement that hear Jeremiah's words and help to preserve them for posterity.

Contemporary Significance

LISTENING TO A PROPHETIC WARNING. How does one listen to a prophetic warning or announcement of disaster to come? One should not simply ask about the dire circumstances of the past, as if biblical interpretation is finished when one understands what was wrong. There is the responsibility also of a faithful reading where one shines the light of hard sayings on a personal or corporate present. In doing so, the issue is not to find a one-to-one correspondence between then and now but a theological link between the call to faithful living then and the call to faithful living in the present. There is also the issue of act and consequence, something the prophets specialize in uncovering. What will be the results of my life or that of a church or community if things do not change? What changes is God calling for among his people?

Jeremiah was put on trial for his warning about judgment to come. Is a clear warning about judgment to come what is required for a faithful rendering of Jeremiah 26 for today? Certainly this is possible, but it is not necessarily the case. One way to understand the contemporary significance of judgmental prophecy in Scripture is to interpret it as an example for later instruction. As such, one must decide first if it is a warning to society as a whole or to one particular community (e.g., a church), or if the application is a more personal matter.

If we conclude that the warning is to society as a whole, then one should be prepared for the question: "Why should they even listen?" Or what about the church? Should the church acknowledge its failures and weaknesses? That is easy to answer; surely, it should! And while the church has good theological reasons for being concerned about destructive trends in society, the light of God's Word should go first to the life of God's people to expose what is wrong and hurtful about its own witness.

Heeding judgment. The response of the elders of the land indicates another way in which this chapter may take on contemporary significance. Notice how carefully they listen to Jeremiah and compare his word with that of another prophet who brought a judgmental word from the Lord. They ask: What did that prophecy evoke among its hearers? Unfortunately, the repentance evoked in Hezekiah was not matched in Jeremiah's day by either King Jehoiakim or the people, but the question starts the search for application in the hearers' own day.

Judgmental prophecy does not reach its final goal when (or even if) a predicted disaster occurs. Micah was a true prophet in that he brought about a change in Judah, although the judgment he announced did not come to pass. Judgmental prophecy is a sharp way of defining who God is, a God who takes his people seriously as covenant partners in his work of bringing justice and redemption to the world. Does God have standards? Yes! Is he committed to the righteousness and integrity of his people? Yes! While God may vindicate his righteousness through judgment of the wicked (and thereby instruct others), such judgment (enacted in history or simply announced) may also serve the larger ends of renewing his people. Both righteousness and renewal are goals of God according to the broader scriptural witness. Attaining these goals through refinement is a consistent pattern of God's dealings with his people.

Standing with the prophets. Perhaps Christians should be wary of a too-ready identification with Jeremiah. After all, God does not call each of his people to be a prophet any more than God requires all congregations to engage consistently in prophetic witness. Ahikam, however, represents a person of some repute and influence in the larger Judean society who responds to the hostile reception of Jeremiah by standing with him. When Jeremiah's life was "on the line," in a sense the integrity of Ahikam's faith was also "on the line." This is what the prophecy evoked in his personal life. He did not take the easy way out, which in this case meant acquiescence to the majority view. In Jeremiah's hour of need Ahikam put his reputation and influence to good use. Perhaps we can say that he acted out of a shared conviction with Jeremiah that the Lord they both worshiped had rightly announced a judgment on iniquity.

The future judgment will take its course from the present realities—unless the people can be brought to their theological senses, which seems unlikely. It is more important that Ahikam stand up and be counted than that he "win the day"; although without his influence, it is likely that Jeremiah would have perished at the hands of the prophets and priests who opposed him. Ahikam is a disciple, one of the "seven thousand who have not bowed the knee to the Baal," one of those effective witnesses whose work has great influence at a crucial time but whose name is not remembered by many. He is an example of that great truth that God's Word does not return to him void, nor finally does the life of God's servants become void. By God's grace there will be someone (or some people!) who have the spiritual ears to hear what a true prophet has to say.

In April 1999 the United States was brought to a state of collective shock over the senseless murders of students and a teacher at Columbine High School in the Denver area. Much has been written about the multiple tragedies of that fateful day. Two disturbed and disaffected students took senseless vengeance on their school community before turning the guns on themselves. One chilling account comes with the testimony of students who saw or heard the killers stalking their prey in the school building, then stopping and asking one young woman (according to reports, Cassie Bernall) if she believed in God. When she answered "yes," they shot her. She was one of thirteen victims to die. There are reports that the killers asked the same question of another young woman and that she answered in the affirmative before being shot.

One cannot know what went through the minds of the young women in the last seconds before their murder. One thought perhaps was that the murderers felt rage at God and the pretensions of classmates to believe and trust in him, and that now these demented boys were going to make the girls victims of that rage. Indeed, they were victims, but more than that, they were witnesses. We have only the brief reference to Uriah or to the courage of Ahikam. They did what they did and stood where they stood because they believed in God. We need not ask the modern psychological question of what they thought at the moments of decision; we should, however, give thanks that they acted on what they believed. And we should be reminded that God asks that of all disciples of his Son.

EARLY IN THE REIGN of Zedekiah son of Josiah king of Judah, this word came to Jeremiah from the LORD: ²This is what the LORD said to me: "Make a voke out of straps and crossbars and put it on your neck. ³Then send word to the kings of Edom, Moab, Ammon, Tyre and Sidon through the envoys who have come to Jerusalem to Zedekiah king of Judah. ⁴Give them a message for their masters and say, 'This is what the LORD Almighty, the God of Israel, says: "Tell this to your masters: 5With my great power and outstretched arm I made the earth and its people and the animals that are on it, and I give it to anyone I please. ⁶Now I will hand all your countries over to my servant Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon; I will make even the wild animals subject to him. ⁷All nations will serve him and his son and his grandson until the time for his land comes; then many nations and great kings will subjugate him.

8""If, however, any nation or kingdom will not serve Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon or bow its neck under his yoke, I will punish that nation with the sword, famine and plague, declares the LORD, until I destroy it by his hand. 9So do not listen to your prophets, your diviners, your interpreters of dreams, your mediums or your sorcerers who tell you, 'You will not serve the king of Babylon.' 10They prophesy lies to you that will only serve to remove you far from your lands; I will banish you and you will perish. 11But if any nation will bow its neck under the yoke of the king of Babylon and serve him, I will let that nation remain in its own land to till it and to live there, declares the LORD.""

Judah. I said, "Bow your neck under the yoke of the king of Babylon; serve him and his people, and you will live. ¹³Why will you and your people die by the sword, famine and plague with which the LORD has threatened any nation that will not serve the king of Babylon? ¹⁴Do not listen to the words of the prophets who say to you, 'You will not serve the king of Babylon,' for they are prophesying lies to you. ¹⁵'I have not sent them,' declares the LORD. 'They are prophesying lies in my name. Therefore, I will banish you and you will perish, both you and the prophets who prophesy to you.'"

¹⁶Then I said to the priests and all these people, "This is what the LORD says: Do not listen to the prophets who say, 'Very soon now the articles from the LORD's house will be brought back from Babylon.' They are prophesying lies to you. ¹⁷Do not listen to them. Serve the king of Babylon, and you will live. Why should this city become a ruin? ¹⁸If they are prophets and have the word of the LORD, let them plead with the LORD Almighty that the furnishings remaining in the house of the LORD and in the palace of the king of Judah and in Jerusalem not be taken to Babylon. ¹⁹For this is what the LORD Almighty says about the pillars, the Sea, the movable stands and the other furnishings that are left in this city, ²⁰which Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon did not take away when he carried Jehoiachin son of Jehoiakim king of Judah into exile from Jerusalem to Babylon, along with all the nobles of Judah and Jerusalem—²¹ves, this is what the LORD Almighty, the God of Israel, says about the things that are left in the house of the LORD and in the palace of the king of Judah and in Jerusalem: ²² They will be taken to Babylon and there they will remain until the day I come for them,' declares the LORD. 'Then I will bring them back and restore them to this place.'"

Original Meaning

THIS CHAPTER IS PART of a larger unit that includes chapters 28–29. It is influenced also by the narrative in chapter 26. It is particularly important to note the relationship between chapters 27 and 28 because text-critical problems in 27:1 and 28:1 have made interpretation more difficult. Chapters 27 and 28 are linked by the report of Jeremiah's wearing a yoke (of thongs and wooden bars) as a prophetic sign that Nebuchadnezzar's claim on Judah has been granted him by the Lord. In chapter 27 Jeremiah reports that the Lord commanded him to make a yoke and to wear it and that the Lord sent him to prophesy that Nebuchadnezzar has been granted sovereignty over nations (including Judah). Jeremiah also reports that the Lord has some sharp words for the various prophets and diviners who have prophesied differently concerning Babylonian rule (cf. ch. 13). The conflict with these prophets continues in chapters 28–29.

Readers should compare translations of 26:1; 27:1; and 28:1, along with any marginal explanations provided by the translators. Often English translations have small print or marginal notes that inform the reader that the translators have made a text-critical choice in the rendering; that is, they have chosen from different words or phrases preserved in the ancient manuscripts.

The problems for translation and interpretation of 27:1 lie in the variants preserved in Hebrew and Greek manuscripts. The majority of Hebrew manuscripts for 27:1 preserve the rendering "in the beginning of the reign of Jehoiakim ... the word came to Jeremiah." "Jehoiakim" is clearly wrong, perhaps mistakenly copied from 26:1, because Zedekiah is the Judean monarch addressed in the prophetic oracle (27:3, 12). The NIV translators have recognized the copy error and followed a "minority reading" in some Hebrew manuscripts, where the appropriate name Zedekiah is preserved.

Recognition that Zedekiah is the correct name in 27:1 solves only one of the problems for interpreting the chapter, however. Insofar as chapters 27 and 28 should be read together as a narrative witness to the work of Jeremiah in wearing a yoke, Jeremiah 28:1 also has a problem. In Hebrew this text begins, "and it happened in that year in the beginning of the reign of Zedekiah ..."; then the text continues, "in the fourth month of the fifth year." The problem is that the fifth year of Zedekiah does not easily qualify as "the beginning of his reign," nor is the "fifth month" the beginning of a year. Probably the phrase "beginning of the reign" (also used in 26:1) has the technical meaning of "accession year." The phrase could perhaps fit the circumstances of 27:1–3, which narrate events in the accession or initial year of Zedekiah as monarch, but it fits poorly in 28:1. The more likely explanation is that the chronological headings for chapters 26–28 have become mixed during the process of transmitting the material to final written form.

A plausible solution to these difficulties is at hand if one takes the qualification of the fourth year of Zedekiah seriously in 28:1, as well as the proposal that the events of chapter 28 occur in the same year as those of chapter 27. The fourth year of Zedekiah (594/593 B.C.) coincides with a serious rebellion in the east against Babylon. If chapter 27 describes an event in the fourth year of Zedekiah, then the notation that Zedekiah and ambassadors from several neighboring states have assembled in Jerusalem (27:3) takes on significance. This conference included discussion about the possibility of a revolt against Babylon, using a political threat to Babylonian hegemony in the east as an occasion for some states west of Babylon to meet for talk. Apparently many priests, prophets, and diviners of various kinds lent their support to this anti-Babylonian movement (27:9, 16). Jeremiah's encounter with Hananiah recorded in chapter 28, where he is still wearing the yoke mentioned in chapter 27, continues the debate among the prophets over the role Babylon will play in the Lord's economy.

In chapter 29 one finds references to prophets among the Judean exiles in Babylon who are predicting a quick end to Babylonian hegemony. This chapter too presupposes a time after the initial Babylonian siege of Jerusalem and the taking of Jehoiachin and others into exile. In other words, a date in the fourth year of Zedekiah fits the historical context nicely for chapters 27–29.

Jeremiah's message in chapter 27 is that God has given a limited historical sovereignty to Babylon and Nebuchadnezzar. This applies to the Transjordanian states of Edom, Moab, and Ammon as well as the city-states of Tyre and Sidon, all of which are mentioned in 27:3. To oppose Babylon at this time is to oppose God's will as Creator and Lord. In this style of presentation, Jeremiah shows himself to be a prophet to the nations (cf. 1:5).

In keeping with prophecies made elsewhere (25:13; 29:10), the end of Babylonian supremacy is also acknowledged. Babylon's end is noted (27:7), as is God's intent to restore the temple vessels taken by Nebuchadnezzar and those of his people now in exile (27:22).⁴

The majority of chapter 27 concerns the work of other prophets who oppose the message of Jeremiah (27:9, 14–18). One wonders at the level of interchange between these various interpreter's of God's will. The events of 598/597 B.C., when Babylon came up against Judah and Jerusalem, did not quite fulfill the prophetic words of either Jeremiah or his opponents. Jeremiah's years of proclaiming an assault on Jerusalem have proved true, but the city itself has survived. Those who prophesied "peace" have been proved wrong, but the Judean state and its capital are still intact.

Verse 9 provides an intriguing list of mediators and specialists for determining the will of the gods. Five specialists are mentioned: prophets, diviners, interpreters of dreams, mediums, and sorcerers.⁵ In times of threat and calamity, such people have plenty of customers. The text does not make any distinction between those practitioners who have sought the Lord's will through their rituals and those who may have consulted another deity. All alike are rejected.

With all of the language of judgment in chapter 27, the concluding verses point to a time when God will bring back temple vessels from Babylon to Jerusalem (27:16–22). Babylon did not take them away because God was impotent—Nebuchadnezzar is God's servant, not vanquisher. The vessels will be returned when God is ready. This concluding comment makes for a transition to the account of Jeremiah's encounter with Hananiah in chapter 28. There too the concern is ostensibly about the temple vessels and related matters, but the deeper issue remains the same.

WORD AND DEED. Chapter 27 records two of the favorite devices of the Old Testament prophets: a word from the Lord and a symbolic act to embody the message. Word and deed go together in prophetic ministry, whether the deed is a sign of a particular message (as here in chs. 27–28) or whether the life of the messenger more broadly speaking is congruent with the message. This is a pattern that both the leaders of God's people and the people themselves should recognize. A consistency of word and deed do not guarantee the authenticity of a message, but it is a valuable indicator of commitment.

Jeremiah is in good company. Isaiah and Ezekiel combined word and deed on several occasions. Prophetic ministry requires a commitment of one's whole life, for even personal details such as marriage, children, and grief over personal loss become vehicles for prophetic proclamation. This is true of Jeremiah's prayers. His "confessions" in chapters 11–20 are vehicles for carrying out his commission as prophet to the nations, since their place in the prophetic book means they too are part of the instructional package. The symbolic acts of prophets are part of an incarnational style of ministry, much like that of Jesus, whose words and deeds embodied his message and served as signs of his true identity.

God's sovereignty over the nations. Chapter 27 is set in the broad biblical context of God's sovereignty over creation and history. The claim is not that people and places are puppets, but that in creation and through the historical process God is working out his purposes of judgment, refinement, transformation, and redemption. Nebuchadnezzar and Babylon are God's servants, as were the Assyrians before and Cyrus and the Persians after. Rome too served God in various ways, as the New Testament writers make clear. None of these historical "servants" of God can boast of moral superiority or freedom from the judgment that the historical process will ultimately bring on them. Nebuchadnezzar will have his day; even the beasts of the field are his (27:5–6)! But God also has his day, when Nebuchadnezzar eats straw like an animal and when the great Babylon eventually falls (Dan. 4:28–33).

GOD'S PRIMARY GOAL. People instinctively pull for underdogs. In political terms it is easy to be sympathetic towards those groups who have had little autonomy and whose voices are not often heard. Since the birth of the United States came about as political underdogs fought for more autonomy and religious freedom, it is easy for most North American Christians to sympathize with Zedekiah and the ambassadors from neighboring states. Indeed, most of the world's peoples understand the yearning of the Judeans and the others as they rebel against foreign domination. No more tribute! No more humiliation! Surely God wants them to be free!

A close reading of chapter 27 (and 28) reveals that God did want his people free—but free from the enslavement to sin and not just free from Babylonian hegemony. The issue first was timing (27:7), but timing pointed to a larger issue: God's relationship to a recalcitrant people. It is a process that the prophet underscores in his words. God intends to judge the people for their iniquities, to refine them through the process of political servitude, and then to use them as instructional examples to later generations of his people. This is a sobering thought, but Jeremiah's yoke does not just represent Nebuchadnezzar and Babylon; it also represents God's judgment on Judah and the neighboring states. Even more radically, the yoke represents the will of God himself to constrain his people.

A modern application of this message must be quick to deny that all peoples who languish under oppressive regimes or that all individuals who suffer emotional and physical exile are bound in these conditions by God's judgment. Scripture gives no blanket warrant for such a claim. Some people (including some Christians) find unpalatable any thought of oppression and exile as God's refining judgment. Scripture gives no warrant for that claim either. The issues with which Jeremiah 27 are concerned are those of God's timing and the larger design of his historical purposes in forming a people for himself. It is simply true that God's timing is often not "our" timing and God's ways are not our ways (Isa. 55:8). What Jeremiah calls his contemporaries to believe is that their first impulse is wrong. They have yet to see the error of their ways, and until God has dealt with that, there will be no successful liberation from political oppression or anything else.

It is ironic that the prophets and priests who oppose Jeremiah are so concerned with the temple vessels. They are so concerned with God's honor, yet they have not seen how Judah's covenantal failures have offended God's honor and spurned his love. They are convinced, furthermore, that God will act quickly to restore "his" vessels. "In good time," is Jeremiah's reply. Yes, God will restore the temple vessels, but God is more concerned with the fate of his people and the refining judgment they must undergo. Ultimately God will bring a merciful end to Babylonian supremacy and in the process will restore his people. His goal is (and remains!) to make his people fit vessels for his service, a kingdom of priests and a holy nation (1 Peter 2:9).

Over the course of centuries, any number of councils and high-level meetings have convened to influence the direction of God's people. Some have been productive; others have not. Just as Jeremiah wandered about with his yoke, so various protesters and lobbyists, preachers and prophets stand to proclaim their message. It is not always easy to tell the genuine article from the counterfeit, when considering their causes. One motive, however, remains constant: God seeks a holy people who will trust him with their lives.

In the fifth month of that same year, the fourth year, early in the reign of Zedekiah king of Judah, the prophet Hananiah son of Azzur, who was from Gibeon, said to me in the house of the LORD in the presence of the priests and all the people: ²"This is what the LORD Almighty, the God of Israel, says: 'I will break the yoke of the king of Babylon. ³Within two years I will bring back to this place all the articles of the LORD's house that Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon removed from here and took to Babylon. ⁴I will also bring back to this place Jehoiachin son of Jehoiakim king of Judah and all the other exiles from Judah who went to Babylon,' declares the LORD, 'for I will break the yoke of the king of Babylon.'"

⁵Then the prophet Jeremiah replied to the prophet Hananiah before the priests and all the people who were standing in the house of the LORD. ⁶He said, "Amen! May the LORD do so! May the LORD fulfill the words you have prophesied by bringing the articles of the LORD's house and all the exiles back to this place from Babylon. ⁷Nevertheless, listen to what I have to say in your hearing and in the hearing of all the people: ⁸From early times the prophets who preceded you and me have prophesied war, disaster and plague against many countries and great kingdoms. ⁹But the prophet who prophesies peace will be recognized as one truly sent by the LORD only if his prediction comes true."

¹⁰Then the prophet Hananiah took the yoke off the neck of the prophet Jeremiah and broke it, ¹¹and he said before all the people, "This is what the LORD says: 'In the same way will I break the yoke of Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon off the neck of all the nations within two years.'" At this, the prophet Jeremiah went on his way.

12Shortly after the prophet Hananiah had broken the yoke off the neck of the prophet Jeremiah, the word of the LORD came to Jeremiah: 13"Go and tell Hananiah, 'This is what the LORD says: You have broken a wooden yoke, but in its place you will get a yoke of iron. 14This is what the LORD Almighty, the God of Israel, says: I will put an iron yoke on the necks of all these nations to make them serve Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, and they will serve him. I will even give him control over the wild animals."

¹⁵Then the prophet Jeremiah said to Hananiah the prophet, "Listen, Hananiah! The LORD has not sent you, yet you have persuaded this nation to trust in lies. ¹⁶Therefore, this is what the LORD says: 'I am about to remove you from the face of the earth. This very year you are going to die, because you have preached rebellion against the LORD.'"

¹⁷In the seventh month of that same year, Hananiah the prophet died.

Original Meaning

JEREMIAH'S ENCOUNTERS WITH HANANIAH comprise one of the best-known accounts in this prophetic book. The first verse of the chapter ties the encounter with the efforts in Zedekiah's fourth year (594/593 B.C.) to foment a rebellion against Babylonian control. Although the date in the fourth year is explicit, the reference to "early in the reign of Zedekiah" seems out of place. As indicated in the commentary on chapter 27, a serious rebellion broke out against Babylon at this time in the eastern section of the empire, and other states subjected to Babylon were tempted to declare themselves independent. In chapter 27 one finds the account of a conference for state diplomats held in Jerusalem, where the discussion apparently included anti-Babylonian proposals. Jeremiah wore a yoke at that time to symbolize God's intention to place Judah in servitude to Babylon.

28:1–11. Hananiah bears all the marks of a prophet of the Lord. His name means the "The LORD is [or has been] gracious." The fact that he is from Gibeon is helpful to identify him, but that fact may have no other significance for understanding his actions. When he speaks, his words are prefaced by the announcement, "This is what the LORD Almighty, the God of Israel, says" (28:2). Hananiah prophesies that God will restore to Jerusalem the temple vessels taken by the Babylonians in 597 B.C. and the exiled Judean king. Concern about the temple vessels and the words of Jeremiah's prophetic opponents have been mentioned in 27:16–22. Hananiah, therefore, represents one of the unnamed prophets, noted in chapter 27, who are leading the people astray.

Hananiah performs a prophetic symbolic act in breaking the wooden yoke that Jeremiah is wearing; this was Hananiah's illustration of his prophecy that the Lord will break the yoke of Babylon, which is constraining and humiliating Judah. Hananiah believes in the power of the Lord to overcome Babylonian rule and to restore the exiled king Jehoiachin,² the other exiles deported in 597 B.C., and even the temple vessels taken by the Babylonian army. Throughout the chapter Hananiah is described as "the prophet" (28:1, 5, 10, 12, 15, 17).³ In the Greek translation of Jeremiah, Hananiah is explicitly described as a "false prophet," but the Hebrew text refrains from using an equivalent term. Both the terminology and the form of his public address indicate that he is a Yahwistic prophet, perhaps even one who has served God faithfully on previous occasions. Now, however, the content of his oracle is wrong. He will be shown wrong about God's timing and about God's intentions in using Babylonian might to chastise his people.

Hananiah makes his announcement that the Lord will soon overcome the Babylonians and restore the people and temple vessels in the courtyard of the temple complex (28:2–4). This setting is important to the context of the message and also to Jeremiah's ministry. On several occasions Jeremiah publicly prophesied in the temple. At the beginning of Jehoiakim's reign he offered a scathing review of misplaced confidence in the temple and called for repentance from the evil course underway in Judah (26:1–6; cf. ch. 7; 19:14–15). After being forbidden to preach at the temple complex, Jeremiah sent his faithful secretary, Baruch, to read from a scroll of collected oracles (ch. 36). During Zedekiah's reign Jeremiah was in the temple complex and received a vision with an oracle attached to it (24:1–10).

Jeremiah's encounter with Hananiah in the temple symbolizes their differing viewpoints on what it means that God dwells in the midst of his people. Hananiah seems to think that God's presence means that God's defense of the house and the people is always near at hand.

Jeremiah's first reaction to the oracle of Hananiah ("Amen!" 28:6) seems to indicate that the prophecy impresses him. This reaction is in spite of the fact that Hananiah's proclamation goes against what he himself has prophesied. Jeremiah is open to hearing God speak through Hananiah. By way of first response, Jeremiah reminds Hananiah and their audience in the temple that prophets of the Lord have habitually announced disaster and judgment—the prophet who predicts peace will be vindicated only when that word comes to pass (28:8–9). This will indicate that it has come from God.

A prophecy of disaster or judgment, however, is evaluated differently. It is intended to evoke consternation and provoke people to action. The citation of Micah 3:12 in Jeremiah 26:18 is a good illustration of the point. Micah of Moresheth announced the coming destruction of Jerusalem. The proclamation was unconditional in form, yet what it provoked in Hezekiah and the people was enough for the Lord to relent and to keep from bringing the announced destruction to pass (26:19; see comments on ch. 26).

28:12–17. When Hananiah breaks the yoke worn by Jeremiah, Jeremiah does not reply immediately. This is another indication of the seriousness with which he takes Hananiah's prophetic efforts. It may also indicate that Jeremiah is humiliated by his first encounter with Hananiah. Subsequently the word of the Lord comes to him, and he confronts Hananiah with the message that Babylon rules with God's explicit assent and that Hananiah has made the people believe a "lie" (Heb. šeqer,⁴ used several times in chs. 27–29). Indeed, Hananiah's words are a rebellion against the will of the Lord. In place of the wooden yoke broken by Hananiah, Jeremiah proclaims that God will now place the people in servitude to Babylon through an iron yoke.

In a somber word, Jeremiah announces that Hananiah will die within the year (28:12–17). That death is interpreted as judgment on him and his word. This is in accord with Deuteronomy 18:20–22, where the penalty for preaching falsely in the name of the Lord is death. The narrative about Hananiah is an illustration of the charges elsewhere in Jeremiah concerning prophets who prophesy "peace, when there is no peace."

Bridging Contexts

THE HUMAN ELEMENT IN PROPHECY. The encounters between Hananiah and Jeremiah in chapter 28 are narrated as part of the immediate context (chs. 27–29) of Judean opposition to Babylon and the claims of many that the Lord is on the Judean side in that struggle. On the contrary, however, Jeremiah insists that God has temporarily granted sovereignty over Judah to Nebuchadnezzar and Babylon. Judah will serve Nebuchadnezzar because he serves the Lord as the historical agent of judgment. This entire book is an attempt to preserve the words of an unpopular prophet whose witness is recognized more clearly after the fall of Jerusalem. Even more broadly the encounters are a part of the larger scriptural witness that God does not leave his people without guidance, even if the majority are heedless of the message or oppose its tenor.

This chapter also underscores the human element in prophecy and in particular the humanness of Jeremiah. One gets no indication from the text that Hananiah has consciously deceived his audience. Presumably he truly believes his message; he cannot conceive of God as using the enemy of Judah as chastisement on Judah. Nor is Hananiah heterodox in prophetic practice—as if he depends on Baal for his inspiration. Everything about him suggests he is (and was) a prophet of Yahweh. Yet in his certainty and zeal for the Lord, he is wrong about the Lord's intentions. Moreover, he falls under the judgment of Deuteronomy 18:20–22 and its strictures against false prophecy. His word will not come true in two years' time, and he will die before that.

Jeremiah, on the other hand, has prophesied for years that God will bring judgment on Judah for its sinfulness. Is it possible that the burden he has carried for years is about to be lifted without the actual fall of Jerusalem and with the speedy return of exiled people and materials? Is the Lord telling him through Hananiah that indeed the time for judgment will soon end? From Jeremiah's reaction, he takes this possibility seriously. Here is one prophet listening carefully to another, open to the possibility that God has initiated a new phase in his dealings with his people.

In his humanness and openness, Jeremiah offers a model of the prophetic office. He does not dictate infallibly; he remains open, yet is certain of two things: God will not leave himself without a witness to the people, and God can make abrupt changes in his dealings with his people. Jeremiah is open, therefore, to the idea that the tone and thrust of his past prophetic ministry (over thirty years in duration) will come to an end because God is about to initiate a new direction for his people.

Perhaps most surprising, Jeremiah is open to the possibility that Hananiah is God's prophet to announce such changes. In this openness to God and to prophetic instruction himself, Jeremiah the prophet (28:5, 10, 11, 12, 15) helps subsequent readers to grasp the relational nature of true prophecy. It remains open to further guidance from God, listening carefully to the voices among God's people, and it requires self-examination before speaking.

The nature of true prophecy. But Jeremiah indicates something else that is fundamental about the prophetic office: It is the nature of true prophecy to indicate where God's people have failed and need instruction (28:8–9). This is basic to the larger collection of prophetic books in the Old Testament. The majority of their contents is critical toward the Israelite or Judean audience. Here is a job description that is always "open." A criterion of true prophecy from the past is not whether what is announced comes true. True prophets focus on the failures of the people and the corresponding judgment to come (if the failures are not dealt with adequately).

Jeremiah 26 referred to the prophet Micah, whose words about the destruction of Jerusalem were efficacious in turning Hezekiah and the nation from their self-destructive ways. Micah fits the prophetic profile as defined by Jeremiah in 28:8–9. Here also is one (among several) criterion for interpreting prophecy that speaks volumes across the centuries. The voice that speaks for God takes seriously the failures of the people. It is the prophet who announces that "all will be well" whose word requires a literal fulfillment. Otherwise, God has not sent him or her, and the true prophet should be about the business of uncovering the failures of God's people, holding them up to the light of day and thus demonstrating the possibility of judgment to come. Hananiah's death confirms his "lie."

Perhaps an instructive way to bridge the gap between the ancient setting and modern appropriation is to ask readers/hearers: With which of the prophets in the account do they identify? The question will not only require that they know something about the issues at stake for Jeremiah and Hananiah; it will also force them to account for why Hananiah is so adamant and sincere and why initially Jeremiah is open to considering his message.

Contemporary Significance

GOD'S WILL TO SAVE. Hananiah speaks forthrightly about God's sovereignty in a time of flux and uncertainty. According to this prophet from Gibeon, not only is the Lord of history capable of delivering his people from the hand of persecutors; it is his gracious desire to save them. Who would wish to quarrel with this? Certainly not Jeremiah! According to Jeremiah, Babylon is but a tool in the hands of the sovereign Lord, and when Babylon's appointed task is complete, its worldly hegemony will come to an end. Moreover, the Lord will redeem his people and bring them back from exile. Hananiah and Jeremiah could agree on these central tenets.

Furthermore, did not God later do what Hananiah predicted when he moved Cyrus to release the exiles and the temple vessels so that both could return to their rightful home? Who among God's people today would dispute Hananiah's basic affirmation that God would deliver Judah? In light of God's subsequent radical reach into human history, his encounter with human sinfulness in Christ, his costly dealings with human failure at the cross, and his glorious triumph over death itself in raising Christ from the dead, God demonstrates his resolve to save. Yes, Hananiah was right about God's will to save.

Who speaks the truth? One sees a strange paradox in the dispute between Hananiah and Jeremiah. Hananiah's certainty about the Lord is illtimed, while Jeremiah's human hesitation in light of Hananiah's initial prophecy is part of his care in listening for the Lord's leading. Such leading can and does come from prophetic voices, but how can one know who speaks the truth? In Hananiah's case, his certainty is ill-timed because he has failed to recognize the gravity of Judah's failures. Yes, his sense of God as strong Deliverer is accurate, but his sense of God's timing is wrong. Hananiah has an inadequate grasp of Judah's predicament before the Lord, and because of this he has an inadequate grasp of what the Lord of history intends in adopting Babylon as his historical agent.

Is Judah's predicament in 594/593 B.C. reflective of a mild miscalculation? Have the ongoing failures of Judah and the deportations of 597 been acknowledged by the people and dealt with adequately? Are the deportations of 597 the needed "slap on the wrist," the "mid-course correction" to set Judah again on the path of righteousness in relationship to her Lord, so that all that remains is God's liberation of the exiles and the temple vessels? No, unfortunately the true prophet sees that Judah has not comprehended adequately either its failures or the consequences of its failures, and the people as a whole have not been receptive to divine instruction. Hananiah is right to believe that God wants the return of his people, but his timing is wrong. In Christian terms, he wants to proclaim a resurrection without an acknowledgment of the necessity of the cross. Are there movements today within the church that "heal lightly the wound of the people"? The issue is not one of sincerity, but of truth.

An authentic prophet cannot overlook the barriers between what God has called his people to be and what they in their human fallibility actually represent. Wherever there is an automatic reliance on God's will to save without an acceptance of his refining judgments as a process of sanctification, there is the real possibility of misrepresenting God to any generation.

One is driven to ask about the state of the church in the modern West. It is on the decline in several areas. Should one think and pray and proclaim that renewal is just around the corner—that God is waiting to pour out his Spirit and to bless the church? Or should one think and pray and proclaim that God will (continue to?) give the church over to its self-incurred failures until some disaster or another has prepared the church to hear again the good news? Perhaps it is not wise to choose strictly between the two options, since God may have both judgment and renewal working mysteriously hand in hand. Nevertheless, we should look carefully for the modern-day Hananiahs because they do exist.

THIS IS THE text of the letter that the prophet Jeremiah sent from Jerusalem to the surviving elders among the exiles and to the priests, the prophets and all the other people Nebuchadnezzar had carried into exile from Jerusalem to Babylon. ²(This was after King Jehoiachin and the queen mother, the court officials and the leaders of Judah and Jerusalem, the craftsmen and the artisans had gone into exile from Jerusalem.) ³He entrusted the letter to Elasah son of Shaphan and to Gemariah son of Hilkiah, whom Zedekiah king of Judah sent to King Nebuchadnezzar in Babylon. It said:

⁴This is what the LORD Almighty, the God of Israel, says to all those I carried into exile from Jerusalem to Babylon: 5"Build houses and settle down; plant gardens and eat what they produce. ⁶Marry and have sons and daughters; find wives for your sons and give your daughters in marriage, so that they too may have sons and daughters. Increase in number there; do not decrease. ⁷Also, seek the peace and prosperity of the city to which I have carried you into exile. Pray to the LORD for it, because if it prospers, you too will prosper." ⁸Yes, this is what the LORD Almighty, the God of Israel, says: "Do not let the prophets and diviners among you deceive you. Do not listen to the dreams vou encourage them to have. ⁹They are prophesying lies to you in my name. I have not sent them," declares the LORD.

¹⁰This is what the LORD says: "When seventy years are completed for Babylon, I will come to you and fulfill my gracious promise to bring you back to this place. ¹¹For I know the plans I have for you," declares the LORD, "plans to prosper you and not to harm you, plans to give you hope and a future. ¹²Then you will call upon me and come and pray to me, and I will listen to you. ¹³You will seek me and find me when you seek me with all your heart. ¹⁴I will be found by you," declares the LORD, "and will bring you back from captivity. I will gather you from all the nations and places where I have banished you," declares the LORD, "and will bring you back to the place from which I carried you into exile."

²⁰Therefore, hear the word of the LORD, all you exiles whom I have sent away from Jerusalem to Babylon. ²¹This is what the LORD Almighty, the God of Israel, says about Ahab son of Kolaiah and Zedekiah son of Maaseiah, who are prophesying lies to you in my name: "I will hand them over to Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, and he will put them to death before your very eyes. ²²Because of them, all the exiles from Judah who are in Babylon will use this curse: 'The LORD treat you like Zedekiah and Ahab, whom the king of Babylon burned in the fire.' ²³For they have done outrageous things in Israel; they have committed adultery with their neighbors' wives and in my name have spoken lies, which I did not tell them to do. I know it and am a witness to it," declares the LORD.

²⁴Tell Shemaiah the Nehelamite, ²⁵"This is what the LORD Almighty, the God of Israel, says: You sent letters in your own name to all the people in Jerusalem, to Zephaniah son of Maaseiah the priest, and to all the other priests. You said to Zephaniah, ²⁶'The LORD has appointed you priest in place of Jehoiada to be in charge of the house of the LORD; you should put any madman who acts like a prophet into the stocks and neck-irons. ²⁷So why have you not reprimanded Jeremiah from Anathoth, who poses as a prophet among you? ²⁸He has sent this message to us in Babylon: It will be a long time. Therefore build houses and settle down; plant gardens and eat what they produce."

²⁹Zephaniah the priest, however, read the letter to Jeremiah the prophet. ³⁰Then the word of the LORD came to Jeremiah: ³¹"Send this message to all the exiles: 'This is what the LORD says about Shemaiah the Nehelamite: Because Shemaiah has prophesied to you, even though I did not send him, and has led you to believe a lie, ³²this is what the LORD says: I will surely punish Shemaiah the Nehelamite and his descendants. He will have no one left among this people, nor will he see the good things I will do for my people, declares the LORD, because he has preached rebellion against me."

Original Meaning

29:1–3. CHAPTER 29 IS LINKED with the previous chapter by literary proximity, historical context, and common vocabulary. As these first three verses make clear, Jeremiah writes a letter to the Judean community in Babylonian exile, that is, to those Judeans taken into exile with Jehoiachin¹ in 597 B.C. Although much of the chapter is taken up with the substance of that letter, it contains references to other messages that have gone back and forth from the two communities of Judeans. Jeremiah entrusts his letter to the Judeans in Babylon to Elasah the son of Shaphan (presumably the brother of Ahikam, who had earlier kept Jeremiah from the lynch mob)² and to Gemariah the son of Hilkiah the priest—two official Judean messengers (ambassadors?) sent by Zedekiah to Babylon on state business.

Several prophets and diviners among the Judean exiles have provoked the community with announcements of the imminent demise of Babylon and a return of the exiles to Judah (29:8–9, 15, 21–28). They are like Hananiah (ch. 28) in their orientation. Some of the agitators are named (Ahab and Zedekiah, 29:21–22; Shemaiah, 29:24), although nothing else is preserved about them beside what is contained in this chapter. Most likely they are prominent figures among the exiles. Shemaiah, for example, has communicated directly with the priest named Zephaniah, who is in charge of the house of the Lord in Jerusalem (29:25–26). These figures show awareness that Jeremiah's prophecies are known in Babylon.

The prophet's letter reinforces his previous prophecies that God has granted Babylon hegemony, that the duration of Babylonian sovereignty has decades to run (cf. 25:12), and that only then will there be restoration (cf. 24:6–7). What is new in chapter 29 is the instruction to settle down in Babylon and to pray for the city. The exiles are to "seek the peace and prosperity of the city to which I have carried you into exile. Pray to the LORD for it, because if it prospers, you too will prosper" (29:7).³

Chapter 29 contains the same charges against the exilic prophets as was made against Hananiah in chapter 28. They cause the people to trust in a lie (28:15; 29:9, 21, 23, 31; cf. 7:4),⁴ and their words are, in effect, rebellion against the Lord (29:31–32; cf. 28:15–16). Jeremiah's struggle against prophets who prophesy falsely in the Lord's name extends even to the exilic community. The book of Ezekiel carries on this struggle to present the exilic community with God's word.

29:4–9. The first line of the letter contains a shocking truth, but it points to the good news to follow. God is the subject of the phrase "all those I carried into exile." Of course, the previous verses noted that Nebuchadnezzar was the historical agent who took the people into exile, but in verse 4 the theological point is made that it is actually the work of God himself. The affirmation is followed by the commands to settle down in exile and to carry out such functions of sedentary existence as building, planting, and marriage. Exile is not the end of existence as God's people, but the beginning of a new phase of relating to God. The people are not to rebel against the authority of Babylon because, in effect, it is the authority of God over them for a prescribed time. More positively, the people are to seek the prosperity of Babylon because it will affect them as well. Most important, they are to pray for their captors.

29:10–14. These hopeful verses help prepare readers for the section that follows in the prophetic book, a section known to interpreters as the Book of Consolation. Jeremiah notes that the future of the people in exile rests on God's "gracious promise" (v. 10; lit., God's "good word"). In verse 11 the gracious promise is described as plans God has for the people, plans for a "prosperity" (šalom, peace) that provides a future and "hope" (tiqwa). A tangible element to the future consists in the restoration of the people to their homeland. The restoration, however, is predicated on their seeking God with their whole heart.

29:15–23. Certain prophets are agitating among the exiles in Babylon. From the message about judgment on the king and people who remain in Judah, one infers that these prophetic agitators believe no more disaster will befall Judah and Jerusalem. Jeremiah describes God as making King Zedekiah and the people in Jerusalem like "poor figs that ... cannot be eaten" (29:17). This metaphor is the same one as given to Jeremiah in 24:1–10. Because the king in Jerusalem and his people refuse to acknowledge God's judgment and refuse to embrace his covenant stipulations, they will be given over to the disasters of the sword and plague. The last part of this section warns the exiles not to listen to these prophetic agitators.

29:24–32. A particular opponent of Jeremiah, Shemaiah the Nehelamite, is singled out for criticism and announced judgment. He is a prophet who has proclaimed lies to the people in exile. He will not, therefore, see the "good things" that God will do for the people because he has "preached rebellion" against God (v. 32). This last element is the same charge leveled against Hananiah in 28:16.⁵

God's people taken into exile. While his influence was profound in the decades after the final destruction of Jerusalem (through his book!), he also communicated to the early exiles via letters during the interim between the first deportation in 597 B.C. and the demise of the city in 587/586. The book of Jeremiah exhibits concern for the exiles in a variety of ways, since a broad goal is to demonstrate that Jeremiah is a true prophet to the nations (including the exiles and Babylon itself). Thus chapter 29 finds itself in the broader context of prophetic texts from Isaiah and Ezekiel that address the city-state of Babylon and the Judean exiles there.

This chapter also finds itself a part of the scriptural witness to God's people who are addressed as pilgrims, as wandering people, even as aliens, whose true home is with the Lord. From the perspective of the New Testament, God's people are both "at home" as members of the body of the risen Christ (regardless of their geographical location) and "in transit" as they live out their witness in this age (regardless of their geographical location). The exiles in Babylon have not been ejected from their place among God's people; rather, they have been called to reconsider their place in God's economy in light of new temporal circumstances. Here potentially is a bridge to any generation of God's people.

Prayers for Babylon. It is helpful to see the letter of Jeremiah in the context of the New Testament letters. Paul and other apostles wrote to congregations about particular matters of the faith. From their remarks later readers can discern something of the debates of the congregations, the dynamics of their ministries, and the other voices that claimed divine inspiration.

Likewise Jeremiah writes to a specific situation in Babylon and offers faithful instruction in light of what he knows to be God's will for the common life of the exiles. He urges prayer for the welfare of Babylon and efforts toward the care for families because there will be no quick return from exile. He assures the exiles that God has not forgotten them or become subservient to the power of Babylon. Temporal submission to Babylon is submission to the work of God, who brought them to Babylon in the first place. The exiles should ignore the self-proclaimed prophets who stir the community with their rhetoric but have not been sent by God.

With the injunction to pray for Babylon, readers encounter an Old Testament form of Jesus' teaching (Matt. 5:43–48) to pray for one's enemies. Jeremiah's instruction to pray does not assume a generic prayer to be transported whole cloth from one setting in the life of God's people to another. It assumes that God has spoken definitively about Babylon's role in the divine economy so that his people located there should pray accordingly and live accordingly. It also assumes that the "enemy" is not simply an opponent and that the exiles are not simply victims.

In a perverse sort of way, the exiles might become comfortable thinking of themselves only as victims and the Babylonians only as the enemy. If so, the exiles would not go through the self-examination process that was necessary. If the Babylonians were only the "enemy," then they could be blamed for all of Judah's failures. Instead, the exiles should pray for Babylon because it is their home and because in the near future, the fate of Babylon will be the fate of the people as well. God will continue to use the enemy to instruct his people. Perhaps the people will offer some witness to the "enemy" and thereby lead to another aspect of God's instruction—to be a light to the nations (Isa. 42:6; 49:6; 51:4).

God's plans. In a justly famous "reminder" the prophet writes that God knows the plans that he has for the exiles—plans for a future, for hope, and for restoration (29:11–14). The first context in which to hear these words comes in the next two chapters of Jeremiah's book, where future hope and restoration in the Promised Land are given fuller expression. The same kind of confidence in God's saving purposes is available to any generation of his people who, as Jeremiah writes, seek him "with all [their] heart" (29:13).

Contemporary Significance

To pray or not to pray? If that is the question for Christians, then the book of Jeremiah offers some surprising answers. On occasion Jeremiah is enjoined by the Lord not to pray for his people because they are intransigent and for the moment irredeemable (7:16; 11:14; 14:11). This somber communication is not, of course, for Jeremiah's private consumption; instead, this word of the Lord becomes part of his public proclamation, designed to shock and to evoke change. The people's time is up and the consequences of failure will be severe. But what about the enemy? Surely God's people should pray for the defeat of their enemies, shouldn't they? Otherwise, they themselves will be overtaken. "Not so this time," says Jeremiah about Babylon.

There are some surprising things to be learned from and experienced through prayer. Such is the rich testimony of Scripture and saints alike. As a general rule, communities and individuals who do not regularly pray indicate by this that they do not have an adequate theology. The command for Jeremiah not to pray is thus a special case and comes as a radical illustration of the spiritual deadness of the people. Fervent prayer means confidence in God and an openness to his surprising leading. Prayer is a form of applied theology. The issue here is not belief in God, but communion with God through prayer. The devil and his assistants do not pray to God, but they believe in his existence.

Prayer is not for the benefit of God, although both praise and petition belong in a relationship with God. Prayer changes both the perceptions of those who pray and their actions. Surely this is the case in ancient Babylon. As Judeans pray for the welfare of the city, God's people will learn that no one is only an enemy. In the case of Babylon, their doom is sure to come, but in a radical way God has bound the fortunes of his people with their enemy. There is something profound at work in such circumstances. What comes with clarity in the gospel is already adumbrated in the Old Testament. Through prayer one can look at opponents or problems as more than someone or something to be overcome. They can become also a means of education and sanctification, the agents through whom one finds growth in relationship with God.

Praying for peace. "Their peace is your peace." Certainly the tremendous changes in relations between East and West—the end of the so-called "cold war"—is an illustration of this truth. The fall of the Iron Curtain and the dissolution of the Soviet empire in the last few years has brought home to millions in the East and West that the "other" is not necessarily an enemy. Subsequently it has become clear that in the prosperity of the one lies the prosperity of the other. For Christians in both East and West this truth hits home with particular force. As former enemies now seek a better coexistence, Christians on both sides can see that God has done more than instruct them about an enemy—there is now a foundation for a new community of faith. Praying for the "other" has changed those who pray as surely as it has affected the "other."

How many tensions would be alleviated, how many problems set on the road to solution, if Christians would pray for the welfare of their opponents? Prayer for an opponent does not forbid action that may keep each other in relational tension. It does not guarantee a solution. But since prayer is applied theology, it will change one's attitude toward opponents.

Prayer is the bedrock of confidence in God. It was in Jeremiah's day, and it remains a key to seeking God with all one's heart. God's promises are freely given, but not all of them can be freely accepted—that is, they have little relevancy to an indifferent people. For those in dire straits, it should come as good news that God knows the future and is committed to the redemption of his people. "Seek and you will find" (Matt. 7:7) is the Lord's gracious command, not "resign and do nothing."

Interspersed in the scriptural word of Jeremiah 29 are indications of particular judgment on individuals. It is important for Christians to remember that judgment is God's affair. Jeremiah does not take judgment into his own hands, nor does he urge others to do so. He simply notes that the work of people like Ahab, Zedekiah, and Shemaiah is opposed to the purposes of God and that God will deal with them.

Introduction to Jeremiah 30–33

THESE FOUR CHAPTERS comprise a distinct subsection in Jeremiah. They are not, however, a simple unity. Chapters 30–31 are largely poetry, while 32–33 are prose. Chapters 30–31 are often called by interpreters the "Book of Consolation" or the "Book of Hope" because they contain proclamations of Israel and Judah's restoration to the Promised Land. Restoration—or better said, the creation of a new relationship with the Lord—is also central here. The same restoration-oriented hope is part of chapters 32–33, so that their interpretation is linked with the two previous chapters. Nevertheless, no concrete setting in Jeremiah's ministry is given for the proclamation of chapters 30–31 (see below) as there is with chapters 32–33. The latter are set in the last days of the Judean state (587 B.C.), the tenth year of Zedekiah and the eighteenth of Nebuchadnezzar (32:1; 33:1).

Since there is a range of interpretive possibilities regarding Jeremiah's future hope, it is best to list the most common of them and to comment on them briefly at the outset of this subsection. Individual details are discussed more fully with the specific chapter.

(1) Some modern interpreters have concluded that major portions of the hopeful prophecies in the book originated not with Jeremiah but with his editors in the later exilic period, as deported Judeans looked for the possibility of restoration to their homeland.² According to some proponents of this view, the historical Jeremiah was essentially a prophet of doom, or an individual so far removed from the book that bears his name that the origin of most of these restoration prophecies comes from people in exile (and perhaps even in the postexilic period) who hoped for future change.

One may begin a response with the affirmation that there is no reason, a priori, why those who edited and produced the book of Jeremiah could not also have contributed prophecies to the finished product. After all, if God can call Jeremiah as a prophet, then God can also use editors! The question is simply one of evaluating the relevant evidence for secondary material and weighing the balance of probability.

As noted in the introduction, it seems more likely to the present writer that Jeremiah's circle of supporters reworked and updated material that originated with the prophet himself, and less likely that some of the most creative and compelling material in all the book originated with these anonymous laborers. Perhaps this circle of supporters even had the assistance of the prophet himself in the earlier stages of editing before the book reached its final form. As editors, this circle would have arranged the material in line with the hope enunciated by Jeremiah himself, even if the sequencing of materials and the final form of the book came after the prophet's death.

Clearly the destruction of Jerusalem and the deportation of many of Judah's inhabitants impact the entire book of Jeremiah, including the hopeful oracles in chapters 30–33. In final form the restoration texts in this section are addressed to those Judeans who lived after Judah's demise and Jerusalem's destruction. In addressing a future hope for God's people, this Book of Consolation points beyond judgment and geographic restoration to an even grander future renewal (cf. [3], below).

(2) Some interpreters have deduced from the various references to Israel, Samaria, Jacob, Rachel, and Ephraim in chapters 30–31 that these chapters contain elements of the young Jeremiah's preaching to the northern territories taken earlier by the Assyrians.³ As with the previous view, the application of historical analysis has led some to claim precise settings for the origins of particular oracles within the two chapters.

In this view, some of the "hopeful" prophecies originated early in Jeremiah's prophetic ministry⁴ as addresses to the northern territories rather than (as in the first view) with editors in the exilic period. Apparently Josiah sought to reincorporate parts of the northern territory and population in his religious and political reforms (2 Chron. 34:29–33; 35:16–18), and it is certainly plausible to see the young Jeremiah as a supporter of these goals. After all, the prophetic hope is founded on a belief that the full complement of God's people could never be limited solely to Judah. Thus the northern territory and its inhabitants are among the people addressed in these two chapters along with Judah (who can be addressed separately).

The question here is whether the restoration of the northern territories (i.e., Israel, Ephraim) was originally addressed separately during an early period of Jeremiah's career or only in the period after 609 B.C., when the announcements of Judah's imminent demise were also delivered and both Israel and Judah were no more than remnants of their former political entities. Some of the material in Jeremiah 30–31 would fit well in the late seventh century as Josiah instituted his reforms, but since the impact of the Judean exile is also in view, perhaps it is better to view this entire section as the result of a topical collection (i.e., prophecies of restoration) that dates from different periods in Jeremiah's ministry and that was updated and set in a broader literary context in the process of preservation.⁵

Like many of the judgment prophecies in chapters 1–20, which in written form are removed from a precise historical context and now function more broadly to explain the demise of Judah, the restoration prophecies in chapters 30–31 are now somewhat isolated from an original historical context and function as indications of the mercy of God and his power to transform both the near and the distant future.

(3) As with all true prophecy, predictions about the future are intended to effect change in the hearers as well as inform them about the future. In light of the comments above (see [2]), the collection of prophecies in chapters 30–31 is actually the prediction of a new world, that is, a new age and a new time unlike that known to the hearers. It includes restoration of exiles from Assyrian and Babylonian territories, surely a hopeful and gracious word to Jeremiah's contemporaries.

But there is more to the prophetic depictions of a new world than that, for nothing less than an ideal community (a new Jerusalem and new David) and a fully realized covenant relationship with God are announced. Such predictions, therefore, gave content to the hope for national healing in the postexilic period and also served as the beginnings of a new community in a restored Jerusalem. At the same time, the prophecies point beyond those marvelous "beginnings" to a day and time qualitatively different from either the postexilic period or that of the contemporary reader.

The new world envisioned in chapters 30–33 is indeed far grander and more sublime than the communities of faith formed after the Exile. Stated somewhat differently, the Jews of the exilic and postexilic periods would not see the significance of chapters 30–31 exhausted in the return to Judea from Babylon. God has yet more to accomplish with and through his people. The future depicted in these chapters still has hopes as yet unrealized. At a fundamental level this puts modern readers in a similar context to that of the first hearers/readers: All alike wait in anticipation of the fuller realization of God's grand design.

Ultimately chapters 30–31 are eschatological in nature, depicting in the language and thought-forms of the day a prophecy that God will gain ultimate victory over alienation and sin. The postexilic restoration was the firstfruits of the promises, the prelude to and a type of the greater restoration to come. In light of Christ's first advent, the New Testament provides further guidance on the significance of these prophecies; nevertheless, modern Christians still await (in hope, just like their spiritual ancestors of Jeremiah's day) the final consummation of the new world glimpsed by Jeremiah. Here is a perspective that places the current generation of God's people in a mode of expectation similar to that of Jeremiah's own day.

Modern Christians may find an instructive analogy in the eschatological discourse of Jesus with his disciples (Matt. 24; Mark 13; Luke 21). The destruction of Jerusalem and conflict in the region after Jesus' death are graphically depicted, but so are the hardships and threats sure to afflict believers in subsequent years. Moreover, these predictions do more than simply depict the Roman devastation of the region, for they point beyond that imminent tragedy to the difficulties expected at the end of the age. Jeremiah 30–31 can be interpreted similarly—the turning of God's judgment is seen in the restoration from the Exile, but these things point beyond to a restoration yet to be fully realized.

The New Testament is reticent about a final restoration of Israel (cf. Acts 1:6–8). That "all Israel will be saved" (Rom. 11:26) is affirmed, quite apart from defining more closely who that Israel will be (ethnic/national? modern state? Jews who eventually accept Jesus as the Messiah?). Interpreters, therefore, differ on the question of interpreting Old Testament promises of Israel's restoration and transformation. Are they inherited by the church and thus reach their eschatological fulfillment through it, or do they represent a fulfillment to come for "Israel" that is distinct from the future promised for the church?

This is a much bigger question than that of interpreting Jeremiah 30–33, but the basic stance of interpreting Jeremiah is the same as that for other eschatological texts in the prophetic corpus. As indicated in the introduction to this commentary, the author opts for fulfillment in and through the church. This is based on the conviction that there is no other eternal connection of God's people to him except that which has been founded through Christ's cross and resurrection. Readers are invited to investigate the resources listed in the introduction for further study and to examine carefully the comments in the Bridging Contexts and Contemporary Significance for chapter 31.

Jeremiah 30:1-24

¹This is the word that came to Jeremiah from the LORD: ²"This is what the LORD, the God of Israel, says: 'Write in a book all the words I have spoken to you. ³The days are coming,' declares the LORD, 'when I will bring my people Israel and Judah back from captivity and restore them to the land I gave their forefathers to possess,' says the LORD."

⁴These are the words the LORD spoke concerning Israel and Judah: ⁵"This is what the LORD says:

"'Cries of fear are heard—terror, not peace.

⁶Ask and see:

Can a man bear children?
Then why do I see every strong man with his hands on his stomach like a woman in labor, every face turned deathly pale?

Thow awful that day will be!
None will be like it.
It will be a time of trouble for Jacob, but he will be saved out of it.

8""In that day,' declares the LORD Almighty,
'I will break the yoke off their necks and will tear off their bonds;
no longer will foreigners enslave them.

9Instead, they will serve the LORD their God and David their king, whom I will raise up for them.

10""So do not fear, O Jacob my servant; do not be dismayed, O Israel,

declares the LORD.

'I will surely save you out of a distant place, your descendants from the land of their exile.

Jacob will again have peace and security, and no one will make him afraid.

¹¹I am with you and will save you,' declares the LORD.

'Though I completely destroy all the nations among which I scatter you, I will not completely destroy you. I will discipline you but only with justice; I will not let you go entirely unpunished.'

12"This is what the LORD says:

"Your wound is incurable, your injury beyond healing.

¹³There is no one to plead your cause, no remedy for your sore, no healing for you.

¹⁴All your allies have forgotten you; they care nothing for you.

I have struck you as an enemy would and punished you as would the cruel, because your guilt is so great and your sins so many.

15Why do you cry out over your wound, your pain that has no cure?

Because of your great guilt and many sins

I have done these things to you.

16"But all who devour you will be devoured;
all your enemies will go into exile.
Those who plunder you will be plundered;
all who make spoil of you I will despoil.

¹⁷But I will restore you to health and heal your wounds,' declares the LORD, 'because you are called an outcast, Zion for whom no one cares.'

¹⁸"This is what the LORD says:

"I will restore the fortunes of Jacob's tents and have compassion on his dwellings; the city will be rebuilt on her ruins, and the palace will stand in its proper place.

19 From them will come songs of thanksgiving and the sound of rejoicing.
I will add to their numbers, and they will not be decreased;
I will bring them honor, and they will not be disdained.
20 Their children will be as in days

20 Their children will be as in days of old, and their community will be established before me;
I will punish all who oppress them.

²¹Their leader will be one of their own; their ruler will arise from among them.

I will bring him near and he will come close to me, for who is he who will devote himself to be close to me?'

declares the LORD.

22"So you will be my people, and I will be your God."

23See, the storm of the LORD will burst out in wrath, a driving wind swirling down on the heads of the wicked.
24The fierce anger of the LORD will not turn back until he fully accomplishes the purposes of his heart.
In days to come you will understand this."

Original Meaning

30:1–3. Although the text does not provide a specific setting for these prophecies in Jeremiah's life, the command in 30:2 to write them in a scroll suggests that they are to stand as instruction and witness for the future. The summary statement in 30:3 uses a typical prophetic introduction for predictions of future change—"the days are coming" (cf. 30:8, 24). The primary claim about the future is that the affliction of "Jacob" (30:7, 10, 18) will be removed and the people will be restored to their land and to a better relationship with God. Apparently "Jacob" is a covenant term for God's people that includes both Israel and Judah (30:4). In the restoration God will raise up "David their king" (30:9). Jerusalem also is addressed in 30:12–17.

These prophecies presuppose a unity to God's people that transcends their current political and geographical circumstances. Not only are there predictions that Israel and Judah will be restored to their land and that God will raise up for them a king from David's line, but the restoration of Zion (= Jerusalem) is also predicted (30:17–18). Moreover, Jeremiah announces a restoration of the covenant relationship between God and his people that assumes a unity for that people (30:22; 31:1; cf. 32:38).

- 30:4–7. This portion of chapter 30 is a bit cryptic with respect to the future turmoil it presupposes. A rhetorical question in verse 6 suggests that the dismay on the part of human beings will not be permanent. The point is that Jacob will be saved from a time of trouble.
- 30:8–11. The introductory phrase "in that day" is a rhetorical device used by prophets to speak of a decisive time in the future. Yokes and bonds will be removed from Jacob, and the people will no longer be enslaved by foreigners. By "David their king" is most likely meant someone from David's line. Such a hope is drawn from texts like 2 Samuel 7 and prophetic texts that rely on God's promised fidelity to the Davidic line. Since no king from David's line ruled Jacob in the postexilic period, this hope finds its ultimate fulfillment in the New Testament proclamation that Jesus is David's greater Son (cf. Matt. 1:1–17; Luke 1:26–33; Rom. 1:3), not in the leadership of the restored community in the Persian period.

The injunction "do not fear," addressed to Jacob as God's "servant" (v. 10), reminds the reader of the exilic prophecies in the book of Isaiah (Isa. 41:8–10; 43:1–7; 44:1–5; 54:4). The nations among whom Jacob has been exiled are subject to judgment. Jacob too has received judgment, but his judgment has been disciplinary in form. A day of reckoning still awaits the nations.

- 30:12–17. In these verses humiliated Jerusalem is addressed. The description of her guilt and her helplessness remind the reader/hearer of the book of Lamentations. Judgmental language predominates in these verses, but its effects on Jerusalem are not without merciful limits. There is also announcement that Zion's enemies will be destroyed and that the city will be restored.
- 30:18–22. The announcement that Zion will be restored continues in the proclamation that Jacob's fortunes will be reconstituted. That Jacob and Zion are closely related can be seen from verse 18b. There is also an allusion to future leadership that will spring up from among the people (v. 21). The concluding verse reiterates the covenant formula (cf. 24:7). Restoration above all is a restoration of the relationship between God and his people.

30:23–24. This surprising section puts the future under the claim of God's righteous judgment and also in the context of divine intentions that cannot be fully grasped. The final verse (v. 24) is cryptic. Only the future (lit., "in the latter days") will reveal the extent of God's purposes in restoring Jacob and in punishing iniquity, for God's intentions to judge iniquity are most certainly part of the future when his people are "restored."

Thus, the earliest recipients of these prophecies are informed that the full significance of these prophecies will only be realized at considerable distance from their time of origin. Perhaps this last verse should be read together with verses 1–2: The cryptic words of chapter 30 will be preserved in a book to serve not only as a witness from the past, but also as inspired prediction about a future where God will judge human iniquity, a future not yet fully understood or realized by Jeremiah's contemporaries. The full impact of these predictions will best be seen at the conclusion of God's intended future.

As noted in the introduction to the hopeful prophecies in chapters 30–33, some scholars have denied that the same Jeremiah who so consistently announced judgment could simply switch directions and announce, like Hananiah in chapter 28, that God's restoring activity was on the historical horizon. These scholars speculate that these verses and others like them in Jeremiah must come from editors in the exilic and postexilic period who wished to supplement Jeremiah's words for the next generation.

But let's note again that these are not the only words of hope in Jeremiah's book. Why could not Jeremiah himself have understood God to be both a righteous Judge and the One who intends to restore a chastened and punished people? We must acknowledge, however, that neither in this chapter nor elsewhere in the book are we provided with enough detail to reconstruct when Jeremiah first announced that God would restore his people after a time of judgment. His reaction in his encounter with Hananiah demonstrates that he was open to the fresh and surprising word of the Lord that would move beyond the necessary corrective judgment to the healing balm of restoration. Since the contents of Jeremiah are not arranged chronologically, it apparently was not important for later readers to have a chronology of his theological development; it was sufficient merely to indicate topically and thematically that the prophet announced both judgment and restoration as the work of the same Lord.

Bridging Contexts

GOD AND THE FUTURE. The chapter contains prophecies that range into the near future and into the far future from the perspective of Jeremiah's contemporaries. This realization helps us with interpreting the texts. Regarding the near future, God worked through the historical process to overcome the power of Babylon and to provide a way for his exiled people to return to their ancestral land. With the rise of Cyrus the Persian, later known as Cyrus the Great, a different political order was established in the latter half of the sixth century B.C. Under the leadership of Sheshbazzar and Zerubbabel, several groups of Jews made their way back to the land of promise. They began the process of rebuilding the temple complex and their lives (Ezra 1–3).

These people were not free from Persian control, but they laid more than a physical foundation; along with the preaching of prophets like Haggai and Zechariah, they also laid a spiritual foundation for greater renewal to come. The unfortunate breach between the returnees and many of the other inhabitants of the area (particularly those led by Sanballat, the governor of the province of Samaria) meant that reconciliation between the descendants of Israel and Judah was not accomplished. Nevertheless, elements of Jeremiah 30 find fulfillment in the miraculous ways in which life in Jerusalem and Judah were restored after the Babylonian exile.

The chapter as a whole indicates avenues through which God's announced intent in chapter 1 "to uproot and tear down" and "to build and to plant" is actualized. Restoration took place in the postexilic period, but this example of God's faithfulness does not exhaust the claims of chapter 30. There is also the indication that God's people should not forget the necessity of a righteous judgment and that they should recognize their own inadequacies in healing their own failures. Such claims give subsequent generations of God's people cause for reflection as they ask: Are there still ways in which we exhibit failure and incur judgment?

A claim like that addressed to Zion in 30:12 ("your wound is incurable") pushes past a mere historical reading to interrogate any generation. It is a theology at one with a later biblical claim of death apart from divine grace (Eph. 2:1; Col. 2:13). The conclusion to Jeremiah 30 points further forward to a time (times?) of broad reckoning, where God will judge iniquity on a wider scale. Such language calls any generation of God's people to anticipate more from the Lord of history.

Chapter 30 also predicts the restoration of the covenant relationship between God and his people (30:22). This claim should cause current readers to reflect on the centuries that have passed since these words were first proclaimed. Subsequent biblical history and that of the church are evidence that God still pursues this goal among his people. In Christ God has bound himself to his people and provided all the means necessary to overcome their failures. The future remains open to a greater fulfillment of these words, just as it was for Jeremiah's contemporaries.

ESCHATOLOGY. WHAT DOES the future hold for the church and the world in which it carries out its ministry? Theologians use the term eschatology to describe the expectations about the end of the age. As these words are being written, there is much in the popular culture about transition to a new millennium. The year 2000 is popularly understood as the beginning of a new millennium (even though it is actually the end of a century and also the end of a millennium). Does this transition year bring us closer to the Millennium on earth, or is that scriptural hope best understood through the life of the Spirit in the church of Jesus Christ? As always, the future will be the best vantage point from which to see the significance of the present! At a distance from the pressure of the "now," the puzzles of the present begin to show new meaning.

Sociologists chart the strange behaviors that often come at transition po ts such as a new year. Some of it is lawless or antisocial, and some of it is the nervousness that comes with the times, even if such nervousness lies below the conscious surface. This was especially true of the transition to the year 2000, which was a milestone as modern people measure time. But what about God's ways of evaluating the state of the world and of working out his ultimate purposes? One wonders if each new year has any particular significance in God's scheme.

God's faithfulness, present and future. Yes, eschatological speculation will be profitable in the near future, but will it be helpful for the church? A glance at biblical prophecy confirms that God has been faithful to his promises, but his faithfulness comes in surprising ways. It is true that God announced through prophets both the exile of his people and their return. But the return did not usher in the final age. God also announced that a new David would come to lead the people, but not everyone could accept that Jesus was the fulfillment of this hope. In this regard, oftentimes it is at some distance that people of faith can see more clearly what God has done. Perhaps what is more important for people of faith today is to concentrate on the "constants" in the eschatological prophecy of the Bible rather than on a blueprint mentality that believes it can "figure out the future in advance."

What are some of those constants? One is certainly that God is the Judge of all people. In addition, God has called a people into fellowship and has promised to be their God. These two things will not change, whether something in the year 2000 makes it a special year or not. A typical year is one in which God judges and purifies a people in various ways. If 2000 and beyond are typical years, then they will reveal many small fulfillments of the greater purpose God has given in Scripture and has not yet brought to culmination. When all is finally accomplished, it will be more clear. The church is called every year to have expectation and hope. God has indicated the shape of prophetic hope for all time in the person of Jesus Christ, who is the same yesterday, today, and tomorrow (Heb. 13:8).

During the last week of 1999 the present writer watched a few people load up their cars and trailers and head out to the rural areas of Texas. They did so because they feared the apocalyptic changes that might be ushered in with the coming of the new year. What was it about the biblical message that so frightened them? Most likely it was the expectation that if the end of history is coming, it would have disastrous proportions (cf., e.g., Matt. 24; Mark 13). All of us should be reminded that when the end is near, whether it is accompanied by the death throes of civilization or not, the consistent teaching of the biblical text is that God will save his people.

Jesus told his disciples to watch for the signs of the times; that is good advice in any situation. It is certainly so with the concern about the future: Watch for signs of the times. The ultimate shape of the future, however, can be discerned from those things that Scripture constantly espouses: God is working out his near and far purposes to judge iniquity, to redeem a people, and to create a new world where death and sin are banished. Maranatha!

Jeremiah 31:1-40

1"At that time," declares the LORD, "I will be the God of all the clans of Israel, and they will be my people."

²This is what the LORD says:

"The people who survive the sword will find favor in the desert; I will come to give rest to Israel."

³The LORD appeared to us in the past, saying:

"I have loved you with an everlasting love; I have drawn you with lovingkindness.

⁴I will build you up again and you will be rebuilt, O Virgin Israel.

Again you will take up your tambourines and go out to dance with the joyful.

⁵Again you will plant vineyards on the hills of Samaria; the farmers will plant them and enjoy their fruit.

⁶There will be a day when watchmen cry out on the hills of Ephraim,

'Come, let us go up to Zion, to the LORD our God.'"

⁷This is what the LORD says:

"Sing with joy for Jacob;

shout for the foremost of the nations.

Make your praises heard, and say,
'O LORD, save your people,
the remnant of Israel.'

⁸See, I will bring them from the land of the north and gather them from the ends of the earth.

Among them will be the blind and the lame, expectant mothers and women in labor;

a great throng will return.

⁹They will come with weeping; they will pray as I bring them back.

I will lead them beside streams of water on a level path where they will not stumble, because I am Israel's father, and Ephraim is my firstborn son.

¹⁰"Hear the word of the LORD, O nations; proclaim it in distant coastlands:

'He who scattered Israel will gather them and will watch over his flock like a shepherd.'

¹²They will come and shout for joy on the heights of Zion;

they will rejoice in the bounty of the LORD—

the grain, the new wine and the oil, the young of the flocks and herds. They will be like a well-watered garden, and they will sorrow no more. 13Then maidens will dance and be glad, young men and old as well.
I will turn their mourning into gladness;
I will give them comfort and joy instead of sorrow.

¹⁴I will satisfy the priests with abundance, and my people will be filled with my bounty,"

declares the LORD.

¹⁵This is what the LORD says:

"A voice is heard in Ramah, mourning and great weeping,
Rachel weeping for her children and refusing to be comforted, because her children are no more."

¹⁶This is what the LORD says:

"Restrain your voice from weeping and your eyes from tears, for your work will be rewarded," declares the LORD.

"They will return from the land of the enemy.

¹⁷So there is hope for your future," declares the LORD.

"Your children will return to their own land.

18"I have surely heard Ephraim's moaning:
'You disciplined me like an unruly calf, and I have been disciplined.
Restore me, and I will return, because you are the LORD my God.

19 After I strayed,
I repented;
after I came to understand,
I beat my breast.

I was ashamed and humiliated because I bore the disgrace of my youth.'

20 Is not Ephraim my dear son, the child in whom I delight?

Though I often speak against him,
I still remember him.

Therefore my heart yearns for him;
I have great compassion for him," 21"Set up road signs;

put up guideposts.
Take note of the highway,
the road that you take.
Return, O Virgin Israel, return to your towns.
22How long will you wander,
O unfaithful daughter?
The LORD will create a new thing on earth

a woman will surround a man."

²³This is what the LORD Almighty, the God of Israel, says: "When I bring them back from captivity, the people in the land of Judah and in its towns will once again use these words: 'The LORD bless you, O righteous dwelling, O sacred mountain.' ²⁴People will live together in Judah and all its towns—farmers and those who move about with their flocks. ²⁵I will refresh the weary and satisfy the faint."

²⁶At this I awoke and looked around. My sleep had been pleasant to me.

²⁷"The days are coming," declares the LORD, "when I will plant the house of Israel and the house of Judah with the offspring of men and of animals. ²⁸Just as I watched over them to uproot and tear down, and to overthrow, destroy and bring disaster, so I will watch over them to build and to plant," declares the LORD. ²⁹"In those days people will no longer say,

'The fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge.'

³⁰Instead, everyone will die for his own sin; whoever eats sour grapes—his own teeth will be set on edge.

31"The time is coming," declares the LORD,
"when I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel and with the house of Judah.

32 It will not be like the covenant I made with their forefathers when I took them by the hand to lead them out of Egypt, because they broke my covenant, though I was a husband to them," declares the LORD.

33"This is the covenant I will make with the house of Israel after that time," declares the LORD.
"I will put my law in their minds and write it on their hearts.
I will be their God, and they will be my people.

³⁴No longer will a man teach his neighbor, or a man his brother, saying, 'Know the LORD,' because they will all know me, from the least of them to the greatest," declares the LORD.

"For I will forgive their wickedness and will remember their sins no more."

35This is what the LORD says,

he who appoints the sun to shine by day, who decrees the moon and stars to shine by night, who stirs up the sea
so that its waves roar—
the LORD Almighty is his name:

36"Only if these decrees vanish from my sight,"
declares the LORD,

"will the descendants of Israel ever cease to be a nation before me."

³⁷This is what the LORD says:

"Only if the heavens above can be measured and the foundations of the earth below be searched out will I reject all the descendants of Israel because of all they have done," declares the LORD.

³⁸"The days are coming," declares the LORD, "when this city will be rebuilt for me from the Tower of Hananel to the Corner Gate. ³⁹The measuring line will stretch from there straight to the hill of Gareb and then turn to Goah. ⁴⁰The whole valley where dead bodies and ashes are thrown, and all the terraces out to the Kidron Valley on the east as far as the corner of the Horse Gate, will be holy to the LORD. The city will never again be uprooted or demolished."

31:1 POETIC DEPICTIONS of the future continue from chapter 30. Verse 1—likely a summary of the chapter's contents—repeats the promise of covenant restoration (cf. 30:22; 31:31–34) as something that will occur "at that time." This chronological phrase is a typical part of the prophetic repertoire for speaking about the future, and it fits well in the context of the repeated references in chapters 30–31 to the future.

"That time" is a reference to a decisive time of divine activity and the resulting changes brought to fruition as a result. The previous verse (30:24) refers to the "days to come," and elsewhere chapter 31 contains three references to "the days are [time is] coming" (31:27, 31, 38). How far into the future is not specified by such references; the emphasis is on the qualitative changes between the present grim circumstances and the future God has promised. In the chapter are also predictions of a restoration of Israel¹⁰ to its land, so that return from the Exile is part of the future that God promises to the generation of judgment in Jeremiah's "day."

Israel's restoration provides a thematic coherence to chapter 31, but it is unlikely that the chapter originated as a literary unity; rather, various predictions from the prophet about the future are collected together to convey to hearer and reader alike that God intends a transformed future for his people. As noted in the introductory comments to chapters 30–33, readers should not think of a single event or discrete period as the only fulfillment of these future hopes. It is the quality of God's intended future that stands out in the chapter. The poetic nature and variety of claims for the future are best understood as indications of the multiple ways in which the Lord will bring (even future for us today) these words to fulfillment.

Chapter 31 can be subdivided into nine different units of speech (vv. 2–6, 7–9, 10–14, 15–20, 21–26, 27–30, 31–34, 35–37, 38–40). Several of the units have introductory and/or concluding formulae that mark the units. This is prophetic speech that places the emphasis on divine communication. Jeremiah has receded into the background, and his circumstances are hardly mentioned (except for the cryptic comment in 31:26). Perhaps this mysterious verse indicates that some or all of the preceding prophecies in the chapter are the result of dreams.

31:2–6. God's people are addressed in familiar imagery. He reminds them that they can find his favor even in the desert (midbar). This should probably be understood in two senses: (1) as a typological comparison with the spiritual history of their ancestors, when that generation found favor with God in the desert, and (2) as a reference to the experience of exile and the hope that God would bring his people home through the desert. The future rebuilding of "Virgin Israel" (a metaphorical reference to the people)¹² indicates that God has loved them with an "everlasting love" and drawn them back to himself with "loving-kindness" (ḥesed). This latter term refers to commitments that spring from affection and loyalty rather than those prescribed by law. The language and thought forms are like those of Hosea (Hos. 2:14–23), who depicted God's covenant renewal with Israel in terms of an "alluring" of Israel in the desert and the betrothal of her to him with loving-kindness (ḥesed).

Zion will play an important role in the future restoration. Those in Ephraim will call to one another with the request to "go up to Zion." There they will come to the Lord their God. This is pilgrimage language.

- 31:7–9. The Lord proposes a song of praise for a saved remnant. In the poetry of this short prophecy, there is parallelism between the expressions "your people" and "the remnant of Israel" (v. 7). Readers should take note of the term Israel in context. Verse 9 uses the term to refer specifically to the former northern kingdom by way of comparison with Ephraim, God's "firstborn" (cf. Ex. 4:22; Hos. 11:1). Perhaps the remnant reference here has a particular focus on those exiled by the Assyrians in the eighth century.
- 31:10–14. The nations are to take note that God intends to redeem his people. God, who scattered the people in judgment, is a shepherd who will gather them. The poetry of verse 11 links two terms to describe God's reacquisition of his people. The NIV translates pdh, the first verb, as "ransom." Indeed it does mean purchase. This word is used in Exodus 13:13 to refer to the substitutionary sacrifice for a firstborn animal; the Israelites could ransom or redeem a firstborn animal among their flocks by offering (in one sense, "paying" with) a substitute. The term is used also for the ransom of a slave (Ex. 21:8).¹³

The second verb, a synonym of pdh, is g'l, translated by the NIV as "redeem." The word has its roots in family custom, where a relative could use his possessions and influence to extricate other family members from such difficulties as debts or other social obligations.¹⁴

As with a previous prophecy, Zion is one of the goals of a rejoicing people. In its primary sense the passage refers to the new exodus, which God is about to accomplish by bringing his scattered people back to their homes. The language of joy and delight in verses 12–14 is every bit as extravagant as the thorough language of judgment used elsewhere in Jeremiah. "Mourning" will be turned into "gladness."

31:15–20. The mourning of the Promised Land for the loss of "her" children is described through the metaphor of Rachel weeping. Rachel was the favorite wife of Jacob and mother of Joseph and Benjamin (Gen. 29–30). She died in childbirth with Benjamin and was buried between Bethel and Bethlehem (35:16–26). A monument was built to mark her tomb. Jeremiah's reference to weeping in Ramah (meaning "hill" in Heb.) apparently refers to the place of this monument. Ramah may refer to the hilltop mentioned in the Samuel narratives as the home of Hannah, Elkanah, and the prophet Samuel, or perhaps to another hilltop shrine known to the audience in Jeremiah's day.

Rachel's children are coming home. This means that there is a hope for Rachel's future. Here again the first element in the renewal of Israel comes in the restoration of exiles to their ancestral home.¹⁵

Verses 18–20 can be taken as a separate oracle from verses 15–17. The speaker changes from Rachel to Ephraim. The sentiment, however, in these verses is similar. The Israelites who have sinned and been cast from their land are personified in Ephraim, who confesses his failures. God tenderly accepts his repentance, describing Ephraim as his "dear son" (cf. 31:9), a child for whom his heart yearns. God's parental mercy is paramount in these verses.

31:21–26. This section is combined of both poetry and prose. The poetry (vv. 21–22) calls for highway markers to be erected so that "Virgin Israel" can find her way home. In this metaphorical expression she is also personified as God's "unfaithful daughter." In context it is difficult to know whether the referent behind Virgin Israel is the city of Samaria or the people. In either case, the female gender is important to the poetry. The text describes her return to her homeland as a new thing that God will create —"a woman will surround a man."

This imagery has caused difficulties and significant divergence for interpreters, as a perusal of commentaries will show.¹⁶ Contextually the emphasis seems to fall on the newness that only the Lord can create. (1) This is indicated by the verb bara' (to create), used in verse 22 to describe what the Lord will do. This verb is used in Genesis 1:1 to describe God's creation of the heavens and the earth. Of all the occurrences of this verb in the Old Testament where the meaning is "to create," God is the only subject.¹⁷

(2) The phrase "a woman will encompass [or surround] a man" is a reversal of what was expected in male-female relations in ancient Near Eastern society. The phrase may have a sexual connotation (i.e., the woman initiates intimate relations); it certainly is surprising and indicates initiative and the exercise of authority or power. Already in context the reader has encountered Rachel, the personified land, who weeps for her children. Perhaps it is she or the renewed Virgin Israel who encompasses the man Ephraim. In any case, the phrase points to a surprising and compassionate act of God in making new life possible for those who were estranged in exile.

Restoration of the people is the theme of verses 23–25. While this theme is familiar in the immediate context, it is still important to note that God is the subject of the verbs "bring back," "refresh," and "satisfy." He is the chief actor in the drama of the return.

31:27–30. The introductory formula indicates that a change is coming in the future. The language is that of Jeremiah's commission to prophesy in 1:10. Not only will God pluck up and destroy Judah, but he will also build and plant Israel and Judah. The use of both names conveys totality (cf. 31:31). The form of their life together is not stated. Furthermore, the future will bring an end to the complaints that corporate judgment is unjust

(31:29–30). Each person will indeed bear his or her own sins in God's judgment of the people.¹⁸

31:31–34. This well-known passage, with its proclamation of a new covenant (berit hadasa), is a summary of Jeremiah's message. It moves from the righteous judgment that has come on Israel and Judah because of their disobedience to the restoration of God's people in a new relationship with him. God's torah ("law," the verbal expression of his will) will become a constituent part of a person/people when God writes it on their hearts. This striking claim is a play on God's writing of the Ten Commandments on tablets of stone (Ex. 32:9–16). Furthermore, the effects of sin to spoil relationships are completely done away with in the incredible claim that God will no longer remember them (and their destructive influence).

The objects of God's restoration are "the house of Israel and ... the house of Judah." As in the previous section (31:27), these terms denote inclusivity as referring to all of God's people. They do not disqualify any other peoples among the nations from being included, but such possibilities are not mentioned either. What is "new" about the new covenant is not the covenant partner but the quality of the community created by God's amazing acts.

The passage contains frank recognition of previous failure, even though God initiated a first covenant with the people. That covenant was at Mount Sinai—a covenant that the people collectively broke. The NIV translates the conclusion of verse 32 as "though I was a husband to them." This is an acceptable rendering of the verb ba'al in the Hebrew text, a verb that means to marry, to own, or to be master over. The imagery is similar to that used in 2:2, where the prophet reminds the people of the bridal period of their youth, when God brought his people to himself in the desert and entered into a covenant with them (cf. Ezek. 16:8).¹⁹

It is the quality of the covenant bond between God and his people that gives the essential "newness" to the coming new covenant. As noted above, the imagery is the writing of God's instruction on the human heart rather than on the tablets of stone. Knowledge of God, therefore, is internalized. Furthermore, the ability of sin to disrupt the relationship is made obsolete by the astounding announcement that God will not remember sins and their effects on the relationship.

The phrase "new covenant" occurs only this once in the Old Testament, although Jeremiah twice announces an "everlasting covenant" (berit 'olam) that God will establish with his people (Jer. 32:40; 50:5). Several prophetic books refer to a renewal of the Mosaic (Sinai) covenant with Israel and Judah in similar terms. Hosea 2:14–23 speaks metaphorically of God's bringing Israel again into the desert and reclaiming the people in a covenantal bond likened to marriage. Ezekiel (Ezek. 16:60; 37:26) and Isaiah (Isa. 55:3) have references to an "everlasting covenant" that point to the same future for God's people as Jeremiah.

This famous "new covenant" passage proclaims that an ultimate restoration of the covenant relationship between God and his people includes the transformation of corporate existence. In essence, it is a summary of all that God will accomplish in the renewing of his covenant relationship with his people (see comments on "the new covenant" in the Bridging Contexts section).

31:35–40. The fidelity of God to his people is cast by analogy with the fixed order of the cosmos. Just as the order of the cosmos is sure, so is God's commitment to his people. The final claim is for the rebuilding of Jerusalem, but the text needs careful consideration in its context. It is not a simple rebuilding of the city that is envisioned; the city, like the people of the new covenant, is to be transformed and will never again be overthrown (cf. Ezek. 40–48).

Bridging Contexts

THE ULTIMATE STATE. As noted above, this chapter concentrates in various ways on the quality of the renewed relationship with the Lord that Israel will experience. Also, as part of its original setting, the chapter presupposes the particularities of Israel and Judah in the humiliation of their failure and the resulting physical collapse of their respective states. As part of the Book of Consolation, Jeremiah 31 projects a future in which God's righteous judgment is superseded by his sovereign work of redemption. Israel is called on to accept in faith that this future is sure and to live in anticipation of the coming redemption.

Here is a key for hearing these ancient words as instructive for the church. The current circumstances of God's people do not reflect their ultimate estate. They are called to confess their sins, to respond obediently as disciples of the risen Christ, and to anticipate the culmination of the reign of God to come with the second advent of Christ. Thus, Christians should interpret the future proclaimed to Israel in Jeremiah 31 in the context of the covenant established in Christ for all believers, Jew and Gentile alike.

The new covenant. Jeremiah's inspired expression "new covenant" has been used for centuries as the heading or title to the twenty-seven documents that form the second half of the Christian Bible, that is, the New Testament. The Latin word testamentum, which underlies the English term testament, translates the Hebrew word b^e rit ("covenant"). Early Christians, therefore, made an interpretive bridge between the proclamation of the prophet and the content of the gospel of God set forth in Jesus Christ.²⁰

One sees this understanding as well within the pages of the New Testament. At the Last Supper Jesus describes the cup as a representation of the "new covenant in my blood" (Luke 22:20; 1 Cor. 11:25). Two other Gospel writers record the phrase "blood of the covenant" (Matt. 26:28; Mark 14:24), which reflects the initial covenant ceremony at Sinai (Ex. 24).

The apostle Paul understands the gospel of new life in Christ to be a fulfillment of the hope expressed in Jeremiah's prediction of the new covenant (2 Cor. 3:1–18). As an apostle, Paul describes himself as a servant of a new covenant, not of the letter but of the Spirit (3:6). His emphasis on the work of God's Spirit shows that he understands Jeremiah's prediction of a transformed heart to be the work of God's Spirit in the life of a Christian. Nevertheless, the coming of Christ and the gift of the Spirit do not exhaust the promises made in the new covenant; the complete transformation of God's people is still in the future.

Finally, the anonymous letter to the Hebrews likewise boldly proclaims that Christ's great salvific work as a high priest on behalf of his people is based on the "new" and "better" covenant announced by Jeremiah (Heb. 8–9).

What all the New Testament references have in common is a belief that the future redemption promised by God through Jeremiah (or any of the prophets) has dawned in the ministry of Jesus Christ and will be brought to an ultimate fulfillment in his second coming at the end of the age. Jeremiah's promise to the house of Israel and the house of Judah (Jer. 31:31) is applied to Jewish and Gentile Christians alike, who comprise the church. Because of Christ's advent and through the continuing ministry of the Spirit, the church has tasted an "already" of the future Jeremiah foresaw.

Nevertheless, there is a "not yet" as the current age runs its course. This interplay of "already" and "not yet" places the church in an anticipatory posture similar to that of Jeremiah's own contemporaries. The prophet's announcement that God intended a transformed future for his people was an "already" that believers could trust. It was a goal for their future that they could use to chart their course in the present. One may interpret similarly Jeremiah's announcement of the restoration of the people in their land. It was a tangible expression, an "already" that pointed beyond itself to a complete transformation of God's people as he worked out his eschatological purposes among them.

Contemporary Significance

God's redemptive action will have a shape and form to it. This is true wherever a scriptural word is taken to heart. Those persons are right who emphasize that salvation in Christ is by grace alone through faith; salvation is God's work, whether we talk of individuals or of the final advent of Christ and the full manifestation of his kingdom (which will include the transformation of the heavens and the earth as we now know them). God calls people to respond to what he has already accomplished through Christ, to grow in their faith and their identity as one of Christ's own (sanctification), and to live in anticipation of the final advent of Christ and the glorious unveiling of his reign in full triumph over evil and death itself.

Jeremiah 31 is the voice of an inspired spiritual ancestor who spoke to his contemporaries about the shape that God's action would take in their lives and that of their descendants (e.g., return from exile, a purified worship, knowledge of forgiveness). Perhaps in the present we can think of things in our lives that are "signs" of God at work, things whose shape and function portray the work of God. These things may be personal; they may concern the family; they may be part of the life of fellowship one enjoys among friends and in the activities of a congregation. Signs of redemption should point not only to what has already been accomplished in Christ but also to what still lies ahead. There is always a future tense to the life of believers.

Mother Teresa died in Calcutta in September 1997. A commentator on her life noted that in a speech she delivered a few years previously to the American Congress, Mother Teresa had offended nearly everyone in the assembly by talking about the neglect of the poor in society. She went on to remark that abortion was the most egregious example of evil against the defenseless, thereby offending yet another segment of the audience. She chided those of Protestant persuasion that faith without works made for a lifeless religion, doing yet more "damage." Her point? There should be a form to and tangible evidence of God at work in his people. She was popularly described as a social activist, but she preferred to be called "religious." In the classical Catholic sense, that meant she lived out her vocation as a response to the call and claim of God. When the gospel of forgiveness and new life in Christ take root in a person or community, there will be change—and any changes will be but steps along the way toward the future that God will usher in. "For in this hope we were saved" (Rom. 8:24).

The Christian life comes with the gift of familiarity and even spiritual intimacy among believers. Jeremiah's prediction that God will write his torah, that is, his instruction, on human hearts takes shape in the church through the work of the Holy Spirit. "To know God" in an intimate and corporate way is not just a future promise. There is an "already" to this experience in the Christian life through the agency of God's Spirit just as there is the exciting anticipation of things "not yet" realized and only intimated. Forgiveness is something that can be experienced in the present; it is a promise of God that can and should give shape and substance to the present reality of Christian existence. Forgiveness helps one anticipate a future where even the remembrance of sin and failure have no role.

God's promises regarding Israel. God's redemptive work gives shape and substance to the life of his people. In various ways the New Testament claims the promises to Israel as promises to the church. One sees this in the use of the "new covenant" passage in the Gospels and letters. Modern Christians have differed considerably over how to read the Old Testament in light of Christ and in the way they interpret the promises to Israel as a future yet unrealized. No one can "solve" all the issues of this topic in a sermon or brief reflection. Nevertheless, Jeremiah's promise of Israel's restoration and its security before the Lord should compel modern Christians to ask about the contemporary significance of believing Judaism

(as opposed to an ethnic definition) and the place of the modern state of Israel in God's economy.

"All Israel will be saved" (Rom. 11:26). Paul could write this because the Old Testament proclaimed a future for God's people, a future not realized in Paul's day any more than in Jeremiah's day. Indeed, there was no state called Israel in Paul's day. Jews lived scattered throughout the Roman Empire, and those Jews who lived within the former boundaries (which changed over the centuries) of Israel were subject to the power of Roman administration. The reason to hear this quote from Paul is a theological one, whether or not the interpreters who stand before this claim know what Paul means by Israel. It takes seriously the shape of God's promises. God has made promises to a people, albeit a people whose political shape and religious profile have changed over the centuries. They are the spiritual ancestors of Christians today.

If the church has inherited the promises made to Israel (as I believe), does this mean that God has simply turned his back in righteous judgment on Jews because they have failed to recognize Jesus as God's Son and Redeemer? The answer is "no." Certainly modern Christians have the responsibility to proclaim the gospel to Jews just as to any who do not know Christ as Savior and Lord. Christians should do so, however, with confidence that God has made promises to his people Israel (historically his "first love"), and that these promises will have an ultimate fulfillment. Those promises will have shape and substance in this age, and their influence will extend even beyond that.

Does this mean that modern Christians should have special concern for the modern state of Israel (a political entity, not to be identified with believing Judaism)? Again the answer is "no"; but God's promises to Israel do mean that Christians should have a special affinity for believing Judaism, and they should recognize that God is still at work among believing Jews in a mysterious way. God's promises hold out a future in which his people will be redeemed and constituted as a transformed community with Christ as its head. This is the future of all of God's people (the Israel of God), including Jews who confess Jesus as the Christ.

¹This is the word that came to Jeremiah from the LORD in the tenth year of Zedekiah king of Judah, which was the eighteenth year of Nebuchadnezzar. ²The army of the king of Babylon was then besieging Jerusalem, and Jeremiah the prophet was confined in the courtyard of the guard in the royal palace of Judah.

³Now Zedekiah king of Judah had imprisoned him there, saying, "Why do you prophesy as you do? You say, 'This is what the LORD says: I am about to hand this city over to the king of Babylon, and he will capture it. ⁴Zedekiah king of Judah will not escape out of the hands of the Babylonians but will certainly be handed over to the king of Babylon, and will speak with him face to face and see him with his own eyes. ⁵He will take Zedekiah to Babylon, where he will remain until I deal with him, declares the LORD. If you fight against the Babylonians, you will not succeed."

⁶Jeremiah said, "The word of the LORD came to me: ⁷Hanamel son of Shallum your uncle is going to come to you and say, 'Buy my field at Anathoth, because as nearest relative it is your right and duty to buy it.'

8"Then, just as the LORD had said, my cousin Hanamel came to me in the courtyard of the guard and said, 'Buy my field at Anathoth in the territory of Benjamin. Since it is your right to redeem it and possess it, buy it for yourself.'

"I knew that this was the word of the LORD; 9so I bought the field at Anathoth from my cousin Hanamel and weighed out for him seventeen shekels of silver. 10I signed and sealed the deed, had it witnessed, and weighed out the silver on the scales. 11I took the deed of purchase—the sealed copy containing the terms and conditions, as well as the unsealed copy—¹² and I gave this deed to Baruch son of Neriah, the son of Mahseiah, in the presence of my cousin Hanamel and of the witnesses who had signed the deed and of all the Jews sitting in the courtyard of the guard.

13"In their presence I gave Baruch these instructions: 14'This is what the LORD Almighty, the God of Israel, says: Take these documents, both the sealed and unsealed copies of the deed of purchase, and put them in a clay jar so they will last a long time. 15 For this is what the LORD Almighty, the God of Israel, says: Houses, fields and vineyards will again be bought in this land.'

17"Ah, Sovereign LORD, you have made the heavens and the earth by your great power and outstretched arm. Nothing is too hard for you. ¹⁸You show love to thousands but bring the punishment for the fathers' sins into the laps of their children after them. O great and powerful God, whose name is the LORD Almighty, ¹⁹great are your purposes and mighty are your deeds. Your eyes are open to all the ways of men; you reward everyone according to his conduct and as his deeds deserve. ²⁰You performed miraculous signs and wonders in Egypt and have continued them to this day, both in Israel and among all mankind, and have gained the renown that is still yours. ²¹You brought your people Israel out of Egypt with signs and wonders, by a mighty hand and an outstretched arm and with great terror.

²²You gave them this land you had sworn to give their forefathers, a land flowing with milk and honey. ²³They came in and took possession of it, but they did not obey you or follow your law; they did not do what you commanded them to do. So you brought all this disaster upon them.

²⁴"See how the siege ramps are built up to take the city. Because of the sword, famine and plague, the city will be handed over to the Babylonians who are attacking it. What you said has happened, as you now see.

²⁵And though the city will be handed over to the Babylonians, you, O Sovereign LORD, say to me, 'Buy the field with silver and have the transaction witnessed.'"

²⁶Then the word of the LORD came to Jeremiah: ²⁷"I am the LORD, the God of all mankind. Is anything too hard for me? ²⁸Therefore, this is what the LORD says: I am about to hand this city over to the Babylonians and to Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, who will capture it. ²⁹The Babylonians who are attacking this city will come in and set it on fire; they will burn it down, along with the houses where the people provoked me to anger by burning incense on the roofs to Baal and by pouring out drink offerings to other gods.

³⁰"The people of Israel and Judah have done nothing but evil in my sight from their youth; indeed, the people of Israel have done nothing but provoke me with what their hands have made, declares the LORD. ³¹From the day it was built until now, this city has so aroused my anger and wrath that I must remove it from my sight. ³²The people of Israel and Judah have provoked me by all the evil they have done—they, their kings and officials, their priests and prophets, the men of Judah and the people of Jerusalem. ³³They turned their backs to me and not their faces; though I taught them again and again, they would not listen or respond to discipline. ³⁴They set up their abominable idols in the house that bears my Name and defiled it. ³⁵They built high places for Baal in the Valley of Ben Hinnom to sacrifice their sons and daughters to Molech, though I never commanded, nor did it enter my mind, that they should do such a detestable thing and so make Judah sin.

³⁶"You are saying about this city, 'By the sword, famine and plague it will be handed over to the king of Babylon'; but this is what the LORD, the God of Israel, says:

where I banish them in my furious anger and great wrath; I will bring them back to this place and let them live in safety. ³⁸They will be my people, and I will be their God. ³⁹I will give them singleness of heart and action, so that they will always fear me for their own good and the good of their children after them. ⁴⁰I will make an everlasting covenant with them: I will never stop doing good to them, and I will inspire them to fear me, so that they will never turn away from me. ⁴¹I will rejoice in doing them good and will assuredly plant them in this land with all my heart and soul.

⁴³Once more fields will be bought in this land of which you say, 'It is a desolate waste, without men or animals, for it has been handed over to the Babylonians.' ⁴⁴Fields will be bought for silver, and deeds will be signed, sealed and witnessed in the territory of Benjamin, in the villages around Jerusalem, in the towns of Judah and in the towns of the hill country, of the western foothills and of the Negev, because I will restore their fortunes, declares the LORD."

Original Meaning

THIS CHAPTER CONTINUES the hopeful section of Jeremiah. The hope is in the power of God to overcome the self-destructive consequences of Judah's folly. Chapter 32 has three major sections: Jeremiah's purchase of property as a prophetic sign (32:1–15), his prayer to the Lord (32:16–25), and a commentary from the Lord on Judah's fate and future (32:26–44).

32:1–15. The chronological reference in verse 1 has caused some difficulties for interpreters. Nebuchadnezzar's eighteenth year on the reckoning of the Babylonian system would be 587/586, while the tenth year of Zedekiah, which has its own problems for interpreters, is 588/587. As noted in the introduction to the commentary, the problems associated with regnal years beginning in the spring or fall and with whether an accession year is assumed make for some problematic chronological reconstructions for the two kings in question.

The historical setting of chapter 32, however, is clear. Babylon has besieged Jerusalem for a second time, and Jeremiah is confined in the city by a royal guard. Apparently the Babylonians began the siege late in the year 588. Subsequently an Egyptian force began a march toward Palestine and caused a temporary easing of the siege (cf. Jer. 37:5). It is plausible that at this time (spring 587?) Jeremiah is visited by his cousin Hanamel, and they carry out the transaction narrated at the chapter's beginning.

Jeremiah's continual prophecies about the sovereignty of Babylon over Judah and Jerusalem have been perceived as seditious, and as a result he is imprisoned or confined on several occasions. His announcement to Zedekiah here (32:3–4) that Jerusalem and the king will be handed over to Babylon is essentially repeated in 34:2–3. Once he is arrested for attempting to leave Jerusalem (37:11–14). Perhaps Hanamel's visit to him in Jerusalem is in response to Jeremiah's failed attempt to reach his ancestral home and to carry out his personal affairs. In any case, family business at a time of crisis becomes the occasion for a prophetic symbolic act.

Jeremiah purchases (g'l; lit., redeems) some family property.²¹ It should be remembered that much of an Israelite family's identity was tied to its possessions. A "household" (an extended family) was defined not merely by a list of its members but also by its property and the related functions of its members. Indeed, "household" (bayit)²² is the closest term in Hebrew to what modern people call a family. A particularly significant element of what defined most families was its patrimony or its inheritance. This property, unlike perhaps other things the family possessed, was not to be sold to those outside of the clan (the kin of the family).²³ Thus, when there were economic difficulties or other types of hardship, the property could be used as collateral and sold to members within the clan (or even tribe), but it was not to be alienated permanently from the family of possession.

According to Jeremiah 32:7 the prophet has the "right of redemption" to the property "owned" by Hanamel. His right comes by virtue of family ties. For Jeremiah to redeem the property means either that the property already has a lien (to use a modern term) against it and the family of Hanamel still needs money desperately, or similarly, that the needs of Hanamel's family are such that they will "sell" the property to Jeremiah in order to satisfy some of their other obligations. Needless to say, a time of siege is not the time to be buying property. Whatever the specific reason behind the request of Hanamel, such a request reflects a time of desperation as families seek whatever means they can to keep life and limb together.

Jeremiah's purchase of Hanamel's property becomes a vehicle, a symbolic act, intended to illustrate his message. At one of the darkest moments in Judah's history, when the Babylonian reduction of the country is in an advanced state and the successful siege of Jerusalem seems merely a matter of time, Jeremiah purchases the property because "houses, fields and vineyards will again be bought in this land" (32:15). There will be a future for God's people, including restoration to their land after the pain of defeat and the trauma of exile.

Baruch assists Jeremiah in carrying out the purchase and the preparation of the necessary records. He is a scribe (36:32); that is, the preparation, reading, and preservation of documents are skills of his profession. Baruch will assist Jeremiah in the preparing of a scroll of prophecies in chapter 36. His patronymic is supplied in 32:12: He is "son of Neriah, the son of Mahseiah." The preservation of the purchase documents is described in some detail. In time to come they will serve as verification of Jeremiah's prophecy that land and fields will again be bought.²⁶

32:16–25. In a prayer Jeremiah praises God as Creator, as merciful and righteous Judge in the historical process, and as the true God who chose Israel as his own. Also he acknowledges that the Babylonian siege is God's work. As a prose prayer it is not unlike that of Nehemiah 9:5–37. Both prayers intersperse hymnic elements that praise God with frank confession of sins.

This prayer ends abruptly with the statement that God has commanded Jeremiah to go and buy the field. It is a sign of the times. When others have lost hope, the "pessimistic" Jeremiah is called to signify a future, and his prayer testifies to readers that God, the Lord of history, is still at work.

32:26–44. God speaks to Jeremiah after the prophet's prayer concludes. His communication is a summary of what Jeremiah has proclaimed for years, that a righteous judgment will befall Judah and Jerusalem and that it will proceed not from God's weakness over against the powerful Babylonian deities, but from his intention to discipline and purge his people. Considerable space is devoted to the articulation of God's anger at the failures of the people. Verse 37 describes God's response as "furious anger and great wrath."

In addition to the articulation of wrath, God reiterates the significance of Jeremiah's land purchase as a sign of the Lord's resolve to restore and bless his people. Both current calamity and future blessing are the work of God. In his prayer, Jeremiah confessed in awe that "nothing is too hard" for God (32:17). In his answer, God's rhetorical question asks: "Is anything too hard for me?" (32:27). Through this God reassures the people that what he has promised he can deliver.

God's announced future holds forth the miraculous promises of an "everlasting covenant" (32:40), a changed heart for the people (32:39), and life again in the Promised Land (32:41). These prose promises are related to the poetic announcements in chapters 30–31, which also concern the people's future. The "everlasting covenant" is essentially a synonym for the "new covenant" in 31:31–34. The qualitative changes depicted for the new covenant, once brought to fruition, will be everlasting.²⁷

The chapter ends as it began. As Jeremiah has bought a field, so shall others buy property in the future. In Jeremiah's "purchase" God's promised future has already begun to take symbolic shape.

Bridging Contexts

IN TIMES OF THREAT. Judah and Jerusalem find themselves under threat. Such can be the common lot of humankind in its corporate life. Circumstances of threat and danger come periodically. Theological questions are inevitable in times of trouble; they are not as frequent in times of blessing and security. Where is God in these horrible circumstances, and what must be done in response to the predicament?

Judah's circumstances are the result of its own moral and spiritual failures. This is a scenario that has been and will be repeated in the history of God's people, for they are not immune to the threatening circumstances that come periodically. Although moral and spiritual failures are by no means the only cause of suffering (personal or corporate), they are the reasons in this case. God is not absent in the process whereby Judah reaps what it has sown but is present to move the process beyond self-incurred judgment. God has given the people over to their folly and has used the historical process as judgment on them. Is this God's final word to the "fallen"? No; judgment is a penultimate word, a stage in God's dealings with his people that leads to a future that only God can bring about.

Word and deed. Jeremiah's prophetic sign comes about in the context of family duty and solidarity. He exercises the "right of redemption" that belongs to him as a member of an extended family. His payment to Hanamel is a tangible expression of his faith and an act that is commensurate with his message. Indeed the two are inseparable. Word and deed go together as a hallmark of Old Testament prophecy. During a time of national calamity and spiritual depression, Jeremiah expends his resources, making a statement about God's intention to redeem and to restore. He does so through the circumstances of his membership in a family. It is a family where some of its members have opposed his message and sought to persecute him (12:5–6). Similar dynamics occur periodically among God's people in any age. Ministry often arises from the debris of cherished plans gone awry.

In the larger scriptural narrative Jeremiah's prophetic act is like that of Elijah on Mount Carmel, straining to see the first signs of rain clouds in a drought-stricken region (1 Kings 18:1–46). He looked for the cloud because water had been used as a sign that God was the Lord of the drought. Drought was on everyone's mind, and God would deal with his people through these circumstances. When finally a small cloud appeared, the prophet ran to signify that rain was on the way. Similarly, with defeat on everyone's mind, Jeremiah buys property to signify that through God's grace, property will again be bought and sold in the land by God's people. One might call this activity a tangible sign of God's grace. Here is a bridge to cross for any generation of God's people: What are the tangible signs of God's grace that you have chosen to illustrate your Christian hope?

One thing leads to another in Jeremiah 32. The making of commitments leads by way of provisional signs to something even greater. God's reply to Jeremiah's prayer becomes a reminder not only of small steps in a time of judgment but of redemption on a grand scale. This is a dynamic of the text that runs all the way from an imprisoned prophet to the announcement of an everlasting covenant. The same dynamic exists in the exercise of Christian faith. Small steps in the right direction point ahead to even greater things God has in store.

Contemporary Significance

VEHICLES FOR COMMUNICATION. As a college student I heard that one definition of an apologist for the Christian faith is a person who takes the thinking of the day and turns it into a defense of Christianity. There is a sense in which Jeremiah takes the circumstances of his day, particularly the crushing reminder of imminent failure that the siege of Jerusalem signifies for Judeans, and turns them and the mindset of the day into a vehicle for proclaiming God's truth. Viewed from this angle, the signs of the times become vehicles for communicating the signs of the kingdom. It is a perennial question: "How do I (we) exercise our faith in relevant fashion in my (our) particular context?" Perhaps one needs to look no further than the circumstances of family and community that so frequently occupy our minds.

One can be quite specific. In the case of my own community, a rapidly growing area with escalating housing costs, so-called affordable housing has become a common problem. There is more than one organization dedicated to the search for affordable housing, and even to the building of such housing, for those in need. Some of these organizations are Christian, and they intend their efforts to be signs of the kingdom, examples of Christian commitment to a vision of wholeness in the community and opportunities to demonstrate provisionally the ethics of the kingdom. Those involved, from the builders to the occupants, are invited to trust the Lord and to dedicate themselves to his service in the community in which they live. These Christians build in hope in places where many others have despaired over their circumstances, present and future.

Prayer. Prayer is a key ingredient to the exercise of one's faith. Not only did Jeremiah buy, he prayed. To praise God as Creator, Judge, and Redeemer is to focus not on one's resources but on God, who calls one to obedience. Prayer (as in the case of Jeremiah and the purchase of property) is an acknowledgment that God is at work in the world and not aloof from the circumstances of his people. It is a reminder that the dominant concerns of a people or community may be the key to the most effective ways of ministry. Finally, prayer is the opportunity for petition. To trust God in difficult circumstances and to ask for guidance and deliverance becomes both a privilege and a responsibility.

Redemption. Redemption always costs something. This is a truth that should never be ignored. Whether it is the purchase of property or a theory to explain the atonement, the whole concept of redemption rests in the dynamics of a gift on behalf of those unable to gain something for themselves. For redemption to work, it requires those who have to give on behalf of those who don't. It is usually easier to argue about the faults of those who don't have rather than to celebrate that God has provided the opportunity to give so that others might live. Evangelism and social ethics both work best when they follow the scriptural pattern of joyful giving without concern for an accounting of merits. It is amazing what can be "redeemed" by the simple giving of talents bestowed by the Lord.

Western print media have recently noted the efforts on the part of some school-age children in the United States to collect money in order to purchase Christian boys and girls in Sudan who are held by Muslims there as slaves. Some members of the public have complained that the children are manipulated and that the situation in Sudan is too complex for making clear moral judgments. For example, it is argued that to purchase the children from slavery merely encourages the practice of kidnapping Christian children so that more money (ransoms) can be collected by the slave-traders. Perhaps there is some truth to this point about not encouraging slave-traders. But ask the question: How would you feel if you were a Christian Sudanese slave? Would you prefer continued debate on the ambiguities of the situation or that someone, somewhere, would take a stand?

In most debates, not all options are open for careful deliberation, as if someone is perusing a giant shopping list with virtually all options available and leisurely looking for the best bargain. I suggest the American children are to be commended for taking a real step, for making tangible efforts at securing the freedom of Christian slaves. While the debate continues on whether or not their purchase is a wise move, let it be said that some persons are willing to pay a price in an uncertain atmosphere simply because they believe that God wants the freedom of his people. While others continue to talk and wring their hands, they pray that God's kingdom and will may be done, on earth as it is in heaven.

Jeremiah acted on the opportunity that came his way. It was definitely not a good business deal. His purchase symbolized, however, that God would redeem his people.

¹WHILE JEREMIAH WAS still confined in the courtyard of the guard, the word of the LORD came to him a second time: ²"This is what the LORD says, he who made the earth, the LORD who formed it and established it—the LORD is his name: ³'Call to me and I will answer you and tell you great and unsearchable things you do not know.' ⁴For this is what the LORD, the God of Israel, says about the houses in this city and the royal palaces of Judah that have been torn down to be used against the siege ramps and the sword ⁵in the fight with the Babylonians: 'They will be filled with the dead bodies of the men I will slay in my anger and wrath. I will hide my face from this city because of all its wickedness.

6"'Nevertheless, I will bring health and healing to it; I will heal my people and will let them enjoy abundant peace and security. ⁷I will bring Judah and Israel back from captivity and will rebuild them as they were before. ⁸I will cleanse them from all the sin they have committed against me and will forgive all their sins of rebellion against me. ⁹Then this city will bring me renown, joy, praise and honor before all nations on earth that hear of all the good things I do for it; and they will be in awe and will tremble at the abundant prosperity and peace I provide for it.'

10"This is what the LORD says: 'You say about this place, "It is a desolate waste, without men or animals." Yet in the towns of Judah and the streets of Jerusalem that are deserted, inhabited by neither men nor animals, there will be heard once more 11 the sounds of joy and gladness, the voices of bride and bridegroom, and the voices of those who bring thank offerings to the house of the LORD, saying,

"Give thanks to the LORD Almighty, for the LORD is good; his love endures forever."

For I will restore the fortunes of the land as they were before,' says the LORD.

¹²"This is what the LORD Almighty says: 'In this place, desolate and without men or animals—in all its towns there will again be pastures for shepherds to rest their flocks. ¹³In the towns of the hill country, of the western foothills and of the Negev, in the territory of Benjamin, in the villages around Jerusalem and in the towns of Judah, flocks will again pass under the hand of the one who counts them,' says the LORD.

¹⁴"The days are coming,' declares the LORD, 'when I will fulfill the gracious promise I made to the house of Israel and to the house of Judah.

15"In those days and at that time
I will make a righteous Branch sprout from David's line;
he will do what is just and right in the land.

16In those days Judah will be saved and Jerusalem will live in safety.This is the name by which it will be called: The LORD Our Righteousness.'

¹⁷For this is what the LORD says: 'David will never fail to have a man to sit on the throne of the house of Israel, ¹⁸nor will the priests, who are Levites, ever fail to have a man to stand before me continually to offer burnt offerings, to burn grain offerings and to present sacrifices.'"

¹⁹The word of the LORD came to Jeremiah:
²⁰"This is what the LORD says: 'If you can break my covenant with the day and my covenant with the night, so that day and night no longer come at their appointed time, ²¹then my covenant with David my servant—and my covenant with the Levites who are priests ministering before me—can be broken and David will no longer have a descendant to reign on his throne. ²²I will make the descendants of David my servant and the Levites who minister before me as countless as the stars of the sky and as measureless as the sand on the seashore.""

²⁴"Have you not noticed that these people are saying, 'The LORD has rejected the two kingdoms he chose'? So they despise my people and no longer regard them as a nation. ²⁵This is what the LORD says: 'If I have not established my covenant with day and night and the fixed laws of heaven and earth, ²⁶then I will reject the descendants of Jacob and David my servant and will not choose one of his sons to rule over the descendants of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. For I will restore their fortunes and have compassion on them.'"

33:1–3. This chapter concludes the "Book of Consolation" (chs. 30–33). Verse 1 links this chapter with chapter 32. God speaks a "second time" to Jeremiah while he is confined under guard and the Babylonians are besieging the city of Jerusalem. Thus one should probably read the prose narratives in chapters 32 and 33 as scene 1 and scene 2 in the narration of Jeremiah's prison experiences.

There are also links between chapter 33 and the largely poetic oracles in chapters 30–31. For example, they have in common the phrase šub šebutes (NIV "bring back from captivity, restore the fortunes"), which succinctly captures much of the emphasis on corporate renewal. The phrase occurs three times in chapter 33 (vv. 7, 11, 26) alone, serving as a thread of continuity in the prose speeches of the Lord.

The emphasis in this chapter is on God speaking (33:2, 10, 12, 17, 19, 23), almost as if the divine commentary that concluded chapter 32 is picked up again, with continued emphasis on the future turning of Judah's fortune. Readers and hearers should note that God's communication to the prisoner is meant for them. The narrator intends for readers to be instructed by what is said to the prophet. Even as a "listener," therefore, Jeremiah is in the prophetic mode of conveying the Lord's message to his contemporaries by repeating what he hears.

- 33:4–9. God reiterates his promise to redeem Judah and Jerusalem. The turning fortunes of the people are here described as God's "healing" them.²⁹ Healing also includes forgiveness, along with such tangible signs of restoration as resettlement in the land of promise, rebuilding Jerusalem ("this city" in v. 9), and security while dwelling there. These promises reiterate those made in previous chapters. Other peoples will learn to fear (hold in awe) God because of Judah's restoration. Here again the theme of Jeremiah as "prophet to the nations" comes to the fore.
- 33:10–13. These verses continue to emphasize a joyful future for the people as a reversal of the judgment on and the misery suffered by Judah. Cities in Judah will again be inhabited. The temple will again have worship. Verse 11 contains a familiar refrain from the temple liturgy: "Give thanks to the LORD Almighty, for the LORD is good; his love [hesed] endures forever." This is the characteristic phrase of the temple singers appointed by David (1 Chron. 16:41) and is known from the praises of the Psalter (Ps. 106:1; 118:1, 29; 136; cf. 100:4). For someone who had been as critical about the temple as Jeremiah, such a text reminds us that his criticisms presuppose no enduring hostility to the temple, only toward its misuse and corruption.
- 33:14–18. There is more than one chronological moment to the "good word" that God provides. These verses are introduced by the prophetic formula for the future: "The days are coming." Both Israel and Judah are included in the future transformation. In addition to the corporate restoration of the people, Jeremiah announces that "a righteous Branch … from David's line" will arise and execute justice and righteousness (see also 23:5–6). This promise is messianic in that it depends on the promises made by God to David's family (see below). Jerusalem will even receive a new symbolic name: "The LORD [is] Our Righteousness."³⁰
- 33:19–22. The work of Davidic rule and that of priestly ministry will not cease. These announcements indicate that God's promises (when finally realized in their completeness) will never end. God will undergird two fundamental institutions of the people in perpetuity. Someone from David's line will be head of the people, and descendants of Levi, the priestly tribe, will always be available to officiate in public worship.³¹

There is an allusion to the promises made to Abraham. He was promised descendants like the stars of heaven and the sand on the seashore (Gen.

15:5; 22:17); here God promises innumerable descendants to the Davidic line and the Levitical priests.

33:23–26. God has heard the despair and cynicism of his people. Those who conclude that God has simply rejected them are wrong. God has not broken his covenant with day and night (cf. 33:20), nor has he rejected his people. The use of covenant language in this context is appropriate. A covenant (b^e rit) is a solemn promise often undergirded by an oath. God's covenant with day and night is not an agreement with those inanimate parties but the expression of his sovereign resolve to maintain a beneficent order. Because of his mercy, the people still have a future.

Bridging Contexts

THE WORD FOR THE FUTURE. God's word about the future is usually built on the prevailing circumstances of the first recipients. His word in Jeremiah 33 presupposes the circumstances of his people in the despair of defeat and in the (soon-to-come) trauma of exile. There is a sense in which Jerusalem is like Jeremiah; as the prophet is detained by guards and his movement restricted, so the city is under siege and its movement constricted—and defeat is imminent.

What is corporate life to be like for Judah when its cities are deserted, its temple in ruins, and its king in exile? Judah and Jerusalem are called on to trust that all these circumstances can be reversed in God's good time. God will deal with the present predicament and reverse the judgment it contains. God takes seriously the particulars of their plight and promises to deal with them. Modern readers should take heart at this pattern and trust that God knows the particulars of their situation (and that of the communities in which his people live).

As noted above, the promises of chapter 33 about the future can be found elsewhere in Jeremiah (esp. chs. 30–32). Thus, chapter 33 should not be read in isolation from other sections of Jeremiah and indeed from other sections of those prophets that speak about the restoration of the people.³³ Although these elaborations have variation in vocabulary and detail, they are consistent with claims elsewhere in the Old Testament that speak about transformations to come.

Although these promises are not new to modern readers, we should not be lulled into complacency because "we know how it all comes out." God has made promises to the house of David³⁴ and vows that there will always be priestly worship. Thus, on the one hand, God deals with the particulars of his people in the trauma of defeat and exile. The future he has promised contains the institutions of monarchy and temple and the renewed gift of the land. On the other hand, there is surprise in store for God's people as the shape of those promises is reconfigured in Christ (David's Son and heir of the promises) and through the people who are "in Christ."

A veil on the panorama of God's promised future is partially lifted in the New Testament, but in doing so, the full realization of God's promises is still future-oriented. Christ is the promised Ruler from David's line, and his ministry on behalf of his people as a great high priest³⁵ discloses the depth of God's commitment to the future of his people. Then as now, they are called to trust in God's promise and to live according to the hope revealed to them.

Christian hope is structured essentially like that of Old Testament prophetic hope: It has a "future tense" while it maintains itself through responsible engagement in the present. The future restoration predicted by Jeremiah is even now still "in process," long after initial realizations in the return from exile and the rebuilding of Jerusalem and the temple. Contemporary Christians should be prepared for surprise and wonder when God brings in his kingdom in its fullness.

Contemporary Significance

WORKING FOR THE LORD IN ADVERSE SITUATIONS. One wonders what it is about prison life that gives rise to such deep reflections as those given in the Bible to prisoners. Joseph, Jeremiah, Paul, and John (the seer of the Apocalypse) come immediately to mind. Recent years have contributed powerful testimony to the ways of God from prison cells (e.g., Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn, Charles Colson, Nelson Mandela, Karla Faye Tucker). Perhaps the obvious answer is "time." Prisoners typically have "time on their hands," since their movements and activities are forcibly restricted. Perhaps also it is the quality of the experience of God during incarceration. Though some prisoners become bored and irrational in their confinement, others are motivated to develop certain skills and mental faculties as they are able. God has found this setting to be a propitious time to approach his chosen ones and to teach his people through them.

Contemporary Christians, particularly in the West, may find this dynamic an odd one: Lose your freedom and find out more about God; be in despair and find yourself instructed about the power and mercy of God. God often finds an opportunity to reconstitute people's horizons about themselves when they are suddenly limited in their freedom. So it was for Judah, so it was for John on the isle of Patmos and the suffering churches of Asia Minor.

Charles Colson is a modern example of someone whose freedom was taken from him by the state because he had broken the law. While there, Colson dealt with more than the humiliation of imprisonment; he wrestled with his sinfulness before God and emerged from prison with Christian zeal. The lives of many prisoners and congregations have been dramatically changed because of his witness. God's promised future has the power to change the present circumstances of people as they yield themselves to the leading of the Holy Spirit.

In the last few years, the country of South Africa has undergone tremendous change. Nelson Mandela, a black South African and former political prisoner, was elected president of the country in 1994. With its former policies of apartheid and a past full of violence, the country had much to atone for and to overcome. Both partial blame for the past and the call to ministry in the present rest on the churches in the country. One wonders if the national Truth and Reconciliation Commission (established by the government to deal with past faults)³⁷ will be able to lead the country forward and help it prepare for the future.

Note well the title of that commission: truth and reconciliation. In God's economy the two go together. Since three-quarters of South Africans (of all races) confess Christ, there is the exciting and challenging prospect of Christian faith as the unifying center of the population. What opportunities lie before the churches at this crossroads in the history of that country! How does a Christian (or the church) see the future from a broken past? Will past sinfulness continue to work its destructive way, or, with God's grace, will the vision of reconciliation and the possibility of a transformed future find root in the present?

God's promise that someone from David's line will reign over his people is made eternal in the resurrection of his Son (born of the house of David). He is the ultimate head of God's people. Truth and reconciliation, whether in South Africa or elsewhere, can take lasting shape only if they are understood by people to be joined in Christ, the head of the church.

WHILE NEBUCHADNEZZAR KING of Babylon and all his army and all the kingdoms and peoples in the empire he ruled were fighting against Jerusalem and all its surrounding towns, this word came to Jeremiah from the LORD: ²"This is what the LORD, the God of Israel, says: Go to Zedekiah king of Judah and tell him, 'This is what the LORD says: I am about to hand this city over to the king of Babylon, and he will burn it down. ³You will not escape from his grasp but will surely be captured and handed over to him. You will see the king of Babylon with your own eyes, and he will speak with you face to face. And you will go to Babylon.

⁴"Yet hear the promise of the LORD, O Zedekiah king of Judah. This is what the LORD says concerning you: You will not die by the sword; ⁵you will die peacefully. As people made a funeral fire in honor of your fathers, the former kings who preceded you, so they will make a fire in your honor and lament, "Alas, O master!" I myself make this promise, declares the LORD."

⁸The word came to Jeremiah from the LORD after King Zedekiah had made a covenant with all the people in Jerusalem to proclaim freedom for the slaves. ⁹Everyone was to free his Hebrew slaves, both male and female; no one was to hold a fellow Jew in bondage. ¹⁰So all the officials and people who entered into this covenant agreed that they would free their male and female slaves and no longer hold them in bondage. They agreed, and set them free. ¹¹But afterward they changed their minds and took back the slaves they had freed and enslaved them again.

¹²Then the word of the LORD came to Jeremiah: 13"This is what the LORD, the God of Israel, says: I made a covenant with your forefathers when I brought them out of Egypt, out of the land of slavery. I said, ¹⁴ Every seventh year each of you must free any fellow Hebrew who has sold himself to you. After he has served you six years, you must let him go free.' Your fathers, however, did not listen to me or pay attention to me. ¹⁵Recently you repented and did what is right in my sight: Each of you proclaimed freedom to his countrymen. You even made a covenant before me in the house that bears my Name. ¹⁶But now you have turned around and profaned my name; each of you has taken back the male and female slaves you had set free to go where they wished. You have forced them to become your slaves again.

17"Therefore, this is what the LORD says: You have not obeyed me; you have not proclaimed freedom for your fellow countrymen. So I now proclaim 'freedom' for you, declares the LORD—'freedom' to fall by the sword, plague and famine. I will make you abhorrent to all the kingdoms of the earth. ¹⁸The men who have violated my covenant and have not fulfilled the terms of the covenant they made before me, I will treat like the calf they cut in two and then walked between its pieces. ¹⁹The leaders of Judah and Jerusalem, the court officials, the priests and all the people of the land who walked between the pieces of the calf, ²⁰I will hand over to their enemies who seek their lives. Their dead bodies will become food for the birds of the air and the beasts of the earth.

²¹"I will hand Zedekiah king of Judah and his officials over to their enemies who seek their lives, to the army of the king of Babylon, which has withdrawn from you. ²²I am going to give the order, declares the LORD, and I will bring them back to this city. They will fight against it, take it and burn it down. And I will lay waste the towns of Judah so no one can live there."

Original Meaning

CHAPTER 34 IS PART of a series of narratives about the siege and fall of Jerusalem. It is linked with chapters 32–33 by the common setting of the Babylonian siege during Zedekiah's reign, although chapters 32–33 are also typically grouped with chapters 30–31 as part of the theme of restoration. A date sometime in 588 B.C. or early 587 fits the historical context of the events narrated in chapter 34. Chapter 35 is set in the time of King Jehoiakim, several years earlier, so its contents are related to chapter 34 by the theme of Judah's failures, not that of chronology.

The narrative in chapter 34 has two primary parts. Verses 1–5 are a word from the Lord to Jerusalem and Zedekiah, and verses 8–22 report an emancipation ceremony (lit., a covenant) for Judean slaves and a subsequent reneging on the proclamation by slave owners. The failure of the people to honor their covenant oath becomes the occasion for the Lord again to announce his judgment on Judah, Jerusalem, and Zedekiah.

34:1–5. This passage should be read in the context of 38:17–18; 39:7; 52:8–11; and 2 Kings 25:1–7. The fate of Zedekiah and of the city and nation are bound together. The statements about the future should be understood as announcements contingent on the reactions of king and people to the Babylonian siege. Verses 2–3 voice a familiar word of judgment on the city and its king. Their present course of disaster will lead (as it were) inevitably to a tragic conclusion. Verses 4–5, likewise, should be understood as contingent on some response of Zedekiah, even at this late date. Although not formulated in the classical form of a call to repentance, these prophecies indicate the possible mitigation of the king's threatening circumstances.

Later on, Zedekiah was captured while fleeing the besieged city. His last days were spent in darkness because the Babylonians blinded him—a cruel act that came after the execution of members of his family (39:5–7). One should note the information provided in 34:21. It is a commentary (an update) on the word to Zedekiah in 34:4–5, perhaps anticipating the king's continuing recalcitrance and his sorry fate. Zedekiah's actions condemned him to the same fate as the rebellious city.

34:6–7. These verses seem to be an incidental comment regarding the timing of Jeremiah's communication to Zedekiah. As a result of archaeological work, however, they have become an interesting commentary on the formation of the book. According to verses 6–7, the two cities of Azekah and Lachish were still holding out against the Babylonian forces when Jeremiah made his prophecies to Zedekiah. The site of ancient Lachish is at modern Tell ed Duweir in the Shephelah hills southwest of Jerusalem. During the 1930s an expedition sponsored by the British School of Archaeology excavated at the site. Near the gate and near the interior fortress the excavation team found several ostraca (letters written on pottery shards) from stratum II, dating from the time of Jeremiah. One of the letters states that the signals from Azekah, located a few kilometers to the north of Lachish, could no longer be seen.

34:8–22. King Zedekiah had initiated a covenant with his subjects regarding their Judean slaves, that they were to be set free. The reason is not stated, but most likely the dire circumstances of the Babylonian siege lay behind the ceremony. Some scholars have speculated that with the scarcity of food, the manumission of the slaves meant that the owners were no longer obligated to feed them. It is also possible that freed slaves were more likely to defend their freedom in the struggle with Babylon. In any case, after the release of the slaves circumstances apparently improved enough so that the solemn oath of the covenant was broken and the slaves were taken back by their owners. Apparently there was a temporary lifting of the siege (cf. 37:7–8). This is the best interpretation of the comment in 34:21–22 that the Lord will "bring ... back" the Babylonian army that "has withdrawn."

No context or background is given for the first acquisitions of the slaves, but their enslavement is primarily debt related. Debts and warfare were the two most common reasons for someone to become a slave in antiquity. In a caustic response to the events, God (through Jeremiah) alludes to the debt-slavery laws of Deuteronomy 15² and perhaps also to the custom of a royal proclamation of "freedom" (deror) from indebtedness.³ In the indictment for breaking their word and reenslaving the slaves, the people are also accused of breaking the covenant God made with them when he brought them out of Egypt. Verse 14 includes the just treatment of slaves (and thus the allusion to Deut. 15) as part of the covenant obligations assumed by Israel. The verse also states categorically that Israel has not met that obligation adequately.

Scholars debate whether the covenant release of Jeremiah 34:8–22 was part of the sabbatical (i.e., seven-year) cycle of debt forgiveness mandated by Deuteronomy 15 or part of a special freedom proclamation initiated by King Zedekiah (on analogy with Assyrian and Babylonian rulers) as a response to the crisis of the siege. One cannot be dogmatic in these matters, but perhaps the role of Zedekiah in making the covenant with the people tips the balance toward a special royal proclamation rather than the regular sabbatical release. In either case, the covenant ceremony is carried out at the temple (v. 15). This is a solemn context in which to make an oath or ratify a promise, since it brings the presence of the Lord to the process.

The allusion to Deuteronomy 15 in Jeremiah 34:14–15 is also important to understanding God's anger over the injustice done to the slaves, since the pentateuchal legislation links the obligation of justice toward slaves with the content of the covenant stipulations given to their ancestors. Jeremiah underscores this same dynamic. The ancestors of the Judeans were slaves in Egypt, and God brought them out of the house of slavery. God has not gone back on his good word and work, so neither should the slave owners in Judah.

The indictment of the people contains a play on the word $d^e ror$ (34:8, 15, 17). If the people can "proclaim freedom" for the slaves, only to take them back when it is convenient, then God will "proclaim freedom" for Judah and Jerusalem. Readers will detect the sarcasm in this proclamation easily enough. God's freedom proclamation to Judah and Jerusalem is "freedom" to fall to Babylon. In this announcement of judgment, the punishment to come fits the crime. There is a link between crime and punishment.

Verses 18–19 refer to the owners and officials who pass between the parts of the calf; this probably indicates a self-imprecation and promissory oath as part of the solemn covenant ceremony. The best parallel to the report comes in Genesis 15:7–21, where Abram prepares for a sacrificial ceremony by slaying the proper animals and dividing their carcasses. In such ceremonies, those who walked between the parts of the slain animals enacted symbolically their passing through death and dismemberment as a pledge to keep their word. "Passing through the pieces" thus became a symbolic act to bind the word of promise as an imprecatory oath. Since the Judeans passed between the parts of the calf when making an oath to free the slaves but subsequently did not keep their word, they themselves will be like the sacrificial animals.

Crisis Morality. Jeremiah 34, with all its specificity regarding time and circumstances, raises the issue of crisis conversions or what some people call "deathbed confessions." Desperate circumstances can lead to desperate measures. As noted, the emancipation of the slaves during Zedekiah's reign was apparently prompted by the harsh circumstances of the Babylonian siege. Apparently the obligations the owners had to their slaves were not carried out fairly in the past (34:13–15), so why enact a covenant ceremony now? It is hard to escape the conclusion that the ceremony was one of desperation, carried out because of the grim circumstances of the city. Was this inherently wrong? Nothing in the text indicates that the ceremony itself was wrong; if anything, the text implies that the emancipation was long overdue (cf. 34:15). The point seems to be that there really was no conversion, only desperation.

The covenant God granted Israel at Mount Sinai obligated the people to certain norms of behavior toward God and one another. Obedience, however, was not only an act but also a matter of the heart (and soul). Neither an individual nor a group honors God solely with outward obedience, although obedience is a key indicator of a person or group's true allegiance. For Judah in Zedekiah's day, it was not a case of learning something new about God's covenant stipulations but of carrying them out as a means to honor God. The people made a solemn promise before God to treat their slaves fairly and to grant them freedom. This is a dynamic that crosses time and culture regardless of the particular issue under consideration. God is served and honored when his claim on his people is demonstrated through their obedience to his revealed will.

Slavery. Slavery was an accepted institution in ancient Israel. Most slaves in the ancient Near East became such through indebtedness or capture in war (not kidnapping, as was the case for Africans brought to the United States). The stipulations about slavery in the Old Testament are mostly about ways to ameliorate the conditions of servitude and/or ways to treat slaves (servants) humanely. It should be noted that God is on the side of the slaves, not on the side of the crass owners. Of course, the indebtedness incurred by slaves had to be dealt with fairly, but the indebted persons themselves were expected to receive just treatment.

Contemporary Significance

PROMISE KEEPERS, THEN and now. On October 4, 1997, close to a million men gathered in Washington, D.C., to proclaim themselves Promise Keepers for the Lord. Bill McCartney, formerly a college football coach at the University of Colorado, began a ministry seven years previously for men, which grew in a few years to become a large and influential ministry. The premise of the evangelical organization known as The Promise Keepers is that men should ground their Christian faith in their responsibilities to love their wives and children. McCartney has also made a strong push to overcome the effects of racism in Christian organizations by reaching out to men of different color and ethnic origins. Moreover, in this movement there is a strong emphasis on repentance from past failures to live up to God's standards and to trust in Jesus Christ to change a man's life.

It is an amazing commentary on modern life when public interest groups question both the motives and the values of the Promise Keepers. Particularly strident have been the comments from the National Organization of Women. Its president stated on national television that the goals of Promise Keepers were detrimental to the freedom and health of women and that the movement was a servant to "right-wing causes." How odd! The stated purpose of Promise Keepers is to call men to be obedient to the claims of the gospel and to take godly responsibility for their lives and those of their families. These principles are not new; they are basic evangelical tenets and classical Christian teaching.

In a perceptive comment published in national newspapers, Martin Marty (professor of church history at the University of Chicago) said that perhaps the Promise Keepers were simply who they said they were: men seeking to be faithful to the gospel by keeping promises made before God to be responsible in their spheres of influence (family, work, society). Such men are not antiwomen, right-wing zealots, or puppets for sinister causes; after all, the core tenets of the movement are conservative in nature. Marty's point is an important one in a time when all commitments and allegiances seem only temporary or to have strings attached. One need not agree with all the theological underpinnings of the Promise Keepers movement to see the value of keeping commitments made before God.

Such debate illustrates the cost of discipleship for Christians as well as the nature of social commitments in a highly individualistic culture. Obedience to God will look strange in a world dedicated to individual freedom and moral relativism. In such a world people will look for their advantage and see a plot wherever people are living in a community of faith and acting out of moral conviction.

But a community of faithful obedience is what God has called his people to be. It is always easier to undergo a public ritual of moral and spiritual obligation (like a covenant before God to release slaves in Jeremiah's day or the signing of a statement of Christian outrage over the abuse of children) than it is to keep a promise made before God and to carry through one's obligation. But God has called his people to be people of their (and his) word. Repentance and embracing the gospel are not negative acts but positive, joyful responses to a higher calling. God is the ultimate Promise Keeper. God's people are called to honor him by keeping their commitments made in his name.

One wonders what later historians will say of the tumultuous social changes that have swept through much of the Western world (and affected other parts of the globe as well) in the last half of the twentieth century. Surely the accelerated pace of change itself will be seen as one of the remarkable characteristics of the period. Perhaps future generations will be making the necessary adaptations to cope with the pace of societal changes. Change seems to dictate for many people that they keep their options open, that they try to remain flexible, and that they make no commitments unless an easy point of extrication is identified. Perhaps the Christians of the future will have the courage of conviction to point out that promises, divine and human, are the rock on which all relationships stand.

THIS IS THE word that came to Jeremiah from the LORD during the reign of Jehoiakim son of Josiah king of Judah: ²"Go to the Recabite family and invite them to come to one of the side rooms of the house of the LORD and give them wine to drink."

³So I went to get Jaazaniah son of Jeremiah, the son of Habazziniah, and his brothers and all his sons—the whole family of the Recabites. ⁴I brought them into the house of the LORD, into the room of the sons of Hanan son of Igdaliah the man of God. It was next to the room of the officials, which was over that of Maaseiah son of Shallum the doorkeeper. ⁵Then I set bowls full of wine and some cups before the men of the Recabite family and said to them, "Drink some wine."

⁶But they replied, "We do not drink wine, because our forefather Jonadab son of Recab gave us this command: 'Neither you nor your descendants must ever drink wine. ⁷Also you must never build houses, sow seed or plant vineyards; you must never have any of these things, but must always live in tents. Then you will live a long time in the land where you are nomads.' 8We have obeyed everything our forefather Jonadab son of Recab commanded us. Neither we nor our wives nor our sons and daughters have ever drunk wine ⁹or built houses to live in or had vineyards, fields or crops. ¹⁰We have lived in tents and have fully obeyed everything our forefather Jonadab commanded us. ¹¹But when Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon invaded this land, we said, 'Come, we must go to Jerusalem to escape the Babylonian and Aramean armies.' So we have remained in Jerusalem."

¹²Then the word of the LORD came to Jeremiah, saying: ¹³"This is what the LORD Almighty, the God of Israel, says: Go and tell the men of Judah and the people of Jerusalem, 'Will you not learn a lesson and obey my words?' declares the LORD. 14'Jonadab son of Recab ordered his sons not to drink wine and this command has been kept. To this day they do not drink wine, because they obey their forefather's command. But I have spoken to you again and again, yet you have not obeyed me. ¹⁵Again and again I sent all my servants the prophets to you. They said, "Each of you must turn from your wicked ways and reform your actions; do not follow other gods to serve them. Then you will live in the land I have given to you and your fathers." But you have not paid attention or listened to me. ¹⁶The descendants of Jonadab son of Recab have carried out the command their forefather gave them, but these people have not obeyed me.'

17"Therefore, this is what the LORD God Almighty, the God of Israel, says: 'Listen! I am going to bring on Judah and on everyone living in Jerusalem every disaster I pronounced against them. I spoke to them, but they did not listen; I called to them, but they did not answer.'"

¹⁸Then Jeremiah said to the family of the Recabites, "This is what the LORD Almighty, the God of Israel, says: 'You have obeyed the command of your forefather Jonadab and have followed all his instructions and have done everything he ordered.' ¹⁹Therefore, this is what the LORD Almighty, the God of Israel, says: 'Jonadab son of Recab will never fail to have a man to serve me.'"

CHAPTER 35 IS set in the reign of King Jehoiakim (609–598 B.C), a period earlier than the events described in the previous chapter. Nevertheless, the two chapters have a common theme (the significance of obedience to one's word) and a common setting (Jerusalem and pressure from outside forces).

This chapter has two major parts. In verses 1–11 God commands Jeremiah to go to the Recabites and to bring them to the temple complex. He commands them to drink wine, and they protest. In verses 12–19 God commands Jeremiah to speak hard words to Judah and Jerusalem, based on the prophet's interaction with the Recabites. The prophet contrasts Recabite obedience to communal standards with the faithlessness of Judah and Jerusalem.

35:1–11. Uncertainty remains over how best to describe the Recabites.¹ Some scholars have seen them as an anti-Canaanite faction and also as conservative representatives of a "nomadic ideal" from Israel's past. This is due mainly to their rejection of wine, agriculture, and houses (cf. 35:6–10), plus the account in 2 Kings 10 that links Jonadab, the founder of the Recabites, with Jehu's revolt against the Omrides. Others have seen them more as an alternative community or commercial guild associated with the design and building of chariots. The Hebrew term rkb means "(to) ride," and the noun merkaba refers to a chariot. Since the Kenites (to whom the Recabites are related; 1 Chron. 2:55) may have been smiths, the combination of name and possible vocation suggests the possibility that the Recabites were itinerant metalworkers.

Verse 3 raises an interesting question with respect to the formation of the Recabite community. Jeremiah reports that he went to Jaazaniah, the head of the community, to offer them the opportunity to drink wine. That community is comprised of Jaazaniah's brothers and sons, "the whole family of the Recabites." One cannot tell from this description whether the community is literally comprised of Jaazaniah's biological extended family or whether the kinship terminology of brothers and sons serves to identify a close-knit community. Jonadab, the founder of the Recabites, is described as the group's "forefather" in verse 8. Literally, the term can be translated as "father" ('ab in Heb.).

Whatever the origin of the Recabites, their constancy regarding their community's values becomes a prophetically appropriated sign against the lack of integrity in Judah and Jerusalem. According to their self-designation, Recabites do not live in houses, plant crops, or drink wine. Instead, they live in tents (and apparently trade goods for grain and other agricultural products). Their presence in Jerusalem is the result of pressure put on the Judean countryside by the Babylonian army and their Aramean companions (v. 11). Jerusalem is a place of refuge for them because of its stout walls. This indicates that otherwise the Recabites would normally have lived in tents outside the city in obedience to the command of their founder, Jonadab.

The prophetic symbolism of the account is accentuated by the scene of wine cups set before the Recabites in the chambers of Hanan's sons (v. 4; their family was founded by Igdaliah, "a man of God" = prophet). Their reply—that they do not drink wine—is narrated for the effect such a scene will have on the larger community of Judah and Jerusalem.

35:12–19. God instructs Jeremiah to report the encounter with the Recabites to the people of Judah and Jerusalem. The fact that Jeremiah has invited the Recabites to meet him at a room near the temple (v. 4) ensures that they are observed by other members of the community. The incident contrasts Recabite obedience to their community standards with the faithlessness of Judeans to theirs. It is part of a history of disobedience, for Judah has consistently disobeyed the word of God's servants, the prophets (v. 15). The prophetic communication, therefore, concludes that a call to repentance is neither timely nor warranted. God spoke (in the past), but Judah did not listen; he called, but they did not answer.

The final word of the chapter is addressed to the Recabites. They are promised that they will always have someone to "stand before" the Lord; that is, they will never be forgotten by God, and their place with him is secure.⁴

THE LESSON OF THE RECABITES. Surprisingly, nothing directly is said about the piety of the Recabites, although one can safely assume that they believe in the Lord, the God of Israel. The main issue, rather, is obedience to a lifestyle to which the Recabite community has committed itself. That the Recabites pursue their lifestyle as part of their piety is clear by the chapter's conclusion, but the emphasis is on their constancy and commitment to the integrity of their community. The particulars of their vows are not universally applicable in Jeremiah's day any more than they would be in modern times. Houses, for example, are neither good nor bad in themselves; but the manner in which houses are used is a moral and spiritual matter. The same can be said of wine, vineyards, and fields. Jeremiah was not a Recabite. Moreover, he owned property, probably lived in a house, and probably drank wine. He affirms the Recabite lifestyle without himself being bound by its requirements.

The Recabites, therefore, pursue their communal ideals within a society that has not adopted all of their ways. Some of their activities may have been related to the particulars of their vocation. If, for example, they itinerated as smiths, their avoidance of houses (or house ownership) is understandable. They may also have carried out certain responsibilities as part of a vow of dedication to the Lord, and their service may have related them to prophets or priests in ways not preserved for later readers. They may have functioned like Nazirites, who took certain vows of abstinence as part of a community ideal.

Nevertheless, their value as an example for Judah may be like that of the "unjust steward" in Jesus' parable (Luke 16:1–13), who is praised for his industry and shrewdness (16:8), even if the particulars of his actions are not to be emulated. Obedience to the community's standards, even if the broader populace is indifferent or hostile, is the key characteristic of the Recabites. This kind of commitment can be understood by an individual or a church in a variety of settings.

Contemporary Significance

CHRIST AND CULTURE. Just after World War II, H. Richard Niebuhr published a series of essays on the subject of Christian faith as it is defined and exercised in a cultural context.⁵ It has become something of a classic in Western Christianity because it takes up an issue central to Christian faith: How does the church offer its witness within its cultural context? In the volume Niebuhr takes up five different models of the relationship between Christian faith and its cultural context: Christ against culture, Christ of culture, Christ above culture, Christ and culture in paradox, and Christ the transformer of culture. Since the shape of corporate human existence varies so dramatically, the response of Christian faith to and within any particular culture may also vary. The relationship, however, between faith and culture is symbiotic. There is no cultureless Christianity any more than there is cultureless human existence. In any given context, the issue turns on the exercise of faithful living on the part of the believing community.

In recent years, especially in the evangelical communities of North America, one hears the expression "culture wars" being used to describe the polarizing debates in Western society about morality and education. Since Christians have convictions about morality and education that can run counter to the relativistic pluralism endemic to Western culture, the issue of Christian witness in society is a "hot topic."

Several things can be said about the nature of faithful witness on the basis of Jeremiah 35 (and the book of Jeremiah as a whole). (1) Faith in God is expressed by living in community with other believers. The community of faith (i.e., the church) helps give shape not only to what one believes but how one lives responsibly as a result of faith. (2) God has called people to lead public lives of obedience to his revealed will. Obedience is not just pleasing to God; it can be an effective witness to the larger culture in which believers find themselves. (3) The exercise of the Christian faith may entail giving up certain practices common to a culture for the sake of the gospel.

To separate or not to separate. Separation from society is not by definition a good thing or a bad thing for Christians; like so many other things, the value of separation depends on the motives and circumstances of the community that separates itself. In Roman Catholicism and the Eastern Orthodox churches, orders and monasteries give expression to the devotion of prayer, holiness, seclusion, and service to God. Protestants of various persuasions have not often followed this model, preferring instead to engage society more directly with the claims of the gospel. Perhaps a Protestant or free-church analogy to the Recabites would be the Amish—Mennonite pacifists who live in communities that forego certain characteristics of modern life in order to serve God more faithfully.

A visit to a monastery, however, often reminds Christians (whether Catholic or not) how influenced they are by the society and culture in which they live. The Amish (Pennsylvania Dutch as some have called them) are heirs of the radical Reformation movements in Europe of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. In the radically pluralistic North American culture, these Christian pacifists have refused to participate in segments of the larger institutional life of the United States because those elements divert them from pursuing their path of discipleship and communal life. Instead, they practice a form of corporate discipline and separateness that reflects well on their commitments.

The shape of the monastic life, the discipline of an order dedicated to the service of God, or the influence of alternative Christian communities can serve as effective witnesses to the power of God in directing his people to fulfill their calling as disciples. In any case, it is a great question to ask: Just what are the marks of the church that announce its commitments within the broader culture in which it takes root?

In 1993 the horror of the Branch Davidian separatists was revealed to the world. A self-appointed leader, David Koresh, named a farmstead near Waco, Texas, as Ranch Apocalypse. His followers separated themselves from the evils of society to follow him. The community had discipline, strict rules about behavior, and time set aside for worship and teaching from the Bible. Many of the community's members simply wanted to live in a Christian community untainted by the world and uncompromising in its commitments to uphold the word of God.

So what went so tragically wrong? The people were misled by Koresh, who saw himself as a messiah⁶ and whose authority was used to twist biblical teaching and to engage in sexual relations with many of the women in the community. Instead of a holy love, he used fear to motivate his flock. Instead of pointing to Christ as the cornerstone of faith, he pointed to himself as the interpreter of God's will. In April 1993, the community was largely consumed by fire that broke out when the FBI bungled a raid on the Ranch headquarters.

The Branch Davidians (and other groups could be named) are testimony that a strong, religiously based community is not infallible. Neither the Recabites of old nor more modern counterparts reflect perfection. One can cite examples of both healthy and sick communities that seek to bind themselves to a religious ideal. Obedience to fundamental values is in and of itself instructive. But how much more pleasing to God is joyful obedience to the kingdom values revealed in his Son!

The Recabites lived according to the standards of their founder. They did so as faithfully as they could, depending on the circumstances of the society in which they lived. It seems too simple to say, but the church is called to the same task. Jesus Christ, the risen Lord, is the foundation of the community of faith we call the church. The life of the church provides a witness to the larger society, whether it withdraws in protest or actively engages its cultural context. The promise of the risen Lord is even grander than that of God to the Recabites, for the gates of hell will not prevail against the community that confesses Christ.

IN THE FOURTH year of Jehoiakim son of Josiah king of Judah, this word came to Jeremiah from the LORD: ²"Take a scroll and write on it all the words I have spoken to you concerning Israel, Judah and all the other nations from the time I began speaking to you in the reign of Josiah till now. ³Perhaps when the people of Judah hear about every disaster I plan to inflict on them, each of them will turn from his wicked way; then I will forgive their wickedness and their sin."

⁴So Jeremiah called Baruch son of Neriah, and while Jeremiah dictated all the words the LORD had spoken to him, Baruch wrote them on the scroll. ⁵Then Jeremiah told Baruch, "I am restricted; I cannot go to the LORD's temple. ⁶So you go to the house of the LORD on a day of fasting and read to the people from the scroll the words of the LORD that you wrote as I dictated. Read them to all the people of Judah who come in from their towns. ⁷Perhaps they will bring their petition before the LORD, and each will turn from his wicked ways, for the anger and wrath pronounced against this people by the LORD are great."

⁸Baruch son of Neriah did everything Jeremiah the prophet told him to do; at the LORD's temple he read the words of the LORD from the scroll. ⁹In the ninth month of the fifth year of Jehoiakim son of Josiah king of Judah, a time of fasting before the LORD was proclaimed for all the people in Jerusalem and those who had come from the towns of Judah. ¹⁰From the room of Gemariah son of Shaphan the secretary, which was in the upper courtyard at the entrance of the New Gate of the temple, Baruch read to all the people at the LORD's temple the words of Jeremiah from the scroll.

Shaphan, heard all the words of the LORD from the scroll, ¹²he went down to the secretary's room in the royal palace, where all the officials were sitting: Elishama the secretary, Delaiah son of Shemaiah, Elnathan son of Acbor, Gemariah son of Shaphan, Zedekiah son of Hananiah, and all the other officials. ¹³After Micaiah told them everything he had heard Baruch read to the people from the scroll, ¹⁴all the officials sent Jehudi son of Nethaniah, the son of Shelemiah, the son of Cushi, to say to Baruch, "Bring the scroll from which you have read to the people and come." So Baruch son of Neriah went to them with the scroll in his hand. ¹⁵They said to him, "Sit down, please, and read it to us."

So Baruch read it to them. ¹⁶When they heard all these words, they looked at each other in fear and said to Baruch, "We must report all these words to the king." ¹⁷Then they asked Baruch, "Tell us, how did you come to write all this? Did Jeremiah dictate it?"

¹⁹Then the officials said to Baruch, "You and Jeremiah, go and hide. Don't let anyone know where you are."

²⁰After they put the scroll in the room of Elishama the secretary, they went to the king in the courtyard and reported everything to him. ²¹The king sent Jehudi to get the scroll, and Jehudi brought it from the room of Elishama the secretary and read it to the king and all the officials standing beside him. ²²It was the ninth month and the king was sitting in the winter apartment, with a fire burning in the firepot in front of him. ²³Whenever Jehudi had read three or four columns of the scroll, the king cut them off with a scribe's knife and threw them into the firepot, until the entire scroll was burned in the fire. ²⁴The king and all his attendants who heard all these words showed no fear, nor did they tear their clothes. ²⁵Even though Elnathan, Delaiah and Gemariah urged the king not to burn the scroll, he would not listen to them. ²⁶Instead, the king commanded Jerahmeel, a son of the king, Seraiah son of Azriel and Shelemiah son of Abdeel to arrest Baruch the scribe and Jeremiah the prophet. But the LORD had hidden them.

²⁷After the king burned the scroll containing the words that Baruch had written at Jeremiah's dictation, the word of the LORD came to Jeremiah: ²⁸"Take another scroll and write on it all the words that were on the first scroll, which Jehoiakim king of Judah burned up. ²⁹Also tell Jehoiakim king of Judah, 'This is what the LORD says: You burned that scroll and said, "Why did you write on it that the king of Babylon would certainly come and destroy this land and cut off both men and animals from it?" ³⁰Therefore, this is what the LORD says about Jehoiakim king of Judah: He will have no one to sit on the throne of David; his body will be thrown out and exposed to the heat by day and the frost by night. ³¹I will punish him and his children and his attendants for their wickedness; I will bring on them and those living in Jerusalem and the people of Judah every disaster I pronounced against them, because they have not listened.""

³²So Jeremiah took another scroll and gave it to the scribe Baruch son of Neriah, and as Jeremiah dictated, Baruch wrote on it all the words of the scroll that Jehoiakim king of Judah had burned in the fire. And many similar words were added to them.

Original Meaning

THIS CHAPTER CONTAINS yet another account of Jehoiakim's failure. Two precise dates are given (36:1, 9), which span about a year in Jeremiah's personal history and which also place the events in the context of a broader history of the Babylonian threat to Judah. Several officials in Jerusalem are named (36:10–12, 26), thereby giving a context to the account for later Judean readers. The conclusion to the account, however, points beyond the circumstances of Jeremiah and Baruch, his scribal companion; the callous response of King Jehoiakim to the words of Jeremiah indicate Judah's disobedience (rejection) of God's message to the nation.

36:1–7. Jehoiakim's fourth year (36:1) is 605 B.C.² In that year Nabopolassar, the ruler of Babylon, died; his young son, Nebuchadnezzar, ascended the Babylonian throne, and his forces defeated the Egyptians in battle at Carchemish. Since Jehoiakim had been placed on the throne in Judah by the Egyptians (2 Kings 23:34–37), this defeat was potentially an ominous sign for him and the Judean leadership. Jeremiah 25:1 bears the same date as the heading to a chapter of judgmental sayings against Jerusalem and Judah.

Just why Jeremiah had been banned from preaching in the temple is a mystery (36:5). Since his words were often judgmental and divisive, a restriction on his preaching in the temple precincts could have come at almost any time in the reign of Jehoiakim. Possibly the temple sermon Jeremiah delivered at the beginning of Jehoiakim's reign (26:1; cf. ch. 7) led to his restriction from delivering oracles at that site. It should be recalled that Jeremiah narrowly escaped a lynch mob at that time. Ahikam, the son of Shaphan, stood on the prophet's side in that setting (26:24). In the narrative of chapter 36, other descendants of Shaphan are instrumental in Baruch's delivery of Jeremiah's words (36:10–12; cf. 29:3). The influential family of Shaphan appears sympathetic to Jeremiah, and its members may be part of the largely anonymous group who have preserved the words of the prophet.

Baruch is a scribe (36:26); that is, his profession is in recording and interpreting documents.³ In a way he is a disciple of Jeremiah. Since Jeremiah is restricted from preaching in the temple precincts, Baruch is commissioned with delivering the prophet's message in the temple. This comes, however, after Baruch has copied Jeremiah's oracles onto a scroll. He knows the material intimately and is able to represent the prophet in his absence.

Here readers encounter another theme of the chapter. The written scroll of Jeremiah's prophecies is an adequate substitute for the living voice of the prophet. Baruch's brother Seraiah also assisted Jeremiah in delivering prophecy to Babylon (51:59–64). Probably scribal activity was a family profession; both the father and grandfather of Baruch and Seraiah are named (51:59), as if the family and its work were well known in Judah.

Jeremiah hopes that the hard words he wants delivered to the people will be a catalyst for repentance and change (36:7). Ominously, the possibility of repentance is not mentioned in the summary statements of 36:27–31. One function of the narrative in chapter 36 is to confirm the obduracy of Judean leadership and even the collective will of the people.

36:8–19. In the ninth month of Jehoiakim's fifth year (i.e., December 604 B.C.), a solemn fast is declared, and many people in Judah stream to the temple to pray (v. 9).⁴ This is a year or so later than the chronological notice in 36:1. The solemn fast becomes the occasion for Baruch to deliver the prophetic message of Jeremiah. At this time Nebuchadnezzar's army was on the Palestinian coast, and the Philistine city of Ashkelon was sacked by the Babylonians. The text does not say why the fast is called, so the link with the ominous arrival of the Babylonians is speculative, but some perceived threat prompts this assembly. Another possibility is the effects of a prolonged drought.⁵

A close reading of the text shows that the words of the scroll delivered orally by Baruch are accorded the same prophetic authority as that of Jeremiah. Baruch is asked in an initial interrogation whether these are the words from the mouth of Jeremiah; he replies that they are (36:17–18). Pointedly, the narrator (Baruch?) gives no account of the people's reaction to Baruch's oral recital in verse 10. He seems to assume that the words are familiar and that the people have not responded as hoped, although the words of the scroll aimed for repentance (36:3). The only one described as hearing anything at the temple is Micaiah the son of Gemariah, the son of Shaphan, who "heard all the words of the LORD from the scroll" (36:11, italics added). This detail is not coincidental. The chain of authority runs backward from Baruch to Jeremiah to the Lord. The prophetic word rejected by the people is ultimately that of the Lord.

It is unlikely that the officials named in Jer. 36:10–14 are simply listed for verisimilitude. On the one hand, they represent Judean leadership. On the other, some of them represent people sympathetic to Jeremiah. Gemariah has taken a big risk in allowing Baruch to use his office as the location for preaching to the crowds in the temple courtyard (v. 10). This suggests that he, like his sibling Ahikam (26:24), has heard something authentic in Jeremiah's preaching. His risk is consistent with what is known elsewhere about his family. His father and brother were cabinet-level officials under Josiah, and they were involved in the discovery of the book of the law and its promulgation (2 Kings 22).

After hearing for themselves the contents of the prophetic scroll, the officials request that Baruch and Jeremiah go into hiding. In taking that advice, Baruch and Jeremiah may have preserved their lives until the turmoil around the oracles dies down a bit (see below).

36:20–26. The callous rejection of Jeremiah's words by Jehoiakim is described in a manner intended to remind readers of his father Josiah and to contrast father and son. When Josiah heard the words of the book of the Torah, a book discovered during temple repairs, he tore (Heb. qr) his garments as a sign that he recognized the authority of the prophetic scroll to judge him and his nation (2 Kings 22). In contemptuous fashion, Jehoiakim cuts (Heb. qr) the scroll in pieces and does not rend his garments (Jer. 36:23–24).

The use of a knife to cut the scroll probably indicates a scroll that contained more than one piece of tanned animal skin. Typically sections of tanned animal skins (probably that of a lamb) were sewn together to make a continuous roll for written contents. The easiest way for Jehoiakim (or anyone else) to cut a scroll would be to slice along the join of two sections where thread held them together. If this is correct, this also indicates that Baruch has copied a number of different oracles for presentation to the temple crowds.

36:27–32. Jehoiakim and Judah's fate is sealed by their indifference and even hostility to the prophetic word. According to 26:20–23, Jehoiakim became upset with the preaching activity of Uriah and sent a delegation to Egypt to arrest him. Subsequently, Uriah was executed for his prophetic activity. Baruch's reading of Jeremiah's scroll is the second recorded time that the prophet's words have been given at the temple and incite consternation; the delegation to arrest Baruch and Jeremiah may not itself have been empowered to execute the two men, but had they been found, execution may have been the conclusion to their arrest. The narrator notes, almost in passing, that the Lord had hidden them.

One supposes that the Lord's command to compile another scroll comes while Jeremiah and Baruch are hiding from the royal officials searching for them. Along with the command comes a revelation to Jeremiah that judgment will come particularly on Jehoiakim and that it will be extended broadly to Judah and Jerusalem. No mention is made of any hope that they will repent.

The second scroll is longer than the first. Its contents are not otherwise revealed except to say that the additions are similar to what was included in the first scroll.

FUNCTIONS OF JUDGMENT PROPHECY. A primary claim of the chapter is that judgment is coming on Jerusalem and Judah for their failure to heed the word of the Lord. Since this is a common claim in Jeremiah, one must look more closely at the particulars of chapter 36. Initially, the word from God to Jeremiah contains a hope that the people will repent. As the narrative progresses, it becomes evident that no repentance is forthcoming. Thus, two of the functions of judgmental prophecy are set forth: It is usually designed to evoke change among God's people, and when change is not forthcoming, the prophecy indicates the consequences of disobedience.

Authority of a prophetic word. This account also emphasizes the authority of a prophetic word even when the prophet himself or herself is absent. As with the discovered scroll in 2 Kings 22, the king and people are called to hear a timely word from the Lord whether the human "author" is present or absent. This emphasis has probably shaped this account as it was intended for early readers (who did not know Jeremiah), but who were asked to affirm that God had spoken through him. The issue, therefore, is not access to an inspired personality (whether prophet or apostle), but recognition that God stands behind his word given to a human vessel.

Hearing the word. Jeremiah 36 also gives a somber and ironic account of worship at the temple. People have come there to fast and pray, apparently out of fear for the future direction of the nation. A solemn fast, almost by definition, includes calls for repentance. Indeed, the very word they need to hear is provided for them, but they lack the corporate will and spiritual discernment to hear it. What an illustration of Jesus' trademark saying: "Whoever has ears to hear ..." (cf. Matt. 11:15; 13:13; John 5:24; 12:47; Rev. 3:20). In the disappointment over the word's reception, it is a blessing to note that some did hear. Micaiah "heard"; Baruch "heard."

One way of hearing Jeremiah 36 is to see its function like that of Acts 6:7–7:60. Stephen offers a witness to the people that is rebuffed. He suffers the ultimate rejection in that he is martyred for his prophetic stance. His word confirms the spiritual blindness of those who reject him. Eventually, however, his witness is confirmed in the life of one of those who persecuted him, namely, Saul of Tarsus (the apostle Paul). This is an important lesson for readers in any age: One cannot know the impact that his or her work will have, even if the initial reaction to it is negative. God may use that work in ways a disciple will never know.

Leadership. Leadership of the people is crucial for its life. Jehoiakim represents the kind of callous, amoral, arrogant, and spiritually dull leadership that is a disaster for God's people. The failure of its leadership is often a significant contribution to a systemic failure of the people. The narrator contrasts Jehoiakim with his father Josiah. Thanks be to God that there were other people of the time who had the courage to protect Jeremiah and Baruch and to follow the words that the Lord had given them.

WORSHIP. In an oral interview some years ago Mother Teresa was asked about her "success." One wonders if "success" is the right word to use, though it is a term common to the news profession. Mother Teresa replied that she spent an hour a day in prayer and didn't "do anything that she knew was wrong." Her answer was deceptively simple. Worship is intended as an encounter with God and to bring a person/group into closer relationship with God. One result of worship should be greater knowledge of God's will and motivation to do that will. Human nature being what it is (sinful), however, a person cannot simply will to do what is right or know infallibly what is right. It takes God at work in the lives of individuals and churches in order to bring them into more conformity with his will and purpose. Prayer that seeks God's will must also earnestly seek the strength of the Spirit to discern that will and empower seekers to carry it out.

In Christian terms the worship of God should lead to sanctification and holiness; to put it succinctly, the purpose of the Christian life is to become conformed to the image of God's Son, Jesus Christ (Rom. 8:28–30; Eph. 4:13–16). There is (or should be) a symbiosis between God, the one to whom worship and service are directed, and his people, who offer to him their worship and service. God gives more than guidance and comfort; through Jesus Christ and his Holy Spirit, God has given us a share in his divine life. Repentance is a biblical word that entails turning from a sinful orientation or activity and embracing God and doing his will.

The paradox of Jeremiah 36 is a people at worship who do not hear and who, therefore, do not respond to the word of instruction and change that God provides them. There is no repentance because there is no recognition that God has addressed them through the words of the prophetic scroll. The issue for Judah of old apparently was not their presence in worship—one gains the impression that many were there in the time of crisis. Rather, it was Judah's inability to see their failure before God and to seek fervently his assistance in changing their actions. A similar dilemma may take various shapes in individual lives and in portions of Christ's church. Attendance at worship is hardly even an acknowledgment that God exists or that his Word is reliable unless those who worship seek to glorify God through word and deed.

Obedience. A learned discussion about modern theology once concluded with a respondent's statement that "much about God is a mystery." Undoubtedly that is true. But the response of yet another partner in the discussion caught the predominant tone of the biblical witness in saying: "It is not what I don't know about God that troubles me; it is what I do know that impels me to action." There is no excuse for individuals or churches being unresponsive to God's call to discipleship. God has declared his will and purpose sufficiently through his Word. His instruction can only be grasped through faith. Success is not the goal of the devout life; obedience is.

The account of the prophetic scroll in Jeremiah 36 illustrates the old English word "heedless." Neither people nor king were prepared to heed (i.e., hear and obey) the word of the Lord. Thus, at one level the account becomes a testimony to the consequences of heedlessness. But at another level, there were those who did heed the word of the Lord. They preserved the account for posterity, so that God's judging word from the past might be God's correcting and instructive word to future generations. It is the nature of God's Word that it always accomplishes its purpose. This question is valid for all of us today: Who recognizes the judging, correcting, and restorative nature of God's Word?

Introduction to Jeremiah 37–45

CHAPTERS 37–45 FORM a subsection in the book of Jeremiah dealing primarily with the reign of Zedekiah and the fall of Jerusalem. Most of this material concerns the details of the Babylonian siege during the last two years of Zedekiah's reign (588–586 B.C.), his capture and ignominious transport to Babylon (39:4–7), and the tragic aftermath of the city's capture when Gedaliah, the Babylonian-appointed governor, is assassinated and Jeremiah is dragged to Egypt with a pitiful Judean contingent (chs. 40–44). A word of hope granted to Baruch concludes the section (ch. 45), dated to the fourth year of Jehoiakim (i.e., 605/604 B.C.). These narratives, therefore, did not form an original literary unity. They are a collection of accounts that have a thematic coherence to them.

Some scholars have called this narrative section a "passion narrative" because the suffering and oppression of the prophet are central to the accounts.² More important, however, is the fact that there are literary and thematic parallels in these chapters with the accounts of Jesus' suffering. This is the real reason to consider using the expression. "Passion narrative" is accurate enough as a description of Jeremiah's tragic setting, even if some may think that parallels to the passion accounts in the Gospels are overdrawn. The prophet is passionate enough about the fate of the people and tragically drawn into its consequences; nevertheless, it is unlikely that the expression would be used much without the New Testament connections.

It is important to stress that the suffering and oppression that Jeremiah experiences are not atoning or salvific for others. Atonement and salvation are wonderful terms to describe what Christ has accomplished for his people through his suffering. Those terms, however, do not describe what Jeremiah accomplishes (if that is even the right term to use) on behalf of God's people. Jeremiah's "passion narrative" describes the work of a prophet whose sensitivity toward a lost people results in a deep identification with them and their suffering, and also the work of a prophet whose innocent suffering is caught up in the fate of those same people. The Gospels describe a public ministry, and particularly narratives of a last tragic week in Jerusalem, that richly reflects the passion of our Lord, whose suffering is on behalf of his people. Jeremiah's story is simply (and profoundly) a pointer in that direction.

We should also stress that these chapters are not the only accounts of Jeremiah's persecution, either in prose (e.g., 20:1–6) or poetry (e.g., 20:7–12), nor is the prophet the only figure of suffering in the accounts. Baruch, Gedaliah, and Ebed-Melech are caught up in the drama as well.

Fundamentally, Jeremiah's "passion narrative" continues the somber unfolding of self-incurred judgment on Judah and Jerusalem, a story deeply embedded in the minds of those who compiled Jeremiah's poetry. Tragic dissolution is the central theme to the accounts, although they are not without words of hope (e.g., the word to Baruch in ch. 45). A city is largely destroyed, a royal family is decimated by execution, a governor is treacherously murdered, and the prophet and his scribal companion are taken against their will to Egypt. As a story of suffering, there is plenty of illustrative material, and perhaps this is the point on which to start building a satisfactory interpretation.

The fate of the nation is a massive tragedy. The consequences of the Babylonian siege and destruction continue on in vicious cycles after the city has quit smoldering and the Babylonian army has departed. At several levels no one is exempt from the dark influence of the nation's fall. At another level, there are words of promise and protection to Ebed-Melech (39:15–18) and Baruch (45:1–5) that cast God's care in personal terms in spite of the upheaval. Others among the remnant are pointed to a better way (42:7–12), but they choose the wrong path.

These are chapters to ponder and to read together, even if their prehistory suggests diverse origins. If we seek "good news" from them, there will surely be some disappointment with their overwhelmingly negative tone. They take on a different hue, however, when placed in the larger context of Israel's history and the broader biblical witness, but we must be prepared to grapple theologically with the enormity of failure and with massive suffering. Only then will we sense the miracle of Jeremiah's preservation until his forced exile to Egypt; only then will we grasp some sense of the cost of discipleship carried by God's servants (Jeremiah, Gedaliah, Baruch, Ebed-Melech); only then will the gift of grace that comes undeserved be appreciated for what it is.

¹ZEDEKIAH SON OF JOSIAH was made king of Judah by Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon; he reigned in place of Jehoiachin son of Jehoiakim. ²Neither he nor his attendants nor the people of the land paid any attention to the words the LORD had spoken through Jeremiah the prophet.

³King Zedekiah, however, sent Jehucal son of Shelemiah with the priest Zephaniah son of Maaseiah to Jeremiah the prophet with this message: "Please pray to the LORD our God for us."

⁴Now Jeremiah was free to come and go among the people, for he had not yet been put in prison. ⁵Pharaoh's army had marched out of Egypt, and when the Babylonians who were besieging Jerusalem heard the report about them, they withdrew from Jerusalem.

⁶Then the word of the LORD came to Jeremiah the prophet: ⁷"This is what the LORD, the God of Israel, says: Tell the king of Judah, who sent you to inquire of me, 'Pharaoh's army, which has marched out to support you, will go back to its own land, to Egypt. ⁸Then the Babylonians will return and attack this city; they will capture it and burn it down.'

¹¹After the Babylonian army had withdrawn from Jerusalem because of Pharaoh's army, ¹²Jeremiah started to leave the city to go to the territory of Benjamin to get his share of the property among the people there. ¹³But when he reached the Benjamin

Gate, the captain of the guard, whose name was Irijah son of Shelemiah, the son of Hananiah, arrested him and said, "You are deserting to the Babylonians!"

¹⁴"That's not true!" Jeremiah said. "I am not deserting to the Babylonians." But Irijah would not listen to him; instead, he arrested Jeremiah and brought him to the officials. ¹⁵They were angry with Jeremiah and had him beaten and imprisoned in the house of Jonathan the secretary, which they had made into a prison.

¹⁶Jeremiah was put into a vaulted cell in a dungeon, where he remained a long time. ¹⁷Then King Zedekiah sent for him and had him brought to the palace, where he asked him privately, "Is there any word from the LORD?"

"Yes," Jeremiah replied, "you will be handed over to the king of Babylon."

¹⁸Then Jeremiah said to King Zedekiah, "What crime have I committed against you or your officials or this people, that you have put me in prison? ¹⁹Where are your prophets who prophesied to you, 'The king of Babylon will not attack you or this land'? ²⁰But now, my lord the king, please listen. Let me bring my petition before you: Do not send me back to the house of Jonathan the secretary, or I will die there."

²¹King Zedekiah then gave orders for Jeremiah to be placed in the courtyard of the guard and given bread from the street of the bakers each day until all the bread in the city was gone. So Jeremiah remained in the courtyard of the guard.

CHAPTER 37 PROVIDES yet another account (like ch. 36) of royal failure and the continued rejection of the prophetic word. The royal culprit this time is Zedekiah, the last king of Judah, who is the pathetic leader of the doomed city.

37:1–2. According to verse 1, Zedekiah was placed on the throne in Judah by the Babylonians. They had surrounded Jerusalem in the winter months of 598/597 B.C. In March 597 the city surrendered to the Babylonians, and Jehoiachin, who had been king only a few months, was deported to Babylon and Nebuchadnezzar placed Jehoiachin's uncle Zedekiah on the throne. The deporting of Jehoiachin (sometimes called Coniah) and the appointing of Zedekiah as king were parts of a "divide and conquer" strategy on the part of the Babylonians. With two different men in two different communities claiming title to the Judean kingship, there was much occasion for internal tensions among the Judeans of Babylon and Palestine. The Babylonians hoped this would lessen the possibility of rebellion against their policies.

These two verses are actually a summary statement of Zedekiah's eleven years of reign. Details of his kingship and of his relationship with Jeremiah are picked up in verse 3 and continue through the end of chapter 38. The section 37:3–38:28 concern only the period of the Babylonian siege of Jerusalem during the years 588–587/586.

37:3–10. An Egyptian army is moving toward Judah in a manner intended to threaten the Babylonian army. This is probably part of the Pharaoh Hophra's scheme to regain control of affairs in Judah in the spring or summer of 588.³ According to verse 4, Jeremiah was not confined or imprisoned during all of Zedekiah's reign, but the rest of chapter 37 confirms that he was confined in a variety of circumstances.

Verses 6–10 report on a revelation given Jeremiah by the Lord, a message that he is to transmit to Zedekiah: Babylon will succeed in taking the city. Even the language of verse 8 is paralleled almost exactly in 34:22. What is new in the revelation is the prediction that the Egyptian army will not turn the tide of the Babylonian intent to take Judah and Jerusalem.

37:11–15. The appearance of the Egyptian army causes a temporary lifting of the Babylonian siege. Possibly Jeremiah's futile attempt to leave Jerusalem at this time is the prelude to the visit of his cousin during his imprisonment (32:1–14). According to the summary statement in 37:12, Jeremiah wants to go to the Benjamite tribal area in order to get his share of the property there. With the (temporary) lifting of the siege must have come a lot of frenetic activity among the inhabitants of the region. In Jeremiah's case, the guards of the city are suspicious that the prophet wants to leave the city in order to desert to the Babylonians. He is beaten and placed in confinement.

37:16–21. Zedekiah appears to be a classic case of a divided mind under pressure. On the one hand, he desperately seeks guidance for the difficulties of Judah, including his requests that Jeremiah pray to God (37:3) and that Jeremiah mediate God's will to him (37:17; see also ch. 21). On the other hand, the word of the Lord causes him consternation and demands of him what his self-serving and vacillating nature will not allow. Indeed, in his irrational behavior Zedekiah mistreats the very prophet he approaches for help.

Jeremiah is confined to a house belonging to a scribe (37:15) and later to a place associated with a guardhouse (37:21). Neither place appears to be a prison in the modern sense of the word, although Jeremiah's personal circumstances are painful. He is beaten at the scribe's house, and his rations in the guardhouse quarters are minimal. Later still, he will be thrown into a cistern (38:6). In 37:18 Jeremiah inquires of the king in what way he has sinned against the king or the people that he should be treated in this manner. He has consistently preached what God has given him to deliver, and he has responded whenever the king has inquired of him. The implied point is that he has told the truth and that Zedekiah is persecuting him for it.

Bridging Contexts

ZEDEKIAH AND A WORD FROM THE LORD. Zedekiah turns to the appropriate source in seeking answers to his dilemma: He seeks a word from the Lord. He fails, however, to listen to the word God communicates. Appropriately for the national crisis, he advocates prayer (37:3) and seeks a message from the Lord through Jeremiah (37:17). The problem is that God has previously informed Zedekiah that his actions and those of the people are unacceptable, and nothing seems to have changed—nothing from the side of God or that of Zedekiah. God has not changed his mind regarding the assessment of king and people, and Zedekiah seems oblivious to the prophet's message. For his part, Zedekiah seems to have followed a form of the proverbial advice to "shoot the bearer of bad news."

Hindsight is usually better than foresight. The tragedy of this account is that God makes known the near future, and Zedekiah is simply incapable of hearing and responding.

Persecution and the prophets. Persecution comes to prophets. In a variety of ways the book of Jeremiah is one long testimony to the cost of prophetic activity. His imprisonment is one of several in the Bible for prophets; Joseph, Micaiah ben Imlah, John the Baptist, Peter, Paul, and John the seer of the Apocalypse are all companions in faith incarcerated for their role in delivering God's word. Some who represent the message of the Lord suffer the ultimate human judgment of death (e.g., Uriah the son of Shemaiah, 26:20–23). Indeed, as is made clear in Jesus Christ, were God himself to advocate his Word, the reaction does not necessarily differ.

Contemporary Significance

THE PRAYERS OF GOD'S PEOPLE. When is prayer for deliverance not acceptable? The question initially seems out of place since a loving God is typically open to the cries of his people, even if the timing of his response remains mysterious. Jesus taught his disciples to pray that they not be led into temptation but that God will deliver them from evil (Matt. 6:13). But there is a difference between Zedekiah and Moses, and between Jesus' disciples and the Judeans of Jeremiah's day. Disciples of Jesus cannot blatantly disregard his Word and then assume that a prayer for deliverance is efficacious; correspondingly, Zedekiah cannot assume that his rejection of God's Word will somehow induce God to send a different word of instruction.

There are circumstances where prayer is not what God desires. Although this sounds like a radical statement, it is worth some moments of reflection. Prayer is a staple of the Christian life, but it cannot be used as a reason for shirking one's responsibility or as an excuse for not being obedient to divine instruction.

A widely told anecdote concerns a man caught in his house during a period of heavy rains and flooding. As the water began to rise around his house, a neighbor came by to take him to higher ground and safety. The man refused to go, saying that he would wait out the storm and trust the Lord. As the water began to pour into the house, the man moved to the second story of the house. A police officer in a small boat came back and called to the man in the second-story window. The man replied similarly that he would wait out the storm and trust in the Lord. As the water continued to rise, the man climbed to his roof. A helicopter came by, and the man motioned for it to go on. After several frustrating minutes, the helicopter departed.

The man waited to see what would transpire next, and when the water continued to threaten, he began to pray to the Lord. He got an answer: "I sent a neighbor, a police officer, and a helicopter. Why didn't you listen?"

This seemingly trite story illustrates an important scriptural lesson. When God sends his servants to proclaim his message, and the servants and their message are rejected, then what other recourse is open? Unfortunately in many crises, no other avenue is open except that of failure and self-incurred destruction.

Stories of the recalcitrant and the disobedient (e.g., Zedekiah) in Scripture are not told so that a different generation can gleefully note how stupid "they" were. They are recorded so that any generation of God's people who read them can be instructed. After all, somebody among the faithful got it right and preserved the accounts for posterity. The foolish finally point by way of contrast to what is healthy among the people. It is far more instructive to read the accounts sympathetically, giving due attention to the possibility that in one way or the other we have become Zedekiah or Judah in our day.

It is important to remember how easy it is to assault the messenger rather than to listen carefully and to learn humbly from him or her. It is more convenient to reject an "unfriendly" assessment than it is to look in the mirror of God's Word.

Paradoxically, there is also hope in this disquieting account. Even in judging Zedekiah and the people, God is still at work to keep his promises. Zedekiah's family (i.e., that of David) will still be privileged to play a crucial role in God's economy. Moreover, what most Judeans think is an awful tragedy—the fall of the state and the resulting exile—is also the seedbed of new beginnings.

Jeremiah 38:1–28a

¹Shephatiah son of Mattan, Gedaliah son of Pashhur, Jehucal son of Shelemiah, and Pashhur son of Malkijah heard what Jeremiah was telling all the people when he said, ²"This is what the LORD says: 'Whoever stays in this city will die by the sword, famine or plague, but whoever goes over to the Babylonians will live. He will escape with his life; he will live.' ³And this is what the LORD says: 'This city will certainly be handed over to the army of the king of Babylon, who will capture it.'"

⁴Then the officials said to the king, "This man should be put to death. He is discouraging the soldiers who are left in this city, as well as all the people, by the things he is saying to them. This man is not seeking the good of these people but their ruin."

5"He is in your hands," King Zedekiah answered.
"The king can do nothing to oppose you."

⁶So they took Jeremiah and put him into the cistern of Malkijah, the king's son, which was in the courtyard of the guard. They lowered Jeremiah by ropes into the cistern; it had no water in it, only mud, and Jeremiah sank down into the mud.

⁷But Ebed-Melech, a Cushite, an official in the royal palace, heard that they had put Jeremiah into the cistern. While the king was sitting in the Benjamin Gate, ⁸Ebed-Melech went out of the palace and said to him, ⁹"My lord the king, these men have acted wickedly in all they have done to Jeremiah the prophet. They have thrown him into a cistern, where he will starve to death when there is no longer any bread in the city."

¹⁰Then the king commanded Ebed-Melech the Cushite, "Take thirty men from here with you and lift Jeremiah the prophet out of the cistern before he dies."

¹¹So Ebed-Melech took the men with him and went to a room under the treasury in the palace. He took some old rags and worn-out clothes from there and let them down with ropes to Jeremiah in the cistern. ¹²Ebed-Melech the Cushite said to Jeremiah, "Put these old rags and worn-out clothes under your arms to pad the ropes." Jeremiah did so, ¹³and they pulled him up with the ropes and lifted him out of the cistern. And Jeremiah remained in the courtyard of the guard.

¹⁴Then King Zedekiah sent for Jeremiah the prophet and had him brought to the third entrance to the temple of the LORD. "I am going to ask you something," the king said to Jeremiah. "Do not hide anything from me."

¹⁵Jeremiah said to Zedekiah, "If I give you an answer, will you not kill me? Even if I did give you counsel, you would not listen to me."

¹⁶But King Zedekiah swore this oath secretly to Jeremiah: "As surely as the LORD lives, who has given us breath, I will neither kill you nor hand you over to those who are seeking your life."

¹⁷Then Jeremiah said to Zedekiah, "This is what the LORD God Almighty, the God of Israel, says: 'If you surrender to the officers of the king of Babylon, your life will be spared and this city will not be burned down; you and your family will live. ¹⁸But if you will not surrender to the officers of the king of Babylon, this city will be handed over to the Babylonians and they will burn it down; you yourself will not escape from their hands."

¹⁹King Zedekiah said to Jeremiah, "I am afraid of the Jews who have gone over to the Babylonians, for the Babylonians may hand me over to them and they will mistreat me."

²⁰"They will not hand you over," Jeremiah replied. "Obey the LORD by doing what I tell you. Then it will go well with you, and your life will be spared. ²¹But if you refuse to surrender, this is what the LORD has revealed to me: ²²All the women left in the palace of the king of Judah will be brought out to the officials of the king of Babylon. Those women will say to you:

"They misled you and overcame you those trusted friends of yours. Your feet are sunk in the mud; your friends have deserted you.'

²⁴Then Zedekiah said to Jeremiah, "Do not let anyone know about this conversation, or you may die. ²⁵If the officials hear that I talked with you, and they come to you and say, 'Tell us what you said to the king and what the king said to you; do not hide it from us or we will kill you,' ²⁶then tell them, 'I was pleading with the king not to send me back to Jonathan's house to die there.'"

²⁷All the officials did come to Jeremiah and question him, and he told them everything the king had ordered him to say. So they said no more to him, for no one had heard his conversation with the king.

²⁸And Jeremiah remained in the courtyard of the guard until the day Jerusalem was captured.

Original Meaning

CHAPTER 38 CONTINUES the narrative account begun in chapter 37 of Jeremiah's imprisonments during the final stages of the second Babylonian siege of Jerusalem. Jeremiah says nothing new about Judah's fate to Zedekiah (who wants desperately to have an authoritative but "positive" word on which to act). The choice that God has set before Zedekiah is described clearly, including words about the king's personal circumstances (38:17–23).⁴ The fear expressed by Zedekiah that he will be abused by fellow Judeans if he surrenders suggests that Zedekiah's concern about himself is stronger than that for his people.

38:1–6. The men named in verse 1 are "officials" (cf. v. 4). Two of them are named elsewhere in the book. Jehucal is the NIV rendering of Hebrew Yukal. The latter is a variant of the name Jehucal, a son of Shelemiah mentioned in 37:3; they are almost certainly the same person. Pashhur is one of Zedekiah's servants (21:1). These officials have much autonomy in dealing with Jeremiah, as Zedekiah concedes in verse 5.

The officials are angry with Jeremiah because his words about Babylonian supremacy are "discouraging" (v. 4; lit., "weaken the hands"). This is not a common phrase in the Old Testament, but it occurs in a secular letter from the time of Jeremiah, where it describes the effect of bad news. The officials lower Jeremiah into a cistern that has mud but no water. This is vindictive treatment by his opponents. Indirectly this comment tells the reader about the desperate circumstances of the siege. An empty cistern indicates water scarcity. Jeremiah is trapped in the cistern and unable to move easily or to rest.

38:7–13. One of the palace officials, a eunuch from Ethiopia, courageously approaches Zedekiah to overturn the order consigning Jeremiah to a slow and painful death. He secures an agreement from the king (who is holding court in the gate of Benjamin) and goes with thirty men to pull the weakened prophet from the muddy cistern. The need for thirty men is not for the task of pulling Jeremiah out of the cistern but for controlling any attempts to stop Ebed-Melech.

One gains an idea of how weak the prophet has become from the description of Ebed-Melech's manner of extricating him from the mire. The men provide some worn-out rags to place under Jeremiah's arms so that the rope harness will not injure him. Jeremiah is freed from his sentence of slow death, but he is still kept under confinement with Zedekiah's guards.

The actions of Ebed-Melech later receive a commendation of God and the promise of personal deliverance when the Babylonians finally take the city (see 39:15–18).⁷

38:14–28. The chapter concludes with the notice that Jeremiah remains in the court of the guard (cf. 37:20–21; 39:11–14) until the day that Jerusalem is captured. But Zedekiah is not through with the prophet. As in earlier cases (21:1; 37:3), the king seeks spiritual advice from him. Initially, Jeremiah seeks assurance that he will not be killed, and the king swears not to hand the prophet over to those who want to kill him.

Readers learn from the narrative that Zedekiah is as worried about his personal safety and future as he is about the city and the state. Jeremiah sets before the king the alternatives of surrendering and trusting the Lord for his safety or holding out and seeing the Babylonians victorious. The latter scenario includes the burning of the city (v. 23).

Zedekiah asks Jeremiah not to reveal their conversation. This is another indication of the king's divided mind and his vacillation with respect to listening to the prophet. One gains the impression from all this that both Jeremiah and Zedekiah are the subject of rumor and conspiracy and that Zedekiah has precious few people whom he can trust. The chapter concludes with the comment that Jeremiah remains in the courtyard of the guard until the Babylonians take the city. This last comment sets the stage for the narrative in chapter 39.

FUNDAMENTAL CONVICTIONS. "Choose for yourselves this day whom you will serve" (Josh. 24:15). Much of the book of Jeremiah is about God's corporate judgment on Judah for her failures. Such a theological conviction is the presupposition of Jeremiah 38, yet this account also shines the light of inspired testimony on individual lives. Here the personal is at center stage. One sees how people variously react to fear and courage and how they view God's work in their circumstances.

The circumstances of the siege and the awful predicament in which the inhabitants of Jerusalem find themselves lead to personal crises. The time has come for people to act on their fundamental convictions, be they "orthodox" or not. Some officials hear Jeremiah's prophetic word as a threat, undermining the resolve of the people necessary to their continued survival. The officials believe that the Lord should strengthen the people in time of need, not announce judgment to them through a prophet. As a result, they take action against the prophet.

Zedekiah hears the message repeatedly but is unable to face up to its demands. Pressure from various quarters has resulted in his doing little more than fretting over his personal safety.

Ebed-Melech too hears much of the debate, and he likewise acts on his fundamental convictions. In the midst of tragedy and suffering, hard choices, and even personal fear, Ebed-Melech stands with the prophet. As a result, God will stand with Ebed-Melech (39:15–18). Since action is a key indicator of a person's disposition, we should recognize in this man spiritual discernment as well as the courage of his convictions. Such discernment and moral courage are elements that can instruct Christians of any generation.

Readers may ask the question: Why would such an account as chapter 38 be preserved? Here are several answers. (1) It helps to explain the obdurate nature of Judah in refusing to see the hand of the Lord at work in judgment. (2) Moreover, it explains why Judah and Jerusalem fell. (3) But the account is also preserved in order to instruct readers and hearers in being open to God's corrective word and in trusting that dark days will lead to something better.

Contemporary Significance

FEAR. Fear does strange things to people. Some are almost superstitious in their avoidance of "negative talk." It is almost as if they believe that to silence the words means to avoid the reality to which they may point. The phenomenon is one reason for the proverbial saying that "one may kill the messenger but not the message." That is, if you throw Jeremiah into the cistern, his message will not be heard and hopefully will not come to pass. Better for Jesus to die than for the people to get stirred up. So-called "gag orders" are intended to keep someone from stating a truth publicly when it may prove to be injurious.

Some people are frozen by fear, unable to make a decision because they cannot clearly see a resolution. Not to decide on a course of action may be prudent, just as staying a familiar course can be the better of options, but neither is satisfactory when God has called his people to accountability and to action. In the case of Zedekiah, not to act decisively and obediently to Jeremiah's prophetic word means simply keeping on with the old and tired policies of failure. In his case, not to decide is actually to make a fateful decision.

God's providence is so designed that people may inevitably face their fears and choose among difficult options. This is not necessarily "bad news." The issue is first discernment and then trusting God, who sends such matters our way. The Gospel narratives provide us with portraits of a Jesus who spoke his word in season and stood by his claims. It is true that he prayed for the cup of suffering and shame to be taken away (Luke 22:39–44). Yet what remained paramount for Jesus (and remains so for us) is the discerning of God's will. And once his will is discerned, trust in God is a conviction about life and our place in it.

Courage. Courage can be simply a noble human trait. But it can also be a gift of God in due season, and its manifestation in the lives of God's people are markers along the path of discipleship. It is for the combination of wisdom and courage that all Christians should pray, knowing that it is only a matter of time until they must make some difficult choices.

In December 1997, a disturbed fourteen-year-old boy in West Paducah, Kentucky, shot and killed four girls at the conclusion of a prayer meeting held before school hours. Hearing the shots and seeing the bodies fall, a boy at the scene stood his ground and finally convinced the attacker to drop his firearm. Why didn't he run from the killer, who still had a loaded weapon in his hand? A devout Christian, the boy stated simply that he felt that God wanted him to stand there and to reach out to the troubled attacker. Courage! It can be God's gift, and its exercise can become a testimony to the grace of the Giver.

In a story like this, one does not first ask about the lives of the four girls who were killed or the life of the disturbed teenager who shot them. All of this is relevant, of course, to understand something of the background to the tragic shootings, but none of that was useful in the quick moment when a decision had to be made. Like so many things in life, events can force decisions on us when we don't have the gift of time and leisurely reflection. If Christ's disciples have not spent time in the practice of discerning God's will and in being open to the leading of God's Spirit, then the pressure of the moment will seem all the more constricting.

Jeremiah 38:28b-39:18

^{28b}This is how Jerusalem was taken: ^{39:1}In the ninth year of Zedekiah king of Judah, in the tenth month, Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon marched against Jerusalem with his whole army and laid siege to it. ²And on the ninth day of the fourth month of Zedekiah's eleventh year, the city wall was broken through. ³Then all the officials of the king of Babylon came and took seats in the Middle Gate: Nergal-Sharezer of Samgar, Nebo-Sarsekim a chief officer, Nergal-Sharezer a high official and all the other officials of the king of Babylon. ⁴When Zedekiah king of Judah and all the soldiers saw them, they fled; they left the city at night by way of the king's garden, through the gate between the two walls, and headed toward the Arabah.

⁸The Babylonians set fire to the royal palace and the houses of the people and broke down the walls of Jerusalem. ⁹Nebuzaradan commander of the imperial guard carried into exile to Babylon the people who remained in the city, along with those who had gone over to him, and the rest of the people. ¹⁰But Nebuzaradan the commander of the guard left behind in the land of Judah some of the poor people, who owned nothing; and at that time he gave them vineyards and fields.

¹¹Now Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon had given these orders about Jeremiah through Nebuzaradan commander of the imperial guard: ¹²"Take him and look after him; don't harm him but do for him whatever he asks." ¹³So Nebuzaradan the commander of the guard, Nebushazban a chief officer, Nergal-Sharezer a high official and all the other officers of the king of Babylon ¹⁴sent and had Jeremiah taken out of the courtyard of the guard. They turned him over to Gedaliah son of Ahikam, the son of Shaphan, to take him back to his home. So he remained among his own people.

¹⁵While Jeremiah had been confined in the courtyard of the guard, the word of the LORD came to him: ¹⁶"Go and tell Ebed-Melech the Cushite, 'This is what the LORD Almighty, the God of Israel, says: I am about to fulfill my words against this city through disaster, not prosperity. At that time they will be fulfilled before your eyes. ¹⁷But I will rescue you on that day, declares the LORD; you will not be handed over to those you fear. ¹⁸I will save you; you will not fall by the sword but will escape with your life, because you trust in me, declares the LORD.'"

THIS CHAPTER HAS PARALLELS with the accounts in Jeremiah 52:1–16 and 2 Kings 25:1–12. As noted in the introduction, the year of the fall of Jerusalem is disputed. The eleventh year of Zedekiah (Jer. 39:2) was either 587 or 586 B.C., probably the latter. The city wall was breached in the fourth month, which would be July/August (according to a spring new year). The temple was not burned until a month later (52:6–14).8

38:28b–39:7. The first line of this section introduces the account of Jerusalem's fall, but the narrative quickly shifts to a description of Zedekiah's fate. To put it succinctly, his fate is essentially the same as that of the city and people (39:4–7). He attempts to escape the consequences of Jerusalem's fall by fleeing to the Jordan Valley. He is caught by the Babylonian army with gruesome results. First he is taken to Riblah in Syria, where Nebuchadnezzar is in residence. The Babylonian king personally gives Zedekiah his sentence. His sons (and potential heirs) are slain in his presence along with other Judean nobles. The Judean king is then blinded so that the last thing he sees is the death of family and friends. He is then bound in fetters like other Judean exiles and taken to Babylon. Nothing else is preserved about him.

39:8–10. These verses describe succinctly the actual burning of the city. Named in particular are the royal palace and houses of the people. The walls are also pulled down. Nothing is mentioned about the temple here.

Nebuzaradan, a high Babylonian official, organizes much of the surviving population into a group for exile. Some of the poorest people in Judah (probably those who do not own land) are left to tend the land. Thus the former state of Judah is not totally depopulated, and the Babylonians will be able to extract tribute from those who remain to tend the land.

- 39:11–14. Nebuchadnezzar himself orders that Jeremiah be released from confinement. Reasons for his release are not cited, but Jeremiah's confinement serves no Babylonian purpose, and perhaps Nebuchadnezzar has heard secondhand that a Judean prophet proclaimed his supremacy. Moreover, the Babylonians⁹ turn him over to Gedaliah son of Ahikam, son of Shaphan. In the next chapter we learn that Nebuchadnezzar will appoint Gedaliah as governor of Judah. Here we see again the illustrious family of Shaphan, whose members had been supportive of Jeremiah. Gedaliah's fate also mirrors the Judean tragedy, even though his personal commitments are closer to those of Jeremiah than Zedekiah's.
- 39:15–18. The narrator provides a retrospective account of an oracle Jeremiah received about Ebed-Melech, the eunuch who saved his life during the darker moments of the siege. God has granted Ebed-Melech his life. Even though he is an official of the despised Zedekiah, he will not be handed over to the Babylonians.

WHEN READ IN THE CONTEXT of the book as a whole, Jeremiah 39 seems not only tragic but also somewhat anticlimactic. The fall of Jerusalem predicted by Jeremiah does, in fact, come to pass, and the faithless Zedekiah is treated harshly by the Babylonians. All we read are the bare details of the account, something like the brief report of the fall of Samaria in 2 Kings 17:1–6.¹³

Bilevel reading. One function of this chapter is the somber confirmation that Jeremiah's prophetic word has reached fulfillment concerning the city and the king. Zedekiah pays the price for his moral and spiritual weakness. He had worried about reprisals from his countrymen if he surrendered to the Babylonians (Jer. 38:19) only to find that he was unable to avoid the prophetic word that he would have to account for his failures. According to the prophet, Zedekiah could have avoided an awful fate and saved the city from destruction (38:17–18), but it was not to be.

One can see this account working on at least two levels. On the one hand, hindsight demonstrates that Zedekiah chose the path that ultimately failed him. He was a responsible agent who acted irresponsibly. On the other hand, his path also confirmed the prophetic word that announced judgment on such a path. Act and consequence are tragically bound together. Both of these elements can be instructive to later readers who seek to learn from the past.

This bilevel reading also works for the report of Jeremiah's word to Ebed-Melech. The eunuch chose his difficult path and discovered that God was with him. He was an agent who acted responsibly on his spiritual and moral convictions. He received his life rather than exile or execution, like many associated with the royal house (cf. Matt. 16:24–26). One cannot universalize from these two examples, but they are instructive nevertheless to God's people.

Contemporary Significance

TRAGEDY AND JUDGMENT. Is there such a thing as an expected tragedy? So often what makes an event or circumstance "tragic" is its unexpectedness. Certainly readers of the Old Testament can point to the account of Jerusalem's fall and say that the city's fate was announced beforehand. A tragedy that is anticipated and yet comes to pass is, in some sense, doubly tragic, because if it is anticipated, there should be ways of mitigating its harshness.

In Judah's case, we may question why one would even call such an event a tragedy rather than simply a reflection of God's judgment. It is really both, and therein lies something for us to think about. Tragedy suggests that an event or process does not have to turn out that way. In theological terms it suggests that God may have preferred it otherwise (cf. Ezek. 18:32), that he took no pleasure in the fall—indeed, that he sent a string of prophets to try and turn Judah from its self-destructive folly. Whether tragedy or judgment, the circumstances of Judah's fall were both allowed and then used by God in the history of his people.

Yet there can be a personal word from God that comes in the midst of tragedy or judgment. One sees it in the gift of life to Ebed-Melech. Such a word just comes. Is it expected? Hardly so, if one calls such a thing a word of grace. Grace happens, but it cannot be presumed upon. God is the God of new beginnings as well as the God of historical destiny. How judgment and new life work out in God's economy is what gives shape to the Christian life and confirms God as Lord of all circumstances.

End and beginning. On December 7, 1941, President Franklin D. Roosevelt gave his famous "a day that will live in infamy" speech. It was his reaction to the Japanese bombing of Pearl Harbor, an event that occasioned the official entrance of the United States into World War II. What tragedies and judgments resulted from that event! The attack on Pearl Harbor took place early on a Sunday morning. But is it only a past act, or was it really the ending of an old form of existence and the beginning of something new, something that is still working out its effects decades after the fact? It is both!¹⁴

The fall of Jerusalem is analogous. It brought several things to an end. Yet it was the beginning of something new, something that would continue on for decades. One might even argue that its effects are still being worked out in the history of Judaism and events occurring in the Middle East. Christians should see the outlines of a pattern here: God at work to use circumstances, even tragedy, for different and life-giving purposes.

¹THE WORD CAME to Jeremiah from the LORD after Nebuzaradan commander of the imperial guard had released him at Ramah. He had found Jeremiah bound in chains among all the captives from Jerusalem and Judah who were being carried into exile to Babylon. ²When the commander of the guard found Jeremiah, he said to him, "The LORD your God decreed this disaster for this place. ³And now the LORD has brought it about; he has done just as he said he would. All this happened because you people sinned against the LORD and did not obev him. ⁴But today I am freeing you from the chains on your wrists. Come with me to Babylon, if you like, and I will look after you; but if you do not want to, then don't come. Look, the whole country lies before you; go wherever you please." ⁵However, before Jeremiah turned to go, Nebuzaradan added, "Go back to Gedaliah son of Ahikam, the son of Shaphan, whom the king of Babylon has appointed over the towns of Judah, and live with him among the people, or go anywhere else you please."

Then the commander gave him provisions and a present and let him go. ⁶So Jeremiah went to Gedaliah son of Ahikam at Mizpah and stayed with him among the people who were left behind in the land.

⁷When all the army officers and their men who were still in the open country heard that the king of Babylon had appointed Gedaliah son of Ahikam as governor over the land and had put him in charge of the men, women and children who were the poorest in the land and who had not been carried into exile to Babylon, ⁸they came to Gedaliah at Mizpah—Ishmael son of Nethaniah, Johanan and Jonathan the sons of Kareah, Seraiah son of Tanhumeth, the sons of Ephai the Netophathite, and Jaazaniah the son of the Maacathite, and their men. ⁹Gedaliah son of Ahikam, the son of Shaphan, took an oath to reassure them and their men. "Do not be afraid to serve the Babylonians," he said. "Settle down in the land and serve the king of Babylon, and it will go well with you. ¹⁰I myself will stay at Mizpah to represent you before the Babylonians who come to us, but you are to harvest the wine, summer fruit and oil, and put them in your storage jars, and live in the towns you have taken over."

¹¹When all the Jews in Moab, Ammon, Edom and all the other countries heard that the king of Babylon had left a remnant in Judah and had appointed Gedaliah son of Ahikam, the son of Shaphan, as governor over them, ¹²they all came back to the land of Judah, to Gedaliah at Mizpah, from all the countries where they had been scattered. And they harvested an abundance of wine and summer fruit.

¹³Johanan son of Kareah and all the army officers still in the open country came to Gedaliah at Mizpah ¹⁴and said to him, "Don't you know that Baalis king of the Ammonites has sent Ishmael son of Nethaniah to take your life?" But Gedaliah son of Ahikam did not believe them.

¹⁵Then Johanan son of Kareah said privately to Gedaliah in Mizpah, "Let me go and kill Ishmael son of Nethaniah, and no one will know it. Why should he take your life and cause all the Jews who are gathered around you to be scattered and the remnant of Judah to perish?"

41:1In the seventh month Ishmael son of Nethaniah, the son of Elishama, who was of royal blood and had been one of the king's officers, came with ten men to Gedaliah son of Ahikam at Mizpah. While they were eating together there, ²Ishmael son of Nethaniah and the ten men who were with him got up and struck down Gedaliah son of Ahikam, the son of Shaphan, with the sword, killing the one whom the king of Babylon had appointed as governor over the land. ³Ishmael also killed all the Jews who were with Gedaliah at Mizpah, as well as the Babylonian soldiers who were there.

¹⁰Ishmael made captives of all the rest of the people who were in Mizpah—the king's daughters along with all the others who were left there, over whom Nebuzaradan commander of the imperial guard had appointed Gedaliah son of Ahikam.

Ishmael son of Nethaniah took them captive and set out to cross over to the Ammonites.

¹¹When Johanan son of Kareah and all the army officers who were with him heard about all the crimes Ishmael son of Nethaniah had committed, ¹²they took all their men and went to fight Ishmael son of Nethaniah. They caught up with him near the great pool in Gibeon. ¹³When all the people Ishmael had with him saw Johanan son of Kareah and the army officers who were with him, they were glad. ¹⁴All the people Ishmael had taken captive at Mizpah turned and went over to Johanan son of Kareah. ¹⁵But Ishmael son of Nethaniah and eight of his men escaped from Johanan and fled to the Ammonites.

¹⁶Then Johanan son of Kareah and all the army officers who were with him led away all the survivors from Mizpah whom he had recovered from Ishmael son of Nethaniah after he had assassinated Gedaliah son of Ahikam: the soldiers, women, children and court officials he had brought from Gibeon. ¹⁷And they went on, stopping at Geruth Kimham near Bethlehem on their way to Egypt ¹⁸to escape the Babylonians. They were afraid of them because Ishmael son of Nethaniah had killed Gedaliah son of Ahikam, whom the king of Babylon had appointed as governor over the land.

Original Meaning

THE TRAGEDY ASSOCIATED with Judah's demise continues after the destruction of the city. Jeremiah 40–41 revolve around the ill-fated Gedaliah son of Ahikam, the son of Shaphan, who is appointed governor of the province by the Babylonians (40:5, 7) and who will die at the hands of a Judean zealot named Ishmael (41:1–3). Gedaliah is already mentioned in 39:14 as the one to whom Jeremiah is released from custody. He was from an influential family and one friendly to Jeremiah. His grandfather, Shaphan, had been a member of Josiah's cabinet, and his father, also related to Josiah's administration, had been of crucial support to Jeremiah after a disastrous temple sermon (26:24; cf. 2 Kings 22).

Thus, the Babylonians appoint someone known to those remaining in the land and someone with administrative and political experience. It is possible, indeed likely, that Gedaliah agreed with Jeremiah's claim that God had employed Babylon as chastisement on Judah, and so he was prepared to do what seemed best for Judah in the months after Jerusalem's fall. He advises those around him to "not be afraid to serve the Babylonians," for in so doing it may go well with them (Jer. 40:9; cf. the prophet's words to the exiles in Babylon, 29:4–7).

40:1–6. Nebuzaradan, a Babylonian official, addresses Jeremiah (39:9), stating that God has given Judah and Jerusalem into the hands of Babylon in order to judge them. This may sound strange to modern readers, but many people in antiquity affirmed the power of a local deity in its sphere of influence. There is no reason to suspect sarcasm or insincerity on the part of Nebuzaradan.¹⁶

Jeremiah is also given a choice whether to go to Babylon or remain in the land with Gedaliah. From the point of view of personal security, it would likely be better for Jeremiah to accompany Nebuzaradan to Babylon, but he chooses to remain with the remnant in the land. In this choice the prophet signals a commitment to the land and to renewal, just like his symbolic purchase of property during the Babylonian siege of Jerusalem (32:1–15). So Jeremiah becomes a member of the remnant band associated with Gedaliah. He seems to know nothing about the plot against the governor. That Jeremiah is given provisions and a "present" by the Babylonians (40:5) is recognition on their part that the prophet predicted their success.

40:7–16. Remnants of Judeans begin to gather around Gedaliah at Mizpah, about five miles north of Jerusalem.¹⁷ Included in the group are Ishmael son of Nethaniah and Johanan son of Kareah, two people whose actions will affect decisively the fortunes of both the little province and the prophet Jeremiah. Johanan is a member of the Judean army but also seemingly well-connected to the remaining officials in Judah. Ishmael is related to the royal family of Judah (41:1). Johanan discovers (we know not how) that Baalis, king of the Ammonites (40:14), has concocted a plot with

Verses 10–11 remind us of the continuing impact of the Babylonian siege. When the Babylonian army first marched into the area, a number of Judeans had fled their homes to take up residence in surrounding territories. Now that the Babylonians have completed their siege and the main elements of the army returned to Babylon, many of these Judeans now return to see what remains of their former property. Upon doing so, they also find that additional property needs tending. Gedaliah's comment to them—"Live in the towns you have taken over"—indicates that the control of land has now passed to them and to others who remain.

All in all, it is a precarious time for those who remain in the land. They can be called the "remnant of Judah" (40:15), and the tasks of bringing corporate life back to a more even keel are daunting. Gedaliah may well have been able to represent the interests of the remnant to the Babylonian provincial administration. Unfortunately, this will never be known because of his tragic and untimely demise.

- 41:1–3. Chapter 41 narrates quickly Ishmael's treacherous murder of Gedaliah. Treachery is the correct description of murder during a mealtime, since the "eating together" of Ishmael and Gedaliah presupposes social bonding and hospitality. The massacre is both a strike against the Babylonians and an attempt by Ishmael to usurp power. In addition to Gedaliah (the appointed governor) Ishmael murders "all the Jews" with Gedaliah and the Babylonian soldiers present. By "all the Jews" is probably meant the Judean men who work with Gedaliah in administrative affairs. Verses 10 and 16 report the survival of some persons from the town of Mizpah.
- 41:4–18. The day after the murder at Mizpah, a group of pilgrims from Shiloh, Shechem, and Samaria come south on the hill-country road to Jerusalem. They have cut their beards and torn their clothes as signs of ritual humiliation, and they intend to worship at the site of the temple in Jerusalem (41:4–8). Here is unintended commentary on the importance of the temple for people who lived outside the territory of Judah. The pilgrims from the north want to present grain offerings and incense at the temple in Jerusalem; does this mean that part of the temple cult continues even after the destruction of the temple itself? Perhaps an altar has been erected and repositioned in the courtyard, or perhaps the ceremony envisioned by the pilgrims is for prayer and lamentation, and their gifts symbolic gesture. The text does not say, and interpreters should be wary of speculation.

In yet another treacherous act, Ishmael gains their confidence and brings them to Mizpah, only to murder most of them and then to cast their bodies into the large cistern built by a former king. A few are spared, who offer him provisions they have hidden in a field. Ishmael then gathers the townspeople and sets out to cross over the Jordan River to the Ammonites. Among his captives are daughters of the king. Most likely these are daughters of Zedekiah from marriages with women of prominent local families. Johanan and his soldiers attempt to intercept Ishmael. The two groups met near Gibeon, with the result that most of the captives taken by Ishmael are recovered by Johanan and his officers, but Ishmael and eight of his men escape.

The question faced by Johanan and his band is, "What now?" Their fear of Babylonian reprisal and the treachery of men like Ishmael lead them toward a decision to flee the region. Their choice of venue is Egypt, where already a sizable group of Judeans live.

Bridging Contexts

Human tendency to self-destruction. Why would an exilic audience find this sad account instructive? The material is not provided only to explain to exiles (or later generations) what happened in the past, but also to demonstrate the tragic consequences of Judah's folly as they continue to play themselves out after the fall of Jerusalem. In a related way the account confirms that the prophet of God does not have a saving word for every occasion. Although it is clear that Jeremiah did not support the assassination of Gedaliah, he says nothing about the plot beforehand (he may have known nothing about it). He will also be ineffective in seeking to convince Johanan and company to stay in the land (ch. 42). The prophet is thus caught up in the circumstances of the tragedy, and he will bear some of its consequences.

In some ways these two chapters are the saddest in the whole book of Jeremiah. Babylon has clearly demonstrated its mastery over Judah, confirming a word Jeremiah proclaimed for years; yet Gedaliah, the one figure who may have facilitated reconstruction of life in the land and become a symbol of hope, is senselessly killed. God will, of course, be able to overcome these bitter ashes of defeat, but it comes at considerable cost.

The account of life in the land after the fall of the city is a clear illustration of human community gone bad, with no mechanism to help it right itself. Part of the impact of reading these chapters is simply to sigh and be reminded of the human tendency toward self-destruction. Only the larger context of God's superabounding grace, based on his resolve to stay with such a people, provides any hope beyond the tragedy.

Contemporary Significance

REBUILDING AFTER DEFEAT. "The wages of sin is death" (Rom. 6:23). For North American readers, the depressing account of Gedaliah's murder and the continuing downward spiral in Judah may strike a responsive chord in their historical memory. Abraham Lincoln announced that a "house divided against itself cannot stand." He knew he was quoting a biblical text (cf. Mark 3:24–25), and he believed that God would judge the United States for its folly in the slave trade and its continuing bitter conflict over ways to resolve the matter.

After four years of civil war (1861–1865), with the southern states in tatters and the whole nation exhausted from the senseless bloodletting, Lincoln began to look for ways to rebuild the nation and to reconcile its various factions. He went public with his conviction that God had judged the affairs of the nation, and he refused to take the moral high ground of exemption when it came to confessing the judging hand of God. Lincoln was not perfect (nor was Gedaliah!), but he represented the possibility of moving past the consequences of moral and spiritual failure. A twisted soul named John Wilkes Booth assassinated Lincoln before he could put his plans for reconciliation into effect, and the resulting turmoil in the southern states over harsh reconstruction policies was extremely costly.¹⁹

What does one say to such a "lesson"? One should begin by affirming that the painful historical process came about as self-incurred failure. Its effects linger on. The issues are not just "in the past." Christians, however, should go on further and, like Lincoln, confess the hand of God at work in judgment.

Are there not additional things that we as Christians can confess? One of them is that Lincoln (like Gedaliah and Jeremiah) is something of a tragic figure. In a mysterious way, he bore corporate failure in his person and suffered along with the nation—and not just in his death. The Christological analogy is not complete: Lincoln (Gedaliah or Jeremiah) did not atone for the sins of others, but they did suffer as part of their "calling."

Their tragedy raises interesting questions. If God uses their tragic circumstances to instruct his people and to evoke measures of repentance and sympathy, then they serve a larger purpose. Moreover, failure can be the prelude to and even the beginning of new directions. In the midst of a national humiliation Gedaliah advises his contemporaries not to fear. Jeremiah chooses the more difficult road rather than setting off to Babylon. Do those who have tasted new life in the crucified and risen Lord have eyes to see and ears to hear what the Spirit is saying?

¹THEN ALL THE ARMY OFFICERS, including Johanan son of Kareah and Jezaniah son of Hoshaiah, and all the people from the least to the greatest approached ²Jeremiah the prophet and said to him, "Please hear our petition and pray to the LORD your God for this entire remnant. For as you now see, though we were once many, now only a few are left. ³Pray that the LORD your God will tell us where we should go and what we should do."

4"I have heard you," replied Jeremiah the prophet. "I will certainly pray to the LORD your God as you have requested; I will tell you everything the LORD says and will keep nothing back from you."

⁵Then they said to Jeremiah, "May the LORD be a true and faithful witness against us if we do not act in accordance with everything the LORD your God sends you to tell us. ⁶Whether it is favorable or unfavorable, we will obey the LORD our God, to whom we are sending you, so that it will go well with us, for we will obey the LORD our God."

⁷Ten days later the word of the LORD came to Jeremiah. ⁸So he called together Johanan son of Kareah and all the army officers who were with him and all the people from the least to the greatest.

⁹He said to them, "This is what the LORD, the God of Israel, to whom you sent me to present your petition, says:

13"However, if you say, 'We will not stay in this land,' and so disobey the LORD your God, ¹⁴ and if you say, 'No, we will go and live in Egypt, where we will not see war or hear the trumpet or be hungry for bread,' 15then hear the word of the LORD, O remnant of Judah. This is what the LORD Almighty, the God of Israel, says: 'If you are determined to go to Egypt and you do go to settle there, ¹⁶then the sword you fear will overtake you there, and the famine you dread will follow you into Egypt, and there you will die. ¹⁷Indeed, all who are determined to go to Egypt to settle there will die by the sword, famine and plague; not one of them will survive or escape the disaster I will bring on them.' 18This is what the LORD Almighty, the God of Israel, says: 'As my anger and wrath have been poured out on those who lived in Jerusalem, so will my wrath be poured out on you when you go to Egypt. You will be an object of cursing and horror, of condemnation and reproach; you will never see this place again.'

¹⁹"O remnant of Judah, the LORD has told you, 'Do not go to Egypt.' Be sure of this: I warn you today ²⁰that you made a fatal mistake when you sent me to the LORD your God and said, 'Pray to the LORD our God for us; tell us everything he says and we will do it.' ²¹I have told you today, but you still have not obeyed the LORD your God in all he sent me to tell you. ²²So now, be sure of this: You will die by the sword, famine and plague in the place where you want to go to settle."

^{43:1}When Jeremiah finished telling the people all the words of the LORD their God—everything the LORD had sent him to tell them—²Azariah son of Hoshaiah and Johanan son of Kareah and all the arrogant men said to Jeremiah, "You are lying! The LORD our God has not sent you to say, 'You must not go to Egypt to settle there.' ³But Baruch son of Neriah is inciting you against us to hand us over to the Babylonians, so they may kill us or carry us into exile to Babylon."

⁴So Johanan son of Kareah and all the army officers and all the people disobeyed the LORD's command to stay in the land of Judah. ⁵Instead, Johanan son of Kareah and all the army officers led away all the remnant of Judah who had come back to live in the land of Judah from all the nations where they had been scattered. ⁶They also led away all the men, women and children and the king's daughters whom Nebuzaradan commander of the imperial guard had left with Gedaliah son of Ahikam, the son of Shaphan, and Jeremiah the prophet and Baruch son of Neriah. ⁷So they entered Egypt in disobedience to the LORD and went as far as Tahpanhes.

Original Meaning

THE PREVIOUS CHAPTER ended with the note that Johanan and company were worried about Babylonian reprisals for the death of Gedaliah and thus considered an escape to Egypt (41:17–18). The current section (42:1–43:7) narrates a discussion between Jeremiah and the group, which takes place over a ten-day period and eventuates in the flight to Egypt. Jeremiah offers both a prophetic oracle and his personal word against such a flight.

One of the mysteries of the narrative is the location of Jeremiah and Baruch at the time of the massacres at Mizpah. According to the last reference to Jeremiah in the narrative, he left the presence of Nebuzaradan in Jerusalem and went to Gedaliah at Mizpah (40:1–6). Most likely, Jeremiah placed himself under the administrative authority of Gedaliah. But before the treacherous murders perpetrated by Ishmael at Mizpah, he and Baruch have probably settled elsewhere. In any case, the meeting of Johanan and Jeremiah apparently takes place after the arrival of Johanan and company at Geruth Kimham near Bethlehem.²⁰ Through this account, we are given some context for the surprising fact that Jeremiah and Baruch eventually go to Egypt.

- 42:1–6. Should the remnant associated with Johanan (and until recently with Gedaliah) flee to Egypt or not? They seek the counsel of God through Jeremiah and promise obedience to the prophetic word. There is an implied self-curse in 42:5, should the company of Judeans not heed the Lord's instruction. Jeremiah agrees to seek counsel from the Lord and to tell them everything the Lord reveals.
- 42:7–22. Jeremiah's reply to the request of Johanan takes two forms. After ten days he begins with the preface, "This is what the LORD ... says," where the gist of the message is that God will preserve the remnant of Judeans if they stay in the land. In language associated with Jeremiah's call, God promises to build and to plant them in the land and there to protect them from the wrath of Nebuchadnezzar (42:10–12). Should they choose to disregard his word and to flee to Egypt, judgment will come on them there.

This indication of judgment should be read in light of 42:5, where the people ask that God be a "true and faithful witness" against them if they disobey his revealed word. Jeremiah adds his personal word to the group (42:19–22), indicating that a choice for Egypt means that they are self-deceived and will not escape judgment.

43:1–7. Members of the group accuse Jeremiah of lying to them and of engaging in a conspiracy with Baruch, who wants the group to stay in the land. Why Baruch might be an agent of subterfuge is not clear from their accusation. Their reaction to Jeremiah's prophetic oracle is similar to that of Zedekiah. The latter specifically asked Jeremiah for a word from the Lord, but when he didn't like what Jeremiah provided, he simply refused to obey.

The end result is that Johanan leads the group to Tahpanhes in Egypt. Jeremiah and Baruch are taken with them, but not willingly. Tahpanhes (cf. 2:16) is located in the eastern section of the Nile Delta. It is one of the first communities that a traveler from Palestine would encounter when approaching the Nile Delta from the east. As 44:1 makes clear, it was one of several cities in Egypt with a Judean population.

Bridging Contexts

THIS EXCHANGE BETWEEN the group and the prophet is one of the clearest examples in Jeremiah of an overt disobedience to God's revealed will. The conversation makes the issues relatively clear, if not ominous. The group wants to escape reprisal from the Babylonians. Jeremiah counsels them to be more attentive to what God has to say about their circumstances. Thus a primary reason to preserve the account is to explain the failure of and the judgment on the nation that continues among disobedient survivors of the Babylonian campaigns.

It is worth noting here that a decision to flee to Egypt likely seems the safer of the two choices, at least in appearance. Nebuchadnezzar would not take kindly to the assassination of his hand-picked governor, and there is every reason to expect reprisals in some form. Furthermore, Egypt is not (yet!) under the control of the Babylonians, so if Johanan and the group make it safely there, they may have some expectation of continued security from the Babylonians.

Both the group solicitation of Jeremiah and his prophetic reply to them are couched in the language of path and obedience. There is similarity in language and theme with the great sermons of Deuteronomy as well as with elements within Jeremiah's own previous utterances. Readers are invited, therefore, not just to take note of the "why" of the continuing tragedy but to see in the language of path and obedience a calling to make their own. Jeremiah is not unconcerned about prevailing circumstances. Rather, he places concern for the safety of the group in the larger context of listening to the guidance of the Lord and having the courage to follow it.

"Not everyone who says to me, 'Lord, Lord' ..." (Matt. 7:21–23; cf. Luke 6:46). It is difficult to talk about obedience in modern North America, whether in secular terms or as part of the life of discipleship. Our dominant culture is one of freedom of choice and avoiding lasting commitments; it also places a premium on "happiness" (whatever that might mean). In spite of these cultural traits, modern Christians should not understand obedience to God's revealed will as an irrelevant burden or needless constriction; obedience is the proper response needed to fulfill one's calling. In biblical terms obedience is virtually a synonym for the path of discipleship.

It is certainly easy to complain that we don't always know God's will and to offer that as a reason why we don't do something. One should not make light of the intellectual difficulties associated with discerning God's will, but it is more frequently the case that the hindrance to discipleship comes from moral sloth and failure to trust than from inability to discern at least the basics of a course of action.

A former teacher once said that truth is only known through commitment. What he meant is that the intellectual approach to God or the dialogical form of inquiry can be helpful, but personal commitment to God (and being known by God) is where the truth of God's sovereignty and goodness is revealed. What a tragedy that Jeremiah's companions could commit themselves in advance to following God's will, only to reject it when it did not suit their predilections.

⁸In Tahpanhes the word of the LORD came to Jeremiah: ⁹"While the Jews are watching, take some large stones with you and bury them in clay in the brick pavement at the entrance to Pharaoh's palace in Tahpanhes. ¹⁰Then say to them, 'This is what the LORD Almighty, the God of Israel, says: I will send for my servant Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, and I will set his throne over these stones I have buried here; he will spread his royal canopy above them. ¹¹He will come and attack Egypt, bringing death to those destined for death, captivity to those destined for captivity, and the sword to those destined for the sword. ¹²He will set fire to the temples of the gods of Egypt; he will burn their temples and take their gods captive. As a shepherd wraps his garment around him, so will he wrap Egypt around himself and depart from there unscathed. ¹³There in the temple of the sun in Egypt he will demolish the sacred pillars and will burn down the temples of the gods of Egypt.""

44:1 This word came to Jeremiah concerning all the Jews living in Lower Egypt—in Migdol, Tahpanhes and Memphis—and in Upper Egypt: ²"This is what the LORD Almighty, the God of Israel, says: You saw the great disaster I brought on Jerusalem and on all the towns of Judah. Today they lie deserted and in ruins ³because of the evil they have done. They provoked me to anger by burning incense and by worshiping other gods that neither they nor you nor your fathers ever knew. ⁴Again and again I sent my servants the prophets, who said, 'Do not do this detestable thing that I hate!' 5But they did not listen or pay attention; they did not turn from their wickedness or stop burning incense to other gods. ⁶Therefore, my fierce anger was poured out; it raged against the towns of Judah and the streets of Jerusalem and made them the desolate ruins they are today.

on yourselves by cutting off from Judah the men and women, the children and infants, and so leave yourselves without a remnant? ⁸Why provoke me to anger with what your hands have made, burning incense to other gods in Egypt, where you have come to live? You will destroy yourselves and make yourselves an object of cursing and reproach among all the nations on earth. ⁹Have you forgotten the wickedness committed by your fathers and by the kings and queens of Judah and the wickedness committed by you and your wives in the land of Judah and the streets of Jerusalem? ¹⁰To this day they have not humbled themselves or shown reverence, nor have they followed my law and the decrees I set before you and your fathers.

11"Therefore, this is what the LORD Almighty, the God of Israel, says: I am determined to bring disaster on you and to destroy all Judah. ¹²I will take away the remnant of Judah who were determined to go to Egypt to settle there. They will all perish in Egypt; they will fall by the sword or die from famine. From the least to the greatest, they will die by sword or famine. They will become an object of cursing and horror, of condemnation and reproach. ¹³I will punish those who live in Egypt with the sword, famine and plague, as I punished Jerusalem. ¹⁴None of the remnant of Judah who have gone to live in Egypt will escape or survive to return to the land of Judah, to which they long to return and live; none will return except a few fugitives."

¹⁵Then all the men who knew that their wives were burning incense to other gods, along with all the women who were present—a large assembly—and all the people living in Lower and Upper Egypt, said to Jeremiah, ¹⁶"We will not listen to the message you have spoken to us in the name of the LORD! ¹⁷We will certainly do everything we said we would: We will burn incense to the Queen of Heaven and will pour out drink offerings to her just as we and our fathers, our kings and our officials did in the towns of Judah and in the streets of Jerusalem. At that time we had plenty of food and were well off and suffered no harm. ¹⁸But ever since we stopped burning incense to the Queen of Heaven and pouring out drink offerings to her, we have had nothing and have been perishing by sword and famine."

¹⁹The women added, "When we burned incense to the Queen of Heaven and poured out drink offerings to her, did not our husbands know that we were making cakes like her image and pouring out drink offerings to her?"

²⁰Then Jeremiah said to all the people, both men and women, who were answering him, ²¹"Did not the LORD remember and think about the incense burned in the towns of Judah and the streets of Jerusalem by you and your fathers, your kings and your officials and the people of the land? ²²When the LORD could no longer endure your wicked actions and the detestable things you did, your land became an object of cursing and a desolate waste without inhabitants, as it is today. ²³Because you have burned incense and have sinned against the LORD and have not obeyed him or followed his law or his decrees or his stipulations, this disaster has come upon you, as you now see."

²⁴Then Jeremiah said to all the people, including the women, "Hear the word of the LORD, all you people of Judah in Egypt. ²⁵This is what the LORD Almighty, the God of Israel, says: You and your wives have shown by your actions what you promised when you said, 'We will certainly carry out the vows we made to burn incense and pour out drink offerings to the Queen of Heaven.'

"Go ahead then, do what you promised! Keep your vows! ²⁶But hear the word of the LORD, all Jews living in Egypt: 'I swear by my great name,' says the LORD, 'that no one from Judah living anywhere in Egypt will ever again invoke my name or swear, "As surely as the Sovereign LORD lives." ²⁷For I am watching over them for harm, not for good; the Jews in Egypt will perish by sword and famine until they are all destroyed. ²⁸Those who escape the sword and return to the land of Judah from Egypt will be very few. Then the whole remnant of Judah who came to live in Egypt will know whose word will stand—mine or theirs.

²⁹"This will be the sign to you that I will punish you in this place,' declares the LORD, 'so that you will know that my threats of harm against you will surely stand.' ³⁰This is what the LORD says: 'I am going to hand Pharaoh Hophra king of Egypt over to his enemies who seek his life, just as I handed Zedekiah king of Judah over to Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, the enemy who was seeking his life.'"

Original Meaning

THIS SECTION NARRATES the work of Jeremiah (and Baruch) in Egypt. They are taken by their Judean compatriots to Tahpanhes in the eastern Nile Delta. Although implicit, Jeremiah and Baruch have been forced to accompany the group. In Egypt Jeremiah performs a symbolic act in preparation for judgment to come and informs the Judeans there of his activities (43:8–13). Chapter 44 records Jeremiah's second judgmental prophecy against Judeans in Egypt (44:1–14), a reply on the part of his Judean audience (44:15–19), and then a third judgment speech of the prophet (44:20–30).

43:8–13. At God's initiative, Jeremiah takes some large stones and buries them in the courtyard of a government building in Tahpanhes. He explains this act by saying that God will grant his "servant Nebuchadnezzar" a seat over these stones when the Babylonian king spreads out his royal canopy. Jeremiah's prophetic depiction of Nebuchadnezzar's presence is an indication that Babylon will conquer Egypt. Moreover, judgment will come on those Judeans who think they have escaped the reach of the Babylonians by fleeing to Egypt. The prophet also predicts that the Babylonians will set fire to temples in the land of Egypt and break the obelisks (standing stones) in the city of the sun, that is, Heliopolis, located just northeast of modern Cairo.

Readers may wonder what the local Egyptians thought about a Judean prophet burying stones in a public courtyard. The narrative, however, does not tell us. As the instructions to the prophet make clear, he is to take the stones and bury them while fellow Jews are watching. The symbolic act and accompanying oracle are intended as instruction for Jews, not Egyptians.

44:1–14. The bitter exchange between prophet and people in chapter 44 underscores the deep cultural and religious fissures in the Judean community. These verses are Jeremiah's prophetic invective against Judean people in Egypt.²² They concentrate on Judean idolatry and syncretism, if not outright apostasy against their ancestral faith. Included is the (by now) familiar charge that God had sent prophets to warn them, yet their words of warning were rejected.

Verse 7 contains a rhetorical question: "Why bring such great disaster on yourselves?" The point is another one familiar to readers of the book: Acts have consequences; the idolatry and apostasy of Judeans in Egypt will have the same self-incurred consequences as did idolatry and apostasy in Judah. The prophet concludes with a statement that Judeans in Egypt seem not to have associated the fall of Judah and Jerusalem as judgment on their faithlessness to the Lord. As the following reply to the prophet makes clear, some have not made the connection.

44:15–19. The people's testy reply to the prophet's judgment speech—that they will indeed continue to worship the Queen of Heaven²³—reflects two significant assumptions about religious practice on the part of Judeans.

(1) Religion has the primary function of securing the health and safety of a group. (2) The worship of the Queen of Heaven was stopped earlier in Judah (by Josiah?) and subsequently resumed. The fortunes of the people, so they claim, have turned out better with her than with the Lord. "At that time we had plenty of food and were well off and suffered no harm" (v. 17). As a result, the Judeans in Egypt intend to maintain the worship of the Queen of Heaven as did their ancestors and their kings in Judah.

In particular, the Judean women reply that their worship of the Queen of Heaven was done with the acquiescence of their husbands (44:19). The crowd assembled with Jeremiah contains representatives from different communities in Egypt, women as well as men. Although Jeremiah's previous comments have not singled out either Judean women or worship of the Queen of Heaven, their role in her cult takes center stage as the example of idolatry²⁴ and apostasy. Perhaps the occasion for the prophet's challenge to the Judeans comes at a time of public ceremony or festival, when people gather for public ritual.

44:20–30. Jeremiah's reply to the people's resolve to commit apostasy is that judgment will come on them for their act of faithlessness toward the Lord. He judges implicitly their claim that things are better with the Queen of Heaven than with the Lord.

Jeremiah recognizes that his give-and-take with the crowd has set out both their resolve to remain worshipers of the Queen of Heaven and God's resolve that his word of judgment will come to pass. He predicts, therefore, that Pharaoh Hophra, the current ruler of Egypt, will be given over to the hands of his enemies as a sign of God's mastery of affairs, even in Egypt. In 569 B.C. Hophra was killed by one of his officials in a military coup.

The prophet does identify a future for a Jewish remnant, a future in which the remnant will recognize whose word stands the test of time. Jeremiah predicts that it will be the word of the Lord that stands the test of time, not that of the Queen of Heaven and her worshipers.

Bridging Contexts

BLINDNESS CONTINUES. The Judeans in Egypt exhibit a pattern of behavior similar to that of Judah and Jerusalem before the Babylonian siege and destruction; that is, they ignore the words of the prophet, God's servant. The consequences for them will be similar to those in Judah, thereby illustrating one of the larger themes of chapters 37–45. Unfortunately, spiritual blindness and political shortsightedness have not ceased among Judeans with the hammer blows of the Babylonians, and so the consequences of this blindness will be severe.

There is little in this section of the book about judgment that has not been said elsewhere in Jeremiah. It is as if the prophet is destined to face recalcitrance and intransigence among his Judean contemporaries all the days of his prophetic work. Readers should not despair over these somber reports, however. Some indeed take Jeremiah's words to heart, preserve them, and prepare for the future on the basis of their authority.

It is illuminating to compare Jeremiah's words to the Egyptian Judeans in chapter 44 with his word to Baruch in chapter 45. The prophet declares that there is no safe haven for Judean iniquity, even in Egypt and (temporarily) away from the reach of the Babylonians. For Baruch, by contrast, the promise is that wherever he goes, God is with him for protection.

In neither case should we read these prophecies and draw blanket conclusions for any situation—Babylon will not be the end of Judean existence in Egypt, nor does chapter 45 guarantee Baruch a blissful existence—but both judgment and promise tell us something fundamental about God. The Lord was (and remains) committed to the judgment of failure among his people as well as to the vindication of his servants. How these truths work themselves out in a given scenario will vary, but God's commitments do not.

Religion that works. Judean presumptions about the efficacy of religious activities dedicated to the Queen of Heaven have their counterparts among modern people. (1) There are people for whom influencing the divine world (however defined) is the paramount reason to engage in religious activities. Religion is "whatever works," rather than the worship and service of the one true God who spoke to Jeremiah and who was fully revealed in Christ. A similar form of religion is the "health and wealth" teaching that makes faith a work to guarantee personal health and material gain.

(2) Some modern interest has developed in goddess worship and spirituality as a way to supplement the worship of a so-called "patriarchal" God of the Bible. God, of course, may have "maternal" instincts (to use anthropopathic language) along with his "paternal" role, but the God of the Bible does not have a sexual identity. The newer interest among progressive Western religions for the feminine divine or goddess spirituality may be driven, in part, by a developing feminist consciousness. Even so, modern seeking for and worship of a goddess is essentially an update of the misplaced concerns of the Judean worshipers of the Queen of Heaven.

Contemporary Significance

EXERCISING DESPERATE MANEUVERS. The somber words of Jeremiah are eloquent reminders of what life can be like when one is estranged from God and has little clue to the power of inherited corruption. Especially hard to deal with are those people who insist they know something about God; for them, being sent into exile (or whatever difficulty) cannot be his work. It would be nice (so human reflection might go) if we could discover the key to saving ourselves consistent with what we think we know about God. Perhaps (so human reflection might continue) the key to self-saving comes in recognizing a new religious impulse whereby the divine world is invoked for protection; perhaps the key lies in the advance of science to meet God; or perhaps the key lies in the flight from problems in the hope that they will not reach us where we have gone. All of these things are overtly a seeking of life, but the end result will be death.

Desperate people will do desperate things. On July 24, 1998, Russell Weston attempted to enter the United States Capitol building without going through the required metal detector. When met by a uniformed officer, he pulled out a pistol and shot the officer, inflicting a mortal wound. A brief gunfight ensued within the hallways of the Capitol in which a second officer was killed trying to stop Weston from advancing any farther. Both Weston and a tourist were wounded in the exchange, with Weston felled by multiple gunshot wounds from officers who returned his fire. Perhaps time and investigation will reveal the degrees to which Weston's senseless attack was precipitated by mental sickness, paranoia, and anger. Apparently he wanted to make his point and fix what he thought was wrong about the government. Everyone acknowledges that his actions were disastrously wrong, even if he himself was too ill to grasp right from wrong.

Weston's sad case illustrates how often desperate maneuvers lead only to failure. Is he not ultimately a sad and twisted illustration of the human propensity to go to any length to make a "point" and to "fix it" ourselves? Sadly for him (and for all of us), the only avenue of "fixing things" comes by accepting God's diagnosis of failure and his free gift of life.

In a related fashion, the modern movements toward worship of one or more goddesses may be motivated by true spiritual hunger. There is no reason to doubt that the Judeans' worship of the Queen of Heaven resulted from pressing spiritual needs. They simply looked in the wrong direction to meet those needs. In a similar manner the modern counterparts will be judged. The hunger is real, but so is the spiritual blindness that keeps people from seeing their true home with the Lord.

"The fear of the LORD is the beginning of knowledge" (Prov. 1:7). The pathway to life begins by acknowledging that every road leads to death except the one charted by God. Jeremiah's contemporaries in Egypt simply could not face the fact that they had been (and remained) part of a failed political and religious enterprise. Tragically, they were willing to do almost anything to hear from God: kidnap Jeremiah and Baruch, worship the Queen of Heaven, and so on. What they refused to do is to acknowledge their failure and depend on the God of grace, who can make all things new.

¹This is what Jeremiah the prophet told Baruch son of Neriah in the fourth year of Jehoiakim son of Josiah king of Judah, after Baruch had written on a scroll the words Jeremiah was then dictating: ²"This is what the LORD, the God of Israel, says to you, Baruch: ³You said, 'Woe to me! The LORD has added sorrow to my pain; I am worn out with groaning and find no rest.""

⁴The LORD said, "Say this to him: 'This is what the LORD says: I will overthrow what I have built and uproot what I have planted, throughout the land. ⁵Should you then seek great things for yourself? Seek them not. For I will bring disaster on all people, declares the LORD, but wherever you go I will let you escape with your life.'"

Original Meaning

THE PROPHECY CONCERNING Baruch is out of place chronologically with the preceding chapters (Jeremiah 37–44). Verse 1 provides a date in the fourth year of Jehoiakim (605 B.C.), which coincides with the command from the Lord in 36:1 for Jeremiah to prepare a scroll of his prophecies. The fallout over Baruch's reading from the scroll may have been an early occasion for public persecution of this scribe, who was Jeremiah's secretary and companion. According to 36:19, 26, Baruch was forced into hiding because of his reading of the scroll at the temple complex. After the fall of Jerusalem, the Judeans accused him of playing loose with the truth (43:3). Subsequently he and Jeremiah were taken to Egypt by a band of Judeans.

Why does this account come at the end of the description of the Egyptian sojourn of Jeremiah and Baruch? Some commentators suggest that the chronological citation in 45:1 is an error (inadvertent or otherwise) and that the assurance to Baruch that God will spare his life originated as a timely assurance during the tense period in Egypt. This solution is possible, but not satisfactory. Although the prophecy does follow the narratives about life in Egypt, there are no compelling text-critical reasons to remove or to overlook the chronological citation in 45:1. Readers should take seriously the setting of the oracle during the reign of Jehoiakim.

Other commentators agree that the account is an earlier statement, but they suggest it is repeated "literarily" in this context to inform readers that God does take care of his own. This is a more satisfactory reading. These words to and about Baruch owe their literary placement to their thematic and theological value as a divine confirmation that Baruch served God and would be enabled to perform his calling. Moreover, the placement of this prophecy as a conclusion to the narratives about life in Egypt serves to reinforce the claim that Baruch's presence in Egypt is not the result of God's disfavor. Thus, although neither prophet nor companion will escape the fate of the nation, God will vindicate them nevertheless.

Baruch's "woe" (45:3) is a counterpart to the laments of Jeremiah. There is a cost to serving the Lord in times such as these—as Uriah (26:20–23) and Jeremiah discovered. The divine oracle to Baruch repeats the language of uprooting and tearing down used at Jeremiah's commission to the prophetic office (1:10). In the tragic affairs of Judah and Jerusalem, God has been at work to uproot and tear down. Baruch has no more "right" (to use modern Western language) than anyone else to expect that he will escape the consequences of corporate and historical judgment that have swept through the region.

In that light, all that can be said is that God calls Baruch to be faithful and that his personal safety resides with God. God promises him that his life has been granted to him "wherever" he might go. Readers are given no additional information about where his service to Jeremiah and to God may take him. His life is a gift, and he has been called to use it well.

Bridging Contexts

INCARNATIONAL MINISTRY. The last word from Egypt in chapter 45 is actually a reminder of an earlier word of assurance. That word remained valid for Baruch wherever he went. Christian discipleship often requires people to identify with the circumstances in which God has placed them. If they do not commit themselves to the circumstances at hand, then it is possible that their looking ahead (usually a good thing) will keep them from exercising a discriminating witness in the present.

Not only is this a characteristic of discipleship; it is a form of incarnational ministry—to be there in person. Disciples are called to be salt and light wherever they are. Baruch's call as scribe and companion to Jeremiah put him in more than one precarious situation. There is nothing wrong with his cry of "woe," for such woeful circumstances were the common lot of the day as the tumult of Judean persecution and Babylonian conquest spread their tentacles. "Woe," while understandable, cannot be the last word of discipleship. God will have the last word in the evaluation of one's work and of one's fate. The last word (literarily) from Egypt, where Baruch and Jeremiah have gone and from whom we will not hear again, is a reminder of an earlier word of assurance. Just as God was watching over his word to fulfill it (1:12), so God is watching over Baruch. Like Ebed-Melech, Baruch has received his life as a gift, so that in return he may serve the Lord in difficult circumstances.

In the Bible Egypt is a strange place for God's people. Consider Abraham, Joseph, the Hebrew slaves, and Moses. Jeremiah offers judgment on Egypt (cf. Jer. 46:2–26) and the Judeans there. But his word should also be compared with that of Isaiah, who sees Egypt as a future blessing for the world (Isa. 19:23–25). In the New Testament the family of Jesus flees to Egypt as political refugees (Matt. 2:19–23). Egypt is not home to God's people, but a lot of formation for ministry is accomplished there, and God's resolve to bless comes from there.

SERVING IN EXILE. According to Coptic Church² tradition, Jeremiah and Baruch chose a spot to come and pray while in Egypt. It was the same place that Moses had used centuries earlier for the same purpose. Later, the holy family would utilize that same spot when they fled to Egypt to escape the wrath of Herod (cf. Matt. 2:13–15). This legendary tradition reveals a larger truth: God is a source of strength and encouragement to those serving "in exile."

Christians who feel isolated or depressed over their circumstances, who have been forced into unfamiliar territory, or who are caught up in destructive forces that overwhelm their lives are invited to measure their lives against a scriptural pattern including saints such as Abraham, Joseph, Moses, Jeremiah, and Baruch. Abraham made mistakes in Egypt. Joseph was unjustly imprisoned there. Moses committed murder there and struggled against Pharaoh and his minions to mobilize his people to leave. Jeremiah and Baruch were kidnapped and brought to Egypt.

None of these saints, however, lacked the attention of God, who remained faithful to them in times of upheaval. This did not cause their pain to go away. Their lives were gifts in service to the Lord in and through the difficulties. And through their difficulties God formed disciples. No wonder that the idiom for Baruch is that his life is a prize of war. It is certainly given to him in the midst of struggle.

In Baruch's case, he assisted in the formation of a book that now instructs us all. That is his greatest gift.

Introduction to Jeremiah 46–51

LIKE OTHER PROPHETIC BOOKS, Jeremiah contains a series of prophecies (or oracles) about other nations. And as with these other books, Jeremiah's oracles are largely collected into one section (Jer. 46–51; cf. 25:19–26). The location of the collected oracles, however, is one of the biggest differences between the Hebrew and Greek versions of the book. In the Greek versions, the oracles against the nations come after 25:13.2 Moreover, the order of the oracles differs somewhat between the versions. The Hebrew manuscripts begin with oracles against Egypt, while the Greek begins with the oracle against Elam.

English versions of the Bible generally follow the chapter arrangements of the Hebrew Bible (the Masoretic Text). This is not necessarily the earliest order of the oracles or placement in a Jeremiah book. Scholars cannot say with certainty what was the original order or placement in the larger collection. Indeed, that question is not nearly as important as that of the collection's contents. Possibly the prophet's oracles against the nations circulated in more than one order from an early time in their literary history.³ In fact, most likely some of the oracles were given individually and only later assembled into a literary collection.

Scholars are divided over which institutions in ancient Israel fostered the public utterance of such prophecies and thereby helped shape their form and concerns. The two most prominent suggestions are cultic festivals, when communities gathered for worship, or councils assembled for war.⁴ Both settings were locations where presentations about God's judgment or curses against evildoers would be made. Prophets and priests are naturally associated with cultic festivals as well as with the public decisions about going to war (cf. 1 Kings 22). In the case of Jeremiah 46–51, the oracles preserve almost nothing about their institutional setting(s). They sit like an appendix at the end of the book, preserving only a few clues as to their origin in the prophet's ministry.

A handful of chronological indicators are preserved in the oracles. For example, 46:2 provides a date that prompted a prophecy against Egypt (605 B.C.), and 49:34 refers to a prophecy early in Zedekiah's reign (597 B.C.).

Thus, what has been said about the book of Jeremiah as a whole also applies to the collection of the oracles about the nations: The prophecies were gathered over a period of time and were placed together because of their common focus on other peoples. They preserve much of their oral flavor but little of the life-settings in Jeremiah's ministry. As a published collection, they bear the marks of editing, such as brief introductory formulae and (apparently) some elaboration/updating in the final text.⁵

The purpose of the collection of oracles in Jeremiah 46–51 appears to be to preserve for posterity the prophet's words about God's judgment in the historical process. Martial language is replete throughout the oracles,⁶ which depict God's wrath as operating through the warfare between neighboring states. Individually and as a collection, these oracles demonstrate the designation of Jeremiah as "a prophet to the nations" (1:5). They presuppose that God is the Lord of history and the moral Judge (and potential Deliverer) of all peoples.

These prophecies are not to be read as blueprints for international events to come in the late seventh/early sixth centuries B.C. any more than they are to be read as blueprints for the twenty-first century A.D. They do indicate elements of historical relations during Jeremiah's day, but more fundamentally they indicate God's resolve to judge idolatry, hubris, and cruelty through the historical process and his intention to use that same process to reveal his glory. In this regard the oracles about the nations function like the prophecies to Israel, Judah, and Jerusalem. They mediate judgment (actualized or to come) and, in some cases, indicate the possibilities of restoration and renewal.

Jeremiah's prophecies about other nations have within them some words addressed to or about God's people (e.g., 46:27–28; 50:4–5, 17–20; 51:5–10). Also, at the end of chapter 51 comes a prose account of instructions that Jeremiah gave to Seraiah, Baruch's brother, when Seraiah went to Babylon on a diplomatic mission (51:59–64). Seraiah was to take a scroll with written prophecies about Babylon, tie a stone to the scroll, and then throw it in the Euphrates River as a sign that Babylon would sink like the weighted scroll.

Not only should the oracles about the nations in Jeremiah be read in conjunction with oracles about Judah and Jerusalem, but also the fate of the nations themselves cannot finally be separated from what God has in store for his covenant people. Judgment and deliverance alike belong to God. Indeed, judgment on the nations is mere preparation for the announcement of good news that will be spread among them by early Christians (see below).

The prophecies about the nations come in the following sequence:

About Egypt	46:2–26
A word to God's people	46:27–28
About the Philistines	47:1–7
About Moab	48:1–47
About Ammon	49:1–6
About Edom	49:7–22
About Damascus	49:23–27
About Kedar (Arabs)	49:28–33
About Elam	49:34–39
About Babylon	50:1-51:64

A recent phenomenon from the Middle East may help modern readers understand the role of the oracles against neighbor states in Jeremiah 46–51. In 1990 hostilities broke out in the region when Iraq threatened and then invaded Kuwait. Eventually several Western nations were drawn into the fray in what became known as the Gulf War. The struggle between Kuwait and Iraq was carried out in more ways than through fighting or diplomatic wrangling. Both states also carried on a propaganda war by several means, including the hiring of bedouin poets who adapted classical Arabic verse on the radio to sting the opposition. The oracles or poems announced divine judgment on the enemy, and their authors used sarcasm and parody in order to belittle the opposition. The poets' efforts became popular radio programs, and both Kuwaiti and Iraqi poets competed for acclaim as the best in concocting such oracles. "Going public" with such oracles stated a case against the opponent and set them up for the predicted fall to come.

Jeremiah's oracles against neighbor states also adapted classical forms of Hebrew poetry used for oracles against nations since at least the time of Amos. These oracles too announce divine judgment and use sarcasm to reveal the hubris and cruelty of the opponents. They are witnesses against injustice as well as advocates of justice to be meted out by God.

One of the striking things about these oracles in Jeremiah (and in the other prophetic books) is that they are primarily concerned with God's just judgment to come. They offer a vantage point of universal judgment on Gentiles (= nations) for such matters as their oppression of God's people or of their more general inhumanity in conduct. It is instructive to put this emphasis beside that of the New Testament when the latter addresses the fate of the nations. The New Testament documents have two major foci in this regard. (1) The nations will be judged by God and by the risen Christ. One sees this most clearly in Jesus' teaching, both in apocalyptic discourses (e.g., Matt. 24; Mark 13; Luke 21) and elsewhere (e.g., Matt. 25; Luke 10:1–15). The New Testament letters also reflect this conviction (e.g., 2 Peter 3:1–13; Rev. 19:11–21).

(2) The gospel of redemption through the death and resurrection of Christ is to be preached among the nations because Jew and Gentile alike are called to repent and to receive new life in Christ (e.g., Acts 3:17–26; Rom. 15:7–22; Rev. 5:9–10). In speaking about the gospel among the nations, the New Testament sometimes refers to the Old Testament promise that through Abraham's seed "all peoples on earth will be blessed" (Gen. 12:3) or that Israel is to be "a light for the Gentiles" (Isa. 49:6).8

By way of summary, the oracles against the nations in the Old Testament prophets are part of a larger biblical concern. They set up standards of judgment and express concern for justice and the need for repentance. The broader biblical concern for the salvation of the nations is predicated on their need for repentance and the gift of God's transforming grace.

¹This is the word of the LORD that came to Jeremiah the prophet concerning the nations:

²Concerning Egypt:

This is the message against the army of Pharaoh Neco king of Egypt, which was defeated at Carchemish on the Euphrates River by Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon in the fourth year of Jehoiakim son of Josiah king of Judah:

³"Prepare your shields, both large and small, and march out for battle! ⁴Harness the horses. mount the steeds! Take your positions with helmets on! Polish your spears, put on your armor! ⁵What do I see? They are terrified, they are retreating, their warriors are defeated. They flee in haste without looking back, and there is terror on every side," declares the LORD. 6"The swift cannot flee nor the strong escape. In the north by the River Euphrates they stumble and fall. ⁷"Who is this that rises like the Nile, like rivers of surging waters? ⁸Egypt rises like the Nile,

She says, 'I will rise and cover the earth; I will destroy cities and their people.' March on, O warriors—men of Cush and Put who carry shields,

men of Lydia who draw the bow.

¹⁰But that day belongs to the Lord, the LORD Almighty—

a day of vengeance, for vengeance on his foes.

The sword will devour till it is satisfied, till it has quenched its thirst with blood.

For the Lord, the LORD Almighty, will offer sacrifice in the land of the north by the Piver in the land of the north by the River Euphrates.

11"Go up to Gilead and get balm, O Virgin Daughter of Egypt.

But you multiply remedies in vain; there is no healing for you.

¹²The nations will hear of your shame; your cries will fill the earth.

One warrior will stumble over another; both will fall down together."

¹³This is the message the LORD spoke to Jeremiah the prophet about the coming of Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon to attack Egypt:

14"Announce this in Egypt, and proclaim it in Migdol; proclaim it also in Memphis and Tahpanhes:

'Take your positions and get ready, for the sword devours those around you.'

¹⁵Why will your warriors be laid low?

They cannot stand, for the LORD will push them down.

¹⁶They will stumble repeatedly; they will fall over each other.

They will say, 'Get up, let us go back to our own people and our native lands, away from the sword of the oppressor.'

17There they will exclaim,
'Pharaoh king of Egypt is only a loud noise;
he has missed his opportunity.'

18"As surely as I live," declares the King, whose name is the LORD Almighty,
"one will come who is like Tabor among the mountains, like Carmel by the sea.
19 Pack your belongings for exile, you who live in Egypt, for Memphis will be laid waste and lie in ruins without inhabitant.

20"Egypt is a beautiful heifer, but a gadfly is coming against her from the north.
21The mercenaries in her ranks are like fattened calves.

They too will turn and flee together, they will not stand their ground, for the day of disaster is coming upon them, the time for them to be punished.

²²Egypt will hiss like a fleeing serpent as the enemy advances in force; they will come against her with axes, like men who cut down trees.

²³They will chop down her forest," declares the LORD,

"dense though it be.

They are more numerous than locusts, they cannot be counted.

²⁴The Daughter of Egypt will be put to shame, handed over to the people of the north."

²⁵The LORD Almighty, the God of Israel, says: "I am about to bring punishment on Amon god of Thebes, on Pharaoh, on Egypt and her gods and her kings, and on those who rely on Pharaoh. ²⁶I will hand them over to those who seek their lives, to Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon and his officers. Later, however, Egypt will be inhabited as in times past," declares the LORD.

²⁷"Do not fear, O Jacob my servant;
do not be dismayed, O Israel.
I will surely save you out of a distant place, your descendants from the land of their exile.

Jacob will again have peace and security, and no one will make him afraid.

²⁸Do not fear, O Jacob my servant, for I am with you," declares the LORD.

"Though I completely destroy all the nations among which I scatter you, I will not completely destroy you. I will discipline you but only with justice; I will not let you go entirely unpunished."

^{47:1}This is the word of the LORD that came to Jeremiah the prophet concerning the Philistines before Pharaoh attacked Gaza:

²This is what the LORD says:

"See how the waters are rising in the north;

they will become an overflowing torrent.

They will overflow the land and everything in it, the towns and those who live in them.

The people will cry out;

all who dwell in the land will wail

³at the sound of the hoofs of galloping steeds, at the noise of enemy chariots and the rumble of their wheels.

Fathers will not turn to help their children; their hands will hang limp.

⁴For the day has come to destroy all the Philistines and to cut off all survivors who could help Tyre and Sidon.

The LORD is about to destroy the

The LORD is about to destroy the Philistines, the remnant from the coasts of Caphtor.

⁵Gaza will shave her head in mourning; Ashkelon will be silenced.

O remnant on the plain, how long will you cut yourselves?

6...'Ah, sword of the LORD,' you cry, 'how long till you rest?

Return to your scabbard; cease and be still.'

⁷But how can it rest when the LORD has commanded it, when he has ordered it to attack Ashkelon and the coast?"

^{48:1}Concerning Moab:

This is what the LORD Almighty, the God of Israel, says:

"Woe to Nebo, for it will be ruined.

Kiriathaim will be disgraced and captured;
the stronghold will be disgraced and shattered.

²Moab will be praised no more; in Heshbon men will plot her downfall:

'Come, let us put an end to that nation.'

You too, O Madmen, will be silenced; the sword will pursue you.

³Listen to the cries from Horonaim, cries of great havoc and destruction.

⁴Moab will be broken; her little ones will cry out.

⁵They go up the way to Luhith, weeping bitterly as they go; on the road down to Horonaim anguished cries over the destruction are heard.

⁶Flee! Run for your lives; become like a bush in the desert.

⁷Since you trust in your deeds and riches, you too will be taken captive, and Chemosh will go into exile, together with his priests and officials.

8The destroyer will come against every town, and not a town will escape.
The valley will be ruined and the plateau destroyed, because the LORD has spoken.
9Dut selt on Mooh

⁹Put salt on Moab, for she will be laid waste; her towns will become desolate, with no one to live in them.

¹⁰"A curse on him who is lax in doing the LORD's work!

A curse on him who keeps his sword from bloodshed!

11"Moab has been at rest from youth, like wine left on its dregs, not poured from one jar to another—she has not gone into exile.

So she tastes as she did, and her aroma is unchanged.

¹²But days are coming," declares the LORD,

"when I will send men who pour from jars, and they will pour her out;

they will empty her jars and smash her jugs.

¹³Then Moab will be ashamed of Chemosh, as the house of Israel was ashamed when they trusted in Bethel.

14"How can you say, 'We are warriors, men valiant in battle'?

¹⁵Moab will be destroyed and her towns invaded;

her finest young men will go down in the slaughter," declares the King, whose name is the LORD Almighty.

16"The fall of Moab is at hand; her calamity will come quickly.

¹⁷Mourn for her, all who live around her, all who know her fame;

say, 'How broken is the mighty scepter, how broken the glorious staff!'

18"Come down from your glory and sit on the parched ground, O inhabitants of the Daughter of Dibon, for he who destroys Moab will come up against you and ruin your fortified cities.

¹⁹Stand by the road and watch, you who live in Aroer.

Ask the man fleeing and the woman escaping, ask them, 'What has happened?'

²⁰Moab is disgraced, for she is shattered. Wail and cry out!

Announce by the Arnon that Moab is destroyed.

²¹Judgment has come to the plateau to Holon, Jahzah and Mephaath, ²²to Dibon, Nebo and Beth Diblathaim,

²³to Kiriathaim, Beth Gamul and Beth Meon,

²⁴to Kerioth and Bozrah to all the towns of Moab, far and near.

²⁵Moab's horn is cut off; her arm is broken."

declares the LORD.

²⁶"Make her drunk,

for she has defied the LORD.

Let Moab wallow in her vomit;
let her be an object of ridicule.

27Was not Israel the object of you

²⁷Was not Israel the object of your ridicule?

Was she caught among thieves, that you shake your head in scorn whenever you speak of her?

²⁸Abandon your towns and dwell among the rocks, you who live in Moab.

Be like a dove that makes its nest at the mouth of a cave.

29"We have heard of Moab's pride—her overweening pride and conceit, her pride and arrogance and the haughtiness of her heart.
30I know her insolence but it is futile,"

declares the LORD,

"and her boasts accomplish nothing.

Therefore I wail over Moab,for all Moab I cry out,I moan for the men of Kir Hareseth.

32I weep for you, as Jazer weeps, O vines of Sibmah.

Your branches spread as far as the sea; they reached as far as the sea of Jazer.

The destroyer has fallen on your ripened fruit and grapes.

³³Joy and gladness are gone from the orchards and fields of Moab.

I have stopped the flow of wine from the presses;

no one treads them with shouts of joy.

Although there are shouts, they are not shouts of joy.

34"The sound of their cry rises from Heshbon to Elealeh and Jahaz, from Zoar as far as Horonaim and Eglath Shelishiyah, for even the waters of Nimrim are dried up.

35In Moab I will put an end to those who make offerings on the high places and burn incense to their gods,"
declares the LORD.

³⁶"So my heart laments for Moab like a flute;

it laments like a flute for the men of Kir Hareseth.

The wealth they acquired is gone.

³⁷Every head is shaved and every beard cut off; every hand is slashed and every waist is covered with sackcloth.

38On all the roofs in Moab and in the public squares there is nothing but mourning, for I have broken Moab like a jar that no one wants," declares the LORD.

39"How shattered she is! How they wail! How Moab turns her back in shame! Moab has become an object of ridicule, an object of horror to all those around her."

⁴⁰This is what the LORD says:

"Look! An eagle is swooping down, spreading its wings over Moab.

⁴¹Kerioth will be captured and the strongholds taken. In that day the hearts of Moab's warriors will be like the heart of a woman in labor.

⁴³Terror and pit and snare await you, O people of Moab,"

declares the LORD.

44"Whoever flees from the terror will fall into a pit, whoever climbs out of the pit will be caught in a snare; for I will bring upon Moab the year of her punishment,"

declares the LORD.

45"In the shadow of Heshbon the fugitives stand helpless, for a fire has gone out from Heshbon,
a blaze from the midst of Sihon;
it burns the foreheads of Moab,
the skulls of the noisy boasters.

46Woe to you, O Moab!
The people of Chemosh are destroyed;
your sons are taken into exile and your daughters into captivity.

⁴⁷"Yet I will restore the fortunes of Moab in days to come,"

declares the LORD.

Here ends the judgment on Moab.

^{49:1}Concerning the Ammonites:

This is what the LORD says:

"Has Israel no sons? Has she no heirs?

Why then has Molech taken possession of Gad?

Why do his people live in its towns?

²But the days are coming," declares the LORD,

"when I will sound the battle cry against Rabbah of the Ammonites;

it will become a mound of ruins, and its surrounding villages will be set on fire.

Then Israel will drive out those who drove her out,"

says the LORD.

3"Wail, O Heshbon, for Ai is destroyed!
Cry out, O inhabitants of Rabbah!
Put on sackcloth and mourn;
rush here and there inside the walls,
for Molech will go into exile, together with his priests and officials.

⁴Why do you boast of your valleys, boast of your valleys so fruitful?

O unfaithful daughter, you trust in your riches and say, 'Who will attack me?'

⁵I will bring terror on you from all those around you," declares the Lord, the LORD Almighty.

"Every one of you will be driven away, and no one will gather the fugitives.

6"Yet afterward, I will restore the fortunes of the Ammonites,"

declares the LORD.

⁷Concerning Edom:

This is what the LORD Almighty says:

"Is there no longer wisdom in Teman? Has counsel perished from the prudent? Has their wisdom decayed? ⁸Turn and flee, hide in deep caves, vou who live in Dedan, for I will bring disaster on Esau at the time I punish him. ⁹If grape pickers came to you, would they not leave a few grapes? If thieves came during the night, would they not steal only as much as they wanted? ¹⁰But I will strip Esau bare; I will uncover his hiding places, so that he cannot conceal himself. His children, relatives and neighbors will perish, and he will be no more. ¹¹Leave your orphans; I will protect their lives. Your widows too can trust in me."

12This is what the LORD says: "If those who do not deserve to drink the cup must drink it, why should you go unpunished? You will not go unpunished, but must drink it. ¹³I swear by myself," declares the LORD, "that Bozrah will become a ruin and an object of horror, of reproach and of cursing; and all its towns will be in ruins forever."

¹⁴I have heard a message from the LORD: An envoy was sent to the nations to say,

"Assemble yourselves to attack it! Rise up for battle!"

15"Now I will make you small among the nations, despised among men.

¹⁶The terror you inspire and the pride of your heart have deceived you, you who live in the clefts of the rocks, who occupy the heights of the hill.

Though you build your nest as high as the eagle's, from there I will bring you down," declares the LORD.

17"Edom will become an object of horror; all who pass by will be appalled and will scoff because of all its wounds.

¹⁸As Sodom and Gomorrah were overthrown, along with their neighboring towns," says the LORD,

"so no one will live there; no man will dwell in it.

19"Like a lion coming up from Jordan's thickets to a rich pastureland,

I will chase Edom from its land in an instant.

Who is the chosen one I will appoint for this?

Who is like me and who can challenge me?
And what shepherd can stand against me?"

²⁰Therefore, hear what the LORD has planned against Edom, what he has purposed against those who live in Teman:

The young of the flock will be dragged away;

he will completely destroy their pasture because of them.

²¹At the sound of their fall the earth will tremble; their cry will resound to the Red Sea.

²²Look! An eagle will soar and swoop down, spreading its wings over Bozrah.

In that day the hearts of Edom's warriors will be like the heart of a woman in labor.

²³Concerning Damascus:

"Hamath and Arpad are dismayed, for they have heard bad news.

They are disheartened, troubled like the restless sea.

²⁴Damascus has become feeble, she has turned to flee and panic has gripped her; anguish and pain have seized her, pain like that of a woman in labor.

²⁵Why has the city of renown not been abandoned, the town in which I delight?

²⁶Surely, her young men will fall in the streets:

all her soldiers will be silenced in that day," declares the LORD Almighty.

²⁸Concerning Kedar and the kingdoms of Hazor, which Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon attacked:

This is what the LORD says:

"Arise, and attack Kedar and destroy the people of the East.

²⁹Their tents and their flocks will be taken; their shelters will be carried off with all their goods and camels.

Men will shout to them,

'Terror on every side!'

30"Flee quickly away!
Stay in deep caves, you who live in Hazor,"

declares the LORD.

"Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon has plotted against you; he has devised a plan against you.

31"Arise and attack a nation at ease, which lives in confidence,"

declares the LORD,

"a nation that has neither gates nor bars; its people live alone.

32Their camels will become plunder, and their large herds will be booty.

I will scatter to the winds those who are in distant places and will bring disaster on them from every side,"

declares the LORD.

33"Hazor will become a haunt of jackals, a desolate place forever. No one will live there; no man will dwell in it."

³⁴This is the word of the LORD that came to Jeremiah the prophet concerning Elam, early in the reign of Zedekiah king of Judah:

35This is what the LORD Almighty says:

"See, I will break the bow of Elam, the mainstay of their might.

³⁶I will bring against Elam the four winds from the four quarters of the heavens;

I will scatter them to the four winds, and there will not be a nation where Elam's exiles do not go.

37I will shatter Elam before their foes, before those who seek their lives; I will bring disaster upon them, even my fierce anger,"

declares the LORD.

"I will pursue them with the sword until I have made an end of them.

³⁸I will set my throne in Elam and destroy her king and officials," declares the LORD.

³⁹"Yet I will restore the fortunes of Elam in days to come,"

declares the LORD.

Original Meaning

46:1.9 THERE ARE two prophecies against Egypt:10 46:2–12 and 46:14–26. Only the first one is dated. The fourth year of Jehoiakim was 605 B.C., the year of the fateful battle at Carchemish (in northern Syria) between the forces of Pharaoh Neco and of Nebuchadnezzar (mentioned explicitly in 46:26). The Egyptians were routed, and Babylon began the process of claiming hegemony over the states in the eastern Mediterranean. Egyptian demise is predicted as part of the judgment in the historical process but not the end of the Egyptians themselves.

46:2–12. This oracle is directed to the army of Pharaoh Neco. In 609 B.C. Pharaoh's army had marched from Egypt toward Syria in order to join forces with the remnants of the Assyrian army and to oppose the emerging power of Babylon. At that time Josiah had attempted to head off the Egyptian army at Megiddo and was mortally wounded in the unsuccessful effort to thwart the Egyptian advance (2 Kings 23:29–30; 2 Chron. 35:20–24).

As noted above, the date of this oracle against the Egyptian army is the fourth year of Jehoiakim (605 B.C.). Jehoiakim was the Egyptian choice among Josiah's sons to follow his father in rule. The martial language of the oracle depicts elements of the Egyptian army preparing to fight and then fleeing in terror. Furthermore, the boastful pride of the Egyptians is described in imperialistic terms (v. 8), only to be reversed by divine judgment on a day that "belongs to the LORD" (v. 10). It is a day of vengeance to be directed against the Lord's foes, of which Egypt is one. In fact, the language of judgment on that decisive day is described in sacrificial terms.

Egypt is also described in familial terms as "Virgin Daughter" (v. 11). She who seeks a balm in Gilead will find that there is no healing for her.

46:13–26. Verse 13 is a prose introduction to the prophecy that follows. Unlike the companion oracle in 46:2–12, this prophecy is undated. Nebuchadnezzar did not invade Egypt until 570 B.C., late in his reign, but there were periodic encounters of various kinds between Egypt and Babylon throughout Jeremiah's lifetime. Essentially the prophecy announces that Babylon will work God's judgment on Egypt. At a basic interpretive level, such a claim is little different from those Jeremiah directed at Judah. In both instances Babylon and Nebuchadnezzar serve as the rod of historical judgment used by the Lord.

The disastrous event is a day in the future (v. 21). For some in Egypt it will be defeat and exile. As in the previous oracle, Egypt is personified as a female ("Daughter ... Egypt," v. 24)," who will be put to shame by a people from the north. Part of the judgment to come is directed at Amon, one of the Egyptian deities (v. 25). Judgment, however, is not the end of Egypt as a nation; it will again be inhabited (v. 26).

46:27–28. Following the oracles against Egypt is a prediction of the restoration of God's people. Those on whom God's judgment has fallen have been disciplined justly, but in his mercy God will not make an end of them. Correspondingly, those whom God used to discipline his people (such as the Egyptians) will suffer the fate of those whose hubris, cruelty, and idolatry have kept them from acknowledging the work of God.

47:1–7. The Philistines¹² lived in some of the cities on the coast of Palestine. They had been neighbors and often enemies of Judah since the days of the judges. They were immigrants to the area, having come from some of the Aegean islands and southwestern Turkey in the twelfth century B.C.

Two Philistine cities are named here: Gaza and Ashkelon. The occasion for the oracle against the Philistines possibly comes with Nebuchadnezzar's preparations to attack Gaza (cf. v. 2, "waters ... rising in the north"). No extrabiblical records survive of a Babylonian attack on Gaza, but it is completely understandable that the Babylonians either fought against Gaza and subdued it or received the city's surrender. Gaza was a trading center and an important point of contact between Egypt, the states immediately to the north and east (e.g., Judah, Moab), and the Arab tribes from Sinai and the fringes of sedentary existence.

The assault in question could have been perpetrated by the Egyptians between 609 B.C., when Necho moved from Egypt to north Syria and 605, when the Egyptians were defeated at Carchemish. A first reading of 47:1 refers explicitly to an attack by an unnamed Pharaoh. There are two problems with this interpretation, although neither are insurmountable: (1) The Greek version of this verse omits the reference to the Pharaoh; (2) there is no record of an Egyptian attack on Gaza or Ashkelon in the period 609 and later. According to Herodotus (Histories 2.157) the Pharaoh before Necho did attack the Philistine city of Ashdod at some point before 610 B.C. At the present state of knowledge, therefore, it is difficult to place this oracle in a specific historical context, but there are several plausible options because of frequent military actions in the region.

In form and vocabulary, the oracle against the Philistines is similar to the preceding oracles against Egypt. The Philistines will be defeated on some future day (v. 4). People will mourn for Gaza and Ashkelon. God's historical judgment is personified through a poetic address to his sword (v. 6).

48:1–25. The Moabites¹³ receive an extensive address in 48:1–47 that preserves a significant knowledge of geography. Over twenty different cities (settlements) are named in the poetic indictment of Judah's eastern neighbor. Moab occupied much of the tableland east of the Dead Sea. According to Genesis 19:30–38, a drunken Lot slept with his two daughters, and as a result they bore Moab and Ben-Ammi.¹⁴ The child named Moab is the ancestor of the Moabite people. Thus the Moabites and Israelites were distant relatives. Later, David's family was related to the Moabites through Ruth, his great-grandmother (Ruth 4:13–22). Solomon married a Moabite princess and built for her a temple to Chemosh, the chief Moabite deity, on the hill east of the temple mount in Jerusalem (1 Kings 11:7).

The repetition of a concluding prophetic formula ("declares the LORD") in 48:25, 30, 35, 38, 43, 44, 47 suggests that more than one prophetic announcement has been collected in Jeremiah 48. Correspondingly, Isaiah 15–16 has lengthy prophecies against Moab, from which some of this material in Jeremiah has been derived and elaborated upon.

Apart from 48:1a and the last phrase of verse 25, this long section does not have introductory or concluding formulae to break up the sequence of verses. It is possible that 48:1b–25 is a single unit of speech, offering mourning language, prediction of judgment and exile, and sarcasm in poetry, all designed to humiliate Moab.

Verse 7 mentions Chemosh. One way to refer to Moab was to call them "the people of Chemosh" (Num. 21:29). He, like his people, will suffer defeat and go into exile. In the future Moab will be ashamed of Chemosh, just as Israel was ashamed when trusting Bethel (v. 13). The name "Bethel" here likely refers to a deity rather than a place. He is known from Assyrian, Babylonian, and Jewish sources.¹⁵

Some of the judgment language in this section is frightful. There are references to salt (v. 9), an agent that ruins agricultural products, and to curses (v. 10) on whoever is lax in doing the Lord's work of execution. As with Egypt and Judah, Jeremiah uses familial language for Moab as a daughter (NIV has "Daughter of Dibon"). Her cities will be ruined, and she will wail a funeral lament. Even physical mutilation is mentioned. Moab's "horn," a metaphor for strength, will be cut off and her arm broken.

48:26–47. These prophecies continue the depiction of Moab's humiliation and degradation. As with the previous oracle, the language is graphic. Moab will wallow in vomit (v. 26), cries of dereliction will be heard (vv. 34, 38), fire will scorch the country (v. 45), and the children of the nation will be taken into exile (v. 46).

So moved is the prophet by the intensity of depicting Moab's downfall that he portrays himself in mourning (vv. 31–32). The historical agent of all this destruction is not named explicitly (see comments below). Moab will be judged because "she defied the LORD" (v. 42).

The last line of these intricate poetic prophecies is one of restoration: God "will restore the fortunes of Moab in days to come" (v. 47). This is the same phrase God uses elsewhere in predicting the restoration of Israel.¹⁶

49:1–6. The oracle against the Ammonites¹⁷ is much briefer than the one against Moab. According to Genesis 19:30–38, Ben-Ammi, the ancestor of the Ammonites, was the incestuous son of Lot. The country of Ammon is located immediately north of Moab and east of the Jordan River. Ammon's chief deity was Milcom. Solomon married an Ammonite princess and built a temple for its worship on the hill east of the temple mount in Jerusalem (1 Kings 11:7). Baalis, king of Ammon at the time of Jerusalem's fall, plotted with Ishmael to murder Gedaliah, the Judean governor appointed by the Babylonians (Jer. 40–41).

Rabbah is the capital city of Ammon. Its remains form part of the impressive citadel at the heart of modern day Amman, Jordan. The judgment to come on Ammon is depicted as defeat and exile. No biblical or Babylonian accounts exist to document an official defeat of Ammon (or Moab), but both states fell under the control of Babylon.¹⁸

In verses 1 and 3 the NIV refers to "Molech" as having taken possession of Gad and then being sent into exile with his priests and officials. Elsewhere in Jeremiah, Molech is the name of the deity to whom child sacrifices are offered in Judah (32:35; cf. Lev. 20:2–5; 2 Kings 23:10). The NIV translators have rendered the Hebrew term malkam (lit., "their king") in 49:1, 3 as Molech, based on the reference to Molech as the Ammonite deity in 1 Kings 11:7 (but cf. NIV note). This seemingly logical move, however, concerns a complicated matter over which considerable uncertainty remains.

As a name, Molech is a polemical hybrid because it combines the consonants of the word king (m-l-k) with the vowels from the word "shame." Molech and Milcom have the same consonants. In comparing the biblical references to Molech, it is not clear whether Milcom is the same deity as Molech. Jeremiah also refers to the deity of child sacrifice as Baal (Jer. 19:5). In brief, the Hebrew term malkam in 49:1, 3 can be rendered "their king," "Milcom," or (by inference from 1 Kings 11:7) "Molech." ¹⁹

As with Moab (with whom the Ammonites are sometimes linked), the Lord promises to restore the fortunes of Ammon.²⁰

49:7–22. Edom²¹ lies south of Moab in a high and remote region of Transjordan. It too will fall in judgment. Like Ammon and Moab, the Edomites are related to God's people—in their case, through Esau (Gen. 36). Esau is mentioned explicitly in Jeremiah 49:8, 10 as a synonym for Edom. The bitterness reflected in the relationship between Jacob and Esau was reflected later in the relationship between Judah and Edom in the days of Jeremiah and into the postexilic period. According to the lamentation of Psalm 137:7, Edom gleefully celebrated the fall of Jerusalem. A main goal of the short prophetic book of Obadiah is the announcement of judgment on Edom (cf. Mal. 1:2–5). Unlike the prophecies to Moab and Ammon, Jeremiah makes no reference to Edom's restoration.²²

The polemic against Edom begins with a reference to wisdom. Those who lived east of Palestine were celebrated as wise (cf. Job 1:3). Jeremiah's polemic against the Edomites depicts its day of judgment as the loss or failure of its wisdom. The region of Dedan (v. 8) is in the Arabian desert, but its inhabitants were linked with Edom through trade.

Bozrah (vv. 13, 22) is the capital city of Edom. Its ruins are located near the modern Jordanian village of Buseirah. Bozrah will drink the cup of wrath.²³ Edom's strongholds on mountains and in cliffs will not save them from destruction. Verse 19 depicts God as a lion coming upon Edom. His plan is to destroy them, which will come on a day that strikes fear into the heart of a warrior.

49:23–27. Damascus²⁴ (i.e., the capital of Aramean southern Syria) is another object of prophetic judgment. Perhaps Damascus is named among the oracles because of the Aramean raids reported in 2 Kings 24:2. Damascus suffered devastating attacks from the Assyrians in the ninth and eighth centuries because it was a persistent ringleader in the region for anti-Assyrian activities. History repeated itself when Babylon took Damascus.

Hamath and Arpad, two cities in northern Syria, are named in this oracle as regional cities who will be dismayed by the bad news of judgment to fall on the area. Damascus is personified as a weak woman with pain like that which comes with labor. The reference to Ben-Hadad (v. 27) comes in an "update" of Amos's prophecy (Amos 1:3–4) against Damascus. Hadad is a well-known Aramean deity, and the name Ben-Hadad designates a king as the adopted "son" (ben means "son") of the deity. Several kings from Damascus had this name/title (e.g., 2 Kings 6:24).

49:28–33. Kedar²⁵ is a region of northern Arabia; the Kedarites are mentioned in Psalm 120:5 and Isaiah 42:11. Hazor is something of a mystery since no location with that name is known in northern Arabia.²⁶ In any case, Kedar and Hazor most likely refer to Arab tribesmen who were attacked by the Babylonians in Nebuchadnezzar's sixth year (winter of 599 B.C.).²⁷ The "people of the East" are associated with Kedar. They live in tents, travel using camels, and keep sheep and goats. These peoples are known in other sources as Arabs.²⁸

49:34–39. The prophecy against Elam²⁹ is dated early in the reign of Zedekiah. Just why Elam is singled out is a mystery. In the Greek version of the oracles, Elam comes first. Perhaps the reason Elam is cited is that it was the object of a campaign by Nebuchadnezzar. If so, only suggestive evidence survives regarding the campaign. Elam will also be restored by God. As with other matters of grace, no merit or reason is cited for this announcement.

Bridging Contexts

THEOLOGY BEHIND THE ORACLES. The fact that the oracles against the nations are collected together and placed at the end of the book of Jeremiah suggests that they are preserved as witnesses to God's sovereign justice and are to be read and pondered by those who come after the prophet. They demonstrate that Jeremiah was a prophet to the nations. Some of the things they announce (e.g., Egypt's capitulation to Babylon or Moab's forced acceptance of foreign domination) give evidence for the ongoing efficacy of God's Word in shaping and interpreting history. Other elements (e.g., the hubris of Ammon) indicate what kind of attitudes and activities are displeasing to the Lord.

With proper acknowledgment of the contingent and the particular, these oracles continue to bear witness to the outworking of God's Word and against the corporate character traits that God disdains. They are valuable for more than simply compiling a checklist to see how and when, or if, judgment befell the nations addressed. Like all announcements of judgment, these oracles get the attention of audiences and warn them; they may serve other tasks than as simple predictors of what must unalterably come to pass.

Two assumptions of the oracles can be transferred to different times and places. (1) They assume without argument that God is the Creator of the broader historical process in which the nations find themselves. This is tantamount to the claim that God is Creator of the world, since creation in the Bible is not simply about a past act but about the ongoing interaction with God and the historical process. For example, God may employ the Egyptians for purposes unknown by them, and he may work through them to accomplish future plans.

(2) The oracles assume that there are recognized standards of conduct to which any group may be held accountable. God has the right to judge the nations, his standards are just, and he may restore the nations as part of a future in which his mercy is as surprising as his judgment.

Prophecy in this mode plays the role of protest against institutional injustice. It is Egypt as a nation and Ammon as a collection of tribes who are judged by God. In some ways the oracles against nations are the most public form of theological discourse in the Old Testament because they use moral standards by which to evaluate public policies and state-sponsored activities on an international scale.

Restoration possible. The oracles against the nations in Jeremiah should be read in light of other prophetic oracles against nations and also in light of the missionary concern of the New Testament that the gospel be preached among all nations.³⁰ Thus, one function of the Old Testament oracles is to indicate the "fallen" condition of institutional life and the need for both moral strictures and a mercy that leads to repentance and new life.

Even though the predominant note of the oracles in the Old Testament toward the nations is negative—that is, they have been weighed in the balance of divine justice and found wanting—it is crucial to note that the redeemed in John's vision come from every tribe and tongue (Rev. 5:9–10; cf. Dan. 7:14). God's sovereignty over the nations does not leave them without hope and fit only for retributive justice; in the good news of the New Testament (anticipated by the mysterious restoration passages in the oracles against the nations) the nations find healing for their sicknesses and spiritual strength to overcome the horrors of their inhumanity.

Contemporary Significance

Public Morality. Early in 1999 NATO forces made the decision to attack Yugoslavia because of charges that Serbian forces sponsored by Yugoslavia were involved in the "ethnic cleansing" of the Kosovo province where ethnic Albanians live. The Kosovo Albanians are predominantly Muslim in religion while the Serbs are predominately Orthodox Christians. The government rhetoric emanating from Washington was harsh on the Serbs and the Yugoslavian president, Slobodan Milosevic. We can debate the accuracy of the charges made by NATO or the Serbs, but the rhetoric is instructive in the ways in which standards of behavior are publicly and internationally judged.

A broad debate in the United States over the behavior of President Clinton centered around the issue of private versus public morality. The charges against the Serbs was that they had violated international standards of conduct and that their treatment of persons in their country could not be considered a private matter. To be sure, there are differences between the behavior of one public figure with citizens and that of an army against its own citizens, but the debate over moral standards and their application to public policies was similar.

Christians may differ over the degree to which they wanted President Clinton to answer for his indiscretions and over the way in which they wished to hold President Milosevic accountable in the international arena for actions taken against his own people. But Christians cannot give in to the argument that private indiscretions or internal oppressions are off-limits to broader scrutiny and evaluation. God is a moral Judge, and there are no "purely" private acts or internal policies that lack wider implications.

Interestingly, in the fall of 2000 Yugoslavian citizens took to the streets to denounce the way that Milosevic had attempted to thwart a democratic election process. Eventually he was forced out of the presidency. Many churches in Yugoslavia supported the nonviolent protests against Milosevic. Justice in corporate terms is never perfect or final, but because God is committed to it, God's people should be committed to it.

Christians in North America must face up to the fact that it is increasingly difficult (some would say philosophically and practically impossible) to have public discussions about the moral nature of public acts. It is difficult enough to have the discussion in the church! In broader society the pluralism is so vast that discussion is very, very difficult. The long tradition of oracles against the nations in the Old Testament are reminders, however, that God is not mocked. The wheels of justice employed by God may grind slowly and leave much unanswered from the limited vantage point of any generation, but a glance at the long histories of Egypt or Rome are solemn reminders that political power itself is no guarantee of right or continuing might.

For all of their particularity and stridency, the oracles against the nations are a good catalyst for the kind of discussions that Christians need to have about public values and their place in institutional life. The oracles put the emphasis on God, who evaluates rather than seeks an easy consensus on what the values are. Perhaps in North American society one cannot get consensus on the values, but this should not stop Christians from claiming that normative values exist and that they play an important role in the moral evaluation that history (and ultimately God) provides of nations. History, in this sense, is a penultimate method used by God to bring down the proud and the cruel.

Restoration. Mysterious affirmations come at the end of the oracles against Egypt, Moab, Ammon, and Elam, which proclaim restoration after their judgment. The good news is that God's judgment is often in the service of a wider saving purpose. His church will be comprised of people from every nation. In heaven this joyful fact is part of a song sung by the redeemed (Rev. 5). Should this not also be a song of the church on earth?

After prayer and study, a local congregation in Texas has adopted a plan to engage in mission work in the former Soviet province of Kazakhstan. There are few churches in this large area, which is located to the south of Russia and east of the Caspian Sea. To put it bluntly, the history of the region has been bleak in recent centuries. Most of the inhabitants are nominally Muslim, but the practice of religion was not encouraged in the region when the former USSR controlled it and sought to exploit its resources. When one thinks of the grim history of this broad section of Asia, it is easy to shudder and to wonder about moral purpose and justice in history. Christians, however, are called to look past the failures and dashed hopes that inhabit the region; they are called on to acknowledge the mysteries of God's judgment and rule, but most importantly, to believe that God's glory is to be revealed among the nations.

Attempts to discern meaning and purpose in the fate of nations is a most difficult task. Read any of the oracles against the nations in Jeremiah and one is reminded instantly that injustice and cruelty are constant historical companions. But so are the words of grace and future hope. The Texas congregation that has committed itself to mission work in Kazakhstan is seeking to follow the leading of the Holy Spirit and to be part of the work to which God has called all his people.

¹THIS IS THE WORD the LORD spoke through Jeremiah the prophet concerning Babylon and the land of the Babylonians:

²"Announce and proclaim among the nations, lift up a banner and proclaim it;
keep nothing back, but say,
'Babylon will be captured;
Bel will be put to shame,
Marduk filled with terror.
Her images will be put to shame and her idols filled with terror.'
³A nation from the north will attack her and lay waste her land.

No one will live in it; both men and animals will flee away.

4"In those days, at that time," declares the LORD,
"the people of Israel and the people of Judah together will go in tears to seek the LORD their God.

⁵They will ask the way to Zion and turn their faces toward it.

They will come and bind themselves to the LORD in an everlasting covenant that will not be forgotten.

6"My people have been lost sheep; their shepherds have led them astray and caused them to roam on the mountains.

They wandered over mountain and hill and forgot their own resting place.

7Wheever found them devoured them:

⁷Whoever found them devoured them; their enemies said, 'We are not guilty, for they sinned against the LORD, their true pasture, the LORD, the hope of their fathers.'

8"Flee out of Babylon; leave the land of the Babylonians, and be like the goats that lead the flock.

⁹For I will stir up and bring against Babylon an alliance of great nations from the land of the north. They will take up their positions against her, and from the north she will be captured.

Their arrows will be like skilled warriors who do not return empty-handed.

¹⁰So Babylonia will be plundered; all who plunder her will have their fill,"

declares the LORD.

11"Because you rejoice and are glad, you who pillage my inheritance, because you frolic like a heifer threshing grain and neigh like stallions,
12 your mother will be greatly ashamed; she who gave you birth will be disgraced.

She will be the least of the nations—a wilderness, a dry land, a desert.

¹³Because of the LORD's anger she will not be inhabited but will be completely desolate.

All who pass Babylon will be horrified and scoff because of all her wounds.

¹⁴"Take up your positions around Babylon, all you who draw the bow.

Shoot at her! Spare no arrows, for she has sinned against the LORD.

15Shout against her on every side! She surrenders, her towers fall, her walls are torn down.

Since this is the vengeance of the LORD, take vengeance on her;

do to her as she has done to others.

¹⁶Cut off from Babylon the sower, and the reaper with his sickle at harvest.

Because of the sword of the oppressor let everyone return to his own people, let everyone flee to his own land.

17"Israel is a scattered flock that lions have chased away. The first to devour him was the king of Assyria; the last to crush his bones was Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon."

¹⁸Therefore this is what the LORD Almighty, the God of Israel, says:

"I will punish the king of Babylon and his land as I punished the king of Assyria.

19 But I will bring Israel back to his own pasture and he will graze on Carmel and Bashan; his appetite will be satisfied on the hills of Ephraim and Gilead.

20 In those days, at that time," declares the LORD, "search will be made for Israel's guilt, but there will be none, and for the sins of Judah, but none will be found, for I will forgive the remnant I spare.

²¹"Attack the land of Merathaim and those who live in Pekod.

Pursue, kill and completely destroy them,"

declares the LORD.

"Do everything I have commanded you.

²²The noise of battle is in the land, the noise of great destruction!

²³How broken and shattered is the hammer of the whole earth!

How desolate is Babylon among the nations!

²⁴I set a trap for you, O Babylon,and you were caught before you knew it;

you were found and captured because you opposed the LORD.

²⁵The LORD has opened his arsenal and brought out the weapons of his wrath, for the Sovereign LORD Almighty has work to do in the land of the Babylonians.

²⁶Come against her from afar.
Break open her granaries;
pile her up like heaps of grain.

Completely destroy her and leave her no remnant.

²⁷Kill all her young bulls; let them go down to the slaughter!

Woe to them! For their day has come, the time for them to be punished.

²⁸Listen to the fugitives and refugees from Babylon declaring in Zion how the LORD our God has taken ow the LOKD our God has taken vengeance, vengeance for his temple.

29"Summon archers against Babylon, all those who draw the bow.
Encamp all around her; let no one escape.
Repay her for her deeds; do to her as she has done.
For she has defied the LORD, the Holy One of Israel.
30 Therefore, her young men will fall in the streets; all her soldiers will be silenced in that

declares the LORD.

31"See, I am against you, O arrogant one," declares the Lord, the LORD Almighty,

"for your day has come, the time for you to be punished.

day," 32The arrogant one will stumble and fall and no one will help her up; I will kindle a fire in her towns that will consume all who are around her."

³³This is what the LORD Almighty says:

"The people of Israel are oppressed, and the people of Judah as well.

All their captors hold them fast, refusing to let them go.

34Yet their Redeemer is strong; the LORD Almighty is his name.

He will vigorously defend their cause so that he may bring rest to their land, but unrest to those who live in Babylon.

35"A sword against the Babylonians!" declares the LORD—

"against those who live in Babylon and against her officials and wise men!

³⁶A sword against her false prophets! They will become fools.

A sword against her warriors! They will be filled with terror.

³⁷A sword against her horses and chariots and all the foreigners in her ranks! They will become women.

A sword against her treasures! They will be plundered.

38A drought on her waters!

They will dry up.

For it is a land of idels

For it is a land of idols, idols that will go mad with terror.

39"So desert creatures and hyenas will live there, and there the owl will dwell.
It will never again be inhabited or lived in from generation to generation.

⁴⁰As God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah along with their neighboring towns," declares the LORD,

"so no one will live there; no man will dwell in it.

41"Look! An army is coming from the north; a great nation and many kings are being stirred up from the ends of the earth.

⁴²They are armed with bows and spears; they are cruel and without mercy.

They sound like the roaring sea as they ride on their horses;

they come like men in battle formation to attack you, O Daughter of Babylon.

43The king of Babylon has heard reports about them, and his hands hang limp.

Anguish has gripped him, pain like that of a woman in labor.

⁴⁴Like a lion coming up from Jordan's thickets

to a rich pastureland,

I will chase Babylon from its land in an instant.

Who is the chosen one I will appoint for this?

Who is like me and who can challenge me?
And what shepherd can stand against me?"

⁴⁵Therefore, hear what the LORD has planned against Babylon, what he has purposed against the land of the Babylonians:

The young of the flock will be dragged away;

he will completely destroy their pasture because of them.

⁴⁶At the sound of Babylon's capture the earth will tremble; its cry will resound among the nations.

51:1 This is what the LORD says:

"See, I will stir up the spirit of a destroyer against Babylon and the people of Leb Kamai.

²I will send foreigners to Babylon to winnow her and to devastate her land; they will oppose her on every side in the day of her disaster.

³Let not the archer string his bow, nor let him put on his armor.

Do not spare her young men; completely destroy her army.

⁴They will fall down slain in Babylon, fatally wounded in her streets.

⁵For Israel and Judah have not been forsaken by their God, the LORD Almighty, though their land is full of guilt before the Holy One of Israel.

6"Flee from Babylon!
Run for your lives!
Do not be destroyed because of her sins.

It is time for the LORD's vengeance; he will pay her what she deserves.

⁷Babylon was a gold cup in the LORD's hand:

she made the whole earth drunk.

The nations drank her wine; therefore they have now gone mad.

⁸Babylon will suddenly fall and be broken. Wail over her!

Get balm for her pain; perhaps she can be healed.

9""We would have healed Babylon, but she cannot be healed; let us leave her and each go to his own land, for her judgment reaches to the skies, it rises as high as the clouds.'

10""The LORD has vindicated us; come, let us tell in Zion what the LORD our God has done."

11"Sharpen the arrows, take up the shields!
The LORD has stirred up the kings of the Medes,
because his purpose is to destroy Babylon.

The LORD will take vengeance, vengeance for his temple.

12Lift up a banner against the walls of Babylon! Reinforce the guard, station the watchmen, prepare an ambush!

The LORD will carry out his purpose, his decree against the people of Babylon.

¹³You who live by many waters and are rich in treasures, your end has come, the time for you to be cut off.

¹⁴The LORD Almighty has sworn by himself:

I will surely fill you with men, as with a swarm of locusts, and they will shout in triumph over you. 15"He made the earth by his power; he founded the world by his wisdom and stretched out the heavens by his understanding.

When he thunders, the waters in the heavens roar;he makes clouds rise from the ends of the earth.

He sends lightning with the rain and brings out the wind from his storehouses.

17"Every man is senseless and without knowledge; every goldsmith is shamed by his idols. His images are a fraud; they have no breath in them.

¹⁸They are worthless, the objects of mockery; when their judgment comes, they will perish.

19He who is the Portion of Jacob is not like these, for he is the Maker of all things, including the tribe of his inheritance—the LORD Almighty is his name.

20"You are my war club, my weapon for battle—with you I shatter nations, with you I destroy kingdoms, 21with you I shatter horse and rider, with you I shatter chariot and driver, 22with you I shatter man and woman, with you I shatter old man and youth, with you I shatter young man and maiden, ²³with you I shatter shepherd and flock, with you I shatter farmer and oxen, with you I shatter governors and officials.

²⁴"Before your eyes I will repay Babylon and all who live in Babylonia for all the wrong they have done in Zion," declares the LORD.

25"I am against you, O destroying mountain, you who destroy the whole earth," declares the LORD.

"I will stretch out my hand against you, roll you off the cliffs, and make you a burned-out mountain.

No rock will be taken from you for a cornerstone, nor any stone for a foundation, for you will be desolate forever," declares the LORD.

27"Lift up a banner in the land!
Blow the trumpet among the nations!
Prepare the nations for battle against her;
summon against her these kingdoms:
Ararat, Minni and Ashkenaz.

Appoint a commander against her; send up horses like a swarm of locusts.

²⁸Prepare the nations for battle against her the kings of the Medes, their governors and all their officials, and all the countries they rule.

29 The land trembles and writhes, for the LORD's purposes against Babylon stand—to lay waste the land of Babylon

so that no one will live there.

30 Babylon's warriors have stopped fighting; they remain in their strongholds. Their strength is exhausted; they have become like women. Her dwellings are set on fire; the bars of her gates are broken.

31 One courier follows another and messenger follows messenger to announce to the king of Babylon that his entire city is captured, 32 the river crossings seized, the marshes set on fire, and the soldiers terrified."

³³This is what the LORD Almighty, the God of Israel, says:

"The Daughter of Babylon is like a threshing floor at the time it is trampled; the time to harvest her will soon come."

34"Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon has devoured us, he has thrown us into confusion, he has made us an empty jar.
Like a serpent he has swallowed us and filled his stomach with our delicacies, and then has spewed us out.
35May the violence done to our flesh be upon Babylon," say the inhabitants of Zion.

"May our blood be on those who live in Babylonia," says Jerusalem.

³⁶Therefore, this is what the LORD says:

"See, I will defend your cause and avenge you; I will dry up her sea and make her springs dry. ³⁷Babylon will be a heap of ruins, a haunt of jackals, an object of horror and scorn, a place where no one lives. ³⁸Her people all roar like young lions, they growl like lion cubs. ³⁹But while they are aroused, I will set out a feast for them and make them drunk. so that they shout with laughter then sleep forever and not awake," declares the LORD.

⁴⁰"I will bring them down like lambs to the slaughter, like rams and goats.

41"How Sheshach will be captured, the boast of the whole earth seized!
 What a horror Babylon will be among the nations!
 42The sea will rise over Babylon;

⁴²The sea will rise over Babylon; its roaring waves will cover her.

43Her towns will be desolate, a dry and desert land,
 a land where no one lives,
 through which no man travels.
 44I will punish Bel in Babylon and make him spew out what he has swallowed.

The nations will no longer stream to him. And the wall of Babylon will fall.

45"Come out of her, my people!
Run for your lives!
Run from the fierce anger of the LORD.

⁴⁶Do not lose heart or be afraid when rumors are heard in the land; one rumor comes this year, another the next, rumors of violence in the land and of ruler against ruler.

⁴⁷For the time will surely come when I will punish the idols of Babylon; her whole land will be disgraced and her slain will all lie fallen within her.

48Then heaven and earth and all that is in them will shout for joy over Babylon, for out of the north destroyers will attack her," declares the LORD.

49"Babylon must fall because of Israel's slain, just as the slain in all the earth have fallen because of Babylon.

50 You who have escaped the sword, leave and do not linger!
Remember the LORD in a distant land, and think on Jerusalem."

51"We are disgraced, for we have been insulted and shame covers our faces, because foreigners have entered the holy places of the LORD's house."

52"But days are coming," declares the LORD,

"when I will punish her idols, and throughout her land the wounded will groan.

53Even if Babylon reaches the sky and fortifies her lofty stronghold, I will send destroyers against her," declares the LORD.

54"The sound of a cry comes from Babylon, the sound of great destruction from the land of the Babylonians.

55The LORD will destroy Babylon; he will silence her noisy din.

Waves of enemies will rage like great waters;

the roar of their voices will resound.

⁵⁶A destroyer will come against Babylon; her warriors will be captured, and their bows will be broken.

For the LORD is a God of retribution; he will repay in full.

⁵⁷I will make her officials and wise men drunk, her governors, officers and warriors as well;

they will sleep forever and not awake," declares the King, whose name is the LORD Almighty.

⁵⁸This is what the LORD Almighty says:

"Babylon's thick wall will be leveled and her high gates set on fire; the peoples exhaust themselves for nothing, the nations' labor is only fuel for the flames."

⁵⁹This is the message Jeremiah gave to the staff officer Seraiah son of Neriah, the son of Mahseiah, when he went to Babylon with Zedekiah king of Judah in the fourth year of his reign. ⁶⁰Jeremiah had written on a scroll about all the disasters that would come upon Babylon—all that had been recorded concerning Babylon. ⁶¹He said to Seraiah, "When you get to Babylon, see that you read all these words aloud. ⁶²Then say, 'O LORD, you have said you will destroy this place, so that neither man nor animal will live in it; it will be desolate forever.' ⁶³When you finish reading this scroll, tie a stone to it and throw it into the Euphrates. ⁶⁴Then say, 'So will Babylon sink to rise no more because of the disaster I will bring upon her. And her people will fall.'"

The words of Jeremiah end here.

Original Meaning

THESE TWO CHAPTERS are a collection of poetic oracles interspersed with brief prose units of speech. They concern Babylon and God's just judgment on that nation for its arrogance and its oppression of others.³¹ They are not an original unity, but the material is brought together as testimony to the role that Babylon had played and would play in the divine economy. These chapters complete the collection of oracles about the nations begun in chapter 46.

These are not the only texts in Jeremiah to take up the topic of Babylon. Indeed, the impact of Babylon lies behind every line of the book as it now exists. In terms of historical context, the Babylonian threat has been a primary concern of Judah's government since the defeat of Egypt at the battle of Carchemish in 605 B.C. In 597 the Babylonian army surrounded Jerusalem and received a surrender from young king Jehoiachin. There were many contacts between Judah and Babylon between 597 and the second siege and tragic destruction of Jerusalem in 588–586. Explicit references to Babylon and to Nebuchadnezzar occur in chapters 21, 24–25, 27–29, 32, 34–35, 37–44. The Babylonian defeat of Judah and the fall of Jerusalem are what shape this book.

The theme of the oracles in chapters 50–51 is the downfall of Babylon, sometimes depicted as already accomplished and sometimes represented as a future event. In this they differ from most of the other references to Babylon in Jeremiah, which assume that Babylonian supremacy has been divinely given and exercised in judgment against Judah and Jerusalem.³² The city of Babylon fell in October 539 B.C. to invaders led by Cyrus the Great.

In a remarkable turnaround, chapters 50–51 portray Babylon's fall in language similar to that used elsewhere in Jeremiah to portray Judah's fall to Babylon. Hostile forces will be arrayed against Babylon, and there will be no deliverance from them. Thus, some scholars have wondered how the prophet, who so assiduously announced Babylonian supremacy, could have made such a complete turnaround. Indeed, a close reading of modern commentaries shows that some authors think these oracles against Babylon come from the prophet's editors rather than the prophet himself.³³

But there is no compelling reason why Jeremiah, who announced the defeat of Judah at the hands of Babylon, could not also have announced the defeat of tyrant Babylon. The two claims are not inconsistent with each other, and there is no objection on the basis of the content of the chapters to assigning the oracles a place in Jeremiah's own lifetime. As noted above, they probably did originate over a period of time—probably they were put together by the prophet's editors—but the theology that undergirds the oracles is vintage Jeremiah. God used Babylon to judge Judah. But Babylon had exercised its role with extreme arrogance and cruelty and had done so in mocking defiance of Jeremiah's claim that it served the Lord, the God of Israel.

Chapter 50 intersperses the doom oracles against Babylon with briefer affirmations of Judah's deliverance (e.g., 50:4–5). The prophecy to strike

Babylon is part of the Lord's plan and purpose (51:45). Even as Judah ultimately will be delivered, a foe from the north will wreak havoc on Babylon (50:3, 41). This is a classic reversal motif—previously Jeremiah had spoken of the foe from the north who would threaten Judah (1:13–14; 5:15–17; 6:22). The sword will flash against Babylon (50:35–37) and all her inhabitants.³⁴ Babylon, which was a tool in the hands of the Lord, exercised an arrogance that provoked him to judgment (50:14–15, 29–31).

One of the ways in which the judgment is depicted is sarcasm. Babylon is lampooned as a rebellious city (Merathaim, 50:21) and as punishment (Pekod, 50:21). Both names are puns on aspects of Babylonian geography or tribesmen.³⁵ Another way is the symbolism of battle forces arrayed against the city (50:14, 35). Babylon will be destroyed because of idolatry (50:2).

50:1–10. The fall of Babylon is to be proclaimed among the nations. Perhaps this is because Babylon had subjugated a number of them, and there will be rejoicing in more than one corner of the former empire. Another reason perhaps is the public declaration of the Lord's sovereignty by announcing the fact in public and in advance.

As in the prophecies in the book of the covenant (chs. 30–31), remnants from Israel and Judah will seek the Lord and a way back to Zion. They are currently like lost sheep, but they will return to their true Shepherd, "the hope of their fathers." The prophet urges them to flee out of Babylon (cf. 51:6). This is not contradictory to the advice given in 29:4–9, that the exiles should build houses in Babylon and pray for the welfare of the city. That same chapter indicated a coming time when God will restore his people. The defeat of Babylon will indicate that restoration is on the horizon.

50:11–17. Babylon's joy in pillaging Judah (God's "inheritance") will be turned to great shame. Babylon is personified here as the mother of the Babylonian people. Portraying cities as female persons is common in the Old Testament, but this imagery will be taken up in the New Testament, where Babylon is portrayed as a great prostitute (Rev. 17–18).

In poetic reversal pattern, Babylon will be besieged and defeated. Verse 15 is a somber cry: "Since this is the vengeance of the LORD, take vengeance on her; do to her as she has done to others." This proclamation is also an example of the "act and consequence" theology espoused by many biblical writers. What Babylon has set in motion will come around to her.

- 50:18–32. Imperialistic Babylon is compared to Assyria, the earlier conqueror of Israel and much of the Near East. As with Assyria, so with Babylon—God will judge the oppressor. Twice the language of judgment against Babylon uses the verb ḥrm ("to devote to ritual destruction").³⁶ Vengeance on God's part is another motive for judgment (v. 28; cf. 51:11).
- 50:33–46. God is strong, not just as Judge of iniquity, but as the Redeemer of his people. Verse 34 celebrates God as the One who vindicates his people's cause.³⁷

The overthrow of Babylon is compared to that of Sodom and Gomorrah. Again the prophet uses the language of military attack and siege to describe the coming fall of Babylon. Verse 44 alludes to either a people or an individual who will do God's bidding and take Babylon. Possibly this refers to the Medes and Persians or even to Cyrus himself (cf. Isa. 45:1), but one cannot be sure. As Jeremiah 50:9; 51:27–28 indicate, God has summoned several groups against Babylon. These claims elaborate on the theme that a foe from the north will attack Babylon.

51:1–23. Chapter 51 continues the contrast between the coming deliverance of Judean exiles and the judgment to befall Babylon. Much of the imagery of judgment on Babylon and redemption for Israel is repeated from or similar to that in chapter 50. One of the poetic symbols Jeremiah uses is that of the "cup," a vessel that indicates the future when its contents are consumed. In 51:7 Babylon itself is depicted as a cup from which Judah and the nations drank, but now it is ready to be smashed.³⁸

Verses 15–19 celebrate the creative power and wisdom of God. The sentiments expressed here are similar to those in chapter 10, where again the character of the true God is set in the context of the foolishness and idolatry of the nations. In contrast to human idol-makers, God is "the Maker of all things."

51:24–58. These verses portray four of Babylon's neighbors as threats.³⁹ The Medes are mentioned twice (51:11, 28). They were a people to the north and east of Babylon who were incorporated into the Persian state created by Cyrus the Great. Ararat, Minni, and the Ashkenaz (51:27–28) were also peoples from the north and northeast of Babylon. Along with the Medes and the Persians, they may reflect collectively the "foe from the north" who will strike Babylon.

In 51:34–40 personified Jerusalem speaks, and the Lord replies that judgment will come on Babylon. In this context she (Jerusalem) speaks of the torment she has received from Babylon. Her first-person speech is similar to that found in the book of Lamentations.

The gods of Babylon are also judged in the fall of the city. Specifically mentioned is Bel (v. 44; cf. Isa. 46:1–2). The imagery of judgment against Babylon alludes to the tower of Babylon (Babel) in Genesis 11:1–9. God will send destroyers against Babylon, even if the city reaches the sky (Jer. 51:53).

51:59–64. The chapter concludes with a prose account of Seraiah, brother of Baruch, who traveled to Babylon in Zedekiah's fourth year (594/593). Apparently he was sent to Babylon on diplomatic business; Seraiah was from a family of scribes and was capable of writing and interpreting documents.⁴⁰ While in Babylon he performed a symbolic act to depict the judgment that would ultimately befall Babylon. Just as the written scroll sank when Seraiah threw it into the river, so will Babylon sink and rise no more.

The last line of the chapter states that "the words of Jeremiah end here." Readers do well to recall the way in which Jeremiah's work began. He was called to be a prophet to the nations. The literary arrangement of his words concludes with an extended prophecy against Babylon, the great imperial power of the day. But note how Jeremiah's words in collected form have lasted much longer than the great political and military foe of his day.

Bridging Contexts

JUDGING THE OPPRESSOR. Chapters 50–51 deal with God's judgment on Babylon, a judgment that came on the city in 539 B.C., when Cyrus the Great and his forces occupied the city and put the Babylonian Empire out of business. The influence of this word of judgment continued as the prophetic texts bore witness to the contrast between the ongoing life of the Judean exiles and the continuing decline of the once-proud city. Ultimately the city itself would be abandoned, giving additional confirmation of the prophetic depiction of its demise. Thus, at one level, chapters 50–51 are not only about announcing God's judgment but also serve as witness to the truthfulness of the claim that God has judged the oppressor in the historical process. Modern application of these sentiments may begin by asking: Which current political entities offend the justice and moral order of God, and which afflict God's people who live among them?

Babylon as a symbol. Chapters 50–51 also serve as reminders that Jeremiah represented a dual theme with regard to Babylon. According to chapter 25, already in the time of Jehoiakim, when Babylon first loomed on the horizon as political master, the prophet announced not only that Babylon would be the agent of God's judgment but that it would also be the recipient of God's judgment. Thus, on another level, these chapters are part of that broader scriptural teaching concerning the ubiquity of sin and of fallen human nature. Babylon becomes a symbol—that is, both a historical illustration and a reminder—of the self-destructive consequences of arrogance, pride in wealth, oppression, and idolatry. They are destructive because they offend the moral order created by God and because they are ruinous to public, institutional life.

One will find additional confirmation of this in the book of Daniel, where Nebuchadnezzar and Babylon are one example of a type of oppressive government that arises periodically. Both Jeremiah and Daniel affirm that God has granted all of them historical supremacy for a time, yet they are—and their type always will be—subject to his judgment for their failures. Nahum similarly affirms God's judgment on Assyria as a great judicial act that frees Judah and others from the oppressive yoke of the tyrant.

Babylon, the evil and arrogant female, is a scriptural symbol that lives on in the inspired imagination of John, prophetic seer of the book of Revelation (Rev. 17–18). He uses the imagery of Babylon as a prostitute, oppressing the world over and drunk with the blood of the saints, as a means to describe the lethal power of imperial Rome. Here is an example of earlier biblical texts being interpreted and reapplied. The older prophetic word lives on in a new key, as again the greatest political and military power of the era persecutes God's people. Furthermore, John's apocalyptic depiction points Christians toward the future. Before the current age runs its course, there may be other arrogant powers that seek to dominate their neighbors. Readers are invited to see a pattern at work in the ebb and flow of the broad historical process.

Contemporary Significance

MORAL RESPONSIBILITY. God's judgment of Babylon is but a past act unless it is put in the broader contexts of God's historical purposes and the continuing validity of belief in a moral order through which he holds nations and institutions responsible for their actions. It is important to note that God's judgment is not simply a righteous reaction to arrogance and oppression; at the same time it is also zeal to defend his own. Notice how many times the deliverance of Israel and Judah is mentioned in these two chapters. Judgment comes in the historical process not only from God, the righteous Judge, but from God the zealous Defender of his people. This is a confession of faith that Christians are called to make in spite of the "messiness" and ambiguity of history.

Forms of deliverance. It is a sad fact that at the beginning of the twenty-first century Christians are being persecuted for their faith in several places around the world. When members of the church universal pray for the safety and deliverance of persecuted brothers and sisters, they do well to remember what forms deliverance takes in the historical process. Deliverance and freedom for God's people may well come through difficult and violent historical circumstances.

It is sobering to think of the military and political struggles in the last few years and their effects. The year 1989 brought the collapse of the Berlin Wall. December of that same year saw the Romanian dictator felled. The so-called "Gulf War" in 1991 may have prevented a wider conflagration from breaking out.

In 1999 there was much debate in the Western world about ways to react to the lethal and oppressive policies of Slobodan Milosevic, president of Yugoslavia and the architect of a brutal campaign by Serbians against the largely Muslim province of Kosovo. A primary debating point concerned the legitimacy of Western intervention in what seemed to be internal strife. One may debate the various reasons why Western forces ultimately began an air campaign against the Serbian forces, but one of them was the belief that universal standards of justice and decency had been violated by the Serbian aggression. Some persons argued, correctly it seems, that similar patterns of horrific ethnic persecution had happened recently in Rwanda between Hutu and Tutsi tribes, but no one had taken any action. It is this sense of a moral standard to which all can be held that partially underlies the claims of Jeremiah 50–51.

In pondering the judgments of history, perhaps no region is more strife-ridden and more difficult to understand than the Middle East. While Israelis and Arabs debate and fight—which they seem to do at the same time—there is the ongoing exodus of Arab Christians from the region. Understandably, Christians in other parts of the world lament the fact that brothers and sisters from the land of the Messiah are fleeing in such numbers that if current projections continue, in fifty years virtually all churches in Israel and Jordan will be museums.

Yes, the fleeing of Arab Christians is a tragedy. It may also be one of the ways in which God saves his people from a more terrible historical fate looming on the horizon. Hindsight often improves judgment, even for the church. Christians may find much about judgment in Jeremiah 50–51, but it is the hidden work of God to which we should also be drawn.

In all these questions about the judgment of oppressing nations, the Christian church finds itself caught up in debates about morality and the just exercise of force. These debates are good when they remind Christians that God is not mocked and that no nation or ethnic group will have the final say on Judgment Day. They can mislead if they allow people to think that it is only the "other side" that is wrong and sinful in God's assessment.

No group comes out unscathed in the book of Jeremiah. There is plenty of folly and failure to go around, whether in Judah or in Babylon. God's promise to rescue his people comes not because they are morally perfect, but because of the grace of his promise to them. His standards of judgment are a stark reminder of how much grace is needed for the rescue of the saints in any generation.

ZEDEKIAH WAS TWENTY-ONE years old when he became king, and he reigned in Jerusalem eleven years. His mother's name was Hamutal daughter of Jeremiah; she was from Libnah. ²He did evil in the eyes of the Lord, just as Jehoiakim had done. ³It was because of the LORD's anger that all this happened to Jerusalem and Judah, and in the end he thrust them from his presence.

Now Zedekiah rebelled against the king of Babylon.

⁶By the ninth day of the fourth month the famine in the city had become so severe that there was no food for the people to eat. ⁷Then the city wall was broken through, and the whole army fled. They left the city at night through the gate between the two walls near the king's garden, though the Babylonians were surrounding the city. They fled toward the Arabah, ⁸but the Babylonian army pursued King Zedekiah and overtook him in the plains of Jericho. All his soldiers were separated from him and scattered, ⁹and he was captured.

He was taken to the king of Babylon at Riblah in the land of Hamath, where he pronounced sentence on him. ¹⁰There at Riblah the king of Babylon slaughtered the sons of Zedekiah before his eyes; he also killed all the officials of Judah. ¹¹Then he put out Zedekiah's eyes, bound him with bronze shackles and took him to Babylon, where he put him in prison till the day of his death.

²⁰The bronze from the two pillars, the Sea and the twelve bronze bulls under it, and the movable stands, which King Solomon had made for the temple of the LORD, was more than could be weighed. ²¹Each of the pillars was eighteen cubits high and twelve cubits in circumference; each was four fingers thick, and hollow. ²²The bronze capital on top of the one pillar was five cubits high and was decorated with a network and pomegranates of bronze all around. The other pillar, with its pomegranates, was similar. ²³There were ninety-six pomegranates on the sides; the total number of pomegranates above the surrounding network was a hundred.

²⁴The commander of the guard took as prisoners Seraiah the chief priest, Zephaniah the priest next in rank and the three doorkeepers. ²⁵Of those still in the city, he took the officer in charge of the fighting men, and seven royal advisers. He also took the secretary who was chief officer in charge of conscripting the people of the land and sixty of his men who were found in the city. ²⁶Nebuzaradan the commander took them all and brought them to the king of Babylon at Riblah. ²⁷There at Riblah, in the land of Hamath, the king had them executed.

So Judah went into captivity, away from her land. ²⁸This is the number of the people Nebuchadnezzar carried into exile:

in the seventh year, 3,023 Jews;

²⁹in Nebuchadnezzar's eighteenth year,
832 people from Jerusalem;

³⁰in his twenty-third year,
745 Jews taken into exile by Nebuzaradan the commander of the imperial guard.

There were 4,600 people in all.

³¹In the thirty-seventh year of the exile of Jehoiachin king of Judah, in the year Evil-Merodach became king of Babylon, he released Jehoiachin king of Judah and freed him from prison on the twenty-fifth day of the twelfth month. ³²He spoke kindly to him and gave him a seat of honor higher than those of the other kings who were with him in Babylon. ³³So Jehoiachin put aside his prison clothes and for the rest of his life ate regularly at the king's table. ³⁴Day by day the king of Babylon gave Jehoiachin a regular allowance as long as he lived, till the day of his death.

Original Meaning

CHAPTER 52, THE CONCLUSION to the book of Jeremiah, largely parallels the conclusion to the book of 2 Kings (2 Kings 24:20b–25:30). That the two accounts are similar is obvious; what is not at all obvious is the literary relationship between the two. Were details from one of the accounts copied for the other; and if so, which is the earlier of the two? The answer to either question is difficult to answer with any confidence—and neither question is as important as the role of the account in 2 Kings and in Jeremiah.

- (1) We begin by observing that at least two scriptural writers/editors believed that a narrative account of Jerusalem's tragic fall, coupled with the report that the exiled king Jehoiachin was still in Babylon until the reign of Evil-Merodach, was the appropriate place to conclude their respective "books."
- (2) The book of Jeremiah is not historical narrative in the sense that 1–2 Kings is, but its presentation of the prophet's work presupposes the historical context provided in Kings.
- (3) Not only is this last chapter of Jeremiah tragic in its details; it is somewhat repetitive and therefore anticlimactic. This may be a small clue to the literary relationship between Kings and Jeremiah. For sequential readers of this book, Jeremiah 37–44 has already provided details of the fall of Jerusalem and its aftermath, some of which get repeated in chapter 52 (cf. 39:1–10 with 52:4–16). The account in 2 Kings 25, however, follows the chronologically arranged, unfolding scheme of the larger work entitled 1–2 Kings. Perhaps, therefore, it was the compilers of Jeremiah who made a conscious decision to end the prophet's book in similar fashion to that of 2 Kings, even if that meant repeating material already used in the book.

If the scenario above is correct, it does not solve the issue of the literary relationship between the two accounts, as if it is certain that Jeremiah's compiler(s) copied from 2 Kings; it only suggests that the way 2 Kings concludes influenced the way Jeremiah's compiler(s) concluded the prophet's book. There are, after all, significant differences between the two prose accounts. Given the fact that generally speaking the prose traditions of Jeremiah are similar linguistically to those in 1–2 Kings—suggesting to a number of scholars that the compilers of the two works were somehow related—it is more likely that the particular relationship between 2 Kings 25 and Jeremiah 52 goes back to the prehistory of the texts as we now have them rather than with one essentially copying the other. Both chapters contain prose traditions that have been shaped by the respective needs of the larger work in which they are included, and both were likely compiled in the exilic period.

To summarize: The ending of Jeremiah was likely influenced by the way 2 Kings concludes. It is difficult to discern if 2 Kings 25 is earlier in literary form than Jeremiah 52, since the prose traditions in Jeremiah's book have a lot in common with those in 1–2 Kings.

There are several minor differences between the Jeremiah and Kings accounts and one major difference. The major one is the omission of Gedaliah's assassination in Jeremiah 52 (cf. 2 Kings 25:22–26). The circumstances surrounding his death are certainly known to Jeremiah's compiler(s), since they are given a much fuller account in Jeremiah 40–41.

One minor difference comes in 52:11, where we read that Nebuchadnezzar put Zedekiah in prison until his death. The parallel in 2 Kings 25:7 simply notes that Zedekiah was blinded by the Babylonians, bound in fetters, and sent to Babylon. There is also a difference between the numbers of exiles cited in Jeremiah 52:28–30 when compared to the parallel data in 2 Kings. Moreover, Jeremiah 52:30 records another wave of exiles in Nebuchadnezzar's twenty-third year (582 B.C.), a detail not provided in 2 Kings. This deportation could be punishment for the assassination of Gedaliah, but the reason is not given.³

Jeremiah 52 provides a retrospective of approximately thirty years. It begins with the account of the Babylonian siege in 588 B.C. and concludes with the notice in 52:31–34 that Evil-Merodach had released Jehoiachin from prison and allowed him to eat at the royal table. Evil-Merodach is the Hebrew version of Amel Marduk, son and successor of Nebuchadnezzar, who had a short reign from 562–560 B.C. Jehoiachin would have been approximately fifty-three years old at the time of his release.⁴ This last reference in chapter 52 gives the reader a likely indication of the date for the final compiling of the material in the book of Jeremiah.

Two different dates are given in Jeremiah 52 for the fall of the city to the Babylonians. They contribute directly to the differences one finds among scholars for the reconstructed date—either 587 or 586 B.C. In 52:12 the date is the nineteenth year of Nebuchadnezzar (so also 2 Kings 25:8), while in 52:29 it is assigned to the eighteenth year. These look like—and perhaps are —contradictory dates. One solution to the problem is to posit a copyist error. But which date is the error? Those who posit a date for the destruction in 587 B.C. suggest that the nineteenth year is a mistake, whether one of improper calculation on the part of the writer or simply a copyist error. Another suggestion is to see the date in 52:12 (nineteenth year) as reflecting a nonaccession-year dating scheme for Nebuchadnezzar, while interpreting the eighteenth year of 52:29 as assuming an accession-year dating for his regnal years. This would make 586 B.C. the date of the city's fall.⁵

- 52:1–11. The date of the ninth day and fourth month (v. 6) refers to the last year of Zedekiah's reign. The details of Zedekiah's capture should be compared with 39:1–7 and 2 Kings 25:1–7. Second Chronicles contains no narrative of Zedekiah's capture.
- 52:12–16. This brief description of the city's fall should be compared with 39:8 and 2 Kings 25:8–12. A reader only of Jeremiah 39 would not know that Nebuzaradan was the official in charge of burning the city and the temple. Indeed, Jer. 39:8 does not even mention the burning of the temple, as do the other two accounts.
- 52:17–23. This is a brief report of the looting of the temple (see also 2 Kings 25:13–17). A comparison of the two is fascinating. Each begins with a report that the Babylonians broke the bronze pillars, and there are similar details preserved between them. Nevertheless, each account preserves some distinctive elements. The Jeremiah account, which is the longer of the two, has more details about the carved pomegranates and the bronze pillars.
 - 52:24–27a. These verses closely parallel 2 Kings 25:18–21.
- 52:27b–30. These verses preserve references to two waves of exiles during the reign of Nebuchadnezzar. The first wave came during the reign of Jehoiachin (597 B.C.), the second in 582 (see comments above).

52:31–34. This notice about Jehoiachin, which concludes Jeremiah, is paralled in 2 Kings 25:27–30, which also concludes 2 Kings. It is far more than a simple report about a minor monarch being long-exiled. The report undergirds a type of muted but stubborn faith. Even when the land of Judah and the city of Jerusalem lie in ruins, one from David's line still lives.

Bridging Contexts

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF JEHOIACHIN'S RELEASE. Jeremiah 52 has a peculiar combination of a narrative that records recent events of a traumatic past with a concluding report that Jehoiachin, a member of the Davidic line and formerly king in Jerusalem for three months, was released from imprisonment in Babylon. This combination points to a way of reading the account as a lesson about the price of failure combined with an indication of a future open to the continuing efficacy of God's earlier promises made to David (2 Sam. 7; Jer. 23:5–6; 33:19–22).

Unless readers can draw continuing significance from narration about the past, past acts remain simply events that lie behind the present. Since a retelling of the past is typically done to uncover ways in which to understand the present, we should ask why the account of Jerusalem's fall is rehearsed (again). One reason is reflected in the widely quoted maxim, "Those who do not remember the past are doomed to repeat it." In the retelling of the story, we are instructed to live and learn from the mistakes of others. Such a reading can be instructive on the personal or the corporate level. It may point us toward introspection regarding our personal histories ("unfinished business") as well as the history of our nation and church.

The account of Jehoiachin's release comes like the small cloud of Elijah's ministry during a time of drought (1 Kings 18:41–46). There is the possibility of change and deliverance to come. The shape of that change is indicated by the person released. He is David's "son." Even though the final paragraph likely presupposes the death of Jehoiachin in Babylon, he is the agent of continuity in the Davidic line and thus the family history of the Messiah, which reaches its culmination in the birth of Jesus. A Christological reading of the chapter's conclusion grows out of the historical concerns of the compilers themselves. They wanted readers to know that all hope was not gone. Jehoiachin and his family were still living.

And while the shape of any hope was inchoate, readers are invited to do more than simply acknowledge the judgment of the past. They are invited to be open to a future predicated on God's promises to the Davidic house.

The basic point is this: The original readers of Jeremiah 52 looked back on judgment, but through the notice concerning Jehoiachin they were invited to look ahead to ways in which God would fulfill his promises to them. This posture can be similar to that of any generation of God's people. Christians, for example, look back on the founding events of their faith—the death and resurrection of David's greater Son—but they also look forward to the second coming of Christ, when he will bring God's promised redemption to its final stage. Christians, like the generations of the Judean exile, live between promise and fulfillment.

Contemporary Significance

BETWEEN THE TIMES. Because of his own and his people's failure, Moses did not enter the Promised Land. He did, however, see it from a distance. One might characterize his final point of view at Mount Pisgah as one between promise and fulfillment. He had the experience of having been led from Egypt, via Mount Sinai and the desert, to the edge of the Promised Land. He had tasted both victory and defeat, and though he himself gained a glimpse of the future, he ended his days before the surviving Israelites settled in the land promised to their ancestors.

Similarly, the point of view of Jeremiah 52 is that between the promise that judgment is not the end and the fulfillment of the promises of a better future and a ruler from David's line to come. This kind of dynamic in the lives of peoples and generations fits the profile of Christians. We are those who live "between the times," in the "already" of Christ's initial coming and in the "not yet" of his second advent, where sin and death still have their influence but where it is known that the future belongs to God. "For in this hope we were saved" (Rom. 8:24), wrote Paul. In the short term we are not invulnerable to failure and weakness, but the future realization of God's promised deliverance is sure—as sure and indestructible as Christ's resurrection from the dead.

God and the future. It is possible for those who "wait on the LORD" to renew their strength. It is possible because God provides the strength we need in our times of need. It is possible because no matter how strong or resilient the enemy, the future belongs to God, who is faithful. How this happens is the mystery of grace. One cannot explain it by a formula; one can only point to the God of new beginnings as the faithful God and Lord of life and death.

Matthew's genealogy of Jesus runs through the line of Jehoiachin (Matt. 1:11–12). What a story is packed into that simple genealogical list. Here is inspired commentary on sacred history. It is a reminder of how decades and centuries play a part in God's redemptive work, even when their twists and turns seem only confusing. Who would have thought that a king exiled for thirty-seven years meant much of anything other than years of frustration?

Jeremiah 52 is the final word about an influential epoch in sacred history. It is the final witness of the prophet Jeremiah's book. What we do with the witness is the way in which the ending of the book becomes an instructional piece in the unfolding drama of our lives. Jehoiachin died in captivity, yet he provided the means by which the Davidic family and the promises to it could continue. Jehoiachin's greater Son arrived in the fullness of time only to die at the hands of another imperial power. The story of which the book of Jeremiah is a part is still unfolding because Christ is alive and because he calls the current generation of God's people to discipleship and faithful living. So comfort one another with these words.

Introduction to Lamentations

Occasion and Date

THE BOOK OF LAMENTATIONS consists of five chapters of Hebrew poetry, joined together by the common themes of sorrow over the destruction of Jerusalem in 586 B.C. and the humiliation of Judah's population. Individual poems within the book may have been compiled soon after the destruction of the city or anytime between that date and the rebuilding of the temple in 520–515 B.C. None of them gives any indication that the temple has been rebuilt at the time of composition.

Whether the individual poems were all composed in Palestine or in one or more of the exilic communities of Jews in Egypt or Babylon cannot be determined conclusively. Scholars also differ over whether one author wrote all five chapters or a compiler brought together laments of different provenance for a liturgical purpose. The poetic style of the chapters is classical, with a vocalized rhythm characteristic of a lament,² and it fits historically in the exilic period.

Authorship

No AUTHOR IS named in the Hebrew version, and the book appears not in the prophetic section of the Hebrew Bible but in the last section, entitled "the Writings." Both of these points are understandable; much of the book gives voice to communal experience, there are few clues within the poetry itself to its human author(s), and the function of the book is different from that of a prophetic corpus.

The issue of authorship—regardless of who is responsible for it—is further complicated in that there are different voices expressed within the book.³ In chapters 1–2 Jerusalem is personified as "Daughter ... Zion" (1:6; 2:1, 4, 8, 10, 13, 18) and speaks on occasion (e.g., 1:9b, 11b–16; 2:22) to supplement the poet's voice. An anonymous individual in chapter 3, who possibly should be identified with the poet of the book, speaks through a first-person lament. Plural forms are used in chapter 4, where there are references to "our eyes" (4:17) and (lit.) "our steps" (4:18). The first-person plural voice continues in chapter 5 in what is essentially a communal lament. The creativity of the human author(s) recedes behind the primary function of these poems, which is to articulate grief over the loss of Jerusalem and to speak aloud the devastating effects of Judah's sinfulness.

The earliest claim to human authorship comes in the Greek translation, where the first verse explicitly attributes the book to the weeping prophet Jeremiah.⁴ In some Greek and Latin manuscripts attribution to Jeremiah is repeated at the beginning of chapter 5, as if that chapter needed additional comment. Chapter 5 is essentially a communal lament, with much of it "voiced" in first-person plural.

Such an association with Jeremiah is an ancient and plausible one, but that the prophet actually wrote the poems is historically unlikely. On the surface it is plausible, given the fact that the prophecy of Jeremiah itself contains laments/complaints, both for himself and for Jerusalem/Judah.⁵ However, some of the emphases in Lamentations are different from the prophet's book,⁶ and the thrust of the poetry is prayerful and liturgical, not prophetic. In 2 Chronicles 35:25 Jeremiah is credited with a lamentation for King Josiah (640–609 B.C.), and its recitation by singers became a custom in Israel, but this is not likely a reference to the book of Lamentations.⁷ The early association of Lamentations with Jeremiah is the reason that it appears in most modern versions after the prophetic book. As a part of Scripture Lamentations has a complementary function with Jeremiah's prophecies, providing yet another inspired assessment of Judah's fate.

Although it is unlikely that Jeremiah is the author of Lamentations, its association with him is one of several indications that the work fits into the broader context of the prophet's later life and times. The effects of the Babylonian army in besieging Jerusalem and in finally burning the city and temple precincts are everywhere reflected in the poignancy of the poetry. Someday Judah's humiliation will end (Lam. 4:22), but there is nothing in the poems to indicate that either Jerusalem or the temple have been rebuilt. In short, the perspective of the voices in Lamentations is that of the Babylonian exile.

At some point in the Exile Judeans began to lament corporately and publicly in order to remember Jerusalem, the capital city, the location of the temple, and the symbolic mother of the people. Already in Jeremiah (Jer. 41:4–8), there is the account of pious men from the former Israelite territories traveling to the ruins of the temple in Jerusalem in order to worship. Their beards were shaved, their clothes torn, and their bodies gashed in order to mourn its destruction. According to Zechariah 7:1–7, there was traditional mourning in the fifth month of the year, and the prophet was asked about its efficacy and whether it should continue. The fifth month is the month of Ab (July/August), the same month of the temple's destruction. Thus within the lifetime of those who witnessed the temple's destruction, there developed ceremonial lamentation to bewail and remember the tragedy, and the book of Lamentations is one result of these rituals.

Structure and Literary Style of the Book

THE FIVE POETIC CHAPTERS do not have a narrative base or reflect a literary plot. As noted above, it is not clear whether the five chapters were always joined in a collection or if one or more of them originated independently of the others. Thus, the effect of reading them sequentially is that of artful repetition, where the themes of suffering, judgment, confession of sin, and divine abandonment reappear.

The book does have, however, clear subunits based on the five chapters. Each of the chapters is arranged in a recognizable pattern—that is, they are in poetry9—and each follows an aspect of the Semitic alphabet. Lamentations 1—4 are known as acrostics because the poetic verses are arranged in a pattern following the sequence of the twenty-two letters in the Hebrew alphabet. The first word of each verse in chapters 1 and 2 begins with a different letter of the alphabet and follows the alphabetic sequence of twenty-two letters from beginning to end. That is, 1:1 and 2:1 begin with a word whose initial letter is aleph (N), and 1:22 and 2:22 begin with a word whose initial letter is taw (\Box). Chapter 3 has sixty-six verses but follows the same acrostic pattern, in three-verse units. Chapter 4 follows the pattern outlined for chapters 1 and 2.

Chapter 5 is somewhat different; it has twenty-two verses—as do chapters 1, 2, and 4—but the initial word of each verse in chapter 5 does not follow the alphabetical sequence. For this reason, most scholars do not describe chapter 5 as an acrostic. Although technically correct, the number of verses in chapter 5 is not likely coincidence.

Readers are left to infer the significance of the alphabetic pattern. Perhaps the best explanation is that the pattern is meant to signify fullness or completeness, something like the English expression "from A to Z" or the expression in the Revelation to John that the risen Lord is "the Alpha and the Omega ... the Beginning and the End" (Rev. 22:13; cf. 1:8). The acrostic provides a structure for the public expression of emotion and the development of a theme. Once hearers or readers know that a communication is following an acrostic pattern, they may anticipate its length and know something of the medium of the message.

Within the literature of the Old Testament, the book of Lamentations has literary parallels with funeral laments, the psalms of lament/complaint, Job's complaints against God and friends, and prophetic oracles against nations. On hearing the account of Saul and Jonathan's death, for example, David composed a poetic funeral oration (2 Sam. 1:19–27). It contains themes that one also finds in Lamentations. For example, 2 Samuel 1:19 begins with reference to Saul as the "glory" of Israel, who "lies slain"; Lamentations 4:20 describes King Zedekiah as the "LORD's anointed, our very life breath," as caught in the captors' trap. Twice the oration cries out that "the mighty have fallen" (2 Sam. 1:25, 27), in tragic contrast to the praise of Saul and Jonathan's royalty (1:23–24). Repeatedly the book of Lamentations refers to the fall and humiliation of Jerusalem, who is personified as a princess (Lam. 1:1, 6), one cast down from heaven (2:1), and as perfect in beauty (2:15).¹³

Approximately half of Psalms is comprised of individual and corporate laments/complaints, with those of individuals being the most frequent. These psalms have some or all of the following formal characteristics: complaints and/or cries of dereliction, petitions for deliverance and/or judgment on the enemies, confessions of sin, expressions of trust, and vows. Lamentations 3 and 5 have enough of these formal characteristics to be described as an individual and a corporate lament respectively, quite apart from their place in the book.

A poignant parallel to the voices of Lamentations comes in the defiant voice of the exiles in Psalm 137, where the pain over the fall of Jerusalem is raw and the anger toward the Edomites is palpable (v. 7). Edom too is remembered in Lamentations (Lam. 4:21–22). The individual voice of chapter 3 finds parallels in the psalms of individual lament/complaint,¹⁵ the complaints of Jeremiah, and those of Job to God.

There are city laments in ancient Near Eastern literature, which are also related to the book of Lamentations. These are compositions that reflect on the fall of a city and its temple(s). The best-known examples are much earlier than the sixth century B.C. and come from Mesopotamia. In some of them a prominent place is given to the patron goddess of the city, who mourns the fall of her city. Since there is no counterpart to the patron goddess in Judah (at least not among the circles responsible for the Old Testament), it is possible that the prominence given to personified Jerusalem as "Daughter ... Zion" and the symbolic mother of the faithful is the Israelite counterpart to the broader, ancient Near Eastern tradition of patron goddesses. Recognition of Jerusalem's voice and personification is crucial to an adequate grasp of the book's style and its message.

A common category among prophetic books is that of oracles against foreign nations. The language is typically poetic, often mixed with sarcasm and invective, and holds out the claim of God's judgment to fall on the arrogance and cruelty of the states. Isaiah 47:1–15 is a splendid example of judgment depicted to fall on Babylon, the same power that besieged Jerusalem and brought Judah to a sorrowful end. The city of Babylon ("Virgin Daughter ... Babylon", 47:1) is depicted as a humiliated queen, bereft of her symbols of royalty and exposed shamefully. Widowhood will be her fate as judgment for her oppression and cruelty falls on her. The personification of Babylon as an exposed female, as a widow bereft of children, and as helpless before the onslaught are all portrayals repeated for Jerusalem in Lamentations.

The characteristics noted above are sufficient to indicate that Lamentations' contents are traditional in the typical cultural sense of the term. In the Israelite funeral, in individual and corporate laments, and in the broad tradition of lamenting the demise of a city, there are recognized formal characteristics and terminology that bear the emotions fit for the particular occasion. Lamentations brings these traditional elements together as a result of Judah's demise at the hands of the Babylonians.

Theology and Significance

ONE INDICATION OF LAMENTATIONS' significance comes in its use. As suggested above, the poetry provided a vehicle for a communal voice to lament the horror of Judah's fall. At some point in the exilic or postexilic period, God's people used the poetry that now comprises the book in public ceremonies of lamenting the temple's destruction. Whether initially or as a later development, these ceremonies became regularized as an annual event (cf. discussion in previous section). Likely the annual ceremony took place in certain exilic communities and among Jews who returned to rebuild the city and temple during the Persian period.

With the tragedy of the Roman capture and destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70, the mourning ritual over the Babylonian destruction was supplemented with mourning for the later Roman destruction. That destruction of Jerusalem and the temple complex was every bit as traumatic as the earlier devastation wrought by the Babylonians. The joining of the two events through the memory of ritual lamentation is the result of "telescoping"; that is, a ceremony occasioned by an earlier event becomes the focal point for also remembering a later and similar event. Thus, in classical Judaism the ninth of Ab is a one-day ceremony (in August) in which Jews read the book of Lamentations, and through its mournful language, worshipers recall the two destructions of the temple.¹⁸

Articulation of Grief

ALL HUMAN BEINGS have a deep-seated need to process grief, death, and loss, or to put it colloquially, "to come to grips with grief." The prevalent mode of doing so in modern Western culture has been through psychological understanding and therapeutic practices. Many in modern society, therefore, are inclined to a psychological interpretation of the ritual mourning for the loss of the temple as described above. There is something to that analysis; anthropologists and cultural historians will point to the formative power of public ceremony to provide symbolic meaning for participants. It bears repeating, however, that premodern cultures did not process these matters psychologically—at least, not in the modern, Western sense of that term—but through various forms of ritual and symbolic performance.

Most likely, Lamentations gave form and procedure to mourning on the part of Judeans, but it did so without the self-consciousness and introspection that comes so "naturally" to modern readers and their analysts. Apparently the poetry (in ceremony) worked so effectively that its performance became an annual ritual. One should not read a negative evaluation into either the term "performance" or "ritual." While moderns think rightly of Lamentations as a form of literature, Judeans in exile understood the poetry as something to be performed. They recited it, sang it, and prayed it. This process brought to mind the continuing influence of a formative event. Furthermore, it helped define Judean corporate identity.

Grief, Complaint, and Hope in God

CLAUS WESTERMANN HAS PROPOSED that the enduring value of the book of Lamentations comes at just the point of its voice in the mourning over and protesting against the tragic events of 586 B.C.:

It is highly significant that there is no attempt anywhere in Lamentations to request restoration. All that is asked for is God's return. God continues to be remembered, and the memory is kept alive in the complaints. They are placed before God in the hope that God's compassion will be aroused.²⁰

Westermann helpfully calls attention to the roles of prayer and memory in forming an expectant people before God. In a public and prayerful way, Judeans were gifted with the opportunity to bring their pain and grief before the same God who had used the Babylonians to judge them and their ancestors. Like the insistent visitor at midnight (Luke 11:5–8) or the widow appealing to the judge (Luke 18:1–8), those who prayed the Lamentations brought the circumstances of their corporate identity before God.

Suffering and Confession of Sin

LAMENTATIONS HOLDS TOGETHER the grief that comes from tragedy and the pain that comes in acknowledging sin and its consequences. When one thinks corporately, the question is not, "How is this event a response to me?" but "How is this event a response to us?" Both tragedy and judgment are voiced in Lamentations. Those voices speak first about a historical catastrophe and a judgment that fell on a particular people. Language about "feelings" is in service to this broader perspective. Weeping comes from both catastrophic loss²¹ and the consequences of failure. Even those people who may not have lived in Judah during the tragic events of 586 B.C. are invited to find their place in the community affected by them. Indeed, by taking up the voices offered them in Lamentations, they are asked to learn from them. In this respect Lamentations has a function similar to certain "spirituals" in the African American community, since these songs continue to instruct a community long after the demise of slavery.

Clearing Ground for New Growth

THERE IS A sense in which the liturgical poetry of Lamentations plays a role similar to that of Ecclesiastes in the wisdom tradition. Ecclesiastes reminds readers of the limits of wisdom, of what the wise among humankind still cannot know or explain, of the inequities of life and its disappointments. To be sure, Ecclesiastes notes the joy that is associated with the Lord; moreover, the conclusion to the book reminds readers that it is best to fear God and keep his commandments, for in the future God will bring every secret matter to judgment. But having said these things, Ecclesiastes is primarily a book about limits and about what does not work. In the service of a greater revelation to come, it clears the ground of obstacles to new growth.

Lamentations similarly takes up the traditions of funeral poetry and prayers of anguish to clear away every vestige of self-righteousness, to close avenues of escape from responsibility for failure, and to drive home the uncomfortable truth that no one is finally exempt from God's searching judgments. To be sure, Lamentations confesses that God's mercies are new every morning (Lam. 3:22–24), but the weight of the poems is to plumb the depths of human anguish and despair and to speak about such experiences to the Lord.²² In the service of a greater revelation to come from God, Lamentations speaks both for and to human suffering.

Lamentations and the New Testament

It is none other than Jesus who provides the primary place for lament in the New Testament. Apart from his practice, lamentation is not common in the New Testament. Jesus wept over Jerusalem as a sign of his grief regarding its unbelief and the consequences to come from it (Luke 19:41–44). In his Gethsemane prayer he sweated and prayed for the cup of suffering to be removed from him, but he finally placed himself in God's hands (22:39–46). This is a posture similar to the prayers in Lamentations—similar in the sense that one resolutely casts his or her fate into the hands of a God who seems absent at a moment of great need or perhaps remote and inscrutable.

Jesus' painful death on the cross is punctuated by the cry of dereliction (Mark 15:34): "My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?" This is, moreover, a quotation from a psalm of lament/complaint (Ps. 22:1). Here, it seems, the cry is not only a reflection of Jesus' own suffering but also a testimony to the power of Scripture to define human experience in light of God's self-revelation. A psalm of lament/complaint was a voice offered to those who suffer.

Psalm 22 had been instructive in this regard for centuries. Even David, the king after God's own heart and the psalmist for Israel, experienced judgment and forsakenness, and yet vindication in God's own timing (cf. Ps. 22:25–31). Jesus' passion is a salutary reminder that suffering and grief are endemic to the human race and that he is no exception. Indeed, one element of the atonement accomplished in Jesus' passion is his identification with human suffering. Jesus represents his own in all things, including tragedy and suffering. This is neither to deny or minimize the sacrificial mode of his death, only to note that his representative death is both sacrificial and tragic.²³

Lamentation as a form of prayer is not common in the letters of the New Testament. Paul, for example, enjoins giving thanks in all circumstances with the advice to make petitions known to God (1 Thess. 5:16–18; cf. Rom. 12:12; Phil. 4:4–7). How strongly he may also have petitioned the Lord is hinted at in his thrice-made appeal to God to remove a physical affliction, his "thorn in the flesh" (2 Cor. 12:7b–10). He also urged believers to have solidarity with one another, and when appropriate, to "mourn with those who mourn" (Rom. 12:15).

A form of lamentation, although somewhat different from the book of Lamentations, comes in the Revelation of John. After a stunning vision of the heavenly throne room and the scroll with seven seals (Rev. 4:1–5:3), John weeps bitterly because no one is worthy to take the scroll (i.e., the book of life) and break its seals. This is a powerful depiction of human fallibility and its consequences apart from the intervening and redeeming acts of God. However, the Lamb, standing as though slain, is able to take the scroll and to receive the praise of those in heaven. Lamentations 5 ends with songs of praise to God and to the Lamb who was slain to purchase the lives of the saints. Yet even in their redeemed state, those who were martyred can still ask, "How long?" concerning a fuller cosmic redemption that God has promised (5:10).

Perhaps the reason that the voice of lamentation is muted in the New Testament letters comes with the conviction that in Christ God has demonstrated decisively that he is for his people and that in spite of continuing judgment and refinement through the historical process God will not be thwarted in saving them. A book like Lamentations is a powerful indicator of the travail of human existence and of the way a particular historical experience can shape the perspective of many generations of people. In depicting God as strong in anger and judgment, the book takes its place in an unfolding revelation that points to a God who is more strongly resolute to save. Calvin's comment at the end of his own lectures on Lamentations is still worth pondering:

The faithful, even when they bear their evils and submit to God's scourges, do yet familiarly deposit their complaints in his bosom, and thus unburden themselves.... Let us, then, know, that though the faithful sometimes take this liberty of expostulating with God, they yet do not put off reverence, modesty, submission, or humility.²⁴

Text and Commentary on Lamentations

Lamentations 1:1–22

¹How deserted lies the city, once so full of people! How like a widow is she, who once was great among the nations! She who was queen among the pr

She who was queen among the provinces has now become a slave.

²Bitterly she weeps at night, tears are upon her cheeks.

Among all her lovers there is none to comfort her.

All her friends have betrayed her; they have become her enemies.

³After affliction and harsh labor, Judah has gone into exile.

She dwells among the nations; she finds no resting place.

All who pursue her have overtaken her in the midst of her distress.

⁴The roads to Zion mourn, for no one comes to her appointed feasts.

All her gateways are desolate, her priests groan, her maidens grieve, and she is in bitter anguish.

⁵Her foes have become her masters; her enemies are at ease.

The LORD has brought her grief because of her many sins.

Her children have gone into exile, captive before the foe.

⁶All the splendor has departed from the Daughter of Zion.

Her princes are like deer that find no pasture; in weakness they have fled before the pursuer.

⁷In the days of her affliction and wandering

Jerusalem remembers all the treasures that were hers in days of old.

When her people fell into enemy hands, there was no one to help her.

Her enemies looked at her and laughed at her destruction.

⁸Jerusalem has sinned greatly and so has become unclean.

All who honored her despise her, for they have seen her nakedness;

she herself groans and turns away.

⁹Her filthiness clung to her skirts; she did not consider her future.

Her fall was astounding;

there was none to comfort her.

"Look, O LORD, on my affliction, for the enemy has triumphed."

¹⁰The enemy laid hands on all her treasures;

she saw pagan nations enter her sanctuary—

those you had forbidden to enter your assembly.

¹¹All her people groan as they search for bread;

they barter their treasures for food to keep themselves alive.

"Look, O LORD, and consider, for I am despised."

12"Is it nothing to you, all you who pass by?

Look around and see.

Is any suffering like my suffering that was inflicted on me, that the LORD brought on me in the day of his fierce anger?

13"From on high he sent fire, sent it down into my bones.

He spread a net for my feet and turned me back.

He made me desolate, faint all the day long.

14"My sins have been bound into a yoke; by his hands they were woven together.

They have come upon my neck and the Lord has sapped my strength.

He has handed me over to those I cannot withstand.

15"The Lord has rejected all the warriors in my midst;

he has summoned an army against me to crush my young men.

In his winepress the Lord has trampled the Virgin Daughter of Judah.

¹⁶"This is why I weep and my eyes overflow with tears.

No one is near to comfort me, no one to restore my spirit.

My children are destitute because the enemy has prevailed."

¹⁷Zion stretches out her hands, but there is no one to comfort her.

The LORD has decreed for Jacob that his neighbors become his foes; Jerusalem has become an unclean thing among them. ¹⁸"The LORD is righteous, vet I rebelled against his command. Listen, all you peoples; look upon my suffering. My young men and maidens have gone into exile. ¹⁹"I called to my allies but they betrayed me. My priests and my elders perished in the city while they searched for food to keep themselves alive. ²⁰"See, O LORD, how distressed I am! I am in torment within, and in my heart I am disturbed, for I have been most rebellious. Outside, the sword bereaves; inside, there is only death. ²¹"People have heard my groaning, but there is no one to comfort me. All my enemies have heard of my distress; they rejoice at what you have done. May you bring the day you have announced so they may become like me. ²²"Let all their wickedness come before you; deal with them as you have dealt with me because of all my sins. My groans are many and my heart is faint."

Original Meaning

As NOTED IN the introduction, this chapter is an acrostic. Each verse begins with a word whose initial letter follows the twenty-two-letter sequence of the Hebrew alphabet. The first word in verse 1, 'eka ("How"), begins with aleph. As the initial word in the book, 'eka is also the traditional name of the book for Hebrew-speaking people.

More than one voice speaks in chapter 1. The poet (the author's voice) begins, and it is complemented by that of personified Jerusalem. When the chapter is read as a unit, the "back and forth" of the two voices mutually reinforces the tragic dilemma of Jerusalem. Possibly the two voices offer a clue to the performance of the poetry among the survivors of Jerusalem's downfall. A poetic recital would give the opportunity not only to descriptive language—that is, that of the poet—but also that of the aggrieved herself, ravaged Jerusalem. The two voices are arranged as follows:

- A. Verses 1–9a are the voice of the poet.
- B. A quotation is attributed to personified Jerusalem in verse 9b.
- C. Verses 10–11a are the voice of the poet.
- D. An extended quotation is attributed to personified Jerusalem in verses 11b–16.
- E. Verse 17 is the voice of the poet.
- F. An extended quotation is attributed to personified Jerusalem in verses 18–22.

Verse 1 indicates the theme of the chapter; it depicts the noble city of Jerusalem in the mourning position of a widow. Not only is she described, but she will speak. The imagery for the city is drawn from three cultural traditions: (1) cities described as female, (2) the funeral tradition of public mourning, and (3) a tradition of using uncleanness and nakedness as metaphors for sinful behavior.

The imagery for Jerusalem, personified and otherwise, runs throughout the chapter. She is a widow, once a noble woman and now a slave (1:1). The NIV rendering in verse 1, "she who was queen," translates the Hebrew noun s'ara, which indicates nobility or royalty but does not necessarily refer to a queen. It is the word used for the name of Abraham's wife, Sarah.

In verse 2 s'ara is forsaken by her "lovers." The term has a sexual overtone when used in a similar context by the prophets (e.g., Jer. 2:25b; Ezek. 16:36; Hos. 2:1–13), where it refers either to other gods pursued illicitly or to stronger neighbors with whom Israel or Judah sought to ingratiate themselves. The city's name is actually used for the first time in verse 4, where she is called "Zion" (also in 1:17). Elsewhere the city is named as "Daughter [of] Zion" (1:6), "Jerusalem" (1:7, 8, 17), and "Virgin Daughter of Judah" (1:15). Because of her sinfulness, the Lord has judged her, and her children have gone into exile (1:5; cf. 1:16, 18). Among her children are named "priests" (1:4, 19), "maidens" (1:4, 18), "people" (1:7, 11), and "young men" (1:15, 18).

The feminine personification runs throughout the chapter, with one exception. In 1:17 the lament is that the "LORD has decreed for Jacob that his neighbors become his foes." Here the name of the ancestor, which in previous years had sometimes been used for the northern kingdom,² serves to personify the nation of Judah and its capital as a covenant partner gone bad. Otherwise, the female imagery extends remarkably even to Judah in verse 3.³ Jerusalem is the metaphorical daughter/princess in the Lord's realm and/or the daughter of Judah (i.e., the name of the state).

The language of chapter 1 refers to the sinfulness of Judah and to a resulting sorrow and suffering. These things are related to one another; sinfulness has led to judgment and suffering. Their link is expressed succinctly in 1:5, "the LORD has brought her [i.e., Zion] grief because of her many sins" (cf. 1:8, 14, 18, 20, 22). The emphasis falls, however, on the grief, the suffering, and the pitiful nature of the city. She "weeps" (1:1–2, 16) and "groans" (1:8, 21–22), and is "in bitter anguish" (1:4) and "distress" (1:20–21). Nothing here points to the relief of the city's woes.

The ongoing nature of the city's suffering is underscored by the fivefold repetition of the phrase, "there is [was] none [no one] to comfort her" (Lam. 1:2, 9, 16, 17, 21), and the concluding comment of the chapter that her "heart is faint." In the comment that "her friends have betrayed her" (1:2), the city takes up a familiar theme from the psalms of lament/complaint (Ps. 38:11; 88:8). The chapter falls short of claiming that God has betrayed the city, but it seems clear that the experience of divine judgment has shattered the emotions of the poem's speakers.

The voice of the poet depicts Jerusalem in the posture of "remembering" her days of affliction (Lam. 1:7). This posture of remembering or bringing to mind again captures much of the reason for the book of Lamentations as a whole. What is depicted for Jerusalem is actually what the readers (or performers) do when reciting the poem.

In verse 16 Jerusalem weeps, for there is no one to comfort her. This is certainly true with respect to the poems of the book. Apart from the marvelous affirmation in 3:22–24, the tenor of the poems is almost unrelieved in its anguish. One gets only a hint of the other side of judgment in 4:21–22, which envisions judgment on the ravagers of Jerusalem and an end to the exile of Judah and Jerusalem. The same term "comfort" (nḥm), however, is used in Isaiah 40:1 in the imperative form as a command to "comfort" Jerusalem, since her anguish will come to an end and because she has paid double for her sins. Possibly there is a scriptural "echo" at work in Isaiah 40:1–2, whereby the cry of Jerusalem in Lamentations is taken up in the prophetic call to comfort the bereaved city.

In verse 22 Jerusalem asks that the evil done to her by her enemies be brought before God so that he can deal with them. An answer to this sentiment also lies largely outside the book. In texts like Obadiah and Isaiah 47 readers again may get an intertextual echo of Lamentations and the desire for vindication.

Bridging Contexts

AN INTERPRETER MAY EXTRACT certain "themes" from Lamentations 1 and then seek to apply them to a setting in ministry today. That exercise would be unhelpful without more consideration of how chapter 1 says what it says. Put another way, there is more to the text than the simple extrapolation of anguish as a result of an ancient tragedy. How "it says what it says" is a primary clue to its meaning for earlier readers, and with proper attention to detail and context, the "how" element can instruct modern readers as well.

(1) The female language points to a familial and corporate depiction of the capital city. By familial is meant the metaphor of membership in God's family. As the royal "daughter," she is a member of Yahweh's family and an intimate covenant partner with him. Jerusalem is also the political and cultural center of Judah. Reference to her is tantamount to a corporate reference to Judah. In that sense, to mention Jerusalem is pars pro toto (a part representing the whole). Her failures, therefore, are failures against a family identity and responsibility. Her shame reflects negatively on her failure to maintain a proper family identity and obedience to its standards of behavior.

- (2) Zion laments with respect to her fall from grace and to her anguish. Her mourning reflects in almost ritual fashion a pattern of funeral lament. Rather than first reading this in psychological terms, it is important to read the text as an indication of social status. Daughter Zion has lost her status as virgin princess and as family member. At certain levels of relationship, she has died. Deadly judgment and public shame are mixed together. Her humiliation reflects also the shame of rejection by God and that of violation by her (and finally God's) enemies. In this case, the shame and anguish are heightened because her enemies have laughed at or celebrated her downfall. As is common with the laments/complaints of the Psalter, the celebrations and taunts of the enemy are particularly bitter to take.⁵
- (3) Zion brings her lament and anguish directly to God. It is a dynamic worthy of careful attention. God has brought the shame and humiliation on her, but he is also the One to whom she turns in lamentation. It is almost as if she reminds God that her humiliation also means his loss as well. Her ridicule could become his as well. She can deny neither her failure nor her neediness. Her neediness is something that only God can fully grasp and only God can fully heal. One function of her lamentation is to give voice to her failures, so that God will recognize in her voice an indication of confession and an appeal for mercy.

It is important to remember that the "she" in this chapter is a corporate reference. Personified Zion is the people. Here we have finally an ecclesiology. God judges his people through their sin and suffering, and they offer their pain to the Lord.

Contemporary Significance

IN THE SUMMER OF 1999 John F. Kennedy Jr. died in a tragic airplane crash. Subsequent investigation concluded that he had likely miscalculated his navigational skills for night-time flight. He, his wife, and her sister were killed in the single plane crash. For American readers, JFK Jr. was close to royalty. With regard to his tragic death, one headline read: "The End of Camelot." Adding to the grief was the fate of his father, President John Kennedy, himself a victim of tragedy when he was shot and killed in November 1963.

It all seemed so senseless. John Jr. was young, handsome, and rich. The public outpouring of grief, however, was out of proportion to what JFK Jr. had accomplished in life. This comment is not meant to denigrate his life but to illustrate the public persona that JFK Jr. had become. Tragically, an American prince had died. His name and family represented much in the realms of American public life and national identity, and with his demise came an end for some people in their way of perceiving American identity.

The demise of Jerusalem brought with it the end of certain ways of perceiving a relationship with the Lord. How difficult it was (and is!) to grasp meaning in the context of tragedy. Just as some could now ask, "What will life be like without the ideals represented by JFK Jr.?" so God's ancient people asked, "What will life be like without Zion and Judah?" How difficult it is for God's people to see themselves in light of their failures. They first must know that to be God's people is a precious privilege, and then that it is possible for something to threaten that privilege so that they cannot take it for granted. Separation and exclusion from the family of God are painful. Shock is added to the pain with the subsequent recognition that failure has separated people from God in such a way that the rift cannot be healed from Daughter Zion's side any more than it can be healed from the church's side. It can only be healed from God's side.

The subsequent history of Jerusalem demonstrates that God can restore what Judah's failures had corrupted. In Jesus Christ the God who judged Jerusalem and worked through her destruction was himself judged. Christ bore the failures of the world as well as judged them. The poetry of Lamentations is one of the most articulate voices for confession of sin and lament over failure. The poems themselves point first to the consequences of failure; as tragedy they loom larger than life and seemingly out of proportion to the failure. But most important, they are directed to the only One who can hear them fully and adequately respond.

¹How the Lord has covered the Daughter of Zion with the cloud of his anger! He has hurled down the splendor of Israel from heaven to earth: he has not remembered his footstool in the day of his anger. ²Without pity the Lord has swallowed up all the dwellings of Jacob; in his wrath he has torn down the strongholds of the Daughter of Judah. He has brought her kingdom and its princes down to the ground in dishonor. ³In fierce anger he has cut off every horn of Israel. He has withdrawn his right hand at the approach of the enemy. He has burned in Jacob like a flaming fire that consumes everything around it. ⁴Like an enemy he has strung his bow; his right hand is ready. Like a foe he has slain all who were pleasing to the eye; he has poured out his wrath like fire on the tent of the Daughter of Zion. ⁵The Lord is like an enemy; he has swallowed up Israel. He has swallowed up all her palaces and destroyed her strongholds. He has multiplied mourning and lamentation for the Daughter of Judah.

⁶He has laid waste his dwelling like a garden;

he has destroyed his place of meeting.

The LORD has made Zion forget her appointed feasts and her Sabbaths; in his fierce anger he has spurned both king and priest.

⁷The Lord has rejected his altar and abandoned his sanctuary.

He has handed over to the enemy the walls of her palaces;

they have raised a shout in the house of the LORD as on the day of an appointed feast.

⁸The LORD determined to tear down the wall around the Daughter of Zion.

He stretched out a measuring line and did not withhold his hand from destroying.

He made ramparts and walls lament; together they wasted away.

⁹Her gates have sunk into the ground; their bars he has broken and destroyed.

Her king and her princes are exiled among the nations, the law is no more,

and her prophets no longer find visions from the LORD.

¹⁰The elders of the Daughter of Zion sit on the ground in silence;

they have sprinkled dust on their heads and put on sackcloth.

The young women of Jerusalem have bowed their heads to the ground.

¹¹My eyes fail from weeping,

I am in torment within, my heart is poured out on the ground because my people are destroyed, because children and infants faint in the streets of the city.

12They say to their mothers,
"Where is bread and wine?"
as they faint like wounded men in the streets of the city, as their lives ebb away in their mothers' arms.

13What can I say for you?
With what can I compare you,
O Daughter of Jerusalem?

O Daughter of Jerusalem? To what can I liken you, that I may comfort you, O Virgin Daughter of Zion?

Your wound is as deep as the sea.

Who can heal you?

¹⁴The visions of your prophets were false and worthless;

they did not expose your sin to ward off your captivity.

The oracles they gave you were false and misleading.

¹⁵All who pass your way clap their hands at you;

they scoff and shake their heads at the Daughter of Jerusalem:

"Is this the city that was called the perfection of beauty, the joy of the whole earth?"

¹⁶All your enemies open their mouths wide against you; they scoff and gnash their teeth and say, "We have swallowed her up. This is the day we have waited for; we have lived to see it."

17The LORD has done what he planned;

he has fulfilled his word, which he decreed long ago.

He has overthrown you without pity,

he has let the enemy gloat over you,

he has exalted the horn of your foes.

¹⁸The hearts of the people cry out to the Lord.

O wall of the Daughter of Zion, let your tears flow like a river day and night;

give yourself no relief,

your eyes no rest.

¹⁹Arise, cry out in the night, as the watches of the night begin;

pour out your heart like water in the presence of the Lord.

Lift up your hands to him for the lives of your children, who faint from hunger

at the head of every street.

²⁰"Look, O LORD, and consider:

Whom have you ever treated like this?

Should women eat their offspring, the children they have cared for?

Should priest and prophet be killed in the sanctuary of the Lord?

²¹"Young and old lie together in the dust of the streets;

my young men and maidens have fallen by the sword.

You have slain them in the day of your anger;

you have slaughtered them without pity.

²²"As you summon to a feast day, so you summoned against me terrors on every side. In the day of the LORD's anger no one escaped or survived; those I cared for and reared, my enemy has destroyed."

Original Meaning

CHAPTER 2 CONTINUES the mournful tone of the previous chapter. The poet again frequently refers to Jerusalem as "Daughter," and the pronoun "her" is used throughout to designate things that belong to or are associated with the city. Covenant terms such as Jacob and Israel also occur (2:1–3) to refer to those whom God has judged. Each of these terms emphasizes that the city, the state, and their inhabitants were and are members of God's people.

Careful examination of chapter 2 reveals several changes in the speaker's form of address. Verses 1–10 describe, in the third person, the suffering and anguish of the city through what God has done to them. God has covered the city with "the cloud of his anger" (2:1); he has "burned in Jacob like a flaming fire" (2:3; cf. 2:5); God has "handed over to the enemy the walls of her palaces" (2:7); and so on. Verses 9–10 describe Jerusalem in her pathetic state.

In verse 11 the poet uses the first-person "I" to describe his weeping and torment with respect to the awful condition of "my people." This is a most interesting verse, since the pattern from chapter 1 suggests that the first-person speech belongs to that of personified Jerusalem. Indeed, some commentators take it that way. However, the first person of 2:13 is that of the poet addressing Jerusalem, and it seems best overall to take 2:11 as also the voice of the poet. The alternation between description and first-person lament gives poignancy to the circumstances of Jerusalem's humiliation.

First-person references come also in verses 13 and 22. The former is the voice of the poet addressing Jerusalem, but verses 20–22 are perhaps better taken as the voice of Jerusalem. Verse 22 refers to those whom the speaker has cared for and raised—verbs associated with child-rearing. Since Jerusalem is frequently personified as a mother, it seems best to see her as the final speaker of chapter 2. In fact, verses 18–19 seem to address the wall(s) of Jerusalem with the urge to cry out. If correct—and verse 18 is textually difficult—this call to the wall(s) of Jerusalem is an example of metonymy, a literary device whereby something is represented or personified by a constituent part.

We may therefore set out the chapter's voices as follows:

- A. Verses 1–10 are the poet's description of Jerusalem's anguish and humiliation.
- B. Verses 11–13 are the poet's first-person response to Jerusalem's wretchedness.
- C. Verses 14–17 are again the poet's description of Jerusalem.
- D. Verses 18–19 are a call to Jerusalem's walls to cry out to God.
- E. Verses 20–22 are addressed to God by Jerusalem (perhaps more specifically her "walls"; cf. v. 18).

Both the city (2:13–19) and God (2:20–21) are addressed directly. These are second-person references ("you ... your"). The effect overall of this chapter is to move beyond a surface description to give a more nuanced and personal portrait of those judged and bereaved and to ask God about the rightness of the devastation.

The great distinction of Zion's calling is reflected in Lam. 2:1. She is the "splendor" (tip'eret) of Israel. This word can be used of an ornament or jewel. In Isaiah 60:7 God describes the temple as "my glorious house" (bet tip'arti). In Psalm 99:5 the ark of the covenant is described as God's "footstool," a term also used in in Lam. 2:1 in parallel with Israel's splendor. The city was "the perfection of beauty, the joy of the whole earth" (2:15; cf. Ps. 48:2), until it came crashing down.

In 2:3 the poet laments the fact that God has "cut off every horn of Israel." The term horn can be used as a metaphor for strength or honor, though it can also refer to the upraised corner or protrusions at the ends of a sacrificial altar (Ex. 29:12; Lev. 4:7; Ps. 118:27). It was customary in Israel that those who "grasped the horns of the altar" had asylum and would not be slain (cf. 1 Kings 1:49–53). Thus the comment that God has cut off every horn in Israel can mean that God has destroyed the pride and nobility of the people and/or that God has removed any means of seeking asylum from the judgment fallen on Jerusalem and Judah.

God is so angry with Jerusalem that he is destroying "his" things that are within her. God has "laid waste his dwelling" and "destroyed his place of meeting" (Lam. 2:6). Verse 7 elaborates on this matter: God has "rejected his altar and abandoned his sanctuary." The presence of the sacred temple in the midst of Jerusalem was no guarantee of God's benevolence or protection. The so-called "temple sermon" of Jeremiah made this view quite clear (Jer. 7 and 26). Even parts of the city are personified to underscore the horror of what has befallen God's jewel. The walls of the city lament and weep over their destruction (Lam. 2:8, 18).

Judgment is unsparing on those leaders who should have led the people in a different direction. The king is rejected and exiled (2:6, 9); the visionary task of the prophets failed them and their people (2:9, 14, 20). Priests are spurned, and now Torah is gone (2:6, 9, 20).

God used the enemy to judge his people and his city. In remarkably pointed and anguished language, the poet asks God whether he has ever treated anyone else like this (2:20). It is as if God has become the enemy by using the enemy.

Bridging Contexts

THE LANGUAGE OF JUDGMENT and destruction in Lamentations is almost a mirror image, a tragic reversal, of the language of the Zion psalms. Those psalms celebrate the greatness of Jerusalem as an agent of God's election and as the secure home of the faithful. A refrain from Psalm 46 says, "The LORD Almighty is with us; the God of Jacob is our fortress" (46:7, 11; cf. 46:1). God is in the midst of the holy city; she shall not be moved (46:5). In the midst of the temple precincts, a worshiper ponders God's steadfast love (48:9). Visitors are encouraged to walk around the ramparts of Jerusalem in order to tell the next generation that "this is God" (48:12–14). But now the security of the city of God has been rolled away by God himself, who has aided Jerusalem's enemies in destroying the city.

The function of this mirror image is to critique a theology of election as privilege and to underscore the necessity of responsibility. Here is a hermeneutical clue for one way to read the book of Lamentations, broadly speaking, and more particularly, to appropriate Lamentations 2. As with the harsh words of Jeremiah 7, Lamentations confesses that one cannot assume God will protect his own at all cost. No one can stand on holy ground and assert that nothing will overcome it/them. The fall of the city in 586 B.C. is proof of that. Chapter 2 portrays the royal city of God as destitute because of her failures.

Within the language of pain and despair are references to familiar failures. The leadership of God's people has failed miserably to educate and to serve the people responsibly. Here is a theme with wide scriptural endorsement—one that is of paramount concern in any age. It is important to note, however, that with all the language of failure and even accusatory language toward God, there is no suggestion that God has brought into being a turn of events incompatible with his will.

Certainly it is also important to note that modern readers should not universalize from the historical experience of 586 B.C. and the poetry of despair it produced. Not every situation of despair, whether of a group of people or an individual, is God's judging hand. Moreover, the almost defiant tone one picks up among the laments can be a spur to resist attempts to be defined solely as victims seeking pity. Defining oneself or one's group as victims with trampled rights can be both accurate and proper, but such defining can also lead to self-righteousness.

Contemporary Significance

Lamentations 2 teaches both an important historical lesson and one way to pray. The historical lesson, stated succinctly, is that nothing made by human hands can save—not even something as significant as the house of the Lord. Yes, God can give up on an institution founded at his instruction and capable of mediating his grace to generations of worshipers. God can even make war against it. That somber news is tempered by the truth that God can raise the dead and that God's ultimate will to save cannot be thwarted by the historical demise of a central "saving" institution. Congregations, denominations, and nations (including the modern state of Israel) need to hear this. They should hear both tones of the lesson. They are not indispensable to God, but God is gracious nevertheless.

The frankness of the language in Lamentations should persuade people that God is open to their real feelings and their honest reactions to tragedy. There is no "answer" in the immediacy of overwhelming tragedy, and one's prayers ought to reflect that. The great miracle of the gospel is that the One to whom despair and bitterness are directed is the One whose only Son suffered the travail of the cross. God, who strove against Jerusalem and Judah, also engaged the principalities and powers to gain an eternal victory for his people.

Yes! All things work together for good to those who love God and who are called according to his purpose (Rom. 8:28). His purpose is to conform us to the image of his Son. That means quite a bit of chiseling and disciplining for us. Not everything is good, but things that happen work toward the good purpose of our incorporation into Christ.

Lamentations 3:1–66

- ¹I am the man who has seen affliction by the rod of his wrath.
- ²He has driven me away and made me walk in darkness rather than light;

- ³indeed, he has turned his hand against me again and again, all day long.
- ⁴He has made my skin and my flesh grow old and has broken my bones.

- ⁵He has besieged me and surrounded me with bitterness and hardship.
- ⁶He has made me dwell in darkness like those long dead.
- ⁷He has walled me in so I cannot escape; he has weighed me down with chains.
- ⁸Even when I call out or cry for help, he shuts out my prayer.
- ⁹He has barred my way with blocks of stone;

he has made my paths crooked.

- ¹⁰Like a bear lying in wait, like a lion in hiding,
- ¹¹he dragged me from the path and mangled me and left me without help.
- ¹²He drew his bow and made me the target for his arrows.
- ¹³He pierced my heart with arrows from his quiver.
- ¹⁴I became the laughingstock of all my people;

they mock me in song all day long.

¹⁵He has filled me with bitter herbs and sated me with gall.

¹⁶He has broken my teeth with gravel; he has trampled me in the dust.

¹⁷I have been deprived of peace; I have forgotten what prosperity is.

¹⁸So I say, "My splendor is gone and all that I had hoped from the LORD."

¹⁹I remember my affliction and my wandering, the bitterness and the gall.

²⁰I well remember them, and my soul is downcast within me.

²¹Yet this I call to mind and therefore I have hope:

²²Because of the LORD's great love we are not consumed, for his compassions never fail.

²³They are new every morning; great is your faithfulness.

²⁴I say to myself, "The LORD is my portion; therefore I will wait for him."

²⁵The LORD is good to those whose hope is in him, to the one who seeks him;

²⁶it is good to wait quietly for the salvation of the LORD.

²⁷It is good for a man to bear the yoke while he is young.

²⁸Let him sit alone in silence, for the LORD has laid it on him.

²⁹Let him bury his face in the dust—there may yet be hope.

- ³⁰Let him offer his cheek to one who would strike him, and let him be filled with disgrace.
- ³¹For men are not cast off by the Lord forever.
- 32Though he brings grief, he will show compassion, so great is his unfailing love.
- ³³For he does not willingly bring affliction or grief to the children of men.
- ³⁴To crush underfoot all prisoners in the land,
- 35to deny a man his rights before the Most High,
- ³⁶to deprive a man of justice would not the Lord see such things?
- ³⁷Who can speak and have it happen if the Lord has not decreed it?
- 38 Is it not from the mouth of the Most High that both calamities and good things come?
- ³⁹Why should any living man complain when punished for his sins?
- ⁴⁰Let us examine our ways and test them, and let us return to the LORD.
- ⁴¹Let us lift up our hearts and our hands to God in heaven, and say:
- 42"We have sinned and rebelled and you have not forgiven.
- 43"You have covered yourself with anger and pursued us; you have slain without pity.
- ⁴⁴You have covered yourself with a cloud so that no prayer can get through.
- ⁴⁵You have made us scum and refuse among the nations.

- 46"All our enemies have opened their mouths wide against us.
- ⁴⁷We have suffered terror and pitfalls, ruin and destruction."
- ⁴⁸Streams of tears flow from my eyes because my people are destroyed.
- ⁴⁹My eyes will flow unceasingly, without relief,
- ⁵⁰until the LORD looks down from heaven and sees.
- ⁵¹What I see brings grief to my soul because of all the women of my city.
- 52Those who were my enemies without cause hunted me like a bird.

- 53They tried to end my life in a pit and threw stones at me;
- 54the waters closed over my head, and I thought I was about to be cut off.
- ⁵⁵I called on your name, O LORD, from the depths of the pit.
- ⁵⁶You heard my plea: "Do not close your ears to my cry for relief."

- ⁵⁷You came near when I called you, and you said, "Do not fear."
- ⁵⁸O Lord, you took up my case; you redeemed my life.
- ⁵⁹You have seen, O LORD, the wrong done to me.

Uphold my cause!

⁶⁰You have seen the depth of their vengeance, all their plots against me.

- ⁶¹O LORD, you have heard their insults, all their plots against me—
- ⁶²what my enemies whisper and mutter against me all day long.
- ⁶³Look at them! Sitting or standing, they mock me in their songs.
- ⁶⁴Pay them back what they deserve, O LORD, for what their hands have done.

- ⁶⁵Put a veil over their hearts, and may your curse be on them!
- ⁶⁶Pursue them in anger and destroy them from under the heavens of the LORD.

Original Meaning

CHAPTER 3 EXPANDS on the acrostic pattern of the first two chapters. Instead of a chapter of twenty-two verses, where the initial word in each verse follows the sequence of letters in the Hebrew alphabet, this chapter has sixty-six verses, compiled of twenty-two stanzas, where the stanzas follow the sequence of the Hebrew alphabet. Thus each stanza has three verses, and the initial word of each verse in a stanza begins with the same letter of the alphabet.

Chapter 3 is dominated by first-person references, the language of "I" and "we." This raises the question of authorship in a way the previous two chapters do not. The emphasis of the previous two chapters on the tragic fate of Jerusalem is in the background of chapter 3; front and center is the travail of an individual. Some scholars have taken a cue from this chapter and seen a reference to Jeremiah in the first-person voice. Although possible, most scholars have not found that view convincing. With respect to this individual, there is much language about judgment and the need for repentance that sets his voice apart from that of Jeremiah. In any case, chapter 3 has several of the constituent elements of a lament/complaint so well known from the book of Psalms.²

It is worth asking whether in chapter 3 we as readers are dealing with an individual voice in the fully modern sense of that term (i.e., an individual whose suffering and experience is provided in autobiographical form), or whether the "I" is the poet's voice in service to the larger community of readers and those who pray the Lamentations. The balance of probability favors the latter. This view does not deny that the suffering voiced in chapter 3 is real; it assumes that the suffering is real and not imagined or choreographed, but it understands that the presentation of the suffering is paradigmatic and that the voice of suffering invites those who hear and read to make it their voice. Put another way, the individual voice of chapter 3, which includes "we" and "our," speaks in order to provide a voice for the suffering members of his community. The first generations of readers would understand the formulaic language of chapter 3 (by way of the laments in the Psalter) to be paradigmatic of the poet's time and generation.

The "I" of chapter 3 is likely the poet of the book. He has seen the destruction of the city and its people, and the language of pain and suffering is filtered through both self-reference and shared experience ("we" and "our"). The language of individual travail is also reminiscent of Job,³ whose "speeches" are much like psalms of individual lament/complaint, especially in the description of his sufferings, in the recounting of the machinations of his "friends," and in his appeal to God for deliverance. Likewise, the affirmation of God's benevolent faithfulness is derived from the central confessions of the Old Testament (see below).

The poet first sees God as the source of trouble, who has turned his rod and hand against the poet (3:1–3). God has besieged and walled him in (3:4–9), as if the fate of the city and the poet are the same. God is a lion or bear, or more menacingly, an archer taking aim at the poet (3:10–12).

In slightly different language the enemies of Zion have condemned and hunted the poet (3:46–54). They plot, insult, and mock him (3:58–63). He recapitulates in his person the suffering endured by the city and its inhabitants. Because his experience is shared by his contemporaries, it is relatively easy to follow the shift in the language from "I" to "we."

As noted above, the terminology of what is essentially an individual lament abounds in scriptural echoes. Darkness is a place of judgment and anguish (3:2, 6).⁴ Barring of a way is evidence of judgment (3:9).⁵ Divine judgment is compared to the assaults of lions and bears (3:10)⁶ and arrows (3:12).⁷ The persecution of the enemies is like being hunted or immersed in water (3:52–54).⁸

Memory plays an important role in a lament. Sometimes the poet asks God to remember and sometimes he himself remembers or recalls the previous deeds of the Lord. Such is the case in 3:19–24. Both suffering and redemption are part of the poet's experience, and he sets their memories side by side. God is the source not only of judgment but also of deliverance. Since he knows that God is strong to save, he says he has "hope" (3:21, 24). The word in Hebrew is a verb (yḥl), which has the sense of waiting with expectancy. This means that the resignation seen elsewhere in Lamentations is tempered by the realization that God, who has struck both Jerusalem and the poet, is the same One who can overturn the shame of public judgment and humiliation.

In 3:22 the "great love" of the Lord renders the Hebrew term hesed. While love is not a wrong translation, the term also carries the meaning of kindness and loyalty. Hesed is the kind of act that is not required by civil law but springs from the concerned character of the one who acts. A good place to see its focus is in the saying of Hosea 6:6, that God prefers hesed to sacrifice and the knowledge of God rather than burnt offerings. Hesed and knowledge of God are paired together in the poetic couplet, and both are contrasted with ritual acts that, while good and proper, must proceed from something deeper and more fundamental than a sense of obligation. Stated differently, sacrifice is a requirement of the Torah and therefore good and proper in context, but hesed is something that can be freely given but not defined by requirements.

Closely related to the term hesed is that of compassion(s)—raḥamim in the Hebrew of 3:22. The best analogy is that of parental concern, for in the singular reḥem can mean womb. Finally, the poet confesses that God is great in faithfulness (*muna; 3:23). One finds these three terms in the great self-definition that God offers of himself to Moses in Exodus 34:6–7:

The LORD, The LORD, the compassionate [raḥum]¹² and gracious God, slow to anger, abounding in love [ḥesed] and faithfulness [*met],¹³ maintaining love [ḥesed] to thousands, and forgiving wickedness, rebellion and sin. Yet he does not leave the guilty unpunished; he punishes the children and their children for the sin of the fathers to the third and fourth generation.

One can read the claims of Lamentations about judgment and mercy and see them as the outworking of this great self-definition of God. The corporate judgment that fell on Judah and Jerusalem is like the judgment that falls to the third and fourth generation, since what is likely meant by them is the claim of completeness. To judge the third and fourth generation is to deal with all involved. By contrast, to show mercy and forgiveness to thousands is to claim that mercy and forgiveness abound further than the third and fourth generation of complete retribution.

As with psalms of lament/complaint, the poet speaks of the "pit," which seeks to claim his life (3:53, 55). In the stanzas of 3:52–57, the poet prays like the beginning of Psalm 130: "Out of the depths I cry to you, O LORD." The poet then reminds God that he has seen and heard what the enemies have done. His own life is like a judicial case (3:58), where God the Judge should rule in his favor. The chapter, again like some of the psalms of lament/complaint, concludes with the plea of the poet for God to judge the enemies. In this the poet is also reminiscent of Jeremiah, who sought judgment on his tormenters (Jer. 11:20; 15:15; 17:18; 18:19–23; 20:12).

As is sometimes also the case with psalms of lament/complaint, the poet is moved to speak about repentance (Lam. 3:40–45). Significantly, the language is first-person plural: "Let us examine ... let us return ... let us lift." This indicates that the poet's experience is linked with that of his community. They become one before God. It also signifies the function or impact of Lamentations as a whole. The poems move readers to consider their lives in light of God's holiness and his cleansing judgment.

Bridging Contexts

HUMAN SUFFERING AND RESPONSE. If one looks for an overall impression of chapter 3, it is its similarity to the psalms of individual lament/ complaint and to the complaints of Job. These parallels also provide the first indications of how they may be interpreted in modern contexts. Job and Lamentations are fundamentally oriented toward two issues: God's character in the face of human suffering, and the human response to God in the context of its suffering. Chapter 3 offers several windows on these two issues.

- (1) God was not absent from the travail and tragedy that accompanied the fall of Jerusalem. God was present as Judge, using historical circumstances in the process of judging and refining his people. The enemies, who in stylized language afflicts the poet, are also agents of God's approach to the poet and the poet's lamenting community. "Why should any living man complain when punished for his sins" (3:39)? Correspondingly, repentance is one response that the poet advocates to his contemporaries. It is characterized by self-examination in light of God's holiness and by a return to the Lord and his covenant stipulations. Judgment on the poet's enemies is still an option for God, even if he has used the "enemy" as a means to reach the poet.
- (2) God is also present as someone who loves his wayward people in spite of their sinfulness. There is more than affirmation of divine judgment in this chapter. If this was not also the experience of the poet before God, he could not have written 3:22–24, and he could not have affirmed that "though [God] brings grief, he will show compassion, so great is his unfailing love" (3:32). Note that the poet's affirmation comes at the center of the book, in the midst of the middle chapter. Perhaps this placement is a clue, although a small one, that God's loyalty is ultimately the center of existence for a believer.
- (3) The way into the future and the way back to God remain open. In addition to repentance the poet gives voice to a plea that God will hear his voice and act (3:56). Job-like in his despair and in his persistent seeking of an audience with God, the poet reminds God that he (God) had defended the poet's case and is his Redeemer. Without a full explanation for his pitiful circumstances, the poet clings to God and asks him to remove the injustice done to him. Only someone with a robust confidence in God's ability to hear and act can speak and pray in this fashion.

In a larger canonical context, one can see the circumstances of the poet similarly portrayed in the life of Christ. The paradigmatic Psalm 22, a classical lament/complaint, helped the early church see meaning in Christ's death and resurrection. Much of the poet's experience in Lamentations 3—especially persecution, suffering, and alienation—are also part of Christ's experience. More importantly, he endured them on behalf of those he loved.

Whether receiving the judgment due to sinners or suffering the fate of the unjustly accused, Christ represented it all in his atoning work, just as he had made it part of his own lived experience. The God to whom the poet prayed and to whom the poet wished to return is the God revealed in and through Jesus Christ.

Contemporary Significance

QUEST FOR SPIRITUALITY. It is illuminating to set the language of Lamentations 3 in the context of the modern quest for (in some cases almost an obsession with) spirituality. We must distinguish carefully between interest in a subject and the particular content or truthfulness of the subject material. There can be no doubt about the rising interest in spirituality in North America, just as there can be no doubt that for many people the topic has been loosened from any connection with a church (i.e., group or corporate identity) or historic form of theology. A recent headline in a secular magazine read "God Dethroned." The point of the piece was that the quest for a personal spirituality and religious experience in the Western world is increasingly being pursued apart from the traditional means of Christian grace.

In a recent phone conversation a pastor friend told me of a conference she was organizing for her congregation around the theme The People of God. A steering committee at the church was eager to explore several issues related to the practice of spirituality in daily life. One committee member reported that his neighbor would be a good person to make a presentation about modern spirituality. When the pastor inquired a bit about the neighbor, she discovered that it was the neighbor's intense interest in spirituality that had impressed the congregation member, even though he didn't know whether the neighbor was a Christian or not.

Chapter 3 of Lamentations comes in the context of historical experience and inherited revelation. It has several marks of authentic spirituality. The language of the text is thoroughly imbued with terms and concepts found elsewhere in the Old Testament. There is no doubt in the poet's mind that he is dealing with the living God, who revealed himself to his ancestors and acted in judgment in the destruction of Jerusalem. The questions for the poet are how to make sense of his tragic circumstances and how to approach his future in relationship to this God.

The poet looks at his circumstances squarely and sees them as God's approach to him and to his community. In response, the poet sees the circumstances as indications of a way forward in his spirituality. (1) He sees the tragedy of Jerusalem's fall as a revelation of the Lord, not as the entry of a new and foreign deity into his life or the stubborn arrival of an irrational mystery. Judgment is consistent with the character of God revealed in Torah, prophecy, and the psalms.

- (2) He learns that prayer and confession directed toward God bring him into fellowship with God.
- (3) He finds that repentance is more than a concept, that it is a tangible way of relating to God. Repentance is not a magical elixir but a series of steps taken toward God in obedience to his will. For many people, failure to acknowledge the truth about God is less an intellectual matter and more a moral matter; and more particularly a matter of the will. That is why confession and repentance are integral to authentic spirituality.
- (4) He seeks God for deliverance and healing. He is able to see that his circumstances are the occasion for fresh prayers and newfound vows.
- (5) It probably never occurs to him that his spirituality can be a private matter. His confession that God is faithful also includes affirmation that "we" are not consumed. His call to repentance offers steps for "us" to return to the Lord.
- (6) For the poet "waiting" on the Lord includes the practices of prayer and repentance and does not assume that waiting is merely marking time.

Obedience. One of the mysterious sayings in the New Testament is the affirmation in Hebrews 5:8 that Jesus learned obedience through things suffered. Clearly the obedience that Jesus embraced did not emerge from his earlier sinfulness. Instead, his incarnation and the life he lived gave shape to a kind of spirituality he shared with his followers. The poet of Lamentations 3 learns a kind of obedience from the things he has suffered. He gives voice to them because his experience is meant to be shared. Christian spirituality has a goal: to be conformed to the image of Christ. By the incarnation of his Son, God has given us a Savior, who was fashioned to draw us to himself. Suffering and travail can be means to that end, not in a masochistic or pain-denying way, but in ways that the poet of Lamentations is just beginning to grasp.

Lamentations 4:1–22

¹How the gold has lost its luster, the fine gold become dull! The sacred gems are scattered at the head of every street. ²How the precious sons of Zion, once worth their weight in gold, are now considered as pots of clay, the work of a potter's hands! ³Even jackals offer their breasts to nurse their young, but my people have become heartless like ostriches in the desert. ⁴Because of thirst the infant's tongue sticks to the roof of its mouth: the children beg for bread, but no one gives it to them. ⁵Those who once ate delicacies are destitute in the streets. Those nurtured in purple now lie on ash heaps. ⁶The punishment of my people is greater than that of Sodom, which was overthrown in a moment without a hand turned to help her. ⁷Their princes were brighter than snow and whiter than milk, their bodies more ruddy than rubies, their appearance like sapphires. ⁸But now they are blacker than soot; they are not recognized in the streets. Their skin has shriveled on their bones; it has become as dry as a stick. ⁹Those killed by the sword are better off than those who die of famine; racked with hunger, they waste away for lack of food from the field.

¹⁰With their own hands compassionate women have cooked their own children, who became their food when my people were destroyed.

11 The LORD has given full vent to his wrath;

he has poured out his fierce anger.

He kindled a fire in Zion that consumed her foundations.

¹²The kings of the earth did not believe, nor did any of the world's people, that enemies and foes could enter the gates of Jerusalem.

13But it happened because of the sins of her prophets and the iniquities of her priests, who shed within her the blood of the righteous.

¹⁴Now they grope through the streets like men who are blind.

They are so defiled with blood that no one dares to touch their garments.

15"Go away! You are unclean!" men cry to them.

"Away! Away! Don't touch us!"

When they flee and wander about, people among the nations say,

"They can stay here no longer."

¹⁶The LORD himself has scattered them; he no longer watches over them.

The priests are shown no honor, the elders no favor.

¹⁷Moreover, our eyes failed, looking in vain for help; from our towers we watched for a nation that could not save us.

¹⁸Men stalked us at every step, so we could not walk in our streets.

Our end was near, our days were numbered,

for our end had come.

¹⁹Our pursuers were swifter than eagles in the sky;

they chased us over the mountains and lay in wait for us in the desert.

²⁰The LORD's anointed, our very life breath, was caught in their traps.

We thought that under his shadow we would live among the nations.

²¹Rejoice and be glad, O Daughter of Edom, you who live in the land of Uz.

But to you also the cup will be passed; you will be drunk and stripped naked.

²²O Daughter of Zion, your punishment will end; he will not prolong your exile.

But, O Daughter of Edom, he will punish your sin and expose your wickedness.

Original Meaning

CHAPTER 4 VARIES the presentation of the city's fall from that given in chapters 1–2 or 3. A dominant motif here is a chronological contrast or what may be called a "then and now" contrast. The poet contrasts the former splendor of the city and its inhabitants with the pitiful conditions of his own day.

Verses 1–2 set a tone for the poem, where he compares the presiege city and its inhabitants to gold, the most precious metal in the ancient world. The postsiege and destroyed city is dull metal and scattered jewels, and its sons are pots of clay, subject to breaking at any moment.

With verse 3 comes a depressing comparison. The carrion-eating jackal cares enough to suckle its young, but the poet's people are like the ostrich. This is not a self-evident comparison to modern readers. Perhaps the ostrich's habit of burying eggs and leaving them gave it the reputation of being heartless (cf. Job 39:13–16). In any case, the dehumanizing effects of oppression continue their deadly work among a spent people.

One shocking effect of the Babylonian siege was the enormity of the changes that happened to families with children. There was no food for the children to eat (Lam. 4:4), so they had to beg for sustenance. Indeed, since there is nothing for anyone to eat, some mothers even cooked their own children (4:10). Although the comment about cannibalism is made without elaboration, the emotional impact can hardly be overestimated.²

Such dire circumstances give rise to a speculative thought concerning death. The poet suggests that those who died from the sword are better off than those who died from famine (Lam. 4:9). It is not clear whether the poet really believes this is so or whether he states the comparison for its effectiveness in depicting the horror of Zion's fall. One may compare the author of Ecclesiastes, a master of rhetoric in making a point, in his claims that the dead have it better than the living, and that better than either is the one never born (Eccl. 4:1–6). The logic of such a statement is, of course, suicide. But since Ecclesiastes does not advocate suicide elsewhere or opt for it in his own case, presumably he is exaggerating to make a point about life's inequities.

Similarly, the poet of Lamentations underscores the pain and despair of his generation rhetorically by noting how much longer and more painful it is to starve than to die by the sword. Perhaps we should interpret similarly the comment about the punishment on Zion as greater than that for Sodom (Lam. 4:6). Sodom—it should be recalled—was wholly consumed in fire in a way that Zion was not. God's judgment on Sodom was proverbial as an example of swift and total punishment, and this is the reason for its employment in the poetry of Lamentations 4.3

The poet picks up a strand of teaching about Jerusalem's failure that is given elsewhere in the Old Testament, namely, that the leadership of the people shed "the blood of the righteous" (4:13, i.e., innocent blood). Whether this means by active persecution or by allowing injustice is not stated. One finds this charge against Manasseh in 2 Kings 21:16, against Jehoahaz in Jeremiah 22:17, and against princes and officials in Ezekiel 22:6, 27.4

There is a reflection of the popular "theology of Zion" in Lam. 4:12, a belief that Jerusalem was sacrosanct and that God would not allow the city to fall. By "popular" is meant that it was well-received by the populace and thus a well-known sentiment. We should add immediately that this view was not held in such a simplistic formulation by inspired prophets such as Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel, who spoke a word of the Lord against a number of popular (mis)conceptions of their contemporaries. Jeremiah, in particular, railed against a blind belief in the inviolability of the temple area (see Jer. 7; 26). The poet of Lamentations notes (perhaps rhetorically) that foreign kings were surprised at Zion's fall, as if everyone knew of Zion's special status.

Lamentations 4:17 picks up on another theme given in prophetic accounts, namely, that help from another state would not save Zion. Jeremiah notes that the Babylonian siege was temporarily lifted because of an approaching Egyptian army (Jer. 34:21–22; 37:5–11). Hopes for relief, however, quickly died when the siege was reinstated.

The poet speaks movingly of Zedekiah, Zion's reigning monarch at the time of the city's fall (Lam. 4:20). He uses a striking phrase to describe his royal role—that Zedekiah was the very "life breath" of the people. Comparison of this statement with the strong polemic of Jeremiah against Zedekiah is one reason why some scholars conclude that Jeremiah cannot be the author of Lamentations. However one decides that issue, verse 20 reflects poignant appreciation for the royal office ("the LORD's anointed"). The royal messiah (i.e., "anointed one") represented and gave life to the people. Metaphorically his "shadow" provided security for the people like the shadow or wings of the Lord for the righteous (cf. Ruth 2:12; Ps. 17:8; 91:1, 4).

Finally, verses 21–22 refer to an end to Zion's punishment and the beginning of Edom's judgment from the Lord. Apparently, the assistance Edom gave the Babylonians in taking Zion was a particularly bitter pill for Judeans. After all, Judah and Edom were joined by blood. Nothing is said directly about an Edomite role in the fall of Jerusalem, but the vitriolic language of Psalm 137:7; Joel 3:19–21; and Obadiah 10–14 make it clear that Edom had committed treachery.

This oracle-like conclusion to Lamentations 4 has a strong ironic bite to it. Edom is actually called on to rejoice and be glad [in the present] because the cup is about to be passed, and they will be harshly judged in the future. Partaking of a celebratory cup—which turns on its drinker and leads to drunkenness and judgment—is a proverbial motif of judgment throughout the Old Testament. The content of the cup initially tastes good, but it contains the wrath of judgment soon to be dispensed.

The judgment that fell on Zion was severe, but it will have an end (4:22a). In succinct fashion the two parts of this affirmation show the major function of Lamentations. On the one hand, judgment has fallen, and the resulting tragedies are everywhere in evidence. On the other hand, a confession on the part of the people helps prepare the way for the new thing God will do in bringing an end to Jerusalem's bereavement and humiliation.

Bridging Contexts

THEN AND NOW. The "then and now" mode of presentation of chapter 4 is a basis on which to proceed toward a modern appropriation of the text. Jerusalem's demise at the hands of the Babylonians (and Edomites!) came as the result of sweeping historical forces used by the Lord to judge and discipline his people. Assumed in this presentation of great privilege and great fall is Jerusalem's place in the divine economy. It was a marvelous place because God had chosen it for the seat of Davidic rule and the location of the temple, where his name and glory dwelt. Any destruction of human life and limb is tragic, but the fall of Jerusalem is particularly poignant because she is "Daughter ... Zion," God's chosen vehicle.

There is a pattern to be discerned and prayerfully contemplated in the "then and now" motif: The church is an object of God's gracious choice, formed through the hammer and anvil of the historical process and intended as the spiritual home and sustenance of believers. Comprised of God's people, the church has taken a variety of forms in the unfolding revelation we call history. It has suffered grievously at times, and in the power of the Holy Spirit it has given birth to redemptive miracles. God has granted the church, or parts thereof, more than one angle of vision to see its past and present set before the seat of assessment.

Correspondingly, individual believers will recognize the pattern of tragedy and triumph, a kind of "then and now" too, as part of the Christian life. Christian lives are grounded in God's gracious call and subject to the various fits and turns known as providence.

It is important to note the way this chapter ends. The poet notes that God will not prolong the exile of Daughter Zion. At a time he has determined, Jerusalem and Judah will be reconstituted. It was and remains an ongoing process. For both individuals and the church, the future lies open to God's redeeming grace and his judgment on wickedness.

Contemporary Significance

ACCEPTING RESPONSIBILITY. The New York Times carried an editorial for July 5, 2000, written by Thomas Lynch entitled "A Man's Right to Choose." His first point has to do with the essence of adulthood in modern America, which is to exercise choice among options. He notes that his three sons and daughter can choose their sexual partners and how much to invest in the broader relationship that comes with sexual activity. Mr. Lynch knows that such choices/commitments are not easy, and he hopes (as do all parents) that his children will choose wisely, including the taking of precautions to avoid unwanted pregnancies. Lynch wonders, however—and this is his next point—that since his daughter can legally avail herself of the option to terminate a pregnancy, why cannot also his three sons legally avail themselves of the option to disallow responsibility for an unwanted child. As he puts it:

If the choice as to when one is ready, willing and able to parent is a good thing, wouldn't it be good for my sons as well? And if that choice may be exercised by women after conception, then shouldn't men have the same option: to proclaim, legally and unilaterally, the end of their interest in the tissue or fetus or baby or whatever it is that sex between a man and a woman sometimes produces?

Lynch reminds the reader that Roe versus Wade gave a woman the right to choose, but that once a child is born, the father is forced minimally into eighteen years of fiscal responsibility. He thinks it better if men as well as women can choose whether to be a parent or not, and that the state should not compel men any more than women to be parents.

The point of this quick summary is not to say that Lamentations 4 is an antiabortion, profamily piece, nor is it to vilify Mr. Lynch (with whom this author emphatically disagrees). It is to show how presuppositions about individual freedom and options of withdrawal of responsibility sit so differently beside a text like Lamentations 4, with its heartfelt concern for the inhabitants of Zion who have died or who are suffering, and above all its presupposition that God has placed them in places of moral and spiritual responsibility in which they will be held accountable.

Zion's (then) recent tragedy is set in the context of a history in which God called the city and its inhabitants to exercise their covenant responsibilities, to be a city set on a hill as a light to the nations, and to show forth God's praise. The poet laments the loss of people, great and small, while acknowledging communal responsibility for her demise. Everywhere it is assumed that God's people are called to exercise a moral and spiritual life in the public realm and that there have been and will be consequences to moral choices. This is not just an Old Testament conviction; it is broadly biblical and as relevant today as in the past.

In the twenty-first century it is still the case that there is no evading of responsibility in God's economy, so that it is false and misleading to view life as comprised primarily of morally neutral choices to be made by autonomous people. We have no right to move in and out of social commitments like stock options in building a portfolio.

The past, present, and future alike come under the judging, refining, and transforming work of God. We are called to moral and spiritual accountability. We, as creatures made in the image of God, are much more than "the tissue or fetus or baby or whatever it is that sex between a man and a woman sometimes produces" (the terminology of Mr. Lynch). All of us have a past as well as a future in which we are held morally and spiritually accountable. There will be harsh and tragic words in the future for those who think that freedom and pleasure are the goals of human existence. By God's grace they can be gifts in due season, but that is a far different matter than the goal of radical autonomy. The latter is a false god and leads ultimately to catastrophe.

God grants joy and peace in the Holy Spirit, but the freedom of his children comes through embracing a gospel of redemption and renewal—redemption from the effects of sin and selfishness, and renewal in the image and likeness of Christ. God will not prolong "your exile," but "wickedness" will be exposed. That was true then, and it will remain so.

Lamentations 5:1–22

- ¹Remember, O LORD, what has happened to us;
 - look, and see our disgrace.
- ²Our inheritance has been turned over to aliens,
 - our homes to foreigners.
- ³We have become orphans and fatherless, our mothers like widows.
- ⁴We must buy the water we drink; our wood can be had only at a price.
- ⁵Those who pursue us are at our heels; we are weary and find no rest.
- ⁶We submitted to Egypt and Assyria to get enough bread.
- ⁷Our fathers sinned and are no more, and we bear their punishment.
- ⁸Slaves rule over us, and there is none to free us from their hands.
- ⁹We get our bread at the risk of our lives because of the sword in the desert.
- ¹⁰Our skin is hot as an oven, feverish from hunger.
- ¹¹Women have been ravished in Zion, and virgins in the towns of Judah.
- ¹²Princes have been hung up by their hands;
 - elders are shown no respect.
- ¹³Young men toil at the millstones; boys stagger under loads of wood.
- ¹⁴The elders are gone from the city gate; the young men have stopped their music.

15 Joy is gone from our hearts;
our dancing has turned to mourning.
16 The crown has fallen from our head.
Woe to us, for we have sinned!
17 Recause of this our hearts are faint.

¹⁷Because of this our hearts are faint, because of these things our eyes grow dim

¹⁸for Mount Zion, which lies desolate, with jackals prowling over it.

¹⁹You, O LORD, reign forever; your throne endures from generation to generation.

²⁰Why do you always forget us? Why do you forsake us so long?

²¹Restore us to yourself, O LORD, that we may return;

renew our days as of old

²²unless you have utterly rejected us and are angry with us beyond measure.

Original Meaning

THE FINAL CHAPTER of Lamentations is a corporate lament, a mournful address to God, seeking his recognition of his people's sufferings and reminding him of the continuing effects of these sufferings on them. The text is not arranged as an acrostic in the ways that the first four chapters are, but the number of verses is twenty-two, the same as chapters 1–2 and 4. Perhaps the use of twenty-two verses is a final reminder that this communal response to the suffering of Judah and Jerusalem moves once more, like the previous chapters, from beginning to end.

The dominant voice in this chapter is first-person plural. There are pleas to God (5:1, 20–21), descriptions of dire circumstances and their ongoing oppressiveness (5:2–18), confession of sin (5:16), and affirmation of God's majesty (5:19). Verse 1 calls on God to remember what has happened to the people, and verse 20 comes back to the matter of what God knows or remembers by asking: "Why do you always forget us?" Between 5:1 and 5:20, only verse 19 does not describe the people's circumstances. In content there is little new from the previous chapters but much that remains poignant about the fall of Jerusalem and its effects on Judah.

The tone, indeed the very grammar, of the chapter with its challenge for God to remember and its plea for God to restore invites conversation between the people and God. In some ways this tone is a primary function of Lamentations as a poetic collection, but it is especially characteristic of the concluding chapter. By conversation is meant much more than the exchange of pleasantries or of recent news. A corporate call to God typically comes in the context of worship, and the topic of conversation here—the very possibility of an ongoing relationship between Judah and God—is best approached through prayer and confession.

There are formal parallels (the constituent parts) and common concerns with Psalm 44, a corporate lament/complaint. In 44:24 God is asked: "Why do you ... forget our misery and oppression?" In 44:1–8 God is extolled. One function of the psalm's initial praise of God is to remind both God and people that he has been their Protector and Redeemer in the past. In 44:20–22 the people note that they have not "forgotten" God, implying that perhaps God has forgotten them. A few verses later (44:23–24), they utter the plea for God to rouse himself from sleep. We are dealing here with metaphor and rhetoric. Psalm 44 does not, however, understand the devastation on God's people (whatever it was) as the consequence of sinfulness and faithlessness. On the contrary, that devastation comes from the evildoers as a result of the people's attempt to be faithful to God (44:17–18, 22).

The poet of Lamentations 5 offers a catalogue of characters whose lives have been shattered by the loss of Jerusalem. Women were assaulted, princes and elders abused, and men of various ages in calamity (5:11–14). Corporately the joy is gone from the people's hearts (5:15). The voices of the text sound weary, resigned, and accusatory.

One acknowledgment is that it was futile to seek aid from Egypt and Assyria (5:6). This was a familiar prophetic charge that God's people looked too quickly for deliverance from a neighbor, and the poet confirms its truthfulness.

There is no doubt in the mind of the poet that God has rejected and judged his people. But has God irrevocably and utterly rejected them, and is his anger beyond measure and without appeasement? No final answer can come solely from the side of the people, for they are not capable of restoring themselves to God. An answer, nevertheless, is intimated, even though only God can bring it to pass. It is intimated in the confession of God's daily mercy (3:22–24), in the claim that Judah's exile will not be forever (4:22), and in the request for God to restore the people to himself (5:21).

Bridging Contexts

WEARY AND OUTCAST. "With what shall I come before the LORD?" asks the prophet Micah in Micah 6:6. There are occasions when confession of sin and articulations of grief and concern are the order of the day. Lamentations 5 gives a historical voice for one such occasion. It serves as a summary of much of the previous book, yet it can also stand alone as a communal lament to God.

The abiding value of chapter 5 (which is essentially a concluding prayer) is not likely to be found by a modern group trying to match up exactly its problems with those enunciated in the chapter. It is more likely to be discovered through contemplation on the weariness (5:5b) that human failure and fallibility typically produce. It is even more likely to be found when a believing community finds itself not only weary but also feeling outcast, and where there is no longer any joy in the Lord. If there is presence of mind among God's people on such occasions, some will articulate their feelings and find that God seems absent or judgmental. It may take a long time to discover any or all of the reasons why. But those reasons do exist. Furthermore, the language of biblical lamentation may provide just the kind of resources needed for the articulation of pain and the spiritual discernment to push beyond the spiritual malaise.

Another clue to the application of the chapter's teaching is the fact that a number of medieval Hebrew manuscripts repeat 5:21 after 5:22, so that the reading or chanting of the book does not end on a down note. A consequence of this reading is to end the book with a recognition that God is able to restore a wayward people (or person) and that there is a history to the issue of divine judgment and restoration.

Contemporary Significance

MEMORY. The congregational voices in Lamentations 5 work on several levels, two of which may be held up for special consideration. One common element is memory. With regard to God's memory, when the ancient congregation asks God to remember its decrepit state, it does not literally believe that God has forgotten their circumstances. To remember in this instance means to bring to mind again a matter whose import should induce one to act. That is why the call for God to remember in the prayer is immediately connected with a plea for God to see and take notice. The assumption is that once the circumstances are noted, they will induce action on God's part.

With regard to the people's memory, the shameful and oppressive nature of what happened at the hands of the Babylonians was kept in memory and thus (it was hoped) became instructional for later generations. The circumstances functioned as a teaching device, explaining why Jerusalem had fallen and warning of the consequences. Lamentations functions to keep a sad and oppressive period alive in memory and influence so that it may not get repeated.

Visitors to the concentration-camp complexes at Auschwitz-Birkenau in Poland report that plaques have been erected on the rubble of one of the crematoriums. Of all the concentration camps established by the Nazis, Auschwitz seems to evoke the most horror. Each plaque says essentially the same thing, although each is inscribed in a different language. The English plaque reads: "Forever let this place be a cry of despair, a warning to humanity." The complexes at Auschwitz-Birkenau serve a crucial educational role. No visitor can avoid the feeling of evil that pervades the place, even though the camp has not been used in over half a century.

Despair and hope. One cannot visit that site without experiencing despair and warning. In recent years Polish Catholics have placed crosses near a part of the complex as a witness of their Christian faith and as a sign that Christ too shared the pain of the thousands of Jews and other "undesirables" executed in the gas chambers and burned in the crematoriums. Some Jewish groups have been offended at their witness and have insisted that nothing divert attention from the task of remembering and warning.

Reading the book of Lamentations evokes similar emotions to those expressed on the plaques at Auschwitz. The main reasons are that much of the language of this book is that of despair and that the destruction of Jerusalem had an impact on ancient Jews similar to that of the Holocaust on modern Jews. To be sure, there are clear differences between occasions for the Judean war with Babylon and those for the Second World War, chief among them being Judean responsibility for the disaster in 586 B.C. Judeans of that time brought the tragedy on themselves in ways that European Jews did not bring the Holocaust on themselves. But despair was and remains a common product of both events.

Whatever one makes of the propriety of Polish Catholics erecting crosses at Auschwitz, a Christian interpreter cannot help but read Lamentations in light of the cross and resurrection, since these two teachings are foundational to the gospel. In some ways the destruction of Jerusalem and the downfall of Judah were tantamount to the death of Judah and the people of God. Only a God who raises the dead can speak adequately to that generation.

The book of Lamentations preaches the cross in a historically based typological sense. In doing so, it unmasks the pretense and hypocrisy of humankind in any generation, pushing all who read its despairing poetry to reflect on the meaning and purpose of their own lives. Within the dominant despair of the book are indications that God has spoken a renewing and redeeming Word. In the fullness of time that Word was enfleshed, crucified, and resurrected. Through his Word God is not aloof toward despair, even despair of its own making, but has taken despair into and upon himself through the cross and resurrection of his Son, expending its death-dealing curse and bringing healing and immortality to light.

Calvin's words to introduce the reading of Lamentations are appropriate also as a conclusion to our own reading: "Though nothing in the land appeared but desolation, and the temple being destroyed, the covenant of God appeared as made void, and thus all hope of salvation had been cut off, yet hope still remained, provided the people sought God in true repentance and faith."

- 1. For additional details see the discussions of E. Tov, "The Literary History of the Book of Jeremiah in the Light of Its Textual History," in Empirical Models for Biblical Criticism, ed. J. Tigay (Philadelphia: Univ. of Pennsylvania Press, 1985), 211–37; idem, "Some Sequence Differences Between the MT and LXX and Their Ramifications for the Literary Criticism of the Bible," JNSL 13 (1987): 151–60; and W. Andrew Dearman, "My Servants the Scribes: Composition and Context in Jeremiah 36," JBL 109 (1990): 403–21.
- 3. The discovery of fragments of Jeremiah at Qumran have made the textual history of Jeremiah even more intriguing and difficult to reconstruct. Included in the Hebrew fragments are texts in Hebrew that are closer to the Greek versions than the Masoretic Text. See the discussion of E. Tov, "The Jeremiah Scrolls from Cave 4," RevQ 2 1989): 189–206.
- 4. In his commentary W. McKane describes the compilation of the book of Jeremiah as a "rolling corpus" (A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on Jeremiah (2 vols.; ICC; Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1986), I–lxxxiii.
- 5. One of the striking things about the book of Jeremiah is the number of doublets and repeated phrases and allusions. This phenomenon seems to reflect a goal of presenting, and even re-presenting, a full measure of Jeremiah's public prophecies. See the analysis of G. H. Parke-Taylor, The Formation of the Book of Jeremiah: Doublets and Recurring Phrases (Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2000).
- 6. For sequential readers, a description of Jerusalem's fall (and thus the end of the kingdom of Judah) is given in Jer. 39. Chapter 52 is anticlimactic in several ways. Apparently the account of Judah's fall was attached to the prophet's oracles against other nations as another indication of his prophetic work.
- 7. Associated with the theme of God's lordship over the nations is the announcement initially revealed in Jeremiah's call that God watches over his word to pluck up and to tear down, to build and to plant (1:10). These words and their elaboration run like a thread through various parts of the book.
- 8. S. Mowinckel, Zur Komposition des Buches Jeremia (Oslo: Dybwad, 1914). Chapter 2 is an example of a collection of poetic oracles; ch. 36 is an example of biographical prose; and ch. 7 is an example of a prose sermon.

- 11. The bibliography on Jeremiah's "confessions" is large; see M. S. Smith, The Laments of Jeremiah and Their Contexts: A Literary and Redactional Study of Jer 11–20 (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1990), and the comments in the commentary on Jer. 11:18–12:17.

- 13. Jeremiah is mentioned in 2 Chron. 35:25 and 36:21, and his oracles influenced a variety of postexilic biblical texts, noncanonical literature, and the New Testament. See Holladay, Jeremiah 2:85–93. For more details, see C. Wolff, Jeremia im Frühjudentum und Urchristentum (Berlin: Akademie Verlag, 1976).
- 14. One may find introductions to and descriptions of these works in volumes of the Anchor Bible Dictionary, ed. D. N. Freedman (New York: Doubleday, 1992). See the various entries under "Baruch," "Jeremiah (Additions to)," and "Jeremiah, Epistle of."
- 15. See M. Knowles, Jeremiah in Matthew's Gospel: The Rejected Prophet Motif in Matthean Redaction (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1993).
- 16. Perusing the catalog of a theological library will amply confirm that reflection on the Trinity has made a remarkable resurgence. Good sources for further thought are: M. Erickson, God in Three Persons: A Contemporary Interpretation of the Trinity (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1995); T. F. Torrance, The Christian Doctrine of God: One Being in Three Persons (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1996); and P. Toon, Our Triune God: A Biblical Portrayal of the Trinity (Wheaton: Victor, 1996).
- 17. Christ as the scope of Scripture is a favorite theme of the church fathers. Although some of their exegetical methods appear arbitrary, the substance of their claim is still valid. See the essays on patristic biblical interpretation in P. Blowers, ed., The Bible in Greek Christian Antiquity (Notre Dame, Ind.: Univ. of Notre Dame Press, 1997). Three modern biblical scholars whose work presupposes Trinitarian doctrine with a Christological center are: B. Childs, Biblical Theology of the Old and New Testaments (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1993); F. Watson, Text and Truth: Redefining Biblical Theology (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1997); and C. Seitz, Word Without End: The Old Testament As Abiding Theological Witness (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998).

- 18. For a treatment of the threefold office in both historical and contemporary theology, see G. Wainwright, For Our Salvation: Two Approaches to the Work of Christ (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1997), 99–186. One may interpret Christ as the culmination of prophecy, priesthood, and royalty whether beginning with a historical-critical analysis or typological, intertextual, and even sociological readings.
- 19. There is future hope for Israel in the New Testament (cf. Rom. 11:25–36). I do not think it wise to give priority to a literal reading of Old Testament prophecies concerning the future of Israel when the New Testament does not do so.
- 20. Some examples would be J. Bright, The Kingdom of God (Nashville: Abingdon, 1953); P. E. Hughes, Interpreting Prophecy (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1976); H. LaRondelle, The Israel of God in Prophecy (Berrien Springs, Mich.: Andrews Univ. Press, 1983); W. VanGemeren, The Story of Salvation: The Story of Salvation from Creation to the New Jerusalem (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1988); idem, Interpreting the Prophetic Word (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1990).
- 21. See further, D. L. Baker, Two Testaments, One Bible, 2d ed. (Downer's Grove: InterVarsity, 1992). His discussions of typology and promise and fulfillment are especially helpful.
- 22. Two excellent discussions of hermeneutics, dispensational and otherwise, are J. S. Feinberg, ed., Continuity and Discontinuity: Perspectives on the Relationship Between the Old and New Testaments: Essays in Honor of S. Lewis Johnson, Jr. (Westchester, Ill.: Crossway, 1988); C. A. Blaising and D. L. Bock, ed., Dispensationalism, Israel, and the Church: The Search for Definition (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1992).
- 23. For discussion of a difficult subject, see E. R. Thiele, The Mysterious Numbers of the Hebrew Kings (3d ed.; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1983); more briefly, M. Cogan, "Chronology (Hebrew Bible)," in ABD, 1:1005–11; and G. Galil, The Chronology of the Kings of Israel and Judah (Leiden: Brill, 1996). Each work takes the scriptural texts seriously in an attempt to present an absolute chronology where possible. The fact that each presents a different chronology in places (and the fact that there are still other competing schemes) urges caution upon the interpreter. For Babylonian and Egyptian dates see D. J. Wiseman, Chronicles of Chaldean Kings (626–556 B.C.) in the British Museum (London: British Museum, 1956); A. Spalinger, "Egypt and Babylon: A Survey (620–550 BC)," Studien zur altägyptische Kultur 5 (1977): 228–44.
- 24. The two-volume commentary on Jeremiah by William Holladay is based on a reconstruction of Jeremiah's career that assumes the thirteenth year of Josiah (ca. 627 B.C.) as the prophet's birth. Holladay provides a full bibliography of others, pro and con, who discuss the date of the prophet's birth and the commencement of his public ministry.
- 25. For a defense of the thirteenth year as the beginning of Jeremiah's prophetic career, assuming a date for his birth ca. 640 B.C. or earlier, see J. R. Lundbom, The Early Career of the Prophet Jeremiah (Lewiston, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen, 1993). Lundbom proposes that Jeremiah was called, as a teenager, in Josiah's thirteenth year, but that he did not commence his public prophecy until a few years later, prompted by the discovery of the book of the Torah in Josiah's eighteenth year (622 B.C.).
- 26. It is also possible that some of the oracles in Jer. 30–31, concerned with the reconstitution of Israel (i.e., the northern kingdom), come from the early period of Jeremiah's ministry. According to 2 Kings 23, Josiah's reforming measures included parts of the former northern kingdom (= Israel), and Jeremiah may have supported these efforts with prophecies about the restoration of Israel. If so, the oracles in Jer. 30–31 have been updated and are placed in a context where they point to a new future for all of God's people.
- 27. See Cogan, "Chronology," 1:1006, for brief explanations of these terms.
- 28. See briefly ibid., 1:1008; Galil, Chronology of the Kings, 108-18.
- 29. See the two articles by A. Malamat, "The Last Kings of Judah and the Fall of Jerusalem: An Historical-Chronological Study," IEJ 18 (1968): 137–56; "The Twilight of Judah: In the Egyptian-Babylonian Maelstrom," VT 25 (1975): 123–45; also Galil, Chronology of the Kings, 108–18.
- 30. Apparently the Egyptians stood to inherit Assyrian title to the region of Syria-Palestine if they supported the Assyrians in their struggle with the Babylonian rebels (see Malamat, "The Twilight of Judah," 124–29).
- 31. According to 2 Chron. 34:3–4, Josiah's physical maturation also resulted in a spiritual maturation. In the eighth year of his reign (632 B.C.) he began to seek the Lord in earnest fashion, and in his twelfth year (628 B.C.) he began a religious reform in Judah and Jerusalem.
- 32. According to 2 Chron. 35:25, Jeremiah offered a lament for Josiah upon his death.
- 33. Jehoahaz is also called Shallum in Jer. 22:11-12.
- 34. According to Dan. 1:1 Nebuchadnezzar also moved against Jehoiakim in the latter's third year and took some Judeans into exile (e.g., Daniel and his friends). Nothing about this action is recorded elsewhere in the Bible or in the Babylonian Chronicles. It may be, however, that the notice in Daniel follows an accession-year form of reckoning. See M. K. Mercer, "Daniel 1:1 and Jehoiakim's Three Years of Servitude," AUSS 27 (1989): 179–92; T. Longman, Daniel (NIVAC; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1999), 43–45. If so, then the third year of Jehoiakim in Dan. 1:1 in an accession-year dating scheme would be 605 B.C. According to Jer. 46:2, the battle against the Egyptians (605) was in Jehoiakim's fourth year. The fourth year would be reckoned on a nonaccession-year scheme. Nebuchadnezzar was made king soon after the battle, and the campaign of the Babylonians in the region continued through the year. Thus the reference in Dan. 1:1 likely refers to Babylonian activity that took place sometime not long after the summer of 605.
- 35. Wiseman, Chronicles of Chaldean Kings, 69.
- 36. According to 2 Chron. 36:6 Jehoiakim was in the custody of Nebuchadnezzar. The various biblical references do not provide details of his mysterious death. See A. R. Green, "The Fate of Jehoiakim," AUSS 20 (1982): 103–9.
- 37. Jeremiah calls him Coniah (Jer. 22:24) and Jeconiah (24:1).

- 38. The date is calculated from Babylonian records. See Wiseman, Chronicles of Chaldean Kings, 72–73. Among the Judeans taken into exile at this time was Ezekiel.
- 39. In an astounding coincidence, archaeologists discovered ration tablets from the Babylonian administration that mention Jehoiachin and his five sons; see W. F. Albright, "King Jehoiachin in Exile," BA 5 (1942): 49–55.
- 40. There are two clay bullae from the time period that likely refer to this Gedaliah. The first is from Lachish and reads, "Belonging to Gedaliah [w]ho is over the house." The provenance of the second is not known; it reads, "Belonging to Gedaliah, servant of the king." For bibliography see N. Avigad, Hebrew Bullae from the Time of Jeremiah: Remnants of a Burnt Archive (Jerusalem: Israel Exploration Society, 1986), 25.
- 41. Because of the constraints of geography, an attacking army would often approach Israel or Judah from the north. Thus it is possible that Jeremiah intentionally did not name the northern threat, but simply emphasized its menacing profile and left its identity to the startled imagination of his hearers. Since Babylonian resurgence had not begun in 627 B.C.—the traditional or early date for the prophet's call—those who look for a likely foe at this time have suggested either the Scythians or the Assyrians. For the discussion see H. Cazelles, "Zephaniah, Jeremiah, and the Scythians in Palestine," in A Prophet to the Nations: Essays in Jeremiah Studies, ed. L. Perdue and B. Novacs (Winona Lake, Ind.: Eisenbrauns, 1984), 129–49. Some scholars have even concluded that Jeremiah wrongly threatened Judah with invading hordes of Scythians or Assyrians in 627 and that later his editors used the prophecies as indications of the coming Babylonian threat.
- 42. In addition to the brief sketch of Jeremiah's theology provided in the introductory sections of this commentary, one may consult the detailed study of M. Schulz-Rauch, Hosea und Jeremia: Zur Wirkungsgeschichte des Hoseabuches (Stuttgart: Calwer Verlag, 1996).
- 43. Jer. 36:9. As noted above, Nebuchadnezzar's army campaigned in the region during this year, destroying Ashkelon in the winter of 604. As an Egyptian appointee, Jehoiakim's future and perhaps that of Judah hung in the balance.
- 44. There are a number of accounts in the book concerned with Jeremiah's persecution at the hands of Judeans. They range from laments about his circumstances (e.g., 15:10–21) to accounts of beatings and imprisonments (e.g., 37:14–15).
- 45. In his oracles against Moab and Ammon (48:1–49:6), Jeremiah may reflect knowledge of Babylonian campaigns in Transjordan after the fall of Jerusalem and his forced relocation to Egypt. Josephus records that Babylon campaigned in Ammon as a reprisal for the murder of Gedaliah (Ant. 10.9.7). This campaign may be the setting for a 3d group of Judean exiles taken to Babylon in Nebuchadnezzar's 23d year (Jer. 52:30).
- 46. A perceptive sketch of elements of Jeremiah's theology is in Appendix A of D. Kidner's The Message of Jeremiah (Downers Grove, Ill.: InterVarsity, 1987), 163–72. This appendix is entitled "Sin, Judgment, Repentance, Grace and Salvation in the Preaching of Jeremiah." See also L. Perdue, "The Book of Jeremiah in Old Testament Theology," Troubling Jeremiah, ed. A. R. Pete Diamond et al. (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1999), 320–38.
- 47. See further R. Simkins, Creator and Creation: Nature in the Worldview of Ancient Israel (Peabody, Mass.: Hendrickson, 1994).
- 48. Jeremiah's convictions on this matter are similar to those of Hosea and Deuteronomy.
- 49. Jer. 2:11, 32; 4:22; 5:26, 31; 7:12; 8:7; 12:14, 16; 15:7; 23:13, 22, 27, 32; 29:32; 30:3, 22; 33:24; 50:6; 51:45.
- 50. Cf. 2 Sam. 7.
- 51. Christ embodies the hopes of Israel in his "threefold office" as prophet, priest, and king. See the introductory comments on interpreting the book of Jeremiah.
- 52. Jer. 3:14; 6:2, 23; 8:19; 9:19; 14:19; 26:18; 30:17; 31:6, 12; 50:5, 28; 51:10, 35. Cities are personified as feminine in the Old Testament. Jeremiah also uses the phrase "my daughter people" in 6:26; 8:11, 19–22; 9:1, 7; and the phrase "virgin daughter people" in 14:17. It is not clear whether the people as a whole are personified as God's daughter or just the people of Jerusalem are thus personified.
- 53. Cf. Jer. 7:2; 19:14; 20:1–2; 26:2; 28:1; 35:4; the phrase "which bears my Name" occurs in 7:11.
- 54. Jeremiah's assessments of polytheism and syncretism are similar to those of Zephaniah and Ezekiel.
- 55. The Hebrew word ba'al means master, owner, and even husband. It is a not a proper name but a title or appellative for a deity who may also have a personal name. In addition to Bible dictionary and encyclopedia entries on Baal, cf. also J. A. Dearman, "Baal in Israel: The Contribution of Some Place Names and Personal Names to an Understanding of Early Israelite Religion," in History and Interpretation: Essays in Honour of John H. Hayes, ed. M. P. Graham et al. (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1993), 173–91.
- 56. Baal in the singular is in Jer. 2:8; 7:9; 11:13, 17; 12:16; 19:5; 23:13, 27; 32:29, 35; in the plural, 2:23; 9:14 (cf. Hos. 2:15 [13], 19 [17]; 11:2); for Baal as "shame" and "worthless," see Hos. 9:10; Jer. 2:8.
- 57. The verb "to rule, be king" in Hebrew is malak. A noun derived from the verb, meaning "king," is melek. Molech is from the same word and indicates a (divine) monarch or ruler. See the commentary discussion on chs. 7, 19, and 32 for additional details on this cult.
- 58. Egyptian deities: 43:12; 46:25; Moabite deity: 48:13, 46; Ammonite deity: 49:3; Babylonian deities: 50:2.

- 1. See the comments on chronology and difficulties in reckoning chronology in the introduction on the life and times of Jeremiah.
- 2. For discussion of the location of biblical Anathoth near the modern Arabic village of Anata, see J. L. Peterson, "Anathoth," ABD, 1:227–28.

1. W. Holladay points out (Jeremiah, 1:26–31) that the call of Jeremiah is close in form to that of Moses in Ex. 3:1–15; furthermore, Jeremiah may be a "prophet like [Moses]" (Deut. 18:18) for Judah and Jerusalem.

- 1. Jer. 2:23 refers to the Baals in the plural. Cf. also the references to multiple deities in 2:25, 28.
- 2. A form of the same Hebrew word (qodes) is used to describe God's setting Jeremiah apart for service in 1:5.

- 1. There is a reference in 3:6 to prophecy during the days of Josiah. Some material in this section, therefore, may reflect Jeremiah's earliest public preaching.
- 2. Ezekiel 23:1–49 is an extended treatment of the two-sisters metaphor. It is so long and developed that it presupposes a narrative form and so functions like a parable.
- 3. Jeremiah Unterman has proposed that Jer. 3:6–13 and 3:19–4:2 fit best in the days of Josiah's reforming efforts, when the prophet Jeremiah thought that wholehearted repentance might effect real change in Judah's national life. See his From Repentance to Redemption: Jeremiah's Thought in Transition (JSOTSup 54; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1987), esp. 23–38, 176–79.

- 1. See the discussion of the "foe from the north" in the introduction ("Jeremiah's Place in the Last Years of the Judean State and Its Destruction").
- 2. In this context one should compare also Ezekiel's prophecy that God will remove the heart of stone from his people and replace it with a heart of flesh (Ezek. 11:18–21). Stone is inanimate and incapable of yielding or responding, but flesh is alive and responsive. When put in the context of the "new spirit" that God will give them (11:19), a fleshly heart is then ready to respond to God.
- 3. This same motif is found in Hos. 4:3 and Joel 1:10 (see text note).
- 4. Lit., "without heart" (cf. Jer. 4:22 on foolishness). Jer. 5:23 describes the heart of the people as "stubborn and rebellious."
- 5. Cf. Matt. 13:1–17.
- 6. Repentance and renewal are goals of the book for readers.
- 7. Perhaps the modern reader will recall that the second law of thermodynamics or entropy holds that matter tends to a state of progressive disorder without the influence of mitigating factors. For example, a plant that no longer translates sunlight and water into usable energy will die; when dead, the plant will decompose.

1. See the treatment of the historical background in the introduction.

- 2. Although the accounts in 1 Sam. 1–4 do not record a destruction of Shiloh's worship center by the Philistines when they defeated Israel, Jeremiah's words imply such destruction. Also, interpreters often suggest that the memory of God's deliverance of Jerusalem during the time of Sennacherib's assault (2 Kings 18–19; 2 Chron. 32; Isa. 36–39) lies behind the Judean belief during Jeremiah's day that God would act similarly when Jerusalem was threatened by Egypt or Babylon. This is certainly possible, if not probable, but Jeremiah does not cite that deliverance. The biblical accounts indicate that the Lord answered the intercessions of Hezekiah and Isaiah by sending his angel to destroy the Assyrian army. God's command to Jeremiah that the prophet not intercede for the people indicates that this time (cf. Isa. 37:33–35) God will not protect the city or the temple.
- 3. See comments on Jer. 44 for discussion of the Queen of Heaven.
- 4. Some interpreters have concluded that Jer. 7:21–23 represents a tradition of the people's desert wandering, which did not include a sacrificial system, implying that sacrifices were not a divine mandate but a human convention. Since the pentateuchal storyline describes sacrificial worship in the desert as God's mandate, this conclusion is not likely. More probably the force of v. 22 is hyperbolic: To deny one thing is to emphasize the importance of the other. Sacrifice and offerings are the fruit of the covenant relationship, not a substitute for it.
- 5. For further details on topheths and their associations with Baal and Molech, see J. A. Dearman, "The Topheth in Jerusalem: Archaeology and Cultural Profile," JNSL 22 (1996): 59–71. See also comments on ch. 19.

- 1. The Hebrew word mišpat, used here, is singular, so that the phrase could be translated that the people "do not know the justice [or justness] of the LORD."
- 2. Verse 8 refers to the lying pen of the scribes. Scribes comprised a professional class of people employed for their abilities in reading and writing. Those who dealt with the interpretation of Torah were most likely priests (who could read and write) because knowledge of priestly duties was necessary in interpreting such matters as sacrificial ritual and distinguishing between clean and unclean items.
- 3. In all three instances, the NIV translates the literal phrase "daughter of my people" simply as "my people," assuming it refers to God's people. This is likely correct, although the literal translation could refer to Jerusalem. Contextually it seems more likely that the people themselves are being addressed as the vulnerable daughter of a heartsick Father. One should compare this phrase with the similar "Daughter Jerusalem" or "Daughter Zion." Both of these phrases refer to the city itself, not to one of its offspring.
- 4. Cf. 2:23 for the other reference to Baal in the plural.
- 5. The noun qina is used in 9:20 (9:19 in Heb.), where the NIV translates it as "a lament." For funeral rituals and poetry associated with them, see the introduction to the book of Lamentations.
- 6. Cf. Isa. 44:9–20 for another extended diatribe against idolatry.
- 7. The NIV uses uppercase letters because the translators understand the phrase to be a title for God.
- 8. Among mainline Protestant churches in North America, the movements associated with goddess spirituality or New Age philosophy may be tantamount to polytheism. Among conservative and evangelical churches, defense of the American way, wooden pride in orthodoxy, and preoccupation with success may be tantamount to idolatry. Among some non-Western churches, overt polytheism may be a serious issue to confront.

- See the introduction to the book for further discussion on the prose materials in Jeremiah and the composition of the book.
- 2. For a lucid discussion of the term covenant and for further bibliography on the significance of the word, see J. H. Walton, Covenant: God's Purpose, God's Plan (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1994).
- 3. It is not clear from the context in ch. 11 whether the oath sworn to the forefathers refers to the promise of land made to Abraham and his descendants in Canaan (e.g., Gen. 12:1–7; 28:10–15) or to this same promise as it was renewed with the generation in Egyptian slavery. Stated differently, it is not clear whether the "forefathers" of 11:5 are the ancestors in Egyptian slavery or those named in Genesis 12–50.
- 4. For additional study on the vocabulary of God's choosing Israel, with attention to the covenant and marriage formulae, see T. S. Sohn, The Divine Election of Israel (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1991).
- 5. For lists of blessings and curses contained in God's covenant with Israel, see Lev. 26 and Deut. 27–30. For the covenant ratification ceremony at Sinai see Ex. 24:3–8. The people promised obedience to the Lord's covenant, and the covenant with him was sealed in blood.

- 6. See the treatment of the historical setting for the book in the introduction.
- 7. In his two-volume commentary Jeremiah, W. Holladay proposes that several passages in Jeremiah are "counter-proclamation" to the seven-year cycle of the public reading of Deuteronomy. The years of reading would be 622, 615, 608, 601, and 594 B.C. According to Holladay, Jer. 11:1–17 is one of those counter-proclamations. See also Holladay's "A Proposal for Reflections in the Book of Jeremiah of the Seven-Year Recitation of the Law in Deuteronomy (Deut 31:10–13)," in Deuteronomium, Entstehung, Gestalt und Botschaft, ed. N. Lohfink (Leuven: Leuven Univ. Press, 1985), 326–28. One need not accept everything about Holladay's theory to see the possibilities of influence from Josiah and Deuteronomy on the work of Jeremiah.
- 8. In Rom. 9:4 Paul refers to the Israelites as recipients of "covenants." Probably what the apostle has in mind is the covenant with creation (Gen. 9:8–17), the Sinai covenant (Ex. 19:3–6), the covenant with David (2 Sam. 7; cf. Isa. 55:1–3), and the eschatological promise of an everlasting covenant with Israel in Ezekiel (e.g., Ezek. 16:60–63; cf. Hos. 2:18–20), interpreted as a complementary way to refer to the eschatological "new covenant" (Jer. 31:31–34) predicted by Jeremiah. Each of these affects Israel differently.
- 9. In first-person speech the covenant is called by God "my covenant" (e.g., Ex. 19:5); in third-person speech it is described as "his covenant" (e.g., Deut. 4:13).

- 1. There is a large bibliography on these texts. To cite only recent studies in English, see M. S. Smith, The Laments of Jeremiah and Their Contexts: A Literary and Redactional Study of Jer 11–20 (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1990); K. O'Connor, The Confessions of Jeremiah: Their Interpretation and Role in Chapters 1–25 (SBLDS 94; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1988); A. R. Diamond, The Confessions of Jeremiah in Context: Scenes of Prophetic Drama (JSOTSup 45; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1987). These titles demonstrate that the terminology varies concerning the proper term for Jeremiah's prayers. Lament is an English term used to describe a type of prayer in the Old Testament that comes in the context of death or tragedy as well as those that are a response to mistreatment and persecution. Some interpreters would distinguish between these two aspects and call the latter a complaint. Others call Jeremiah's prayers "confessions." Whichever term is preferred, this basic type occurs frequently in the Psalms, and Lamentations is the title to the little book of prayers that follows Jeremiah in English versions of the Bible (see introduction to Lamentations).
- 2. The NIV translation "let me see your vengeance upon them" can also be rendered "let me see your vindication upon them." The Heb. word in question is n^eqama. It does indeed have the element of retribution or vengeance, but also that of vindicating the innocent or oppressed through judgment.
- 3. The NIV correctly renders the verb rib as "bring a case." It is typically used for judicial affairs and matters of dispute needing judgment or arbitration.
- 4. See the remarks in the introduction about Jesus as the fulfillment of the offices of prophet, priest, and king in the Old Testament.

1. W. D. Stacey, Prophetic Drama in the Old Testament (London: Epworth, 1990); K. Freibel, Jeremiah's and Ezekiel's Sign-Acts: Rhetorical Nonverbal Communication (JSOTSup 283; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1999).

- 1. The Hebrew text of Jer. 14:1 actually reads "droughts," an odd term that some commentators have wanted to vocalize differently. In context, however, the basic meaning is clear: There has been no rain (14:3–4).
- 2. See comments on ch. 36 for additional discussion of the date and context given in 36:9. The Greek version (LXX) reads "eighth year" instead of "fifth year."
- 3. The word translated as "backsliding" is $m^e \check{s}ubot$. It is a plural term. In singular form it is the same word used to describe "faithless" Israel in 3:6–13.
- 4. The reign of the wicked Manasseh is also narrated in 2 Chron. 33:1–20. As with the account in Kings, the sins of Manasseh are described; in addition, however, his eventual repentance is also noted (33:12–16). The references in 2 Kings and Jeremiah are concerned with the continuing influence of Manasseh's apostasy on a subsequent generation.

5. Calvin, in preaching on Jeremiah 14, said: "It is not that God does not hear the prayers of His people, for He always accepts them, but most often He does not fulfill them in the way they have requested. Their prayers are answered, but not according to their desires"; quoted from Sermons on Jeremiah by Jean Calvin, trans. Blair Reynolds (Lewiston, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen, 1990), 1.

- 1. One may consult Holladay, Jeremiah, 1:447–55, for some of the lexical and interpretational difficulties. The NIV interprets Jer. 15:12–14 as a continuation of the Lord's first reply to Jeremiah, which begins in 15:11.
- 2. See comments on Jeremiah's laments in 11:18–12:17. Much of the lament in Job 3:1–26 concerns the claim that it would have been better for Job not to have been born.
- 3. There are several other places in the Old Testament where a similar concept is expressed, using the Niphal (passive) form of the verb maşa' (2 Kings 22:13; 23:2; 2 Chron. 34:21, 30), all of which refer to the finding of the book of the covenant during the reign of King Josiah. Ezekiel is asked to eat a scroll as part of his prophetic call (Ezek. 2:9–3:15).
- 4. See comments on this verb in Jer. 3.
- 5. In 15:19 Jeremiah is told literally that he will become as God's mouth.

- 1. One should compare Deut. 4:25–31, which also assumes that the worship of other gods in exile is a judgment that comes on Israel as a result of similar activity in the Promised Land.
- The NIV typically renders the personal name of God as "LORD." This is a tradition reaching back into the biblical period itself.
- 3. Calvin, Sermons on Jeremiah, 140.

- 3. On the Lord's inheritance, see 2:7; 3:19; 10:16; and the Lord's plaintive lament in 12:7–9.
- 4. The word for "blessed" in Ps. 1:1 is 'ašre, not a form of the verb barak as in Jer. 17:7. The former is used more often in wisdom literature.
- 5. Refuge (mahseh) is used primarily in Psalms to describe the person and work of God (cf. Ps. 62:7; 71:7; 73:28; 91:2, 9; 94:22; 142:5).
- 6. This is particularly true of Paul (see below).
- 7. R. Niebuhr, Moral Man and Immoral Society: A Study in Ethics and Politics (New York: Scribner's, 1932). Niebuhr claims that regardless of the personal commitments of people, their participation in public life and society's institutions involves them in collective failures. His modern analysis of "society" is a good way to understand how an Old Testament view of corporate personality and identity can be translated (in modified form) into concepts that modern people will recognize as influential on themselves.

- 1. See the discussion of symbolic acts in the comments on Jer. 13.
- 2. The common English term for forming the clay is actually "to throw" a pot.
- 3. See the comments about the call for repentance in ch. 3.

- 4. The comment is similar to 2:27, where God charges the people with turning their back ('orep) to him, yet in the day of trouble they turn and seek his deliverance.
- 5. Ch. 20 will show what kind of judgment and humiliation Jeremiah's opponents have in mind for him.
- 6. The term for pit in 18:20, 22 is used in Prov. 22:14 and 23:27 to describe the seductive trap of a prostitute. Cf. Ps. 35:7, where the psalmist laments the fact that his enemies have "without cause dug a pit for me." A similar term is used in Prov. 26:27: "If a man digs a pit, he will fall into it." This is an affirmation about act and consequence.
- 7. See comments on Jer. 7.

- 1. The name is known from extrabiblical inscriptions from the period of Jeremiah, including a reference in the Arad inscriptions. Since there was a sacrificial shrine at Arad (near where the ostraca were discovered), it may be that the Pashhur of Arad was also a priest. See Y. Aharoni, Arad Inscriptions (Jerusalem: Israel Exploration Society, 1981), inscrip. #54.
- 2. The word translated by the NIV as "stocks" is rather obscure. It may refer to some form of restraining device like a collar or to something like the stocks known from Europe and colonial America, where one is forced to sit, bound by fetters, in an unnatural and painful position.
- 3. For an introduction to Jeremiah's laments/complaints, see comments on 11:18–12:17.
- 4. The same verb (pth) is used in Ex. 22:16[15] to describe the seduction of a young woman. It can also describe the actions of a suitor or someone who courts ("allures") a female with the prospects of marriage (Hos. 2:14[16]).
- 5. The phrase indicates "the sorrowful way of the cross."

- 1. The Heb. phrase is an idiom that describes the gift of life as a "prize of war" or "booty." Cf. the similar statement in Jer. 38:2; 39:18; 45:5.
- 2. For further elaboration on this theme, see T. Longman and D. Reid, God Is a Warrior (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1995).

- 1. See 2 Kings 23:31–34. After a brief reign of three months following Josiah's death, Jehoahaz was removed by Pharaoh Neco; he died in exile in Egypt.
- 2. See 2 Kings 23:34–24:6. His name was Eliakim, but it was changed to Jehoiakim by Pharaoh Neco, who placed him on the throne after removing Jehoahaz. His reign lasted from 609–598 B.C. 2 Kings 24:6 simply notes that he died, while 2 Chron. 36:6 records that Nebuchadnezzar bound him in chains to take him to Babylon.
- 3. See 2 Kings 24:6–16; 25:27–30. He reigned only three months before being led into exile by Nebuchadnezzar. According to 2 Kings 25:27–30/Jer. 52:31–34 he survived at least thirty-seven years in Babylon.
- 4. See 2 Kings 24:17–25:7. He reigned approximately eleven years, from 597–587/586 B.C. The fall of Jerusalem and its destruction by the Babylonians took place at the end of his reign.
- 5. The list of social crimes in Jer. 22:3 is similar to that in 7:6.
- 6. For further comments on the cultural setting of social justice themes, see M. Weinfeld, Social Justice in Ancient Israel and in the Ancient Near East (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1995). Ps. 72, for example, presupposes that the king in Jerusalem is to defend the weak and to guard justice and righteousness in the land as his God-given duties.
- 7. "Righteous" (saddiq) is also the term used for someone who is "innocent" of a legal charge.
- 8. Jer. 21:12 addresses the house of David; 22:2 speaks generally of the king of Judah who sits on David's throne, along with his "servants" and "people." Both Jer. 21:12 and 22:3 contain the injunction to "rescue from the hand of his oppressor the one who has been robbed."
- 9. One should compare the instructions in Deut. 21:1–9, which are designed for a community to purge itself of any guilt for "innocent blood" that may derive from an unsolved murder.

- 10. The NIV translates Jer. 36:22 as "winter apartment." This is possible, but the Heb. term at issue, bet, ordinarily means house. According to Mic. 3:9–10, leaders in Jerusalem had earlier built Jerusalem with bloodshed and wickedness.
- 11. See 1 Chron. 3:17–18, which lists Jehoiachin's sons. Five of his sons are mentioned in Babylonian administrative documents that detail the rations given to Jehoiachin while a prisoner in Babylon. See W. F. Albright, "King Jehoiachin in Exile," BA 5 (1942): 49–55.

- 1. Jeremiah's younger contemporary Ezekiel describes the kings as shepherds (Ezek. 34). There are several similarities between this chapter and Ezek. 34.
- 2. Jer. 23:5–6 is repeated in 33:14–16.
- 3. The verb is a passive form of yš'. Names such as Joshua, Isaiah, Hosea, and Jesus (Matt. 1:21) are based on this word.
- 4. The "you" of Jer. 23:16 is second-person plural.
- 5. The council is the assembly of the heavenly host (cf. 1 Kings 22:19–22), where the Lord, the cosmic King, holds court and sends appointed messengers to announce his word.
- 6. Prophetic activity is known in the New Testament churches (1 Cor. 12–14; Eph. 4:11), both for good and for ill (cf. Rev. 2:20).

- 1. According to Jer. 52:31–34 Jehoiachin was kept under house arrest for thirty-seven years before being granted some additional freedom in Babylon. In 24:1 Jeconiah, an alternate form of his name, is used in the Hebrew text.
- 2. Amos had a vision of a basket of fruit (at a temple?), which became the occasion for a prophetic announcement of judgment on Israel (Amos 8:1–4).
- 3. Readers will note the correspondence in vocabulary between the call of Jeremiah (Jer. 1:10) and the (re)building and (re)planting of the exilic community.
- 4. This formula is the shorthand version of the covenant relationship established by God with Israel at Mount Sinai/Horeb. Cf. Jer. 31:33 (and reference to heart); also Ex. 6:7; Lev. 26:12; Ezek. 11:20; 36:28; Zech. 8:8. Deut. 26:16–19 has the formula in somewhat expanded form.
- 5. See comments on the heart at Jer. 4:4 and 17:9.

- 1. That is, 605 B.C. Nebuchadnezzar had been active previously as crown prince and head of the army before assuming the throne at his father's death. With the defeat of Egypt at Carchemish in the summer of 605, the Babylonians assumed political hegemony over Syria-Palestine.
- 2. In the Heb. text these oracles are located in chs. 46–51. Not only does the Greek version of Jeremiah include them here after v. 13, but the order of the oracles differs in the Greek version from that of the Hebrew chs. 46–51. The transmission of this oracular material is a complicated issue. In addition to the detailed commentaries see G. Fischer, "Jer 25 und die Fremdvolkerspruche: Unterschiede zwischen hebraischem und griechischem Text," Bib 72 (1991): 474–99.

- 2. The NIV translates the Heb. word tora as "law." The choice for an English equivalent is difficult. It is not clear if the tora of 26:4 refers to a state-mandated code or the Sinai covenant code, since we do not know what was the state-mandated religious code under Jehoiakim. If 26:4 assumes the Sinai covenant code, then its authoritative nature as divine instruction should be recognized in the temple above all places. It may not have been the "law of the land."
- 3. See the reference to "his servants the prophets" in 25:4.
- 4. See the comments about Shiloh in the interpretation of ch. 7.
- 5. Shaphan was an important official under Josiah and instrumental in the finding and interpreting of the book of the torah discovered during Josiah's reign (2 Kings 22). Ahikam too was part of the committee sent to consult with the prophet Huldah about the book (22:12). He was the father of Gedaliah (2 Kings 25:22; Jer. 39:14). On the influence of this scribal family, see J. A. Dearman, "My Servants the Scribes: Composition and Context in Jeremiah 36," JBL 109 (1990): 408–17.

- 1. For a more complete explanation of the textual problems, see W. Holladay, Jeremiah, 2:112, 115.
- 2. The NIV translation assumes that "in the beginning" can qualify the fourth year of Zedekiah. If the phrase refers to the accession year of Zedekiah as proposed by most commentators, then the translation is incorrect.
- 3. This requires seeing the events of ch. 27 as occurring in the beginning of Zedekiah's reign (597/596 B.C.), while those of ch. 28 in his fourth year. The more natural reading of the narratives is to see both ch. 27 and ch. 28 as recounting events in the fourth year (594/593) of Zedekiah.
- 4. Jer. 27:22 concerns the restoration of the temple vessels taken by Nebuchadnezzar, but the restoration of the people is probably assumed (cf. 28:3–4). In any case, it is stated elsewhere that God will restore the exilic people to their land (e.g., 24:5–7).
- 5. Balaam was paid the diviner's fee in Num. 22:7. For a discussion of the terms listed in Jer. 27:9 in the context of divination in the ancient world, see M. S. Moore, The Balaam Traditions: Their Character and Development (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1990).
- 6. See comments on prophet symbolic acts in Jer. 13.

- 1. On the translation of 28:1 and the interpretation of the phrase "early in the reign," see the introductory comments in the commentary on Jer. 27.
- 2. Some English translations give the name as Jeconiah, which approximates the Hebrew name in 28:4. The name is an alternative to the better-known name Jehoiachin. For consistency, the NIV uses Jehoiachin.
- 3. In 28:8 Jeremiah makes a reference to the prophets "who preceded you and me." The "you" is masculine singular and likely refers to Hananiah. Thus Jeremiah too included Hananiah in the category of a Yahwistic prophet.
- 4. This word is used in the Decalogue (Ex. 20:16): "You shall not give false testimony against your neighbor." Jeremiah uses it on various occasions (Jer. 3:10, 23; 5:2, 31; 6:13; 7:4, 8–9; 8:10; 9:3, 5; 13:25; 14:14; 16:19; 20:6; 23:14, 25–26, 32; 37:14). In the context of prophets speaking deception or falsehood, it occurs in 27:10, 14–16; 28:15; 29:9, 21, 23, 31.

- 1. Some English translations give the name as Jeconiah, which approximates the Hebrew name in Jer. 29:2. The name is an alternative to the better known name Jehoiachin. For consistency, the NIV uses Jehoiachin.
- 2. Cf. comments in 26:24 about the family of Shaphan.
- 3. The NIV translators have interpreted the Hebrew term šalom, traditionally rendered as "peace," as expressive of more than the absence of conflict and the presence of security; it is expressive also of material well-being ("prosperity," "prosper").
- 4. See the references to the Heb. term šeqer (lie, deception) in the comments of the previous chapter.
- 5. The Hebrew word in 28:16 and 29:32 is sara. It reflects a conscious turning away from something, an overt rejection of someone.
- 6. 6. See, e.g., Phil. 3:7-21; Heb. 11:1-40.

- 1. There is a reference to a book (scroll) in Jer. 30:2. Cf. 25:13; 36:4, 28, 32. See further B. Bozak, Life Anew: A Literary-Theological Study of Jer. 30–31 (Roma: Editrice pontificio instituto, 1991).
- 2. See the relevant sections in R. P. Carroll, Jeremiah: A Commentary (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1986). A reasonable and theologically sensitive representative of a related view may be found in W. Brueggemann, Jeremiah 26–52: Exile and Homecoming (ITC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1991), 39–47. Brueggemann is reticent about the precise historical origin of much of the material in chs. 30–31. He is more concerned to interpret the voice of God within these texts, which give hope to the hopeless.
- 3. An influential article representing this view is by N. Lohfink, "Der junge Jeremia als Propagandist und Poet: Zum Grundstock von Jer 30–31," Le livre de Jérémie, ed. P. M. Bogaert (Leuven: Leuven Univ. Press, 1981), 351–68. W. Holladay, Jeremiah 2 (Hermenia; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1989), 155–67, reconstructs earlier recensions of chs. 30–31, directed first to Israel and then to Judah. Most recent commentators who hold to a traditional dating for Jeremiah's public ministry do associate some of these prophecies with his preaching during the period of Josiah's reform. Obviously those who believe that Jeremiah began his prophetic ministry in 609 or later do not equate any of the texts in chs. 30–31 with the period of Josiah's reforms.
- 4. See comments on "faithless Israel" in ch. 3.
- 5. These chapters have a complicated textual history, perhaps suggesting a lengthy process of preservation. In addition to the study of Bozak cited above, see B. Becking, "Jeremiah's Book of Consolation: A Textual Comparison: Notes on the Masoretic Text and the Old Greek Version of Jer 30–31," VT 44 (1994): 145–69.
- 6. Cf. 30:21; 33:17; also 23:5–6. In 30:9 "David" stands symbolically for someone from David's dynasty. Jeremiah stands in line with several of the prophets who predict that God's promises to the Davidic house have not failed, regardless of the quality of the current ruler or even if no descendant currently serves as king. Cf. Isa. 9:1–7; 11:1–9; Ezek. 34:23; 37:24; Hos. 3:5; Amos 9:11–12.
- 7. See the texts listed in the footnote above and the comments on Jer. 23:5–6.
- 8. One might compare the concluding words to the book of Ecclesiastes: "Fear God and keep his commandments, for this is the whole duty of man. For God will bring every deed into judgment, including every hidden thing, whether it is good or evil" (Eccl. 12:13b–14). The point of intersection with this passage in Jeremiah comes in the claim that the future will cast a different light on matters now hidden or misunderstood.
- 9. Jer. 31:1 is likely a summary heading for the prophecies contained in ch. 31. The introductory formula that begins verse 2 ("This is what the LORD says") is for a particular oracle (cf. also 31:7, 15, 23; footnote 11 below).
- 10. Israel is but one of several terms used to signify the people of God. It is used several times (e.g., 31:1–2, 4, 10, 21, 23, 27, 31, 36–37) as are the terms virgin (31:4, 21), Judah (31:23, 27, 31), Jacob (31:7, 11), Ephraim (31:6, 18, 20), and Rachel (31:15). Zion (31:6, 12; cf. 38–40) and even Samaria (31:5) are also employed to refer to the people in their various political and geographical forms.
- 11. See "This is what the LORD says" in 2, 7, 15, 35; "declares the LORD" in 1, 27, 31, 38; "hear the word of the LORD" in 10. It must be admitted that there is still ambiguity where some units of speech end and others begin. One can, for example, read 31:15–22 as one poetic unit, and see 31:23–26 as a separate prose unit.
- 12. The term is female and can refer to the capital city as indicative of the people. Since "Virgin Israel" will plant vineyards on the hills of Samaria (v. 5), it is unlikely that this reference is a metaphor for Samaria.
- 13. Note, e.g., Deut. 7:8, which uses the verb to describe God's redeeming Israel from slavery in Egypt.
- 14. The acts of Boaz in redeeming family property, marrying Ruth, and providing an heir to the family line of Elimelech are the acts of a family or kinsman-redeemer. In Heb. such a one is called a go'el, lit., "one who redeems." The verb ga'al is also used to describe God's liberation of his people from slavery in Egypt (Ex. 6:6; 15:13).
- 15. Jer. 31:15 is quoted in Matt. 2:17–18. Herod the Great's slaughter of the young boys in Bethlehem provoked lamentation among the bereaved. Matthew reminds readers of his Gospel that this is not the first time that children among God's people have been killed. The dastardly work of Herod and the sorrows it produced are part of a larger scriptural pattern already adumbrated in Rachel's weeping. See the study by M. J. J. Menken, "The Quotation from Jeremiah 31(38).15 in Matthew 2.18: A Study of Matthew's Scriptural Text," in The Old Testament in the New Testament: Essays in Honour of J. L. North, ed. S. Moyise (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2000), 106–25. Menken notes a quote from a rabbi preserved in Genesis Rabbah 82:10: "We find Israel called after Rachel, as it says, 'Rachel weeping for her children." The location of Rachel's tomb is thought to be near Bethlehem (cf. Gen. 35:19–20; 48:7), and this may also have given Matthew reason to see significance in the Jeremiah quote for the sad event in Bethlehem during Herod's reign.

- 17. God is the subject of the verb when used in the simple (Qal) and Niphal stems. This is not the case in Piel and Hiphil.
- 18. The same proverb is quoted in Ezek. 18:2 as part of an extended discussion on the nature of corporate judgment and individual responsibility. J. S. Kaminsky, Corporate Responsibility in the Hebrew Bible (JSOTSup 196; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1995), 139–78.
- 19. One should compare also the use of the term ba'al in Jer. 3:14.
- 20. One cannot determine who was the first early Christian to equate the gospel message of new life in Christ with the phrase "the new covenant." Melito, bishop of Sardis in western Turkey from ca. A.D. 170–90, made a list of books that he placed under the category of "the old covenant," implying that the Christian faith could be placed in the category of "new covenant." The reference to his list comes from Eusebius's Ecclesiastical History (4.26.14). Clement of Alexandria used "new covenant" to refer to Christian faith, and the term became more widespread in the third and fourth centuries. See further, H. von Campenhausen, The Formation of the Christian Bible (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1972), 262–68.
- 21. On matters related to writing and transfer of property, see P. King, Jeremiah: An Archaeological Companion (Louisville: Westminster-JohnKnox, 1993), 85–91. King specifically treats Jeremiah's purchase as part of this section of the book.
- 22. Most English readers will recognize the construct form (= "house of") of the word bayit in the more familiar term bet. Bethlehem, e.g., means "house of bread."
- 23. Cf. Lev. 25:25–28 on the significance of a family's inheritance.
- 24. The word for redemption is g^e 'ulla, derived from the verb ga'al, to redeem. A kinsman-redeemer was called a go'el, someone who could buy back or acquire family property or even family members who had been acquired by someone else (cf. comments on 31:11).
- 25. Two clay bullae (lumps of clay impressed with a seal) have been discovered in the vicinity of Jerusalem that preserve a reference to Baruch the scribe (see comments on Jer. 36). Apparently Baruch had a brother who was a government official (51:59): Seraiah, the son of Neriah, the son of Mahseiah had duties that most likely required literacy. Scribal activity may have been a family trait. Seraiah too worked in conjunction with Jeremiah.
- 26. Isaiah sealed up his testimony (Isa. 8:16), apparently so that it might be consulted in the future. Daniel's vision also is sealed for the future (Dan. 12:4), perhaps for the same reason: At the end of days it will verify his prophetic word.
- 27. Cf. Jer. 33:20-26; Ezek. 16:60-62; 37.
- 28. This Hebrew phrase uses the verb šub (turn, return) with a cognate accusative—more literally translated, "to turn the turning." It is a common phrase for corporate restoration and renewal (e.g., Deut. 30:3; Ps. 14:7; 53:6; 85:1; Amos 9:14; Zeph. 2:7), although it can be used for an individual (cf. Job 42:10). In addition to Jer. 33, the phrase also occurs in 29:14; 30:3, 18; 31:23; 32:44; 48:47; 49:6; 49:39. Ezekiel likewise uses the phrase (Ezek. 16:53; 29:14; 39:25).
- 29. In Jer. 33:6 the lexeme rp'("heal") occurs in both noun and verb form.
- 30. In 23:6 the future Ruler from David's line bears the (symbolic) name "The LORD our Righteousness." The NIV translates 33:16 as "the name by which it will be called," with a note that indicates "it" can also be "he" (i.e., the future ruler). Although there are variant readings among early manuscripts, the MT preserves the rendering "the name by which she [i.e., the city] will be called." Jeremiah's contemporaries will hear the name for either ruler or city as a play on the name of Zedekiah, the last Judean king, which means "The Lord is righteous." The prophecy does not indicate a saving role for Zedekiah (whom Jeremiah and Ezekiel criticize severely); instead, his name is used to declare that its unrealized promise will be fulfilled by different means and by someone else from his family.
- 31. One should compare the promise to the Levitical priesthood with the judgment speech against Eli and his priestly house at Shiloh (1 Sam. 2:27–35). Note esp. the statement in Jer. 33:35 that the faithful priest whom God will raise up is to serve with God's "anointed."
- 32. Cf. Gen. 8:22 in the context of the Noachic covenant in Gen. 9:1–17.
- 33. See comments about interpreting prophecy in the introductory section to Jer. 30–33.
- 34. See comments on 23:5–6.
- 35. See esp. the New Testament letter to the Hebrews. In Rom. 8:34 the risen Christ is depicted as standing at God's right hand and interceding for his people.
- 36. Karla Faye Tucker is not as well known as the others listed here. In 1999 she was executed by the state of Texas for a murder she committed as a young woman under the influence of drugs and alcohol. She underwent a conversion experience in prison and served Christ faithfully for years while there. She was a model of Christian fortitude in the weeks before her execution. Her case was much discussed in the national media, raising questions about the necessity of carrying out her sentence when it was obvious to all that God had changed her life.

- 1. For bibliography and details, see King, Jeremiah: An Archaeological Companion, 78–84. Letter 4 contains the information that the writer has been watching for the fire signals of Azekah and Lachish, and that the signal from Azekah is no longer visible. This last comment may indicate that the letter to the garrison at Lachish was written toward the end of the Babylonian campaign, when Azekah had finally fallen to the siege and only Lachish remained untaken.
- 2. Cf. Jer. 34:14 with Deut. 15:12–18 and Ex. 21:1–6. Deut. 15:12 begins with the circumstance ("If a fellow Hebrew, a man or a woman, sells himself to you ...") and concludes with the sabbatical stipulation that he or she shall go forth "free" in the seventh year. Moreover, the slave shall not be sent forth without provisions (15:13–14).
- 3. The Hebrew word *dror (release, liberty, freedom) is used in Jer. 34:8, 15, 17. Elsewhere it is used in Lev. 25:10 as a designation of the Jubilee release of land sold for debts, in Isa. 61:1 as a description of the freedom announced by God's messenger, and as a reference in Ezek. 46:17 to a "year of release" when parts of a royal inheritance are to return to the owner. The Heb. word is cognate to an Akkadian term used in periodic royal proclamations of debt annulments and slave manumission. See J. Lewy, "The Biblical Institution of *dror in the Light of Akkadian Documents," Eretz-Israel 5 (1958): 21–31.
- 4. Cf. discussion and bibliography in Holladay, Jeremiah, 2:236-43.
- 5. Readers should note that in the Gen. 15 ceremony God is represented by the smoking torch that passes between the divided carcasses. This symbolizes God's self-binding oath to fulfill his word to Abram. The latter is in a deep sleep and unable to participate in the ceremony other than to witness the passing of the torch and to receive the freely given promise made by God.
- 6. Kidnapping and then selling a person was a capital crime (Ex. 21:16).
- 7. The distinction between slave (a person owned by another) and servant (a person socially or institutionally obligated to another—e.g., an indentured servant) cannot be gained from the Heb. term 'ebed, which is used for both categories.

- 1. F. Frick, "The Rechabites Reconsidered," JBL 90 (1971): 279–87; W. McKane, "Jeremiah and the Rechabites," ZAW 100 (1988): 106–23. Jonadab, the founder of the Recabites, assisted Jehu in his overthrow of the Omrides (2 Kings 10:15–28). The Recabites are named as descendants of the Kenites in 1 Chron. 2:55.
- 2. So NIV. The Heb. term is the familiar one for a family—bayit, lit., "house, household."
- 3. The word 'ab can refer to someone in authority over a group and not simply the biological head of a family (cf. 2 Kings 2:12; 5:13; 6:21).
- 4. The promise is similar to those given to the Levites in Jer. 33:18. It is not a promise that the Recabite community will continue on indefinitely; it is a promise that some representative of that community will always "stand" (lit.) before the Lord
- 5. H. Richard Niebuhr, Christ and Culture (New York: Harper & Row, 1951).
- 6. Koresh is the Hebrew pronunciation of Cyrus. The leader of the Branch Davidians took his name from a twisted reading of Isa. 45:1, where Cyrus (i.e., Koresh) is called God's anointed one and is taken by the right hand.

- On the officials named, their context in Judean history, and their portrayal of scribal activity in interpreting documents, see J. Andrew Dearman, "My Servants the Scribes: Composition and Context in Jeremiah 36," JBL 109 (1990): 403–21.
- 2. For additional details, see comments on Jer. 1:1–3.
- 3. An impression in fired clay (a "bulla") of a seal with the reading "belonging to Berekyahu son of Neriyahu, the scribe," has been published by N. Avigad, Hebrew Bullae from the Time of Jeremiah (Jerusalem: Israel Exploration Society, 1986), #9 (pp. 28–29). A second bulla of the seal is in the possession of an antiquities dealer; see H. Shanks, "Fingerprints of Jeremiah's Scribe," BAR 22.2 (1996): 36–38. Baruch is a short form of the name Berekyahu, like Will for William or Andy for Andrew. The Heb. word brk means "to bless," and the name Baruch (modern English spelling) means

- "blessed." Most probably the two seal impressions were attached in ancient times to papyrus or animal skin documents prepared by Baruch, Jeremiah's companion. For additional references to scribal figures, such as Gemariah the son of Shaphan, whose bullae have come to light in modern times, see Dearman, "My Servants the Scribes."
- 4. The LXX reads eighth year rather than fifth. See Holladay, Jeremiah, 2:255–56, for reasons why he prefers this reading to that of the Heb. text. Although one cannot be dogmatic, it seems to me that the MT should be preferred on this point. The fifth-year date illumines the historical context, and the Greek text can be explained plausibly as a copy error.
- 5. Jeremiah 14 is a series of oracles related to the effects of drought. Verses 7–9 are a repentance liturgy and the kind of confessional prayer that would be enjoined in a "time of fasting."
- 6. No details are given about the hiding of Jeremiah and Baruch. Almost certainly, however, it took cooperation from others to keep the two hid successfully. The comment of the narrator is a theological one. God willed their survival. In this context it is interesting to note the account of the Lord's prophets being hidden during the time of Ahab and Jezebel. According to 1 Kings 18:3–4, Obadiah, the official in charge of the royal palace, had hidden two groups of prophets in caves and provided them with sustenance.

- 1. Jeremiah 45 fits thematically with the accounts of the fall of Jerusalem and its aftermath, but it is out of place chronologically with the previous chapters (see comments on ch. 45). Chapter 39 has verbal parallels with ch. 52 and 2 Kings 25. It seems that accounts of the fall of the city have been refracted in several literary settings.
- 2. See G. von Rad, Old Testament Theology (2 vols.; New York: Harper & Row, 1965), 2:206-10, and references there.
- 3. See the discussion of this period from the perspective of international history in A. Malamat, "Twilight of Judah," VT 25 (1974): 123–45.
- 4. One should compare these words with Jer. 21 and 27; 38:2 and 21:9 are essentially the same quotation.
- 5. The only other occurrence of the phrase (the verb used is rph in Piel) in the Old Testament is Ezra 4:4. The phrase occurs in Lachish letter 6:6.
- 6. The palace official is called Ebed-Melech, which means "servant of the king" in Hebrew. The "name" may be nothing more than his title. Jer. 38:7 describes him as a man from Cush and a saris. Cush is the biblical term for the territory associated with Egypt and descended from Ham (Gen. 10:6–7). The LXX sometimes translates Cush as "Ethiopia." The Hebrew term saris likely means that the African man was castrated (i.e., a eunuch). The NIV translates the term as "official," which is accurate, but provides the alternative "eunuch" in a footnote.
- 7. The word of grace to Baruch in Jer. 45:5 uses the same image as 39:18 (cf. also 21:9). Even though Jerusalem would fall to the Babylonians (and thus suffer defeat), both Ebed-Melech and Baruch would survive. Their life would be like the gift that comes from military victory.
- 8. At some point after the destruction of the city, Jews began a public ceremony of lamentation to recall its fall. That ceremony now takes place on the ninth of Ab (which falls in August). See the introduction to the book of Lamentations.
- 9. Chapter 39 names several Babylonian officials. For a treatment of their names and titles, see Holladay, Jeremiah, 2:291.
- 10. See comments on Jer. 26:24 and ch. 36.
- 11. See also comments on chs. 40–41.
- 12. The Heb. idiom states that his life is granted as a prize of war. It is the same phrase used in 21:9; 38:2; and 45:5.
- 13. It will be recalled that prophets like Amos and Hosea devoted much of their public prophetic work to announcing the fall of Israel and Samaria. Moreover, the majority of 2 Kings 17 is devoted to a polemic against Samaria and its inhabitants. Perhaps the reason that Jer. 39 and 2 Kings 17 give such a brief narration of the actual event of the fall of the cities is that they paraphrase official notices preserved in royal or state annals.
- 14. One might compare in this context the speech of President Lincoln that a "house divided cannot stand," in which he reflects also on the fact of divine judgment in history. The ripple effects of the Civil War are still working themselves out in the history of North America.
- 15. The narrator's report in 39:14 about Jeremiah's release into the hands of Gedaliah is likely proleptic, i.e., it anticipates the conversation between Jeremiah and Nebuzaradan in 40:1–6. With respect to the identity of Gedaliah, it is probable that two Iron Age seal impressions that name a certain Gedaliah as "over the house" (from Lachish) and "servant of the king" (origin unknown) refer to this Gedaliah, who was appointed governor by the Babylonians. Both phrases from the seals are titles for officials in a state administration. Given the roles of his father and grandfather, it is understandable that Gedaliah had such titles before his appointment by the Babylonians. For references to the Iron Age inscriptions and brief discussion, see Dearman, "My Servants the Scribes," 412–14. A more cautionary note regarding the equation of Gedaliah, governor of Judah, with the Gedaliah of the two inscriptions is given by B. Becking, "Inscribed Seals As Evidence for Biblical Israel? Jeremiah 40:7–41:15 par example," in Can a 'History of Israel' Be Written? ed. L. L. Grabbe (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1997), 75–78. Becking also evaluates the possibility of identifying Ishmael and Baalis from extrabiblical inscriptions, 78–83.

- 16. Readers should compare this communication of Nebuzaradan with that of the Assyrian Rabshakeh to Jerusalem in 2 Kings 18:19–25, 28–35.
- 17. For the possibilities of its identification, see P. Arnold, "Mizpah," ABD, 4:879–81. Two sites are commonly suggested: Nebi Samwil or Tell en-Nasbeh.
- 18. An Ammonite seal bearing the Semitic equivalent of the name Baalis was discovered in an excavation south of Amman. See L. G. Herr, "The Servant of Baalis," BA 48 (1985): 169–72. The biblical text provides no reasons behind the nefarious plot of Baalis and Ishmael. Perhaps the Ammonite king saw an opportunity to expand his influence in the region now that the Judean government had been overthrown. For his part, Ishmael may have seen in Baalis the kind of support he needed to carve out his own sphere of influence once the main body of the Babylonian army left the region. He was, after all, a member of the Judean royal family. Zedekiah and his sons were gone, so perhaps Ishmael intended to play on his Davidic heritage in a bid for power.
- 19. The Marshall Plan instituted by the United States after World War II did not get derailed and illustrates how a positive policy after war and tragedy can have repercussions for stability that continue to have influence in current times.
- 20. This is the only reference to Geruth Kimham in the Old Testament; nothing else is known about it. Possibly Jeremiah and Baruch went to the prophet's family property (cf. Jer. 32:1–15; 37:12). Another possibility is that Jeremiah and Baruch were living on property belonging to Baruch. Baruch came from a prominent scribal family. One supposes the family had significant property holdings.
- 21. In his thirty-seventh year as king (567) Nebuchadnezzar did conduct a successful campaign against Pharaoh Ahmosis II.
- 22. The places named in 44:1 are in different parts of Egyptian territory, indicating a comprehensive address to the Judeans in Egypt.
- 23. Queen of Heaven is a title for a goddess. She is mentioned in 7:18 as a deity worshiped in Jerusalem. Just which goddess is a disputed question. The three primary candidates are Anat, Astarte, or Asherah—to cite Canaanite deities—or possibly Ishtar, the east Semitic goddess who was popular among the Assyrians and the whole region annexed by Babylon. To make matters even more complicated, it is possible that there was some fusion between Ishtar and Astarte (the names are similar in Semitic) or some fusion between the different Canaanite goddesses. The practices of baking cakes for a goddess has been identified in the worship of Ishtar. For further discussion, see M. Smith, The Early History of God (New York: Harper & Row, 1990), 88–94, 145.
- 24. Note the reference in v. 19 to making cakes in the image of the Queen of Heaven.
- 25. Weston previously had been diagnosed as a paranoid schizophrenic.
- 26. The promise in 45:5 that Baruch will have his life as a prize of war is an idiom used for Ebed-Melech in 39:18. God the warrior (against his sinful people) is also the gracious deliverer of his servants.
- 27. The Coptic Church traces its heritage to St. Mark (the Gospel writer), who (according to tradition) came to Egypt in A.D. 45. Currently the Coptic Church is the largest group of Christians in Egypt, and they follow the monophysite wing of the church, dating from its earliest centuries. Monophysites are those Christians who believe that the earthly Jesus had but one nature (divine). As a minority group, Coptic Christians suffer periodic persecutions in Egypt and daily pressures of various kinds from their neighbors.

Christensen, Transformations of the War Oracles in Old Testament Prophecy: Studies in the Oracles Against the Nations (Missoula, Mont.: Scholars, 1975), 183–280.
- 5. Some examples of introductory formulae for reading include Jer. 46:2, 13; 47:1; and 49:34. The combination of poetry and prose and the length of the prophecies against Egypt and Moab suggest the editing of oral presentations. The oracles against Babylon in chs. 50–51 may have circulated separately (even in written form) before being joined with the others in chs. 46–49. There are also quotations or "echoes" of earlier prophetic material (cf. 49:18 with Zeph. 2:8–9; Jer. 49:27 with Amos 1:3–5).
- 6. There are references to "the sword" (e.g. Jer. 46:10; 47:6), bows and arrows (50:14), the war club (51:20), God's "arsenal" (50:25), and the proverbial "cup" of wrath (49:12).

- 14. Lot is the nephew of Abraham. The strange episode of Gen. 19:30–38 comes in the aftermath of God's destruction of Sodom (where Lot and his family were living) and the death of Lot's wife. His daughters were motivated by concern for the continuation of the family and used the occasion of their father's drunkenness to become pregnant.

Perhaps this campaign is also the occasion for a third group of exiles taken to Babylon (cf. Jer. 52:28–30). Most certainly the Ammonites should expect reprisals for their role in the murder of Gedaliah

The Figure of Babylon in the Book of Jeremiah MT* (Leiden: Brill, 1999). The city of Babylon is personified as a female in several of the poetic oracles (cf. "Daughter [of] Babylon" in 51:33).
- 32. Jer. 25:12–14 announces that God will judge the Babylonians after the period of Babylonian hegemony is complete. Chapter 25 dates to the fourth year of Jehoiakim/first year of Nebuchadnezzar (i.e., 605 B.C.).
- 33. Holladay, Jeremiah, 2:401–15, has a lengthy discussion on the form, authenticity, and setting of these two chapters.
- 34. Another name for Babylon is Chaldea. Inhabitants of Babylonia are sometimes called Chaldeans.
- 35. In 51:41 the name Sheshach for Babylon is another wordplay. It is used also in 25:26.
- 36. Verses 21, 26.
- 37. The Heb. term is rib, a legal term. God will act to defend a proper cause.
- 38. See comments on the image of the cup in 25:15–29. The "cup" becomes something of a proverbial symbol in the New Testament (cf. Mark 10:35–40). In Rev. 18:6 Babylon, the harlot, is to drink from the "cup" of judgment. The symbolism in Rev. 18 draws heavily on Jer. 51.

- 1. See comments in the introduction to Jeremiah.
- 2. The numbers given in 2 Kings 24:13–16 for the deportation at the time of Jehoiachin (the seventh year of Nebuchadnezzar) are higher than those cited in Jer. 52:28. The smaller number given in Jeremiah may include only males.
- 3. As noted in the introduction, Josephus records that the Babylonian army campaigned in Ammon as punishment for the murder of Gedaliah (Ant. 10.9.7). Perhaps this campaign is linked to the deportation noted in 52:30. The problem is that we do not have a firm date for the death of Gedaliah. It may have come shortly after the fall of the city in 586 B.C.
- 4. According to 2 Kings 24:8, he was eighteen years old when he became king in Judah. He was exiled to Babylon in 597 B.C. after a reign of only three months. As noted in the introduction, archaeologists excavating the ruins of Babylon discovered ration tablets that mention the name of Jehoiachin and his five sons. See W. F. Albright, "King Jehoiachin in Exile," BA 5 (1942): 49–55.
- 5. See the discussion of chronology in the introduction.

- 1. For the events leading up to the Babylonian capture and destruction of Jerusalem, see the introduction to the book of Jeremiah.
- 2. That the Hebrew poetry of Lamentations 1–4 contains an uneven poetic meter, defined as couplets with uneven lengths of line, was first proposed by K. Budde, "Das Hebraische Klagelied," ZAW 2 (1882): 1–22. He described it as the qinah meter, based on the Hebrew noun for lament/lamentation, and suggested that it can be seen in some other biblical laments where the imagery of a funeral is carried by the meter. See also W. R. Garr, "The Qinah: A Study of Poetic Meter, Syntax and Style," ZAW 95 (1983): 54–75. Current scholarship, however, uses the term meter less frequently and talks more about rhythm.
- 3. See further W. F. Lanahan, "The Speaking Voice in the Book of Lamentations," JBL 93 (1974): 41–49. The voices are that of the poet, personified Jerusalem, an unidentified man in ch. 3 (who may or may not be the poet personified), and the communal voice of Jerusalem's inhabitants.
- 4. Lam. 1:1 in the LXX begins as follows: "After the captivity of Israel and the destruction of Jerusalem, Jeremiah sat weeping and composed this lament, saying...." The Babylonian Talmud tractate B. Batra 15a holds that Jeremiah wrote his book, that of Kings, and Qinot. Qinot is the plural form of qina and refers to the book of Lamentations. See note 2 above.
- 5. For Jeremiah's personal laments, see Jer. 11:18–12:6; 15:10–21; 17:14–18; 18:18–23; 20:7–13; 20:14–18. During a devastating drought Jeremiah takes up the people's lament in 14:1–9. In 8:18–9:3 Jeremiah expresses deep grief and weeps over the fate of the people. The way that he expresses himself seems also to present God's tearful grief over the people's fate (note the first-person complaint by God in 9:3). God laments the loss of "his house" in 12:7–13.
- 6. For a judicious assessment of the book's authorship and date, see the discussion by D. Hillers, "Lamentations, Book of," ABD, 4:138–39, and his commentary on Lamentations (AB; Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1992), 9–15. The haunting recollection of Zedekiah, Judah's last king, in 4:20 is far different from Jeremiah's sad but harsh denunciation of him. Similarly, Jeremiah's criticism of the temple and prediction of its demise are different from the plaintive comment in 1:10. In ch. 3 the poet is quite aware of his complicity in the failures of Zion. One scholar has gone so far as to suggest that parts of Lamentations are written to counteract some of Jeremiah's emphatic preaching on the judgment of Jerusalem and Judah. Cf. G. Brunet, "Une interpretation nouvelle du livre biblique des Lamentations," RHR 175 (1969): 115–17. While the poems of Lamentations are not inappropriate for Jeremiah, their tone is somewhat different from the "confessions" he offers.
- 7. This passage does, however, undergird the view that Jeremiah held King Josiah in great esteem, something that the book of Jeremiah also indicates (Jer. 22:15–16).
- 8. The temple was destroyed in the fifth month (2 Kings 25:8–9). The setting for the question to the prophet Zechariah is the fourth year of the Persian king Darius (Zech. 7:1), which would be 518 B.C.
- 9. For a good introduction to the characteristics of Hebrew poetry, with many bibliographical references, see the entry by A. Berlin, "Parallelism," ABD, 5:155–62. For Lamentations in particular, see Hillers, Lamentations, 16–31.
- 10. Several Psalms (Ps. 9–10, 25, 34, 37, 111, 112, 119, 145) and Proverbs 31:10–31 are also acrostics.
- 11. The first word in each verse of Lam. 3:1–3 begins with a word whose initial letter is aleph, and the first word in each verse of 3:64–66 has taw for its initial letter.
- 12. Actually chs. 2, 3, and 4 alter the traditional sequence of letters, putting the pe() before the ayin(). This would be like putting the English letter p before the letter p. There is limited but suggestive evidence that some in Syria-Palestine followed an alphabet with the pe before the ayin. For details, see Hillers, "Lamentations, Book of," 4:139.
- 13. Amos offers a Qinah (a funeral lament) against Israel in 5:1–2, saying that the "Virgin Israel" is fallen, no more to rise. The term virgin is female and honorific and likely refers to the capital city of Samaria. F. W. Dobbs-Allsopp, Weep, O Daughter of Zion: A Study of the City-Lament Genre in the Hebrew Bible (Rome: Pontifical Biblical Institute, 1993), 97–

- 154, demonstrates the broad connections between prophetic judgment speeches and the description of humiliated
- 14. A classic treatment of the lament in the Old Testament is given in C. Westermann, Praise and Lament in the Psalms (Atlanta: John Knox, 1981), 165–213.
- 15. Hillers, Lamentations, 124, cites a number of the thematic and verbal parallels.
- 16. For further discussion see W. C. Gwaltney, "The Biblical Book of Lamentations in the Context of Near Eastern Lament Literature," in Scripture in Context II: More Essays on the Comparative Method, ed. W. W. Hallo et al. (Winona Lake, Ind.: Eisenbrauns, 1983), 191–211; Dobbs-Allsopp, Weep, O Daughter of Zion. A convenient translation of some Sumerian city-laments can be found in ANET, 611–19. Dobbs-Allsopp proposes that the book of Lamentations as a whole is an example of a city-lament genre. Hillers, Lamentations, 32–39, speaks more broadly of the "city-lament tradition."
- 17. Some English translations (e.g., NIV) render the Hebrew phrase bat siyyon () as "daughter of Zion" while others render "Daughter Zion." There are complex grammatical matters in the discussion, but the better rendering in my judgment is the latter. "Daughter Zion" is the personified symbol of Jerusalem herself (cities are feminine in Hebrew); "Daughter of Zion" leaves open the possibility that it is someone who belongs to the city that is being described or addressed as the daughter. See the following helpful studies on this matter: M. E. Biddle, "The Figure of Lady Jerusalem: Identification, Deification and Personification of Cities in the Ancient Near East," in The Biblical Canon in Comparative Perspective, ed. K. Lawson Younger et al. (Lewiston, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen, 1991), 173–94; E. Follis, "Zion, Daughter of," ABD, 6:1103; and T. Frymer-Kensky, In the Wake of the Goddesses: Women, Culture and the Biblical Transformation of Pagan Myth (New York: Fawcett, 1992), 168–78.
- 18. On this issue, see the discussion in M. Ydit, "Av, The Ninth of," in Encyclopedia Judaica (16 vols.; Jerusalem: MacMillan, 1971), 3:936–40. According to the Talmud (b. Ta'an. 30b), this commemoration of the temples' destructions is as important as Yom Kippur (= the Day of Atonement).
- 19. One thinks of the impact in modern culture of the studies on death and dying by E. Kubler-Ross, and more particularly the ways in which she has assisted people in processing their grief. This is not to endorse all that has been claimed for her studies; rather, it is to note how influential she has been in her psychological analysis of the process. Indeed, there is a whole industry related to grief, death, and dying in Western culture. Among her works are: On Death and Dying (New York: MacMillan, 1969); Questions and Answers on Death and Dying (New York: Collins, 1974); Death: The Final Stage of Growth (Englewood, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1975); To Live Until We Say Goodbye (Englewood, N.J.: Prentice-Hall); Living With Death and Dying (New York: MacMillan, 1981); and On Children and Death (New York: MacMillan, 1983).

- 21. F. W. Dobbs-Allsopp, "Tragedy, Tradition, and Theology in the Book of Lamentations," JSOT 74 (1997): 29–60, proposes that Lamentations is a work about tragedy. He points out that the book contains more complaints addressed to God than confessions of sin on the part of the community. Judgment on sin, he maintains, is a claim of the book, but the perspectives associated with tragedy and suffering are dominant. He understands that one contribution of the book is the heroic response to tragedy, i.e., the community should not react passively to suffering. Another is the compassion that the articulation of suffering brings. A third is the possibility that healing comes with the recitation of the laments.

- 23. In some Christian liturgies portions of Lamentations are read during Holy Week, including the Tenebrae service. Making Lamentations a part of the scriptural lesson for Holy Week entails an interpretation of the book as a witness to human suffering that Jesus has taken up and made his own.

- 1. On the cultural habit of depicting cities as female and on the language of funeral, see the introduction. "Unclean" and "nakedness" are used by the prophets (e.g., Ezek. 7:19–20; ch. 16) to depict sinful behavior. Whether such usage developed as part of the prophetic speech repertoire or whether they borrowed it from another rhetorical tradition is unknown. Judgments about clean and unclean are the work of priests and Levites. In 2 Chron. 29:5 Levites are asked to remove the "defilement" (so NIV) from the sanctuary. It is the same term translated "unclean" in Lam. 1:17.
- 2. In Amos 7:2, 5, Jacob is a synonym for Israel and refers to the northern kingdom and its capital city of Samaria. Cf. Lam. 2:2–3.
- 3. In the Heb. text of Lam. 1:3, the verbs associated with Judah are inflected as feminine.
- 4. This last phrase can refer to physical illness or emotional distress (cf. Isa. 1:5; Jer. 8:18).
- 5. Cf. Lam. 4:21–22 and the caustic language about Edom.

- 1. See the discussion in the introduction regarding authorship.
- 2. Among these elements are: description of dire circumstances, references to the persecution of the enemy, plea for God to judge the enemies, plea to God for protection or deliverance, invitation to repentance. Two examples can be cited for comparison. Psalm 56 speaks of the persecutions of the enemies and implores God to be gracious and to deliver the psalmist. Psalm 88 speaks of travail as the threats of the "pit" (cf. Lam. 3:53, 55).
- 3. See, e.g., Job 9:34 and 21:9 (3:1); Job 19:8 (3:2); Job 7:18 (3:3); Job 3:23 (3:7); Job 30:20 (3:8); Job 7:20 (3:12); Job 6:4 (3:13). Other examples could be cited.

- 12. Raḥum is an adjective formed from the basic root rḥm.
- 13. Heb. 'emet is a variant form of the basic term 'emuna.

- 1. Note the brief (but ominous) comment about famine in 2 Kings 25:3. Lam. 2:11–12 also reminds the reader of the insidious affliction of famine.
- 2. Deut. 28:53–57 lists cannibalism as a curse to come on God's people should they break the covenant God granted them. Lev. 26:29 similarly speaks of the eating of children as a curse to come on Israel for disobedience to the Lord. Since in Lam. 4:11 the poet speaks of God's venting his anger on Zion, it may be that he links the cannibalism of 4:10 with God's judgment and not only with a tragedy brought on by Zion's enemies. In any case, it is almost certain that he understands the fall of Zion and its horrific aftermath as the outworking of Zion's failures (i.e., breach of covenant faithfulness).
- 3. See Deut. 29:23; Isa. 1:9-10; Jer. 49:18; 50:40; cf. Matt. 11:20-24.
- 4. Ps. 106:38–39 states that the shedding of innocent blood defiles a land and the perpetrating state.
- 5. Judah traced her lineage back to Jacob and Edom to Esau (cf. Gen. 36:1, where Esau is explicitly equated with Edom).
- 6. Jeremiah uses the image several times (Jer. 13:13; 25:15–29; 48:26; 49:12; 51:7, 39). The majority of these references come in oracles against the wickedness of other nations. Cf. Hab. 2:15–16 and esp. Obad. 15–16 "The day of the LORD is near for all nations. As you [Edom] have done, it will be done to you.... Just as you drank on my holy hill, so all the nations will drink continually; they will drink ... and be as if they had never been."

1. Lam. 5:1 contains three imperatives: "Remember ... look, and see." Verse 20 has the interrogative "why," which occurs once in the Hebrew text, but it is probably assumed to do double duty with the next poetic line as well: "[Why] do you forsake us so long?" The imperative of 5:21 deserves some scrutiny. It is the Hiphil imperative of šub, a primary term meaning "turn" or "repent." What God can demand, i.e., repentance, is something that God can also effect by working in and through the people's circumstances. Cf. 3:40, where the poet proposes that the community "return" (šub) to the Lord.

- 2. Cf. Lam. 5:20; also Ps. 13:1.
- 3. Cf. Lam. 5:19.
- 4. Cf. Lam. 5:1.
- 5. Lam. 5:16, by contrast, has: "Woe to us, for we have sinned!" (cf. 5:7).
- 6. Cf. Hos. 7:11; also Jer. 2:18.

General Editor's Preface

SOME THINK THAT EZEKIEL is difficult to interpret because of its visions. By their nature, those people say, such books are not meant to communicate truth in a literal manner. These truths do not lend themselves to scientific language. They are heavy with a surplus of meaning that goes beyond the scientific.

True, Ezekiel does have visions. True, Ezekiel is difficult to interpret. As Iain Duguid points out in his introduction to this excellent commentary, at one time or another the church fathers have called the book difficult, early rabbis considered it dangerous, and most of us have despaired of figuring out what God's message is in its pages.

However, as Professor Duguid also points out, Ezekiel's difficulty emerges not only from the visions, but also from the fact that Ezekiel was written over a number of years that spanned a chaotic, confusing time. Ezekiel spoke to people at three different phases of a crisis situation: when they were about to be overrun by a desperately cruel foreign political power, when they were overrun and deported to an alien land, and when their restoration to their lost land was in view. Each phase elicited a distinct message from the prophet.

As any parent knows, the content and tone of messages delivered before disaster strikes and those delivered afterward can be very different. When my now twenty-two-year-old son, David, was ten years old, I presented him, as a birthday present, a Swiss Army knife. Along with the knife I made a speech: "You are a responsible young man now," I intoned, "capable of handling a valuable tool that at its worst can also be used as a weapon. I fully expect you, however, never to misuse it in that way."

Two days later I arrived home from work to a house filled with the heavy, anxious air of crisis. David had threatened the seven-year-old boy next door with his Swiss Army knife. I found David in his room and made another speech: "You have misused your trust. You must apologize—and you must give me back the knife." Several days later, I made a third speech: "I love you still and always will. I believe you can handle a Swiss Army knife in the way it was meant to be used. Together we will discover the time and place for you to be a knife owner again."

Three very different speeches about the same subject: the first ritualistic, the second moralistic, the third pastoral. The first aimed at celebration of life, the second at rule-keeping and correction, the third at restoration. I did not change in my understanding of what a Swiss Army knife was and how it was to be used. But the circumstances of David's and my relationship and life did change. Thus, the speeches changed accordingly.

How should we understand the changing and sometimes irreconcilable passages of Ezekiel? Many hermeneutical principles come to bear. But one of them must be an awareness of the historical circumstances of Ezekiel's time, as Professor Duguid commends. Once that background is in place, some coherence begins to emerge.

Even with all this help, however, a key ingredient is still missing. Where does the story come from, the story that holds all the changing pieces together? It doesn't come from the Assyrians. It doesn't come from the Egyptians. It doesn't even come from the changing fortunes of Judah, Israel, or Jerusalem. To fully understand Ezekiel we must fast forward six hundred years to the life of Jesus of Nazareth. There we discover a story so inspiring, so unifying, so redemptive that the difficulties, dangers, and despairs of life begin to take on a slightly unreal cast, like the horrors of a bad movie.

In their place what becomes increasingly, overwhelmingly real is the fact of our restoration in the hands of a loving God. The last act of our lives, the third speech, is so filled with God's love that everything else takes on additional meaning. In our darkest hours, the cupped hands of God are there to catch us. The Lord is in control. Thanks be to God!

Author's Preface

THE ART OF WRITING COMMENTARIES, like that of creating movies, is far easier to criticize than to execute. Unlike the task of writing a doctoral dissertation or a scholarly monograph, which merely demands that you write exhaustively on a topic of limited scope, a commentary demands that you write something interesting, stimulating, and relatively brief on every portion of your assigned book. A commentary series like the NIV Application Commentary series demands reflection not only on the ancient setting of the prophet but also its address to contemporary readers. Such a task could not be completed without the involvement of a host of people, each of whom in his or her own way has helped to shape the commentator or his book.

In preparing the Original Meaning sections, I have been reminded over and over of the substantial debt I owe to those who were my teachers in the study of the Old Testament. While I was a student at Westminster Seminary in Philadelphia, I had the enormous privilege of learning at the feet of Ray Dillard, Bruce Waltke, and Tremper Longman III, while Hugh Williamson guided my doctoral research on the book of Ezekiel at Cambridge. In the Bridging Contexts and Contemporary Significance sections, I hope that the influence of those from whom I learned how to preach is evident. The impact of the teaching of Edmund Clowney, alongside whom I now teach at Westminster Seminary in California, has been incalculable, as has the instruction and example of Tim Keller, now pastor of Redeemer Presbyterian Church in Manhattan, New York. The manuscript versions of my work have been read carefully and commented on by Robert L. Hubbard Jr. and Terry Muck, both of whom have contributed greatly to the final product. In addition, the editing skills of Jack Kuhatschek and Verlyn Verbrugge have been much appreciated. My student, Shaun Nolan, prepared the diagrams in electronic form for me. The faults of the commentary, however, remain my responsibility

Writing a book of this size can be a trying task not only for the commentator but also for his family. I therefore want to thank my wife, Barb, for her unfailing love and enthusiastic support. With perceptive insight, she always asks the question that penetrates to the heart of the issue, often before it has occurred to me. Like her favorite author, John Newton, she also reminds me daily to keep my eyes focused on the grace of God extended to us as sinners. In addition, thanks are due to my children, Jamie, Sam, Hannah, Robbie, and Rosie, who allowed me to devote some days to working on this commentary when we could otherwise have been playing on the beach. I pray that each of you may, as you grow up, come to be passionately devoted to Ezekiel's God and mine, the God whose wrath and mercy met at the cross and there accomplished our salvation. To Him be all the glory!

Introduction

Why Read Ezekiel?

If YOU WERE to ask your Christian friends to name their favorite book of the Bible, the book of Ezekiel would not spring to most people's minds. There are exceptions, of course. My fourteen-year-old niece is a big fan of the book, especially of the opening vision. But she is surely in the minority. In fact, I suspect that few of you picked up this commentary out of love for the book of Ezekiel. Most of you are probably reading this commentary out of curiosity, or desperation, or a mixture of both. You are seeking help in making some kind of sense out of this Old Testament book.

The book of Ezekiel is a certainly a difficult book to understand. That is hardly a new observation. The church father Jerome remarked:

As for Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel and Daniel, who can fully understand or adequately explain them? . . . The beginning and ending of Ezekiel, the third of the four, are involved in so great obscurity that like the commencement of Genesis they are not studied by the Hebrews until they are thirty years old.

Before Jerome, the rabbis had themselves struggled with the book of Ezekiel. For them the chief problems lay, as Jerome noted, in the beginning and ending of the book. Study of the obscurities of the opening chariot vision, which became a mystical pursuit in some circles, was thought to be not only difficult but even potentially dangerous. The rabbis recorded the cautionary tale of a child who picked up a copy of the book of Ezekiel at his teacher's home and apprehended the true meaning of the extremely obscure and much-debated Hebrew word <code>hašmal</code>, the substance of which the divine figure appears to be comprised (Ezek. 1:27). Instantly, fire came out from the <code>hašmal</code> and incinerated him.² Herein lay part of the reason for restricting study of the book in Jewish circles to those of more mature years.

At the other end of the book, the rabbis also had a problem with Ezekiel's temple vision. Here the difficulty lay in harmonizing the regulations of Ezekiel with those prescribed by Moses in the Pentateuch. That the problems of harmonization remained unresolved by them was certainly not for want of effort on their part. One of their number, Hananiah ben Hezekiah, is said to have hidden himself away in his attic and burned three hundred barrels of oil in his lamp in his search for a reconciliation between the different laws. Thanks to the success of his labors, the book of Ezekiel as a whole was saved from being excluded from the canon.³ Unfortunately, however, the fruits of his work have not been preserved for us. Should they ever turn up, they will undoubtedly make fascinating reading. Bereft of his wisdom, other rabbis gave in to the counsel of despair, something many readers of Ezekiel can sympathize with. At those moments, they simply referred their pupils to a higher authority: Elijah would explain it all when he came.⁴

Notwithstanding the very real difficulties that exist, I do not think that we need to despair of understanding this book. Elijah has come (Mark 9:12–13); the Holy Spirit has been poured out on the church, and it is the Spirit's task to guide us into all truth (John 16:13). The book of Ezekiel is part of God's Word, part of the truth that the Holy Spirit is assigned to open up to us. It is part of what Paul was thinking about when he said that "all Scripture is God-breathed and is useful for teaching, rebuking, correcting and training in righteousness" (2 Tim. 3:16). Therefore, at least in principle, the book of Ezekiel is both comprehensible and profitable to the man or woman whose eyes have been opened by the Holy Spirit.

As we proceed through this commentary, our goal will not be to study the book as an exercise in ancient history or literature but rather to seek what the Spirit has to teach us from the biblical text, where he will rebuke us, how he will correct us, and how he will train us in righteousness. Such a study will be full of relevance for contemporary Christians, for at its heart the whole of Scripture is a testimony about Jesus Christ (John 5:39). As we proceed, therefore, we will be continually looking to see how in particular ways Ezekiel points us forward to Christ.

Historical Background

THE BOOK OF EZEKIEL was composed for a particular moment in time. Unlike the Book of Mormon, the Bible is not an abstract revelation that descended to the prophet on tablets of gold from heaven. What is more, unlike some of the other prophetic books within the Bible whose historical setting is hard to date with certainty, Ezekiel provides us with precise dates that enable us to determine accurately where in the history of God's people his writings belong. It is a prophecy given to a particular person in a particular situation at a particular juncture in redemptive history. Ezekiel was by the Kebar River in Babylonia in the fifth year of the exile of King Jehoiachin when the visions began (1:2–3). In order to understand the book, we must explore the theological significance of that location (see comments on Ezek. 1:1–3). But for now we need to sketch in the historical background. How did a company of God's people end up in such an apparently God-forsaken location?

Part of the answer is contained in the movements of "secular" history of that day. In the preceding centuries, the neo-Assyrians, whose capital city was Nineveh, had dominated the Near East. The limits of their empire had ebbed and flowed, reaching as far as Egypt. In their forays to the west, they imposed tribute on Jehu and the northern kingdom of Israel in 841 B.C. A century later, under Tiglath-Pileser III and his son Shalmaneser V, the Assyrians made inroads into the territory of the northern kingdom, finally absorbing it in 722 B.C. The Israelite population was exiled to various parts of the Assyrian empire, and they were replaced with other people groups (2 Kings 17). Within twenty years, the Assyrians swept up to the very gates of Jerusalem itself under Sennacherib, shutting up the would-be rebel King Hezekiah "like a bird in a cage." Hezekiah's bacon was saved (if one may be permitted to use such a non-kosher idiom) only by the direct intervention of the angel of the Lord, who put to death 185,000 of the Assyrian army (2 Kings 19:35).

At the same time, the powerful Chaldean ruler Merodach-Baladan was causing trouble for Sennacherib closer to home. He sought to encourage Hezekiah's rebellious ways by sending envoys, whom Hezekiah treated to a royal display of his wealth and weaponry (2 Kings 20:13). Obviously, Hezekiah had swiftly forgotten that it was neither his wealth nor his weaponry that had rescued him when the Assyrians had come calling earlier. He probably viewed the Babylonians as a potentially useful political and military ally against their mutual foe. But such dependence on human allies, whether in the shape of the might of Egypt or of Babylon, was always reprehensible in a Judean monarch. He ruled his kingdom as a man under authority, as the vassal of King Yahweh. He was therefore not free to make and break military and political alliances based on his own reading of political necessities. This is a theme we will see emerge again in Ezekiel.

Therefore, God sent his ambassador in Jerusalem in the shape of the prophet Isaiah. His task was to confront Hezekiah with his sin (2 Kings 20:14–18). If Hezekiah was so enthusiastic about Babylon, then he should know that at some unspecified time in the future those same Babylonians would come back and strip his palace of everything of value. The Babylonians would carry off into exile his own flesh and blood, so that they might become eunuchs in the house of the Babylonian king. It is a marker of the political and military pressure brought to bear on a small nation like Judah in such times of political uncertainty that Hezekiah regarded this oracle as good news, since it seemed to indicate that his own life, at least, would be lived out in peace (20:19).

Indeed, these were trying times for most small nations in the ancient Near East. Though Sennacherib crushed the Babylonian monarch in 689 B.C. and tore down the sacred city of Babylon, dragging off her patron deity Marduk, the power of the Assyrians was already on the wane. By 625 B.C., the Babylonians had freed themselves from the Assyrian yoke again, this time under the generalship of Nabopolassar. Ten years later, in 616 B.C., he marched into Assyrian territory and began to capture city after city. Even the astonishing switch in loyalties of the Egyptians, Assyria's traditional enemy, who came to the aid of their former foes, was insufficient to stem the tide. Nineveh fell in 612 B.C.; and after the decisive battle at Carchemish in 605 B.C. the Assyrio-Egyptian alliance was destroyed. Shortly thereafter, Nabopolassar died and his place was taken by his son, who is well-known to readers of the Bible by the name Nebuchadnezzar.

Although not directly involved in these events, Judah had already been caught in the crossfire. Good King Josiah, the last good king of Judah, who had led prominent reforms in public worship, went out to try to intercept the Egyptian forces marching to the aid of Assyria in 609 B.C. The motivation behind this action is not entirely clear, unless he thought to reestablish Judah as the dominant force in the Levant, something not seen since the time of David and Solomon. Whatever his reasoning, he was tragically killed in battle against the Egyptians at Megiddo.

With his death, the brief Judean experiment with orthodoxy came to an abrupt end. He was succeeded by his son Jehoahaz, whose three-month reign followed in the wicked ways of grandfather Amon rather than in the righteous ways of father Josiah. After three months the Egyptians intervened, carrying Jehoahaz off into exile in Egypt and placing his elder brother, Eliakim, on the throne (2 Kings 23:34). As an act demonstrating covenant lordship, Pharaoh Neco renamed him Jehoiakim ("the Lord raises up"), an ironically orthodox name for yet another bad king, especially for one who had been installed on the throne by a foreign superpower.

Around 605 B.C., the Babylonians came knocking. The Egyptians were driven out of Palestine and Jehoiakim wisely switched sides, swearing allegiance to the Babylonians. Hostages were taken to Babylon from the nobility, including Daniel and his three friends. But Jehoiakim had no intention of keeping his commitments to the Babylonians, which, to be fair, probably included crushing tribute requirements. He rebelled against them in 598 B.C., no doubt crying "No taxation without representation."

This was all noble and heroic, but in the light of his pattern of wickedness in the eyes of the Lord, only one outcome was possible. The Babylonians returned and crushed his revolt; in the process, Jehoiakim died, either executed by the Babylonians⁷ or assassinated by the Judeans in hopes of winning clemency from the Babylonians.⁸ In his place, the Judeans installed his son Jehoiachin on the throne. Jehoiachin turned out to be no better than his father, either in the eyes of God or of Nebuchadnezzar. Instead of submitting to Babylon, as Jeremiah advised, he looked to Egypt for help (the perennial alternative in the Old Testament to trusting in the Lord), and within three months he was dragged off to exile in Babylon along with many of the temple treasures and more of the leading citizens. Ezekiel was one of those taken into exile in this wave.

After Jehoiachin's exile, Nebuchadnezzar placed Jehoiachin's uncle Mattaniah on the throne and renamed him Zedekiah (2 Kings 24:17). Once again, one wonders who thought up the name "The Lord is righteous" for this particular individual! It probably wasn't Nebuchadnezzar himself, nor Zedekiah, whose personal righteousness is regarded as highly problematic not only by the book of Kings but also by both Ezekiel and Jeremiah.

Zedekiah, whose personal hold on the throne appears to have been sufficiently tenuous that he did not always know or control what his officials were doing, voted for revolt in 589 B.C. Doubtless his confidence was bolstered by the promise of help from Tyre and Ammon and high hopes of Egyptian aid. It was a fatal mistake. Nebuchadnezzar came loaded for bear. Gradually the lights went out across Judah, as one fortified city after another was pummeled into submission. Jerusalem itself came under a siege that lasted for over a year. Finally, the walls were breached, and although Zedekiah fled, he was captured and brought to Riblah. There Nebuchadnezzar made him watch while his sons were put to death, before gouging out Zedekiah's eyes and taking him away to Babylon.

The city of Jerusalem was then torn down and burned, with most of the remaining inhabitants of the land being carried off into exile. Only the poorest of the poor remained, struggling without skills or resources to scratch out a living from the land. If you imagine the kind of doomsday scenario painted in movies like The War of the Worlds or Terminator, in which society as we know it has been reduced to rubble and ash and a few shell-shocked human beings remain, desperately trying to keep themselves alive among the ruins, then you won't be too far off the mark of what life must have been like for those who remained in Judah. Just substitute the fearsome Babylonians for the Martians or the Cyborgs and you get the picture.

The years leading up to that ultimate cataclysm form the background to the prophecies in the book of Ezekiel, which span a twenty-year period before and after Jerusalem's destruction. You cannot understand this book unless you see it as the response to Holocaust Now!, warning God's rebellious people of the oncoming juggernaut—and then scraping up the pieces of what remained off the highway. The book itself is fundamentally arranged about the central event of the fall of Jerusalem, or more precisely, around the event of the arrival among the exiles of the news of the fall of Jerusalem (anticipated in Ezek. 24:27; realized in 33:21–22). This forms the turning point in the experience of both the prophet and God's people in exile. The prophecy, which begins by clearly depicting the end of the road for God's rebellious people (Ezek. 1–24), closes by showing that the end of the road is not the end of the story (Ezek. 34–48). Even his people's sinfulness and rebellion cannot ultimately prevail against God's electing grace.

In the providence of God, the Babylonians and the Assyrians had very different policies of exile. The Assyrians adopted the policy of divide and conquer; they would take large numbers of people from one area of their empire and resettle them in small groups in different parts of the empire. By breaking up old ties and alliances, they hoped to render the defeated peoples disorganized and disoriented, unable to mount any effective revolt. Their policy therefore represented a shuffling of the people groups around the margins of their empire, in what you might call a "melting pot" policy of imperial rule. The aim was that people would lose their original ethnic identity and become simply "Assyrians."

The Babylonians, on the other hand, followed a less assimilationist "tossed salad" model of empire. They took the leaders and skilled workers from the subjugated nations and brought them from the margins of the empire to the center, to Babylonia itself. There they treated them reasonably well and allowed them to settle in ethnic groups and to advance within the Babylonian system. The goal, from a Babylonian perspective, was to incorporate these diverse people groups in the service of the empire by bringing their various talents and gifts into the center, while allowing them to retain their own ethnic identities. In addition, the margins of the empire were thereby left impoverished and leaderless and therefore less likely to rebel against the power of the center.¹⁰

The results, from the perspective of Israel and Judah, were the different fates of the northern and southern kingdoms in exile. The northern kingdom of Israel was dispersed and effectively destroyed. Individual believers presumably remained, keeping hope alive among the Diaspora of a future reunion of the twelve tribes (as we will see in Ezekiel), but as a political entity, the northern kingdom was finished. Their land was occupied by a half-breed mixture of different ethnic groups, who had little more than a superstitious interest in the God of their land. Judah, on the other hand, remained largely denuded of population after the debacle of 586 B.C., allowing the possibility of a genuine return from exile on the part of those who had kept the faith. It was one of these groups of exiles living by the Kebar River in Babylonia, which included both faithful and not so faithful, to whom Ezekiel was commissioned to prophesy.

Authorship and Date

WHO WROTE THE BOOK that bears Ezekiel's name? There are, and have been for some time, four schools of thought on the subject. (1) Some scholars have taken the radical view that very little of the book can be traced back to the prophet himself. This view became temporarily fashionable following the publication in 1924 of Gustav Hölscher's book, *Hesekiel: Der Dichter und das Buch.*Hölscher ascribed to Ezekiel a mere 144 verses out of the canonical 1,273, on the basis that all of the authentic oracles of the prophet were poetic or elevated prose. Although few scholars actually found Hölscher's method of separating out genuine Ezekiel texts from later accretions convincing, his successors have continued in attempting to distill out a small base layer from the later dross by a variety of means.

The criteria employed by these scholars have frequently included the requirements that the original oracles be terse and strictly uniform in style. Each oracle is allowed only to have one opening and closing formula. Texts that pick up and develop ideas from earlier in the book are held to be "clearly" secondary; only oracles expressing ideas that can be paralleled from elsewhere in preexilic prophecy are allowed to stand as original. Once the various texts have been detached from their immediate surroundings, continuities of thought or style are then used to link these separate texts into a number of different "layers" or "strata." Since the layers of text separated out by these methods do not come with signatures, the scholars often then make elaborate attempts to determine the social and historical contexts that gave birth to the different layers, and sometimes warnings are issued that even the "earliest" layer cannot naively be assumed to stem from the "historical prophet." 13

This last observation is indeed true, though in an entirely different sense from that usually intended. It can be shown, for example, that Ezekiel 22:25–29 is based on Zephaniah 3:3–4. The distinctive language of Zephaniah has been picked up and adopted, though not without changes that make the style distinctly that of Ezekiel. It is possible for us to unfold and identify these changes, but only because we have the base text of Zephaniah with which to compare it. If we did not have the text of Zephaniah, we would not be able to reconstruct it from Ezekiel's version. What is more, even if we were able to do so, our hypothetically "reconstructed" text would not be what originally belonged in Ezekiel 22. It is the present "reworked" text that is the original in this case.

This practical example suggests that in the absence of such points of comparison, the whole scholarly enterprise of reconstructing "original" texts is fraught with fundamental methodological questions. It is like cleaning "accretions" from the ceiling of the Sistine chapel and crying "Aha" once you reach the bare plaster. In the process, it is not merely centuries of dirt that have been removed but the work of Michelangelo as well! The text as it stands is our only sure datum.

- (2) In a different direction, Hölscher's work encouraged a few scholars to argue that the entire book of Ezekiel was a pseudepigraphic work dating from much later than the Babylonian exile. C. C. Torrey, for example, argued that the book is a unity that belonged to the period around 230 B.C. For a while in the 1930s and 1940s, these two opinions captured a significant percentage of scholarly critical opinion.
- (3) But gradually the pendulum swung back to a more moderate critical position, which argues that the vast majority of the book comes from the prophet himself and his immediate disciples, and that it was essentially complete by the end of the exilic period. The outstanding figure supporting this position has been Walther Zimmerli, whose massive German commentary, with its English translation, remains the reference point of critical scholarship on Ezekiel, even though it is now thirty years old. These scholars make some use of the criteria of authenticity described above to detect significant editorial additions and changes, and thus diversity of authorship within the book; however, in contrast to the radical scholars, they date most of those changes relatively close to the lifetime of the prophet himself.
- (4) In recent academic work, there has been something of a resurgence of support for a more conservative position regarding the relationship of the prophet and the book. The excellent commentaries by Daniel Block in the New International Commentary on the Old Testament series and by Moshe Greenberg in the Anchor Bible series acknowledge in principle the possibility that there may have been editorial additions and revisions made by the disciples of the prophet. Indeed, Ezekiel 1:2–3 seems to be a fairly routine example of just such an editorial comment, locating the work of the prophet in space and time for those who did not hear him or know him firsthand. Yet both commentaries work in practice from the initial assumption that the present contents of the book essentially come to us from the hand of the prophet himself, an assumption that their own work helps to support. As Greenberg puts it:

the persuasion grows on one . . . that a coherent world of vision is emerging, contemporary with the sixth-century prophet and decisively shaped by him, if not the very words of Ezekiel himself.¹⁵

Their position still remains a minority opinion in scholarly circles, compared to the moderate critical position argued by the disciples of Zimmerli. Nonetheless, it is the firm conviction of this writer that they are fundamentally accurate in their assessment. When the text is allowed to speak for itself, it conveys a coherent and consistent worldview that addresses the situation of those exiled from Judah in the sixth century B.C. There seems, therefore, little good reason to assign significant portions of it to late and clumsy redactors. What is more, if the editing process is neither late nor clumsy, why must we assign it to anyone other than the prophet himself?¹⁶ It is simpler to accept the testimony of the book itself than to multiply unnecessarily complex theories of authorship.

Ultimately, however, the authority of the text does not lie in our ability to demonstrate that it comes to us directly from the mouth of the prophet. Nor does it lie in the assessment of the book by an authoritative body of human beings, whether a council of academics or a council of the church, that it is worthy of a place in the canon. In the final analysis, as the Reformers insisted, Scripture is self-authenticating. Though there may be supporting witnesses, such as the testimony of God's people down through the ages or the testimony of those who have studied the book in depth, for us to be convinced of its divine origin and authority over us requires a work of the Holy Spirit in our hearts. Only this internal illumination will enable us to recognize the book and receive it for what it really is: nothing less than the word of the Sovereign Lord.¹⁷

Interpreting Ezekiel

WITHIN THE HISTORY of the church, probably the most popular method of interpreting Ezekiel has been the allegorical method. Thus the church father Gregory the Great, in his homily on Ezekiel 40:6–8, identified the East Gate of the temple as Jesus, the steps leading up to the gate as the merits of the virtues that lead to salvation, and the threshold of the gate as the ancestors of Jesus. The chamber inside the gate has length, which symbolizes longsuffering in expectation, and breadth, which symbolizes amplitude of charity. A millennium later, the Puritan William Greenhill's commentary on Ezekiel 40:16 finds significance in the windows of the visionary temple as denoting the spiritual light and joy that should be in the church of Christ. According to him, the fact that there are windows also in the "little chambers" means that even the least churches and the least saints shall not be without light and joy, teaching and comfort. In this kind of allegorical approach, the interpretation does not flow out of an understanding of the text in its original context; rather, it fastens on certain details in the text and applies them directly to our present context.

This method of interpretation is undoubtedly motivated by pastoral concerns. These preachers desired to help their people benefit from all of Scripture. After all, is not all Scripture inspired by God and profitable in the life of the believer (2 Tim. 3:16)? Indeed, although unfashionable in the contemporary world, not everyone would agree that such an approach to difficult texts is problematic. Charles Spurgeon, that prince of Victorian preachers, defended the practice of allegorizing—or as he called it, "spiritualizing"—on the grounds of its pragmatic value. According to him, provided that it is done within certain limits, a great deal of real good may be done by occasionally taking forgotten, quaint, remarkable, out of the way texts; I feel persuaded that if we appeal to a jury of practical, successful preachers, who are not theorizers, but men actually in the field, we shall have a majority in our favour. It may be that the learned rabbis of our generation are too sublime and celestial to condescend to men of low estate; but we who have no high culture, or profound learning, or enchanting elegance to boast of, have deemed it wise to use the very method the grandees have proscribed; for we find it one of the best ways of keeping out of the rut of dull formality and it yields a sort of salt with which to give flavour to unpalatable truth.²⁰

On the grounds of gospel success, Spurgeon therefore defends (to cite just one example) a sermon preached on the text: "The owl, the night hawk and the cuckoo" (Lev. 11:16). If you wonder how it might be possible to get a profitable sermon out of that verse, his explanation is well worth reading! He would have been quite happy to "spiritualize" Ezekiel's visionary temple in the same way as William Greenhill did.²¹

It is interesting, however, to note the tone of Spurgeon's defense. Insisting that you should always preach the "plain, literal sense" of the text is, according to him, an elitist proposal. It is the kind of idea forwarded by the "learned rabbis," those who esteem "high culture" and "profound learning." Of course, he is right. What I mean by that is that it is a difficult task to expound what he describes as the "plain, literal sense" of the text (i.e., the meaning of the text within its original context) week after week. To do so requires a significant amount of hard work and depth of biblical knowledge. This is particularly true in the case of a book like Ezekiel, whose surface meaning seems at first sight singularly uninviting. It is not surprising that so many ordinary preachers and Bible study teachers shy away from such an approach to Ezekiel, feeling unprepared to tackle its numerous complexities. On the other hand, it is relatively easy to preach the simple gospel week by week and merely vary the text from which you preach it.

Those who by the grace of God are "learned rabbis," whether as a result of formal academic study or self-directed reading, should not despise such simple proclamation of the gospel. In the history of the church, many have been brought into God's kingdom and nourished on the central truths of the gospel in that way. What God has chosen to use, let us not be overly hard on. As we have already noted, this kind of allegorical interpretation stemmed from a firm conviction of the inspiration and usefulness of every portion of God's Word; thus, rather than not expound part of the Word because its plain sense was not understood, these preachers proclaimed what they knew to be true from elsewhere in the Bible.

Yet we should also recognize that such allegorical interpretation has many dangers. Spurgeon himself was aware of some of them: The exposition given may strain common sense, as in the case of the preacher who discoursed on the Trinity from the three baskets on the head of Pharaoh's baker. Allegorical interpretation may also be used as a means of impressing your audience with what a clever person you are. In some cases, it may lead to undervaluing or forgetting the factual and historical nature of the texts on which you are preaching. But one of the biggest drawbacks of allegorical interpretation, even at its best, is that it does not train your listeners to interpret the Scriptures for themselves. Even when done well, it almost inevitably leaves the people impressed by the teacher's personal ability and "spirituality" rather than being equipped to feed themselves from the Word. The congregation comes out of church saying, "I would never in a million years have seen that truth there," instead of, "How obvious it is! How could I have missed what the passage was clearly saying?"

Jim Elliot, one of the five missionaries who were killed in 1957 while attempting to reach the Auca Indians of Ecuador with the gospel, was an intensely—dauntingly—spiritual young man. Yet he once wrote this entry in his journal:

Meditation yesterday on the curtains and boards [of the tabernacle] seemed fruitless. . . . Somehow the study of the tabernacle seems fruitless. I can see no plausible interpretation method. My brethren who are older and much more experienced have been able to draw much from it in type. Lord, I need to have my spirit refreshed with some new thought from Thy Word. Open my eyes and let me behold some of those "wondrous things" contained in Thy Law.²²

Growing up in Brethren circles on a diet of allegorical preaching, Elliot felt that only a direct infusion of divine insight could enable him to understand such a difficult text. As a result, he berated himself for being unable to pull a spiritual rabbit out of the exegetical hat in the way his favorite preachers always seemed able to do. The true fault lay more with his favorite preachers than with him, however. The purpose of this commentary is to enable you to understand more fully what the text is about in its original context. In that way, understanding its true meaning, there need be no resort to allegorical interpretation to derive spiritual food from this portion of God's Word.

On the other hand, it is necessary to point out that what we mean by "understanding the text in its original context" does not imply what is sometimes termed in contemporary discussion literal interpretation. This latter approach means, according to Charles Ryrie, "interpretation which gives to every word the same meaning it would have in normal usage, whether employed in writing, speaking or thinking."²³ To put it like this begs the question of what "normal" usage is in the prophets, as Ryrie is himself aware. Ryrie's response to that potential objection is that his approach does not deny the possibility of figurative or symbolic speech. However, it insists that "prophecies are to be normally interpreted... as any other utterances are interpreted."²⁴ The key point to observe is that for him, the genre of prophecy is fundamentally one of normal or plain speech. He supports his case by citing the fulfillment of Micah 5:2, which prophesies that the Christ will be born in Bethlehem. Indeed, Jesus was literally born in Bethlehem, not just in some analogous small town in Judah.

But does the Bible itself support Ryrie's claim? Certainly some Old Testament prophecies were fulfilled literally in the New Testament. Some of those Old Testament prophecies were equally clearly understood in a literal manner prior to their fulfillment. Thus, Herod could be advised by the chief priests and teachers of the law where to go looking for the Christ child on the basis of Micah 5:2 (Matt. 2:4–5). However, other prophecies from the Old Testament were fulfilled in a way that would have been completely unexpected to preceding generations, even though they too were fulfilled in a literal way. What first-century B.C. prophecy conference would have been clearly predicting the birth of Messiah from a virgin on the basis of Isaiah 7:14? Or his crucifixion on the basis of Psalm 22? Or his physical resurrection on the basis of Psalm 16? These texts are clearly viewed by the New Testament as messianic prophecies that were literally fulfilled, yet they were only seen to be such with the benefit of 20-20 hindsight after their fulfillment in Christ, not before.

Still other Old Testament prophecies are transformationally fulfilled; that is, their New Testament fulfillment is clearly related to the Old Testament promise, but it is not exactly literal. Thus Isaiah 40:3 speaks of the coming of a messenger whose message is: "In the desert prepare the way for the LORD; make straight in the wilderness a highway for our God." The New Testament sees that promise fulfilled in the coming of John the Baptizer, who is, to quote Luke, "a voice of one calling in the desert, 'Prepare the way for the Lord, make straight paths for him' "(Luke 3:4). In other words, in the New Testament, the "desert" is no longer part of the message as it was in Isaiah's proclamation, but has become the location of the messenger.

This transformational fulfillment is repeatedly found in the New Testament, perhaps in classic form in what John does in Revelation 22 with Ezekiel's temple vision of chapters 40–48. We will examine that connection in much greater detail further on in the commentary, but for now suffice it to say that the New Jerusalem is not a literal fulfillment of Ezekiel's temple, nor is the latter a millennial preparation for it. The book of Revelation shows us the temple of Ezekiel viewed through the lens of our redemption accomplished in Christ.

Nor is this merely an exegetical observation of what the New Testament does in practice in a few cases with Old Testament prophetic texts. It is in principle what the Old Testament itself tells us to do with prophetic texts. The classic Old Testament text on the nature of prophetic visions is Numbers 12:6–8, where the Lord says:

When a prophet of the LORD is among you, I reveal myself to him in visions, I speak to him in dreams.

But this is not true of my servant Moses; he is faithful in all my house.

With him I speak face to face, clearly and not in riddles; he sees the form of the LORD.

The point of this text is a distinct contrast between the revelation by Moses (i.e., the Torah or Pentateuch) and that by means of the (true) prophets. The latter is characterized as being indirect—by vision $(mar'\hat{a})$ and dream $(\dot{h}^al\hat{o}m)$. In stark contrast, the revelation by Moses is characterized by four expressions that emphasize its directness. (1) It is "face to face," or more precisely, "mouth to mouth," a unique phrase that focuses on the verbal nature of that revelation. (2) It is "plain" or "clear" (mar'eh), not by means of dreams or visions. (3) It is "not in riddles" $(\dot{h}\hat{i}d\bar{o}t)$, unlike prophets such as Ezekiel, who were explicitly commanded by God to speak riddles (Ezek. 17:2). The revelation by Moses is transparent and self-explanatory in comparison to the obscurities that attend the words of the prophets. (4) Finally, the revelation by Moses is superior in directness to that by the prophets because Moses saw "the form of the LORD," a reference to his encounter with God on Mount Sinai, which was so transformational that it made his face shine.²⁵

The entire burden of this text, then, is that the Old Testament should not be read in a uniform manner. Moses (the Pentateuch) should be read in a straightforward way, according to "literal interpretation." When reading the prophets, on the other hand, we should expect to find nonliteral forms, dreams, visions, and riddles, which are not intended to be interpreted literally but rather will be unfolded in the light of the clearer revelation of God.

But what prevents us from sliding into the morass of subjectivism in interpreting the prophets, of which Ryrie warns? Does this approach not inevitably lead to speculative allegorizing that wrenches out of the texts spiritually uplifting messages that they were never intended to bear? The answer is to recall the words of Jesus on the Emmaus road. When Jesus caught up with those two despondent disciples, who were leaving Jerusalem unaware of the resurrection, he took them back on a tour of the Old Testament Scriptures. He exposed their woefully inadequate knowledge and exegesis, saying (Luke 24:25–27):

"How foolish you are, and how slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken! Did not the Christ have to suffer these things and then enter his glory?" And beginning with Moses and all the Prophets, he explained to them what was said in all the Scriptures concerning himself.

In other words, Jesus gave these two followers a classic redemptive-historical sermon, unfolding the Old Testament and showing them how it is fulfilled in him. The point is that according to Jesus, we should expect the message of all of the prophets to be Jesus Christ! The disciples' response was not to be amazed at his cleverness in uncovering references to himself in such a wide range of sources! Rather, they were astonished at their dullness in not having perceived before what these familiar books were about.²⁶ Nor was that simply his message on one particular occasion. Luke 24:44–47 gives us the substance of Jesus' teaching to all the disciples in the climactic forty-day postresurrection period:

"This is what I told you while I was still with you: Everything must be fulfilled that is written about me in the Law of Moses, the Prophets and the Psalms."

Then he opened their minds so they could understand the Scriptures. He told them, "This is what is written: The Christ will suffer and rise from the dead on the third day, and repentance and forgiveness of sins will be preached in his name to all nations, beginning at Jerusalem."

This is Jesus' master class in Old Testament interpretation. Note the comprehensiveness of the language he uses: "Everything must be fulfilled that is written about me in the Law of Moses, the Prophets and the Psalms." These three terms make up the three comprehensive divisions of the Old Testament, what Luke later designates "the Scriptures." In other words, the focus of Jesus' teaching was not a few "messianic" texts but rather the entire Old Testament. According to him, the whole Old Testament Scriptures are a message about him. More specifically, the central focus of the entire Old Testament is his sufferings, his resurrection, and the proclamation of the gospel to all nations.

Nor was the teaching of Jesus lost on his disciples. In Acts 3:18, preaching in front of the temple, Peter described the crucifixion of Jesus in these words: "This is how God fulfilled what he had foretold through all the prophets, saying that his Christ would suffer." The apostle went on to speak of Jesus' second coming from heaven as being something God "promised long ago through his holy prophets. . . . Indeed, all the prophets from Samuel on, as many as have spoken, have foretold these days" (3:21, 24). Once again, notice the assertion that the central message of the prophets is Jesus' suffering and the glories that would subsequently flow from that event.

Peter explicitly formulates that principle in 1 Peter 1:10–12:

Concerning this salvation, the prophets, who spoke of the grace that was to come to you, searched intently and with the greatest care, trying to find out the time and circumstances to which the Spirit of Christ in them was pointing when he predicted the sufferings of Christ and the glories that would follow. It was revealed to them that they were not serving themselves but you, when they spoke of the things that have now been told you by those who have preached the gospel to you by the Holy Spirit sent from heaven. Even angels long to look into these things.

So too did Paul, who testified before King Agrippa (Acts 26:22–23):

I am saying nothing beyond what the prophets and Moses said would happen—that the Christ would suffer and, as the first to rise from the dead, would proclaim light to his own people and to the Gentiles.

This was Paul's exegetical method that he put into practice in Thessalonica, where on three consecutive Sabbaths, he reasoned with the Jews "from the Scriptures, explaining and proving that the Christ had to suffer and rise from the dead" (Acts 17:2–3).

To sum up, then, the message of the prophets in general, and Ezekiel in particular, is not simply instruction addressed to their own day and age. Still less is it a manual to help you interpret current events in the Middle East and work out the countdown to Armageddon. The message of the prophets is Jesus, and specifically "the sufferings of Christ and the glories that would follow." Thus, when you interpret Ezekiel correctly, without allegory, you will find that his message is not primarily morality, or social action, or eschatology. His central message is Jesus.

To be sure, understanding this gospel will lead to a new morality in the life of believers; it will motivate and empower them for meeting the needs of a lost world and engage their passion for the eschatological vision to be realized in fullness with the return of Christ. But the heart of Ezekiel is a witness to Christ, which centers in on his suffering and glory, his death and resurrection. The goal of this commentary is to show how this Christ-centered approach opens up the heart of the message of the ancient prophet for the contemporary believer.

Some of my readers are likely to be concerned at this point that I am selling short the ethical imperatives of the prophets in general and of Ezekiel in particular. I appreciate their concern, and I will respond with two simple points.

- (1) The gospel (the good news about Jesus' death and resurrection) is not merely the power by which God's people are transformed. The gospel is not merely the starting point from which we move on to ethics; it is the heartbeat of our lives as Christians. That is why Paul could say in 1 Corinthians 2:2: "I resolved to know nothing while I was with you except Jesus Christ and him crucified." Presumably, Paul is not saying that he only preached evangelistic sermons while ignoring the task of discipleship. Rather, he means that every sermon he preached had a focus on the cross of Christ, whose implications he then drew out for every area of life.²⁸ To put it simply, he never preached Ephesians 4–6 (the ethical imperatives) without Ephesians 1–3 (the gospel indicative). Our sanctification flows out of our justification.
- (2) This is important in our contemporary context because relatively few believers are short of ethical knowledge. There may be exceptions to the general rule, and there are certainly some areas where ethical instruction is sorely needed by the church. But in my own experience most Christians know a great deal about how they ought to live. Their problem is that they don't live up to what they know.²⁹ The gap is not in their knowledge but in their obedience.

How do we address this gap? Ethical sermons and Bible studies, no matter how accurately biblical their content, tend simply to add to the burden of guilt felt by the average Christian. Such teaching yields little by way of results. The gospel, on the other hand, has the power to change lives at a deep level, as men and women come to see both the depth of their sin (and therefore that their feelings of guilt were actually far too shallow) and at the same time the glorious good news that Jesus is their substitute, who has taken upon himself the punishment their sin deserved and has lived the perfect life in their place. Freed from their guilt, freed from their fear of failure, freed from their love of reputation, these people are now equipped to change.³⁰

Finally, this approach requires a different orientation to preaching (and, I would argue, Bible study) than is common in our churches. Typically, we have drawn a sharp division between "worship" (the first part of our service) and "preaching." Often, the latter has degenerated into "instruction" with the sole measure of its efficacy, "How much have people learned?" To aid the communication of information, we put diagrams on overhead projectors and issue handouts. Yet biblical preaching is much more than instruction: The preaching and hearing of God's Word is itself worship in its most profound sense. Its goal is doxological, that is, that men and women might be brought to see in a new way the glory of God and to bow their hearts in adoration and praise. Such preaching will certainly change lives, but it will be concerned even more fundamentally that God should be glorified. Like the apostle Paul, we pray (Eph. 3:20–21):

Now to him who is able to do immeasurably more than all we ask or imagine, according to his power that is at work within us, to him be glory in the church and in Christ Jesus throughout all generations, for ever and ever! Amen.

Central Themes of the Book of Ezekiel

THE TASK THAT was assigned to Ezekiel was to prophesy to the exiles of Judah, who had been carried away into captivity in distant Babylonia. It was an audience close to despair, asking why this disaster had come on them and where God was in the middle of their personal holocaust. Their assessment of their own condition was: "Our bones are dried up and our hope is gone; we are cut off" (Ezek. 37:11). What use was a God who seemed unable or unwilling to protect his own land? What use was a God who allowed his own temple in Jerusalem to be defiled? What use was a God who allowed his own people to be carried away from the land he had promised to the patriarchs? Even if he were to intervene now on behalf of his land, how would that help those who were far away in exile? These were the questions with which the exiles struggled.

The answers to these questions permeate the book. The first and overarching theme of the entire prophecy is the sovereignty and glory of God. Ezekiel's opening vision is a vision of the glory of God, in all of his power and majesty (Ezek. 1). This visible glory was the mark of God's presence in the midst of his people in former times, which had first filled the tabernacle and subsequently fell on Solomon's temple at its dedication (2 Chron. 7:1–2). God had chosen the temple in Jerusalem to be his dwelling place. But now, amazingly, this same glory of God is seen by Ezekiel by the Kebar River, that is, in the midst of the exiles! The glorious and majestic sovereign God has gone into exile with his people (Ezek. 11:16).

Ezekiel 8–11 explains in visionary form why this shift has happened. The temple in Jerusalem has been utterly polluted by the abominations of the people (Ezek. 8). God's response to this defilement is twofold: He first decrees the destruction of the city and the temple (Ezek. 9), and then his glory departs from the temple to the east. He leaves slowly, haltingly, as if sorrowing over the scene, and moves towards those already in exile (Ezek. 10–11). The point of the vision is that God has not been evicted from his home by a superior force, impotent in the face of the Babylonian horde. Rather, because of the sin of his people he deliberately abandons the city of Jerusalem and its temple, decreeing their destruction. The Babylonians are merely a tool to do his will (Ezek. 21).

God's control over the entire situation is such that he can even determine the outcome of the Babylonian king's efforts to consult his gods through examining the liver of an animal (Ezek. 21:21)! As Proverbs 16:33 puts it: "The lot is cast into the lap, but its every decision is from the LORD." For wicked Jerusalem that is bad news, because it means that the punishment already decreed by God will surely come about and nothing can avert it (Ezek. 21:8–17). But for those already in exile, this same sovereignty represents hope. If it is indeed God who has scattered them among the nations, then he may also gather them back to himself and to their land again (11:17). He who voluntarily withdraws his glory from the defiled temple in chapter 11 is able to choose to return to a renewed and cleansed temple in chapter 43. God's sovereignty guarantees both the destruction of the sinner and the salvation of those who hope in him.

The second main theme in the book of Ezekiel could not contrast more strongly with the first: the utter sinfulness of humans. Yet the two themes are interrelated: To become aware of the glory of God is to receive a heightened awareness of the awfulness of sin, as Isaiah had earlier discovered (Isa. 6:5). All of the prophets preached against the sin and idolatry of their own day, but perhaps none was quite as comprehensive or as sweeping in their indictments as Ezekiel. For him, the sin of God's people stretched back throughout their entire history. Jerusalem had acted like a prostitute from the day of its birth (Ezek. 23:3) and was actually worse than Sodom (16:46–48)! Even from earliest times, from the day when God had called Israel out of Egypt and brought them into the desert, they had rebelled against him (ch. 20).

In addition to stretching back through time, the sin of God's people also stretched throughout society. It affected kings, priests, bureaucrats, prophets, the elite families of Jerusalem, elders, women—in short, every layer of society (see esp. Ezek. 22). It included sins against God (idolatry, neglecting the Sabbath, despising God's holy things; 22:7–12), as well as crimes against their fellow men and women (slander, violence, sexual impurity, bribery, extortion, oppression of the weak; 22:7–12). In order to make his point abundantly clear, Ezekiel deliberately adopts the most shocking language possible. Parts of Ezekiel 16 and 23 have been deemed by many scarcely suitable to be read aloud in church, and an ancient audience would have found its bluntness no less offensive.

The message is crystal clear, however: Sin cannot be swept under the carpet. It cannot be prettified, excused, or ignored. It is ugly, dirty, and offensive and cannot coexist with the presence of a holy God. When Jeremiah complained of those prophets and priests who dressed the wound of the people as though it were not serious, who said "Peace, peace" when there was no peace (Jer. 8:10–11), he was certainly not thinking of his younger contemporary, Ezekiel.

The third theme of the book grows out of the first two: the inescapable coming of judgment. That judgment will come first of all on Judah and Jerusalem. Jerusalem will be made a ruin and a reproach among the nations. Its destruction will be almost total and its people will be scattered to the four winds (Ezek. 5). It is literally the end of the road for Judah (chs. 7, 12, 15, 17, 21). They are the meat in the cooking pot, about to be cooked not simply medium-rare or even extremely well-done, but until they are turned into a charred heap of ashes (ch. 24). What is more, this holocaust is not the result of blind fate or the expansionist ambitions of arrogant world rulers. Rather, it is the outpouring of the wrath of a holy God on a land full of bloodshed and a city full of injustice (9:9).

Nor is there any mediator who will be able to turn away God's wrath from his people. Even if Noah, Daniel, and Job were miraculously present, between them they would have only enough righteousness to save themselves, not the people of the land (Ezek. 14:12–20). There is no prophet to stand in the gap on behalf of the people and thus prevent their destruction (22:30). Ezekiel himself is prevented from interceding for the people or remonstrating with them. He is struck dumb, only able to speak to declare the word of the Lord to them (3:26–27).

Judgment begins in God's program at the center, with his sanctuary (Ezek. 9:6). But it does not end there. Just as God's sovereignty extends to the ends of the earth, so also does his judgment. Thus, after the extensive section on Israel's sin and punishment, we find a section of prophecies against the other nations (chs. 25–32). They too have sinned in their pride and mocking of Judah's fallen state, and judgment will fall on them as well.

We might call these last two themes the bad news according to Ezekiel. It is bad news indeed, but it is a reality that had to be faced nonetheless. Judah was now going into exile, and her people needed to acknowledge that the cause of this situation was their own sin, not their fathers' sin or their brothers' sin. This is the point of Ezekiel 18, a point repeated in chapter 33 at the beginning of the section on the future hope. Until Judah acknowledges the rightness of God's action, she cannot receive forgiveness.

Yet there are signs from the opening pages of the book that God's judgment will be tempered by mercy. Ezekiel's vision of God includes a throne surrounded by a rainbow (Ezek. 1:28), the covenant sign that judgment against sin will never obliterate the remnant of God's true people (see Gen. 9:13–15). This theme is reiterated in many ways: a few hairs tucked away (Ezek. 5:3), a promise to spare some (6:8), the marking of the faithful (9:4), and so on. Yet it is no coincidence that Judah must first come face-to-face with the reality and ugliness of its sin in chapters 1–24 before it can receive the promise of a new future in chapters 33–48.

The turning point of the entire book comes with the coming of news of the fall of Jerusalem, an event anticipated at the end of Ezekiel 24, which then actually occurs in 33:21–22. Now the prophet's dumbness is removed, and the good news of restoration dominates. Now the positive side even of the oracles of judgment against the foreign nations can be seen: It is a mark that at least part of God's covenant with Abraham is still in force, that "whoever curses you I will curse" (Gen. 12:3). Is it not then true that the part of the covenant that promised ultimate blessing to Abraham's descendants is also intact?

The exploration of that possibility provides the central theme for the remainder of the book, which deals with the return of the King and the restoration of the people to their land and a state of blessing. The heart of Ezekiel's vision of the renewed temple is the return of the divine glory to the Most Holy Place (Ezek. 43:1–5). Once it has returned, the East Gate of the temple is closed forever. God will never again depart from his people as he did earlier. In order to assure this continuous presence for blessing, God promises to act to transform the people, starting from the top down. Their leadership is first on his agenda. A multiplicity of bad shepherds will be replaced by one good shepherd, a new David, by whom God will restore justice for all (Ezek. 34). He will unite in himself all of God's people, from the former northern and southern kingdoms (37:15–28). The priesthood will also be purified, with only those who remained faithful permitted access to the inner part of the sanctuary (44:6–16). Laws will be established that prevent the possibility of any return to the nation's former sins (e.g., 46:16– 18). The old structures of the society that transgressed are completely swept away.

But sin does not reside simply in the structures of society; it pervades the hearts and minds of men and women. What the people need is nothing less than a new heart and a new spirit—a heart that will be willing and a spirit that will be obedient. That is what God promises to give them (Ezek. 37:1–14). What is promised is nothing short of a new creation, a radically changed world that will rise out of the ashes of the old. Even the very land in which they live will be transformed from a harsh, barren wilderness to a fruitful paradise (36:11, 35). Even though the enemies of God may still seek to stir up trouble against his people, they will never again come as an act of God's judgment and prevail against them. From henceforth, God will fight on behalf of his people, not against them (Ezek. 38–39). Judah is promised a return to Eden, but it is now an Eden that is populated with purified Adams and that has a high fence around the forbidden tree.

These, then, are the themes we find in the book of Ezekiel: God's glory and sovereignty, human sinfulness, the certainty of judgment, and the promise of mercy and hope for the future. From a New Testament perspective, the picture presented of the future still has an air of "not yet" about it. The most prominent feature of the new temple is not free access to God, but massive gatehouses designed to keep sinners from defiling it. There is a cleansing stream flowing from the temple (Ezek. 47), yet there is still a need for regular atonement sacrifices offered by the prince on behalf of his people (45:17). There is salvation for the Promised Land (Ezek. 48), and even for the alien and stranger in their midst, but not yet for the whole world. In all of this, there is still room for a greater revelation of hope.

This greater revelation of hope is revealed in Christ, to whom Ezekiel points us forward. The Glory of God, which Ezekiel saw coming to the temple, arrived in the person of Jesus, of whom John testifies: "We have seen his glory, the glory of the One and Only, who came from the Father" (John 1:14). Just as the Glory of God departed from Jerusalem and went to be with his people in exile, so Jesus left his Father's side to identify with sinful humanity, suffering "outside the camp" on behalf of his people (Heb. 13:12–13). The mediator who could not be found to turn aside judgment from Judah is now found in Jesus, the mediator of the new covenant, who offered his own blood for the sins of his people (9:11–15). Jesus is the Good Shepherd promised by Ezekiel, who will restore justice for his sheep (John 10:11). All who are in him are completely new creatures, filled with the Spirit of God (2 Cor. 5:17; Eph. 5:18).

But the salvation revealed in Jesus is far greater even than that which was revealed to Ezekiel. The reality is far better than the anticipation. It turns out that the prophet's wildest dreams were simply not wild enough! In Christ, we have boldness to approach the throne of grace (Heb. 4:16; 10:19). The city toward which we press needs no temple (Rev. 21:22), for the final sacrifice has been offered once and for all by Christ (Heb. 10:10). In it will be not only the full number of the tribes of Israel but a great multitude of all nations, tribes, peoples, and languages (Rev. 7:5–9).

Truly, the gospel is present in the book of Ezekiel for those with eyes to see it. It may not be with the full measure of revelation found in the New Testament—indeed it could not be—yet Ezekiel, too, deserves his place among those who "predicted the sufferings of Christ and the glories that would follow" (1 Peter 1:11).

Text and Commentary on Ezekiel

Ezekiel 1:1–3

IN THE THIRTIETH YEAR, in the fourth month on the fifth day, while I was among the exiles by the Kebar River, the heavens were opened and I saw visions of God.

²On the fifth of the month—it was the fifth year of the exile of King Jehoiachin—³the word of the LORD came to Ezekiel the priest, the son of Buzi, by the Kebar River in the land of the Babylonians. There the hand of the LORD was upon him.

Original Meaning

THE OPENING THREE VERSES of Ezekiel serve to locate the prophet's ministry in time and space. Verse 1 tells us that the prophet received his call on the fifth day of the fourth month in the thirtieth year, among the exiles beside the Kebar River. This verse may originally have stood simply as the heading for the opening vision, addressed to people familiar with the prophet and his situation. At a later date, when the prophecies were addressed to a wider (Judean?) audience, it became necessary to clarify the details of verse 1. It was at this point that the next two verses were added, either by the prophet or someone else. This addition equates the "thirtieth year" of verse 1 with the fifth year of the exile of King Jehoiachin (593 B.C.), specifies the "I" of verse 1 as "Ezekiel son of Buzi the priest" (see NIV text note), and identifies the Kebar River, where the exiles lived, as being "in the land of the Babylonians."

The original meaning of the "thirtieth year" in verse 1 has been much discussed from the time of the rabbis onward. The text gives us no indication from what datum the thirtieth year is counted. Three major possibilities have emerged.

(1) It is the thirtieth year since a specific event. This method of dating is well attested in the Old Testament (see, e.g., 2 Chron. 23:1, where "the seventh year" is the seventh year since the usurpation of the throne by Athaliah). Elsewhere in Ezekiel, the dates have as their consistent baseline the exile of King Jehoiachin (as in Ezek. 1:2), while Amos dates his prophecy with reference to an earthquake (Amos 1:1).

On the basis of the other dates in Ezekiel, some have thus seen the "thirtieth year" as the "thirtieth year of King Jehoiachin's exile," which would make verse 1 refer to the date of the final prophecy of the whole book.¹ Other commentators from ancient times have sought an event thirty years previous to 593 B.C. that might serve as a suitable datum point. The identification of Josiah's reform (ca. 621 B.C.) as that "point zero" goes back to the Targum and was held by Jerome,² while David Kimḥi favored the idea of the thirtieth year since the last year of Jubilee.³

- (2) It is the thirtieth year in the reign of a specific king. This is the most common dating method in the Old Testament, used not only of the kings of Israel and Judah but also of a foreign king in Nehemiah 1:1 and 2:1. Indeed, the references in Nehemiah are of particular interest since the first simply speaks of "the twentieth year," which is not more specifically defined until the next chapter, where it becomes clear that the "twentieth year" in question is that of King Artaxerxes. Some have therefore argued that the dating in Ezekiel 1:1 is based on "Babylonian time," beginning with the accession of Nabopolassar in 625 B.C.⁴
- (3) It is the thirtieth year of the prophet's life. This view goes back to Origen and has found several contemporary supporters.⁵ One would normally expect an additional phrase in the Hebrew to indicate it as his age; yet there is a parallel at Genesis 8:13, where the "six hundred and first year" is that of Noah, as 7:11 makes clear. This date would have been significant for Ezekiel, for at that age he would have taken up his priestly ministry in the Jerusalem temple, had it still been standing.

There is no simple solution to this problem (self-evidently, since otherwise it would not continue to be discussed!). Some reference point that was presumably transparently clear to the original audience is no longer available to us. More significant, whoever added the additional notes of verses 2–3 chose not to highlight the "thirtieth year" but rather offer the date from Jehoiachin's exile. It is thus perhaps best to leave the question open and not base our exegesis on inevitably speculative reasoning. What is clear and underlined in the present form of the text is that the opening vision of the prophet Ezekiel is placed in the fifth year of Jehoiachin's exile, that is, 593 B.C., while the prophet lived among the exiles of Babylonia.

Historically and socially, therefore, Ezekiel's message was addressed to those in exile.

There in exile, Ezekiel was confronted by a dramatic spectacle: The heavens were opened and he saw "visions of God" ('mar'ôt' elōhîm, 1:1). The prophet was taken behind the scenes, as it were, and given a different, divine perspective on the events unfolding around him. The phrase "visions of God" or "divine visions" encompasses not only the opening vision of the divine throne-chariot, but all of the visions that play such an important part in Ezekiel's message.

Although Ezekiel, like other Old Testament prophets, hears the word of the Lord, for him the visual aspect of God's revelation has a particularly prominent place. Thus the book is in important ways structured around the vision of God's throne-chariot prepared for action in chapter 1, that of the abominations that cause the glory to depart from the Jerusalem temple in chapters 8–11, the vision of the renewal of the dry bones in chapter 37, and the vision of the new temple in chapters 40–48. God is dramatically at work even in the apparently hopeless situation of the exiles, a work that the prophet is invited to "show and tell" to those around him.

Bridging Contexts

God's word for the exiles. One common mistake in interpreting the prophets (and perhaps esp. Ezekiel) is to get bogged down in the minor details and thus attempt to overinterpret the text. For instance, some commentators build extensively on the "thirtieth year" of verse 1, speaking of that as the time when the prophet would have expected to enter priestly service had he been at home in Jerusalem. Yet the presence of Ezekiel 1:2–3 already serves to play down the importance of the exact identity of the thirtieth year. If verse 1 is the original heading of (part of) the prophecy for the original audience, verses 2–3 are the heading for the wider audience, that is, for us! They address those who do not know what the thirtieth year is, need to be informed which prophet is speaking, and cannot be expected to know that the Kebar River is in Babylonia unless that fact is made clear.

The basic point, then, of the introductory verses is that God's word comes to the exiles. Now it may seem self-evident to contemporary readers that God can address us and we can come to him wherever we are. The prophet's original hearers, however, had a different understanding of their relationship to the place where they lived. If we are to understand Ezekiel's message, we must seek to understand what it meant to the people of his day to be in exile. It was not merely that they happened to be living somewhere other than they would have preferred to be; rather, their entire world had caved in upon them. In the same way that contemporary Jewish theology can be described as "Theology after Auschwitz," because every understanding of God and the world has to take into account the experience of the Holocaust, so also this part of Old Testament theology must be designated the "Theology of Exile," because of the radical impact of that earlier holocaust. Tamara Eskenazi expresses it thus:

Exile. It is not simply being homeless. Rather, it is knowing that you do have a home, but that your home has been taken over by enemies.

Exile. It is not being without roots. On the contrary, it is having deep roots which have now been plucked up, and there you are, with roots dangling, writhing in pain, exposed to a cold and jeering world, longing to be restored to native and nurturing soil. Exile is knowing precisely where you belong, but knowing that you can't go back, not yet.⁷

Weeping and dreaming. What do you do in exile? The first thing that you do is sit down and weep. As the psalmist put it in Psalm 137:1—4:

By the rivers of Babylon we sat and wept when we remembered Zion.
There on the poplars
we hung our harps,
for there our captors asked us for songs,
our tormentors demanded songs of joy;
they said, "Sing us one of the songs of Zion!"
How can we sing the songs of the LORD
while in a foreign land?

In exile, life cannot be "business as usual." How can there be joy in exile? How can there be joy when the memory is still filled with the demolition of all that is precious: Jerusalem's stones torn down, her infants slaughtered (Ps. 137:7–8)? In view of God's apparent rejection of his people, who can but pour out tears unceasingly (Lam. 2:18; 3:49)? Joy is gone and dancing turned to mourning (Lam. 5:15).

This mourning is not simply grief at the random sorrows of life, the "slings and darts of outrageous fortune," to use Shakespeare's phrase. Rather, in the midst of the pain, there is a recognition of the cause of that pain. Judah's calamity is a consequence of her own sin (Lam. 3:42; 4:13). Paradoxically, though, in the midst of that recognition is also the beginning of hope. If tragedy is not a random event but the result of God's sovereignty, then there may be hope of a new beginning. The one who has bruised can also bind up; the one who has rejected his people can restore them to himself (Lam. 5:21). God's covenant love, his ḥesed, is the basis for hope in the midst of tears.

Just as Moses appealed to the covenant with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob so that God would not destroy his people utterly after the incident with the golden calf (Ex. 32:13), so also in the Exile, God's commitment to the covenant brought hope. Added to this self-commitment was the basic character of God as gracious and compassionate, again as he had revealed himself originally to Moses (Ex. 34:6). Because of those facts, the possibility of forgiveness and restoration was real. Thus the book of Lamentations closes: "Restore us to yourself, O LORD, that we may return; renew our days as of old unless you have utterly rejected us and are angry with us beyond measure" (Lam. 5:21–22).

Such a restoration could not be claimed presumptuously, however. The temptation, even in exile, was to hang on to glib hopes rather than truly to mourn and repent. Thus Jeremiah wrote to the exiles furiously denouncing those who promised a quick end to their troubles (Jer. 29:15–23). Such prophets found a ready audience for their words, but Jeremiah criticized them for failing to listen to God's words through the prophets, words that spoke of the sword, famine, and plague (29:17–19). Until the dregs of the bitter cup of exile had been drained, there could be no talk of a new future. For the foreseeable future—for seventy years, which in most cases was far more than their life expectancy, their future lay in Babylon. Only after the cup of wrath had been drained would a new future be possible for Israel; only after the sin had been paid for would it be possible to speak tenderly to Jerusalem and proclaim her comfort (Isa. 40:1–2).

In the meantime, alongside weeping, there was also room for dreaming. According to Psalm 126:1, "When the LORD brought back the captives to Zion, we were like men who dreamed." The dreaming actually started a long time before the captives began to return. When everything has been torn down to the foundations, when nothing remains of the structures of the past, but when at the same time there is confidence that the nation will rise again, phoenix-like, from the ashes, visionary dreams can flourish. There can be dreams of a future that will preserve the best of the past while avoiding the worst.

Ezekiel's task. This context of weeping and dreaming describes well Ezekiel's task. On the one hand, he speaks clearly and unequivocally of judgment and destruction. During the early years of his ministry, he spoke of more judgment yet to come. In 589 B.C., in spite of the warnings of Ezekiel and Jeremiah, Zedekiah rebelled against the Babylonians, hoping to break free with Egypt's help. It was a disastrous error of judgment; in the aftermath, the temple itself was destroyed and Jerusalem razed to the ground (see 2 Kings 25). The people needed to know that the events of the fall of Jerusalem and its temple were no mere accidents of fate but were the result of the people's sin. Those responsible had to be called to account.

Yet while he was called to tear down the ruins of the past, at the same time Ezekiel was called to portray also a message of hope for the future. Though the judgment was from God, so also was the possibility of restoration. In the opening portion of the book the emphasis is on tearing down: The ruins must first of all be cleared, yet hope for the future is not completely lacking. Likewise, in the latter portion of the book, though the emphasis is on hope and dreams of the future, there is also room for a return to criticism and weeping for the past.

There is thus both continuity and discontinuity in Ezekiel's presentation of the Exile. On the one hand, things can never again be as they once were. Because of the idolatry of the past, God's judgment has come upon his people with devastating effect. The glory has departed, not just symbolically but really from Israel. God has turned his face away, abandoning his people, leading to their certain death. Had that been all there was to the history of redemption, no one could have faulted God.

But amazingly in the midst of that sentence of death comes God's recreative word of life. God speaks to these people where they are, in exile! God tears the heavens open and invites his chosen prophet to see his glory, the grounds of both judgment and hope. There will be, after the Exile, life from the dead—not because of any claim Israel may have but simply because of the mercy of God. In the meantime, Israel in exile is not forgotten or abandoned by God but is to live in the light of that promise, with hope. Though they live after the coming of night before even the first rays of dawn, yet in the light of who God is and his free promise to his people, they can live in expectant hope.

Contemporary Significance

LEARNING TO LIVE in exile. It seems to me that the social location of the book of Ezekiel in the Exile is one of the reasons for its contemporary neglect. The image of the Christian life as exile is not a common one in our days. We don't think of ourselves as exiles, and so we neglect the literature of the Exile, not simply in favor of the New Testament, but of the literature of the Exodus and of the periods of conquest and monarchy. We even prefer the writings of the return to Judah to those of the Exile; Moses and Joshua, David and Nehemiah are our mentors, not Ezekiel. Why is that? Perhaps it is because in our culture we prefer heroes and idolize success; our models are strong, "can-do" types, people who seem able to take on the world with one hand tied behind their backs. The primary paradigm we have adopted is that of the victorious Christian life.

How then do we live with the reality of life in a very different world, where victories are frequently hard to come by and right living does not always lead to success? How can we speak an encouraging word to those barely able to keep their heads above water, to those who are not living the victorious Christian life but for whom it is an achievement simply to live the surviving Christian life? What does God have to say to those of us who frequently find ourselves, like the prodigal, far away from where we should be, suffering the deserved consequences of our actions? The answer is to balance the biblical models of exodus and conquest with the equally biblical models of wilderness and exile.

In fact, the biblical image of life in exile has actually never been more timely than it is today, for we live in a time in which people are experiencing a growing sense of alienation from the world around them. Fewer and fewer people find themselves "at home" where they live. On the one hand, in our generation millions across the globe have been forced to flee their homes through migration and ethnic cleansing, through persecution and war, as well as through economic migration in search of job opportunities.¹⁰ On the other hand, even safe and affluent communities in the West have turned relocation—and dislocation—into a way of life.11 Sometimes our email addresses seem to be the only "constant" in a rapidly changing world. In such a world, the pressing question for many is, "Where do I belong?" What address can we give that describes where our hearts are? Some of us can identify a geographical area as "home," the part of the world where we would live if we could, where our language is spoken and our faces fit. But for many, home is not where we live. We live geographically uprooted lives.

Even among those who have not experienced such a physical uprooting, there are many who endure their own personal, internal experiences of "exile." The comfortable veneer of life is easily scraped away, perhaps with the loss of a job and the comfortable lifestyle that went with it, or with the death of a loved one. There are times when the props in which we trusted are knocked away and we are left winded and gasping, not knowing which way is up or where to turn. Our entire personal world has caved in upon us in an experience that will forever shape who we are.

The tendency is at such times to feel isolated and alone in feeling this way. However, it is a far more common experience than we think. Paul Simon gave expression to the sense of alienation and disorientation of an entire generation of young Americans when he wrote:

I don't know a soul who's not been battered;
I don't have a friend who feels at ease;
I don't know a dream that's not been shattered or driven to its knees.¹²

The universality of the sense of exile ("so far away from home") that Paul Simon is describing is conveyed in the title he gave to this lyric: "An American Tune." It describes the experience of all those who have metaphorically sailed off on the Mayflower into the American dream. Nor is that a uniquely American experience. Almost all of us in the modern world know what it is to live with battered souls and shattered dreams.

In those times of personal tragedy and uprootedness, our first response is to mourn and weep, and rightly so. We turn to the psalms of lament and pour our tears out before God. But we are not to weep forever. There comes a time when we need to move on and hear the challenge of God's Word as well as its comfort. Where it is our sin that has brought us into this situation, we are to confess it to God and acknowledge our own responsibility. Even where the pain we are suffering is not caused by our sin, we need to hear his words of discipline, as he reminds us that, as Christians, we can never be "at home" in this world. As the writer to the Hebrews puts it, "Here we do not have an enduring city, but we are looking for the city that is to come" (Heb. 13:14). The Christian life is, in a profound sense, always one of exile in a strange land, far from home.

Ancient believers understood this. The writer of the early second-century Epistle of Mathetus to Diognetus reminded his friend:

As citizens, Christians share all things with others, and yet endure all things as foreigners. Every foreign land is to them as their native country and every land of their birth as a land of strangers. . . . They pass their days on earth, but they are citizens of heaven. They obey the prescribed laws, and at the same time surpass the laws by their lives.¹³

Why then do we moderns persist in seeking to live as though it were not so? We put down roots as though we were here on this earth to stay forever, and we pursue the trinkets of time while ignoring the essentials of eternity. Truly, we need to learn how to live in exile.

Our true home. But living in exile is not simply a matter of gritting our teeth and getting on with it in the manner of the Stoics; we are not called to accept that life stinks, so that all we can do is make the best of a bad job. As exiles, we are not homeless and hopeless. We do have a home—it is just not here. Though we cannot go home yet and though we feel the pain of not being home, we can still dream of home. As an "exile" in the United States, I have plastered the walls of my office with reminders of home: I have a map of Britain on my wall, a calendar with views of Scotland, a Scottish flag to fly on days of national significance. I read a British newspaper daily via the Internet to keep up with current events. So also, as citizens of heaven, our lives should be filled with tokens of our true home. As Paul puts it in Colossians 3:1–2: "Since, then, you have been raised with Christ, set your hearts on things above, where Christ is seated at the right hand of God. Set your minds on things above, not on earthly things."

Why do we love to read the Scriptures daily? Because they speak to us of home. Why do we live differently from those around us? Because we remember that we are soon going home (1 Peter 4:1–7). Why are we willing to suffer and even die for our faith? Because we are sure of what we hope for and certain that to be with God, even through pain, is better by far than to be comfortable without him (Heb. 11:1–2, 13–16).

But we do not simply dream about heaven, our true home; we do what we can to establish an enclave of heaven where we live. In exile, the Sabbath and the synagogue became key institutions for the Jewish community as the means by which they maintained their distinctiveness. So too for us, if we appreciate what it means to be living in exile, our Sundays will become precious and distinctive as opportunities to experience in the company of other believers a foretaste of heaven. In fact, how you use Sunday says a lot about what you really believe about heaven. If you think that heaven is a successful career and a large house, you'll use Sunday to put in extra time at work. If you think heaven is eternally doing nothing, you'll snooze Sunday away on the sofa. If you think heaven is shopping till you drop, Sunday will find you at the local mall. But if you think that heaven is to "glorify God and enjoy him forever," how are you going to spend Sunday? By glorifying him and enjoying him now! To those who look forward to spending eternity praising God among his people, spending one day in seven in like manner is surely no hardship; rather, it is an antidote to the harsh reality of life in exile.

Equally, the experience of exile should lead us to value all the more the counterculture of the new community of the saints. The exiles focused their lives around the synagogue: It was the heart of their social lives as well as their spiritual lives. In a similar way, the infant church formed an alternative community from their earliest days, eating and spending time in one another's company as well as worshiping together (Acts 2:42–47). This is the natural response of exiles to life in an alien land and will act as an accurate measure of just how much we as Christians are truly citizens of heaven first and citizens of our earthly country second. If we truly believe that those we worship with week by week are our brothers and sisters with whom we will gladly spend eternity, then it will be entirely natural for them to be our closest friends and companions here and now.

All this is possible because to us too, in our contemporary exile, God speaks and reveals himself. Whereas in the past he spoke to the exiles through the prophet, now in these last days he has spoken to us by his Son, Jesus (Heb. 1:1–2). In the coming of Jesus, God has definitively drawn aside the curtain and revealed his heavenly purpose to all of his people—that in all things God is working for the good of those who love him, so that in Christ we may ultimately be more than conquerors (Rom. 8:28, 37). To be sure, as we look around us, we do not yet see everything in subjection to Jesus (Heb. 2:8). That is part of the experience of living in exile. But by faith, we do see Jesus, crowned with glory and honor at the right hand of the Father, and believe that our present suffering is part of God's perfect plan to mold us into the image of the one who suffered first for us (2:9–10).

Ezekiel 1:4-28

I LOOKED, AND I SAW a windstorm coming out of the north—an immense cloud with flashing lightning and surrounded by brilliant light. The center of the fire looked like glowing metal, ⁵and in the fire was what looked like four living creatures. In appearance their form was that of a man, ⁶but each of them had four faces and four wings. ⁷Their legs were straight; their feet were like those of a calf and gleamed like burnished bronze. ⁸Under their wings on their four sides they had the hands of a man. All four of them had faces and wings, ⁹and their wings touched one another. Each one went straight ahead; they did not turn as they moved.

10 Their faces looked like this: Each of the four had the face of a man, and on the right side each had the face of a lion, and on the left the face of an ox; each also had the face of an eagle. ¹¹ Such were their faces. Their wings were spread out upward; each had two wings, one touching the wing of another creature on either side, and two wings covering its body. ¹² Each one went straight ahead. Wherever the spirit would go, they would go, without turning as they went. ¹³ The appearance of the living creatures was like burning coals of fire or like torches. Fire moved back and forth among the creatures; it was bright, and lightning flashed out of it. ¹⁴ The creatures sped back and forth like flashes of lightning.

¹⁵As I looked at the living creatures, I saw a wheel on the ground beside each creature with its four faces. ¹⁶This was the appearance and structure of the wheels: They sparkled like chrysolite, and all four looked alike. Each appeared to be made like a wheel intersecting a wheel. ¹⁷As they moved, they would go in any one of the four directions the creatures faced; the wheels did not turn about as the creatures went. ¹⁸Their rims were high and awesome, and all four rims were full of eyes all around.

¹⁹When the living creatures moved, the wheels beside them moved; and when the living creatures rose from the ground, the wheels also rose.

²⁰Wherever the spirit would go, they would go, and the wheels would rise along with them, because the spirit of the living creatures was in the wheels.

²¹When the creatures moved, they also moved; when the creatures stood still, they also stood still; and when the creatures rose from the ground, the wheels rose along with them, because the spirit of the living creatures was in the wheels.

²⁵Then there came a voice from above the expanse over their heads as they stood with lowered wings. ²⁶Above the expanse over their heads was what looked like a throne of sapphire, and high above on the throne was a figure like that of a man. ²⁷I saw that from what appeared to be his waist up he looked like glowing metal, as if full of fire, and that from there down he looked like fire; and brilliant light surrounded him. ²⁸Like the appearance of a rainbow in the clouds on a rainy day, so was the radiance around him.

This was the appearance of the likeness of the glory of the LORD. When I saw it, I fell facedown, and I heard the voice of one speaking.

Original Meaning

FOR EZEKIEL AMONG the exiles by the Kebar River, God's word became sight. "The heavens were opened and I saw visions of God" (1:1). Ezekiel saw in his vision an astonishing revelation of God's glory. Now there was nothing particularly new in a prophet seeing God's glory. Isaiah had seen it in a vision of the Lord in the Jerusalem temple, high and exalted on the throne (Isa. 6). Moses himself, the archetypal prophet (Num. 12:6–8; Deut. 18:15, 18), saw God's glory on Mount Sinai—a vision so glorious that it made his face shine (Ex. 33:18–23). God's glory is the visible manifestation of his presence among his people. Thus, at the dedication of Solomon's temple, the Lord demonstrated his approval of the building by filling the structure with his glory-cloud (1 Kings 8:10–11). What is new in Ezekiel, however, is the exact form that the manifestation of God's glory takes, as a comparison with Isaiah's vision makes clear.

Isaiah's vision was stately and essentially static, as befits a vision in the temple, the symbol of God's permanent resting place in the midst of his settled people. To be sure, there was sin to be atoned for, yet atonement was accomplished by a simple touch from the coals on the heavenly altar (Isa. 6:6–7). Though there was a message of judgment for the prophet to give to a stubborn people, a judgment that would continue until the cities lay ruined and the land deserted (6:11), there was no sense of that destruction reaching to Mount Zion and bringing down the temple itself.

Indeed, the events of Isaiah's own lifetime seem to have contributed to the comfortable idea that no matter what else happened, Zion was secure. The Lion of Judah would roar from Zion (Amos 1:2), but he would not abandon it. Thus, when the Assyrian king Sennacherib swept across the ancient Near East like a flood in 701 B.C., even though he reached the gates of Jerusalem, God intervened to deliver his people by means of a dramatic plague (Isa. 36–37). Lamentations 4:12 sums up the theological conclusion drawn from these events: "The kings of the earth did not believe, nor did any of the world's people, that enemies and foes could enter the gates of Jerusalem."

In the context of this popular Zion theology, it is easy to see the difficulty that Ezekiel's earlier contemporary Jeremiah faced. He was called to oppose the complacency of those who kept repeating, "The temple of the LORD, the temple of the LORD, the temple of the LORD" (Jer. 7:4). His prophecies of judgment against Jerusalem were interpreted as high treason because they struck at the heart of this belief (Jer. 26:11). The temple itself had become viewed as an amulet, a lucky charm to ward off evil. In response, Jeremiah simply pointed to the lessons of history. In the past, in the days of Samuel's youth, Israel had placed the same kind of faith in the ark of the covenant, the symbol of God's presence, instead of in the reality of God's presence. The result had been the destruction of Shiloh and the "exile" of the ark (Jer. 7:12–15; cf. 1 Sam. 4, esp. v. 22, which reads lit., "Glory has gone into exile from Israel, for the ark of God has been captured").

It was this same false perception of safety that Ezekiel's vision challenged. Two kinds of imagery dominate the opening vision of Ezekiel: images of motion and images of judgment. In contrast to Isaiah's static temple imagery, Ezekiel's vision is filled with movement. Whereas Isaiah saw the Lord seated in the temple, Ezekiel's vision opens with the Lord in the midst of a motion-filled "windstorm" (rûaḥ se ārā, Ezek. 1:4) in the land of the exiles. God is not dead or sleeping, nor is he restricted to the temple; on the contrary, he is living and active and on the move. The Lion of Judah is restless. In general, such a depiction of the Lord's coming to intervene in the lives of his people would be a positive development. However, in this case God's activity does not bode well for the temple or for Jerusalem. It is only a short step from Ezekiel 1, where the glory of God is in motion, to Ezekiel 10, where the glory abandons the temple, leaving it defenseless against the Babylonian invaders.

Movement dominates Ezekiel's description of the approach of a mighty windstorm. The windstorm itself is in motion, while the living creatures it contains not only have legs but wings as well. Torches are moving back and forth between the creatures (Ezek. 1:13), while alongside the creatures are various wheels, with each "wheel intersecting a wheel" (1:16). All of these wheels move together and stop together under the control of "the spirit of the living creatures" (rûaḥ haḥayyâ, 1:20). Everywhere the prophet looks, he sees bustling activity.

What is more, the activity has ominous import. Ezekiel's vision, however bizarre it may seem to us, draws on a number of traditional ancient Near Eastern elements. The imagery of the Lord riding on the storm, surrounded by fire and lightning, was a common way of describing the coming of the divine warrior (see Ps. 18:9–14; Nah. 1:3). The wheels of Ezekiel's vision represent a chariot, another typical aspect of the divine warrior image. Frequently, the image of God as a warrior was adopted by the prophets to speak of the Lord's coming to deliver his people. In this instance, however, it is significant that the windstorm is coming "out of the north" (Ezek. 1:4), the traditional source of Judah's foes. The divine warrior is here approaching to wage war against his own people, not to deliver them. The covenant-breaking people can find no comfort in the imminent personal arrival of their God.

The Lord's throne-chariot is supported by living creatures, which are instantly recognizable as cherubim from their role as throne-bearers (cf. Ps. 18:10) and indeed are explicitly identified as such in Ezekiel 10:1. These extraordinary winged creatures have nothing to do with the rosy-cheeked, naked infants of popular mythology. They have four faces each—that of a man, a lion (the highest wild animal), an ox (the highest domestic animal), and an eagle (the highest bird)—symbolizing the fact that they embody within themselves all of the highest attributes of living creation. Thus they are appropriately called "living creatures."

As well as being God's throne-bearers, the cherubim are the guardians of God's holiness, God's heavenly bodyguard. The threatening nature of their presence comes from their role as enforcers of divine judgment. Thus, when the man and the woman were thrown out of the Garden of Eden, cherubim were appointed to bar the way back into God's presence, preventing any intrusion of the profane into the realm of God's holiness (Gen. 3:24).

In fact, in many respects the events of Genesis form the backdrop for Ezekiel's vision. The mighty windstorm recalls not only creation, where the Spirit $(r\hat{u}a\dot{h})$ of God was hovering over the waters (Gen. 1:2), but also the Flood, where God sent a wind $(r\hat{u}a\dot{h})$ to dry up the floodwaters (8:1). The connection with these two pivotal events of protohistory is underlined as the chapter unfolds. We read about the living creatures (hayyôt; cf. Gen. 1:24, 28) and an awesome "expanse" (rāqîa'; Ezek. 1:25) over the cherubim, like that of Genesis 1:6. The aura of God's radiance is compared to a rainbow in the clouds on a rainy day (Ezek. 1:28), which evokes Genesis 9:13–16. These references set the tone of Ezekiel as an account of creation-uncreation-recreation, similar to that of the early chapters of Genesis. They invite the first readers of the book to compare their own experience of exile with Adam and Eve's banishment from the Garden of Eden and with Noah's endurance of the Flood.

While the emphasis of Ezekiel 1 is almost exclusively on the gathering clouds that threaten rain, yet the mention of the rainbow (v. 28) allows the possibility of a ray of hope even in the midst of the gloom. That hope does not deny the possibility of judgment, any more than the rainbow denies the possibility of rain. Indeed, without the rain there could be no rainbow! What the rainbow asserts is the faithfulness of God even in the midst of overwhelming judgment. It is a sign of God's self-commitment to his promise. God's judgment must fall on his rebellious people, yet because of commitment to his covenant he will not wipe them out. In the darkness of exile, God's covenant faithfulness, his ḥesed, was Israel's only hope. Thus the writer of Lamentations, without in the least diminishing the nature of the calamity that had befallen his people, could say: "Because of the LORD's great love (ḥasdê-yahweh) we are not consumed, for his compassions never fail. They are new every morning; great is your faithfulness" (Lam. 3:22–23).

But where can one flee from this impending judgment of God? The message of the vision is that flight is useless. The throne-chariot can proceed as easily to any of the four points of the compass, without even having to turn, symbolizing God's omnipresence (Ezek. 1:12, 17). The wheels are covered with eyes, symbolizing the omniscience of God. As the prophet Jonah had earlier discovered, when God stirs the storm there is literally no place to run and nowhere to hide. In the face of such an awesome, ominous appearing of God, it is small wonder that Ezekiel fell on his face (1:28). The certain, unavoidable judgment of God is a terrifying spectacle to behold.

CALL NARRATIVE. Ezekiel's prophecy opens with a typical "call narrative," outlining the details of his commissioning to be a prophet (Ezek. 1:1–3:15; cf., e.g., Jer. 1). The prophetic call narrative was an important part of every prophecy. On the one hand, it served to give legitimacy to the prophet's words, for he spoke not on his own account but as an ambassador sent by the Great King, the Lord himself. In it, the prophet gave details of how he had been singled out for the prophetic office. On the other hand, the call narrative often introduced the themes that the prophecy would encompass in greater detail, just as the overture to a symphony introduces in brief form the musical motifs that will form the basis for the work to follow.

Thus, Ezekiel's vision begins the process of communicating God's judgment to Israel. Again, as with the introductory verses of Ezekiel's prophecy, it is easy to get drowned in the details. It is possible to get caught up in the complexities of creatures with legs and faces and wings, of coals and torches and lightning, of wheels within wheels. Such overattention to details can easily lead to allegorical interpretation, in which meaning is read into the text rather than out from the text. Rather, we must see how Ezekiel's vision of movement and impending divine judgment has a challenge for our day.

The challenge for our day. (1) God is not tied to the old ways of doing things. Just as Ezekiel's contemporaries put their trust in the temple rather than in the God of the temple, so also in our day there are many who place their faith in the gifts of God rather than in the Giver. The complacency of such people, then and now, needs to be challenged. The true and living God is not a tame God. He cannot be comfortably manipulated into a box and made to do our bidding. If he were, he would hardly be worthy of following. God's radical freedom to be God, bound only by his own selfrevelation, means that his ways can never be reduced to a pat formula or a trite slogan. If his people abandon him, he may abandon them and fight against them. A lady reputedly asked Abraham Lincoln during the dark days of the Civil War if he was confident that God was on their side. "Madam," he is said to have replied, "I am less concerned whether God is on our side than whether we are on his side." No matter what our past history, we cannot assume God is on our side unless we are constantly and faithfully on his side.

(2) To those tempted to place their hope in fallible earthly institutions, a warning note of judgment needs to be sounded. God's presence in the midst of his people is not always good news, for he is a holy God who will judge evil. He is still the divine warrior, who comes to establish justice without favoritism or partiality. That is bad news indeed to those who are counting on a comfortable continuance of the status quo. But, paradoxically, at the same time God's coming in judgment is still viewed as good news in the Bible. He comes not merely to punish the wicked but to establish his kingdom, news that is good indeed to those whose hope is firmly placed in him. No matter how black the gathering clouds may be, those who trust in the Lord will live in the light of his covenant faithfulness.

This same note of the danger of impending judgment on the complacent is struck in the New Testament analogue of Ezekiel's opening vision—that of the apostle John on Patmos (Rev. 1:10–20). The allusions to Ezekiel 1 in Revelation 1 include the terrifying images of blazing fire and glowing bronze, a human figure surrounded by radiance, and the noise of rushing waters. Like Ezekiel, John falls down at the feet of the glorious revelation of God (1:17). He is then commissioned with a message for the seven churches of Asia Minor, which combines judgment to come on the unrepentant with hope for those who persevere.

God is not merely a distant observer of our struggle, for he walks in the midst of the seven lampstands (Rev. 2:1). What is more, he is no respecter of tradition when it becomes merely the dead heritage of the past. He will remove the lampstand from the midst of those who have forsaken their first love. Only living and active faith will overcome all the trials that face people and enter into life (see Rev. 2:5–7). But those who are seeking to serve the Lord in the midst of many trials can take comfort from the powerful presence of the Lord in their midst. God knows their deeds (2:2; 3:1, 8, 15), their hard work and perseverance (2:2, 19), their afflictions and poverty, the slanders ranged against them (2:9), and the unique problems of where they live (2:13). Nothing escapes his observation—and now he is ready to act!

Contemporary Significance

THE REALITY OF JUDGMENT. The message of judgment is indeed never popular to proclaim. Some contemporary churches have completely removed any mention of sin and its consequences from their messages, on the grounds that it turns people away. One pastor recently described the goal of his church's "seeker services" in the following terms: "In a nonthreatening atmosphere, the 'seekers' share a delightful, thought-provoking hour in which they are introduced to the person of Jesus Christ."12 It is doubtful that Ezekiel would have described his encounter with the living God as "a delightful, thought-provoking hour"; the reality of God's presence created, on the contrary, a threatening atmosphere. It is never comfortable for sinners to stand in the presence of an angry God. But in exile, when all that has meaning and value is torn away, people do not seek entertainment but reality; what they require is not so much to have their thoughts provoked as to have their hard questions answered. Perhaps this is one reason why we find the book of Ezekiel so hard to grasp today in our Western culture, with our delusions of adequacy. We are more used to reading the Bible as a kind of self-help manual, which provides ten top tips for cultivating the roses in our spiritual garden.

But the world through which we walk is not a safe place. It is a wilderness walk, in which every turn of the road brings into view new challenges and dangers. It is a world where things break down and fall apart, even for the best of people. It is a world marred by sin—your own sins and the sins of others. Without a recognition of sin and the curse that lies on our world because of sin (Gen. 3:16–19), the brokenness of life does not make any sense. You are left with the dilemma that either God is good but not powerful enough to avert life's disasters, or that God is not good. The Bible shows us a third possibility: God is both good and all-powerful, but because of human sin the world is under God's curse.

That does not mean that all bad things happen because of our individual sins. Jesus rejected that solution in John 9:3 when he asserted of the man born blind, "Neither this man nor his parents sinned . . . but this happened so that the work of God might be displayed in his life." But it does mean that we have to reckon with a God who is just and holy as well as loving and compassionate, who judges in wrath as well as graciously forgives.

This is the God with whom Israel has to deal, and his character has not changed over the intervening centuries. God continues to act in judgment on sin as well as to bring justice to the oppressed, even though only in a partial way in our present era. But into the situation of pain and anguish, of dislocation and alienation, even as it is revealed to be (in this case) the direct judgment of God's wrath, comes the trumpet sound of Ezekiel's prophecy: You are not alone. Surrounded by clouds that will bring a deluge on God's rebellious people, the rainbow still shines. God continues to reveal himself to his people in the exile that they merited for themselves. Indeed, in the situations of pain and anguish, the sound of his voice is often most clearly heard. We will not always like what he has to say, of course. His Word confronts us with our sin as well as comforts us with his grace. But the truly astonishing thing is that in spite of our sin, he still speaks to us and through us. There is no other word for that but grace.

The challenge to the church. But God's challenging Word comes not only to individuals but also to societies. The cities of Europe are filled with the great cathedrals and churches of past centuries, many of which are now empty. Some have been turned into mosques, others into restaurants or carpet showrooms, the symbols of a post-Christian society. Invariably, the way to such a post-Christian society lies through a contentment with the externals of religion, a society in which it is enough to have the form of godliness, while denying its power (2 Tim. 3:5). The church in Ephesus was warned that it had lost its first love and unless there was repentance, the church itself would cease to exist (Rev. 2:5). Coldness, if left untouched, leads to hardness and then deadness.

Yet this perilous condition may be present even while the externals are all in place; orthodox theology and activism in good works may continue long after love has grown cold (Rev. 2:2–4). Within a generation a similar fate could easily befall the churches of our cities. Only constant repentance and ever-renewed trust in the living God ensures continued life and usefulness for a church. We should therefore pray continually for the Spirit's life-giving power to be at work within our churches, lest our churches likewise become mere monuments to God's powerful work in the past.

There is no magic formula for measuring and maintaining the life of a church. The classic "marks of the church" formulated by the Reformers—the pure preaching of the Word and right celebration of the sacraments—certainly focus our attention on important issues, but they are both too broad and too narrow. They are too narrow insofar as they would refuse the name "church" to many gatherings of our true brothers and sisters in Christ. After all, those who practice paedo-baptism and those who practice adult baptism cannot both be celebrating the sacrament rightly, yet there are many bodies of true believers on both sides of the argument. And these marks are too broad since they dignify with the term church some institutions that may have a form of external orthodoxy, yet lack genuine life. Love of doctrine is not enough, not even the love of true doctrine.

The one clear mark of true discipleship that the Lord himself instituted is love for one another (John 13:35). This trait, though perhaps hard to define quantitatively, yet is surely possible to recognize when experienced. It is the external evidence of the internal reality of eternal life, or, to put it another way, it is the primary fruit of remaining in living connection with Jesus (15:9–17). Of course, where that living connection is present, the other aspects of the fruit of the Spirit's work in our hearts will not be lacking either (Gal. 5:22–26).

It is not merely a challenge to the complacent to remember that God is not tied to the past. It is good news for his people. God is living and active and constantly doing new things. Should the existing structures of the church grow moribund and useless, he can and does raise up for himself new organizations and denominations to achieve his purposes. The coldness and deadness of the eighteenth-century Church of England may have seemed unpromising soil for a potent movement of God's Spirit, yet God caused George Whitefield and John Wesley to spring out of it as powerful witnesses to the truth of his Word. The encouragement and challenge to our contemporary churches is that the living God will achieve his purposes—with or without us!

Given that truth, Christians need to adopt a balance between progressivism and traditionalism. On the one hand, not everything that is new is of God. Christians need to be discerning in their evaluation of movements and trends within the church, measuring all things against the yardstick of the Scriptures. On the other hand, neither is everything new automatically suspect. Our understanding of the Scriptures and how they are to be applied to our present times is constantly growing as new challenges drive us back to reread old passages and reevaluate the traditions we have received from our forefathers in the faith.

Like Abraham Lincoln, we need to be constantly posing ourselves the question in every situation, "Am I on the Lord's side?" As we do so, may the Spirit convict us of our sins and point us afresh to Christ, the divine warrior who bore the full weight of God's wrath for us, so that we may experience the full light of his presence without being consumed.

Ezekiel 2:1–3:15

HE SAID TO ME, "Son of man, stand up on your feet and I will speak to you." ²As he spoke, the Spirit came into me and raised me to my feet, and I heard him speaking to me.

³He said: "Son of man, I am sending you to the Israelites, to a rebellious nation that has rebelled against me; they and their fathers have been in revolt against me to this very day. ⁴The people to whom I am sending you are obstinate and stubborn. Say to them, 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says.' 5And whether they listen or fail to listen—for they are a rebellious house—they will know that a prophet has been among them. ⁶And you, son of man, do not be afraid of them or their words. Do not be afraid, though briers and thorns are all around you and you live among scorpions. Do not be afraid of what they say or terrified by them, though they are a rebellious house. You must speak my words to them, whether they listen or fail to listen, for they are rebellious. ⁸But you, son of man, listen to what I say to you. Do not rebel like that rebellious house; open your mouth and eat what I give you."

⁹Then I looked, and I saw a hand stretched out to me. In it was a scroll, ¹⁰which he unrolled before me. On both sides of it were written words of lament and mourning and woe.

^{3:1}And he said to me, "Son of man, eat what is before you, eat this scroll; then go and speak to the house of Israel." ²So I opened my mouth, and he gave me the scroll to eat.

³Then he said to me, "Son of man, eat this scroll I am giving you and fill your stomach with it." So I ate it, and it tasted as sweet as honey in my mouth.

⁴He then said to me: "Son of man, go now to the house of Israel and speak my words to them. ⁵You are not being sent to a people of obscure speech and difficult language, but to the house of Israel—⁶not to many peoples of obscure speech and difficult language, whose words you cannot understand. Surely if I had sent you to them, they would have listened to you. ⁷But the house of Israel is not willing to listen to you because they are not willing to listen to me, for the whole house of Israel is hardened and obstinate. ⁸But I will make you as unyielding and hardened as they are. ⁹I will make your forehead like the hardest stone, harder than flint. Do not be afraid of them or terrified by them, though they are a rebellious house."

¹⁰And he said to me, "Son of man, listen carefully and take to heart all the words I speak to you. ¹¹Go now to your countrymen in exile and speak to them. Say to them, 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says,' whether they listen or fail to listen."

12Then the Spirit lifted me up, and I heard behind me a loud rumbling sound—May the glory of the LORD be praised in his dwelling place!—¹³the sound of the wings of the living creatures brushing against each other and the sound of the wheels beside them, a loud rumbling sound. ¹⁴The Spirit then lifted me up and took me away, and I went in bitterness and in the anger of my spirit, with the strong hand of the LORD upon me. ¹⁵I came to the exiles who lived at Tel Abib near the Kebar River. And there, where they were living, I sat among them for seven days—overwhelmed.

Throughout history, mystics have sought to experience visions of God. They have often gone to great lengths in their pursuit of this ultimate experience, subjecting their bodies to innumerable hardships in order to attain to a great spiritual "high." They have traveled to the ends of the earth and undergone fastings, lack of sleep, isolation, self-denial, and self-flagellation in search of contact with the Divine. In contrast, God comes to Ezekiel entirely unsought and reveals himself to the prophet not for the sake of giving him the quiet time to end all quiet times but rather to commission him for a task and to entrust to him a message. The message that Ezekiel is to proclaim is not his own, but God's; for that reason, only God can empower him and authorize him to deliver it. On the most basic level, therefore, the call vision and commissioning serve to authenticate Ezekiel's ministry, both to himself and to his audience.

But in addition to that general authentication, the manner of the prophet's calling also speaks to his hearers of the task to which the prophet has been called. In Ezekiel's case, that task will not be an easy one. He has not been sent to the Gentiles, with whom the only problem in communicating his message would have been linguistic (Ezek. 3:4–6). Had he been sent to them, they would surely have listened, even though their speech was obscure and their language difficult (lit., "a people deep of lip and heavy of tongue," 3:5). Being a Wycliffe Bible translator would have been a straightforward assignment in comparison to what Ezekiel has been called to do.

Instead, Ezekiel is being sent to the Israelites, who are a "rebellious nation" (gôyim hammôredîm; Ezek. 2:3). Notice how the traditional language of election has been reversed here, so that the Gentiles have become 'am (a "people") while Israel has become gôyim ("nations"). The chosen nation has become, appropriate to their own action, unchosen. The depth of Israel's alienation from God further emerges in 3:11, where Ezekiel is sent to "your countrymen in exile." God is not willing to call them "my people," a sure sign of disaster to come. Nor is this state a temporary aberration on the part of this present generation but rather a continuation of a long history of disobedience. They are simply the "sons of Israel" (benê yis rā'ēl, 2:3), a term that brings out the hereditary nature of their rebelliousness: They are true children to their rebellious parents (2:3–4).

The essence of the people's transgression lies in their rebellion, that is, their refusal to recognize God's sovereignty over them. In that attitude they have hardened themselves, externally and internally, becoming "obstinate" and "stubborn" (Ezek. 2:4). Though language will not be a barrier, they will not listen to Ezekiel because they are not willing to listen to the One who sent him (3:7). If responsiveness is to be the measure of success, Ezekiel's mission is declared a failure before it even begins. But Ezekiel's mission will be judged by another standard, for even though the people will not listen to his words, yet "they will know that a prophet has been among them" (2:5). That is, when the predicted disasters befall Israel, they will recognize that God had previously warned them of what was about to happen.

The prophet himself is to provide an alternative model of behavior. Unlike Israel he is to listen to what the Lord says to him and not to rebel as they do (Ezek. 2:8). Throughout the vision, Ezekiel is the very picture of compliant obedience to the Word of God. When he comes face-to-face with the glory of God, he falls face down in humble submission (1:28); he is not obstinate in God's presence. When God speaks, he listens; when he is commanded to stand, he rises to his feet (2:1–2). However, this obedience comes not because of some special measure of holiness intrinsic to Ezekiel but because of an infusion of divine Spirit (rûaḥ; 2:2). The entry of the Spirit not only raises him to his feet but enables him to hear God's speech (2:2). God not only hands the scroll to Ezekiel, he causes him to eat it (3:2). He is the One who will strengthen Ezekiel to make him as tough as his opponents. When the vision and commissioning are over, the Spirit lifts Ezekiel up and deposits him among the exiles again, where he sits motionless. Without God's power, Ezekiel literally can do nothing.

This depiction of Ezekiel as the model of Spirit-infused submission suggests that there is more than one dimension to the Lord's characteristic address to Ezekiel as ben-'ādām, usually translated "son of man." This expression occurs over ninety times in Ezekiel, compared to a mere fourteen times in the rest of the Old Testament. As has often been recognized, this form of address sharply distinguishes Ezekiel from the Sovereign God and the divine beings of chapter 1; ben-'ādām marks him out as a mere mortal.⁶

But this expression may perhaps also mark him out from all of his contemporaries. They are the "sons of Israel" (benê yis rā'ēl, 2:3), the true descendants of the one whose nature was to strive with God (Gen. 32:28); Ezekiel, on the other hand, is literally designated "the son of Adam." Just as the first Adam received the breath of life from God (Gen. 2:7), so Ezekiel as "son of Adam" receives an infusion of divine Spirit (rûaḥ), which raises him, as it were, to renewed "life" by enabling him to obey. This unusual form of address may thus be an aspect of the creation theme we saw in Ezekiel 1. This re-creation theme emerges more clearly in the related passage in Ezekiel 37, where the coming of the Spirit (rûaḥ) into the skeletons brings new life to the dry bones, but what happens later for the community happens first of all here to the prophet. Ezekiel himself is to be the founding member of a new community, empowered by the infusion of the divine Spirit to a life of radical obedience.

Like the first Adam, Ezekiel faces a test of obedience that revolves around the idea of eating, though in his case he is to eat whatever the Lord commands him to (Ezek. 2:8) rather than to abstain from eating what the Lord prohibits. In another reversal of the original sin, what Ezekiel is given to eat is anything but "good for food and pleasing to the eye, and also desirable for gaining wisdom" (Gen. 3:6); rather, it is a scroll covered on both sides with words of lament and mourning and woe (Ezek. 2:10). But though its appearance is unattractive, to the obedient eater it tasted "as sweet as honey" (3:3). Ezekiel's obedient consumption of the scroll is his only activity in an otherwise completely passive vision. By it, he is equipped as God's messenger to go and speak the unpalatable truth to his fellow exiles.

Yet the vision ends on what appears at first sight to be a discordant note in 3:14–15. The prophet who has been called, empowered, and equipped is found sitting down, overwhelmed, filled with feelings of anger. These verses underline, however, the dual nature of the prophet's task. On the one hand, he remains under "the strong hand of the LORD" and therefore begins to feel the feelings that the Lord has toward the people—feelings of wrath and anger (3:14). On the other hand, he sits among the exiles, living where they live, and thus sees the effects of God's wrath from the other side: the forthcoming overwhelming devastation of his people (3:15).

Ezekiel's proclamation is not delivered from the safety and comfort of an ivory tower but flows out of personal experience of the suffering of his people. Indeed, it may not be too strong to say that he has already ingested their suffering, in the form of the scroll covered with words of lament, mourning, and woe, just as in the temple ritual the priests would ingest the sin offering and thus absolve the guilt of the people. But in the absence of the temple, there is no sacrifice to take away the guilt of the people, only a scroll that records it. In the meantime, these feelings of wrath and desolation must remain inside the prophet until the Lord opens his lips and gives him the words to say (3:16).

Bridging Contexts

THE SPIRIT IN the old and new eras. In what ways is our task as messengers of the gospel similar to and different from that assigned to Ezekiel? In some ways, as New Testament Christians we live in a different era. The role of the Holy Spirit in particular changes radically from the Old Testament period to that of the New. In the Old Testament the Spirit is given to specific people to accomplish specific tasks, especially the ability to speak God's word to his people. The hope and expectation of a universal outpouring of the Spirit was there throughout the Old Testament, but it remained something for the future (Joel 2:28–29). In the New Testament era, however, the promise is fulfilled. The Spirit has been poured out on all of God's people, young and old, male and female, influential and insignificant alike, commissioning and equipping them for the prophetic task (see Acts 2). Thus, we now live in the age of "the prophethood of all believers."

In the book of Acts, a prominent theme is the fact that the coming of the Holy Spirit gives believers power to witness about Jesus Christ. As was the case for the prophet Ezekiel, the major impediment in that task is not merely linguistic (though the Holy Spirit deals with that problem as well in Acts 2:4!). It is the fact that we are trying to communicate the gospel to people who are "dead in . . . transgressions and sins" (Eph. 2:1). What people need is not simply new information but new life. The essence of human sin continues to be rebellion against God's sovereignty, a state in which people desire to suppress the truth about God (Rom. 1:18).

Whereas Ezekiel was called to bring this message to Israel, God's chosen people, we bring the message to the Gentiles as well. They too, though once "far away," now have access to the Father by the same Spirit that Israel does, as Paul reminds us in Ephesians 2:17–18. The process of bringing that gospel to the nations is often a painful one, however. God continues to use as his messengers not the strong but the weak, placing his treasure in clay pots to show that strength really belongs to him (2 Cor. 4:7). Like Ezekiel, we need to fall on our faces in God's presence, recognizing that we have no strength, no gifts, nothing that we can contribute to the task, and pleading with him to fill us with his Spirit so that we can be faithful servants. Like Ezekiel, we must be willing to die to ourselves and to our desires and comfort to be useful to God. As Paul puts it in 2 Corinthians 4:5, hitting both themes of weakness and self-denial: "We do not preach ourselves, but Jesus Christ as Lord, and ourselves as your servants for Jesus' sake."

The Son of Man. That ministry is ours because in the meantime the final "Son of Man" has come, Jesus Christ himself. He is The Human One in fullness, just as Ezekiel was a "mere human" in contrast to the exalted title used for God, "Sovereign LORD." But Jesus is also the heavenly Christ, the "one like a son of man"—picking up on the majestic imagery of Daniel 7, an exalted, regal figure (see Rev. 1:13). These two aspects seem at first sight incongruous, even contradictory. Yet that is why it was such a perfect title for Jesus to adopt for his incongruous mission. In his earthly ministry, it is the "mere humanity" aspect that is prominent. In Eugene Peterson's words, "this Son of Man has dinner with a prostitute, stops off for lunch with a tax-collector, wastes time blessing children when there were Roman legions to be chased from the land, heals unimportant losers and ignores high-achieving Pharisees and influential Sadducees." Ultimately, he hangs pierced and bleeding on a cross. He dies, the most human and radically undivine of acts.

But his majesty, while veiled, is still present in his earthly ministry. He teaches as one with authority, he speaks of possessing a kingdom. Both aspects are present because Jesus is son of man and Son of Man, very man and very God, taking on our humanity and combining it with undiminished deity. For the first disciples the lesson necessarily focused on his humanity because they had to learn that salvation comes not through the advent of a triumphal heavenly figure bearing a sword, blasting his opponents with fire from heaven, as James and John thought (Luke 9:54). Rather, it came through the advent of a baby in a manger, who grew up to bear a crown of thorns and a cross. The "son of man" had come not (as you might expect from Dan. 7) to be served but to serve and give his life as a ransom for many (Mark 10:45).

But for the hearers of the book of Revelation, the lesson is reversed. The return of our Lord will not be the same as his first advent. Christ is not eternally suffering on the cross, but will return (as the Son of Man!) in glory on the clouds, bearing a sword to blast his opponents with fire from heaven. James and John were not entirely wrong, they just had their advents confused; they mixed up the son of man and the Son of Man. The answer to both is "the son of man"—first in his state of humiliation and second in his state of exaltation; as the ancient liturgy puts it: "Christ has died, Christ is risen, Christ will come again."

The human Christ of the crucifix, the son of man in his state of humiliation, is not all there is. According to Revelation 1, even now in his state of exaltation, the heavenly, exalted, glorious Christ rules and reigns. But he reigns in the middle of the seven golden lampstands, which are later identified as the seven churches. It may seem a strange location for the Glorious One, in the midst of seven small, undistinguished churches, tarnished by sin and weakness. Yet where else should we expect to see the One whose nursery was a cowshed and whose coronation ceremony took place on a cross? He is there in the midst of real, ordinary communities of faith—not idealized, sanitized versions—and he is there dressed in priestly garb, with kingly accouterments and the power of the prophetic word. He is there as prophet, priest, and king, on behalf of his people.

Jesus is also the Second Adam, who by his obedience undoes the effects of the first Adam's fall (Rom. 5:19; 1 Cor. 15:44–49). He is the one on whom the Spirit rested in fullness of power and through whom the Spirit is poured out on the church, to create the new community of his people. Jesus does not need to swallow the Word of God; he is himself the Word of God, the manifestation of the divine glory (John 1:14). He is the One who came to earth to preach good news to the poor (Luke 4:18); he is also the One who will return to earth to tread the winepress of the fury of the wrath of God Almighty (Rev. 19:15).

The imagery of scroll-swallowing reappears in Revelation 10, where the apostle John is told to eat a scroll that will turn his stomach sour, though, as with Ezekiel, it had been sweet in his mouth. The ingested Word of God will provide him with the material to prophesy about many peoples, nations, languages, and kings (10:11); however, bearing such testimony is frequently a bittersweet experience, as the fate of the two witnesses in Revelation 11 indicates. To some, the message of the gospel is the aroma of life, sweeter than honey, while to others it is the aroma of death, to be opposed and destroyed (2 Cor. 2:16).

Contemporary Significance

CONTEMPORARY EVANGELISM. What do the models of Jesus and Ezekiel tell us about our efforts in evangelism and missions? In the first place, surely they challenge the common notion in the church that "bigger is always better." There is a lot of pressure from many quarters in our times to measure success in terms of numbers. Whether it is evangelistic crusades that speak of thousands of "decisions for Christ" or popular books that suggest that adopting certain methodologies will inevitably bring church growth, the "bigger is better" philosophy reigns in much of the contemporary church.

In support of this doctrine, the biblical image of the harvest is pressed into service. It is asserted on the one hand that the faithful Christian will inevitably be the fruitful Christian, seeing many people brought to Christ, and on the other hand that fruitfulness should determine strategy, so that the maximum number of harvesters are sent to where the fruit is ripe. On this approach, the primary goal of missions and evangelism is to see the world come to Christ.

The call of Ezekiel (and of some of the other prophets) should challenge this simplistic assumption. He is specifically called and sent to a people who have been unresponsive in the past and will be unresponsive in the future. Not only that, but God tells the prophet that if he had sent him to the Gentiles, a far greater response to his preaching would have occurred. The faithfulness of this man's ministry cannot be measured in numerical terms. The primary goal of his ministry is not to see people converted but to bring glory to God by preaching (and modeling) the message he has been given. As John Calvin put it: "When God wishes to move us to obey him, he does not always promise us a happy outcome to our labor; but sometimes he wants to test our obedience to the point that he will have us be content with his command, even if people ridicule our efforts."¹⁶

That is not to say that we should adopt a kind of reverse psychology, whereby we assert that we must certainly be faithful if no one is being reached by our message! We must labor to the utmost of our ability to remove any stumbling block that stands in the way of communicating the gospel, becoming "all things to all men so that by all possible means [we] might save some" (1 Cor. 9:22). Yet we do so recognizing that a work of the Holy Spirit is necessary in the hearts of men and women if they are to become Christians, a work that is the sovereign prerogative of God to impart. At times, God opens the hearts of men and women to himself through the most unlikely of messengers, such as Jonah's concise and not exactly heartfelt preaching to the Ninevites (Jonah 3:4), while at other times the eloquent pleading of God's messengers falls on deaf ears.

This truth should be both a comfort and a challenge to us in our evangelism. On the one hand, sharing the gospel is far easier than we think. God is not limited by the weakness of my efforts; he can, if he chooses, save in spite of my incompetence. As one person put it, passing on the good news is simply a matter of one beggar telling another where to find bread. That should motivate us to witness boldly for Christ wherever we go. On the other hand, however, sharing the gospel is far harder than we think. Even the most brilliant performance on my part may still fail to convince my hearers, not because they are dense but because they are still "dead in . . . transgressions and sins" (Eph. 2:1). That should motivate us to pray far more passionately than we do for those around us—and around the world—who are not Christians.

The missionary task of the church. This perspective should also challenge much of our thinking on the missionary task of the church. Were those pioneer missionaries who died within days or weeks of arriving on the mission field wasting their lives, because they saw no one converted? Are those who today labor for many years in the difficult areas of the Middle East or Japan, while seeing only a handful of converts, operating in the wrong place? If the primary goal of missions is to see the world converted, then the answer to both questions is yes. But if the primary goal of missions is the same as the goal set before Ezekiel—faithfulness to the task to which one has been called, no matter what the consequences, so that God may be glorified—then the answer is different. In biblical perspective, reaching the world is only the secondary goal of missions, behind the primary goal of bringing glory to God through faithful obedience.¹⁷

We are, after all, followers of the Son of Man, who came to his own and his own did not receive him (John 1:11). Yet to all those who did receive him, and to all those who will receive him through our proclamation, he gives the right to become children of God (1:12). In this obedient mission, he brings glory to the Father's name (12:27–29).

In order to carry through such a ministry where there is little success in the eyes of the world, a strong sense of calling is essential. Why should we preach the gospel to those who stubbornly refuse to hear? Because God has called and sent us, and he has the right as our Sovereign King to use us as he sees fit. He is not only the One who calls us to the task and strengthens us for it; ultimately he alone is the One whom we are seeking to please. Thus, in Isaiah 49, when the Servant of the Lord struggled with the idea, "I have labored to no purpose; I have spent my strength in vain and for nothing," his reply to himself was, "Yet what is due me is in the LORD's hand, and my reward is with my God" (49:4). The Puritan William Greenhill comments:

Sometimes God gives large encouragement, promises, hope, success, providing for our infirmities; at other times a bare commission and command must suffice to do that which would make one's heart ache: it is his prerogative to send whom he will, and upon what service he will.¹⁸

The role of the Spirit. Moreover, to fulfill that service we must be people of the Spirit and people of the book. Ezekiel could not even stand up without the Spirit's empowerment, yet we frequently feel able to preach sermons, counsel the struggling, comfort the dying, and equip the saints for ministry in our own strength—or at least we act as if we do. When we neglect to pray in order to get out and do, we are proclaiming a practical theology of self-reliance, whatever our theological formulations may be. It is striking that seminaries typically have few courses teaching future ministers of the gospel about prayer compared to those instructing them how to preach or how to witness. Is it any wonder, then, that we frequently turn out pastors who have not learned how to wait patiently upon the Lord and to seek his Spirit's power?

Such pastors, in turn, naturally preach more sermons to their congregations on the importance of witnessing than they do on the centrality of prayer. The result is that our churches are frequently intensely busy places, but the busyness is ours, not Christ's. Christians need to remember that they are founding members of the new Spirit-filled community—or, more precisely, that Christ, the new Adam, is the founding member into whose community the Spirit builds us. This means that our greatest need is not for us to be more active but for the Spirit to be more active in and through us.

Yet that Spirit does not come to draw attention to himself. The Spirit's work is always to bring Christ to bear on a person's life (cf. John 16:15). That is why Christians are always people of the book. They are those who have ingested the Word of God in its written form, from which comes their message for the world. That is why our pastors, like the first apostles, need to be freed up from other responsibilities, such as waiting on tables (and serving on committees?), so that they can devote themselves to the ministry of the Word and to prayer (Acts 6). The world may listen—or it may not. It is the Spirit's prerogative to open and close the doors to the hearts of men and women. But wherever they go, God's people are witnesses to the truth about God, revealed in his Word and declared in the power of the Spirit.

Ezekiel 3:16–27

At the end of seven days the word of the LORD came to me: ¹⁷"Son of man, I have made you a watchman for the house of Israel; so hear the word I speak and give them warning from me. ¹⁸When I say to a wicked man, 'You will surely die,' and you do not warn him or speak out to dissuade him from his evil ways in order to save his life, that wicked man will die for his sin, and I will hold you accountable for his blood. ¹⁹But if you do warn the wicked man and he does not turn from his wickedness or from his evil ways, he will die for his sin; but you will have saved yourself.

²⁰"Again, when a righteous man turns from his righteousness and does evil, and I put a stumbling block before him, he will die. Since you did not warn him, he will die for his sin. The righteous things he did will not be remembered, and I will hold you accountable for his blood. ²¹But if you do warn the righteous man not to sin and he does not sin, he will surely live because he took warning, and you will have saved yourself."

²²The hand of the LORD was upon me there, and he said to me, "Get up and go out to the plain, and there I will speak to you." ²³So I got up and went out to the plain. And the glory of the LORD was standing there, like the glory I had seen by the Kebar River, and I fell facedown.

²⁴Then the Spirit came into me and raised me to my feet. He spoke to me and said: "Go, shut yourself inside your house. ²⁵And you, son of man, they will tie with ropes; you will be bound so that you cannot go out among the people. ²⁶I will make your tongue stick to the roof of your mouth so that you will be silent and unable to rebuke them, though they are a rebellious house. ²⁷But when I speak to you, I will open your mouth and you shall say to them, 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says.' Whoever will listen let him listen, and whoever will refuse let him refuse; for they are a rebellious house."

Original Meaning

At the END of Ezekiel's seven-day waiting period (3:16), the prophet receives a further communication from God. His prophetic commissioning continues in two sections. The first outlines his responsibility as a "watchman for the house of Israel" (3:17–21), while the second unfolds further the limitations that his calling will place on him as he becomes, literally, the mouthpiece of God (3:24–27). The intervening reprise of the vision of chapter 1 in 3:22–23 ties these two sections together with the opening call vision, a link underlined by the common themes of "the hand of the LORD" (3:22; cf. 3:14), the appearance of "the glory of the LORD" (3:23; cf. 1:28), and the Spirit's setting Ezekiel on his feet.

The idea of the prophet as a "watchman" is a familiar one in the Old Testament (see Isa. 56:10; Jer. 6:17; Hos. 9:8). A watchman was someone appointed as a lookout to provide the people with advance warning of the coming of an enemy so that they could run to shelter (Ezek. 33:2–3). It was the Old Testament equivalent of the Second World War's "Air Raid Warden," the person who sounded the alarm as bombers approached so that the people could flee to the safety of the shelters. In this case, the "enemy" of whom the people have to beware is none other than God himself!

By giving Ezekiel the revelation of chapter 1, where as we saw, the Lord is depicted as the divine warrior coming from the north to judge his people, Ezekiel has been shown the reality of judgment to come. That vision was not given to him for his own personal edification but in order to share it with others. His mission is a matter of life or death. To those who heed his warning of judgment, it will be a message of life; to those who refuse him, it will be a message of death. In either case, his responsibility is the same: to sound the warning note clearly so that he discharges his own obligation. Otherwise, he too will share in the judgment.

The focus of the present passage is not so much on the change that may be wrought in individuals who hear his message, but on the responsibility laid on Ezekiel to preach to all, regardless of their response. The situations proposed ("When I say to a wicked man 'You will surely die . . .'"; "When a righteous man turns from his righteousness and does evil . . .") are purely hypothetical: Ezekiel is not thereby commissioned to the pastoral care of individual souls.² Rather, the two classes of people, the "wicked" and the "righteous," are all-encompassing. Just as a watchman has to shout his message of danger to everyone in the city, so also Ezekiel must address his message of judgment to all, whether righteous or wicked, and whether they listen or fail to listen (cf. Ezek. 2:7).³ Thus, 3:17–21 does not expand the scope of Ezekiel's ministry beyond what is already required of him in 2:7, where the Lord told him: "You must speak my words to them, whether they listen or fail to listen, for they are rebellious." What it does is set before him clearly the consequences of any failure to fulfill his responsibilities.

For each class of hearers, righteous or wicked, there are the same two potential outcomes to Ezekiel's preaching: Either they hear and respond and live, or they ignore Ezekiel's message and perish. Those who respond faithfully to his proclamation will "live," a term describing not merely physical life but rather the fullness of relationship with the Sovereign Lord that flows from obedience. Death, on the other hand, means estrangement from both God and the covenant community. To be cut off from God's people is to be "dead," even while physically still alive, for one is separated from the source of life. Indeed, cut off from the Promised Land and the temple, many of the exiles presumed themselves to be effectively "dead" (cf. 37:12).

However, in the message given to Ezekiel the wicked are not closed out from life by their present status; there is still time to hear the word of the prophet and turn and live. Similarly, the righteous cannot presume on their status. They too must listen to the word of the prophet in order to live. In other words, what marks the righteous out from the wicked, what marks out those who "live" from those who "die," is the fact that they listen to the word of the Lord through the prophet and respond to it. The wicked are wicked precisely because they do not change their ways in response to the prophetic message, whereas the righteous heed the warning and receive life.

Here again, as in Ezekiel 2, Ezekiel himself is the model of what he prophesies. For whether he himself lives or dies depends on his "righteousness"—his faithfulness to the commission he has received. If he obeys the word of the Lord to him and proclaims his warning, then he will live. If he disobeys and fails to give a warning, then the blood of those whom he failed to warn will be required at his hand—in other words, he too will die.⁵ Ezekiel's commission is thus an equivalent test for this "son of Adam" to the tree of the knowledge of good and evil for the first Adam (Gen. 2:17). Having swallowed the scroll—for unlike the first Adam, Ezekiel is commanded to eat—Ezekiel is able to speak God's word, which distinguishes between good and evil. If he is faithful in his submissive obedience, he will himself live and will bring the possibility of life to those who hear and obey the message that comes through him. But if he fails, he and his hearers "will surely die" (Ezek. 3:18; cf. Gen. 2:17).

The depth of the prophet's self-emptying becomes apparent in Ezek. 3:24–27. Once again, he is confronted with a vision of God's glory, similar to what he saw before, in response to which he falls to the ground. When he is placed on his feet by an infusion of the divine Spirit, Ezekiel is ordered to remain confined to his house and told that he will be dumb (3:24–26). The completeness of his captivity is underlined by the three different pronouns used in verses 24–26. The prophet is told, "Go, shut yourself inside your house. And you, son of man, they will tie with ropes. . . . I will make your tongue stick to the roof of your mouth." Had his isolation been self-inflicted, he could have ended it when he chose; had it been inflicted by others, he could perhaps have escaped. But since it is placed on him by himself, by others, and by God, there is no escape.

The nature of the prophet's isolation will be twofold: He is to be confined to his house and he will lose his power of free speech. He is God's prisoner, a situation vividly depicted by the ropes that bind him.⁷ Even his tongue is God's prisoner, bound to the roof of his mouth, except when God frees it to speak his oracles.⁸ His dumbness is not total; he is still able to warn of the danger to come, as he has been commissioned to do in 3:17–21. But his speech is totally restricted to the reproduction of God's words of judgment—the words of lament, warning, and woe inscribed on the scroll he has swallowed.⁹

This restriction on the prophet's speech will make him unable to function as a mediator ('iš môkîaḥ, 3:26; NIV, "to rebuke"; lit., "an arbitrating man") for the house of Israel.¹⁰ He may not intercede for the people, nor may he seek the Lord on the people's behalf. The time for appeals for mercy is past; the appeals process is exhausted. The prophet's role, at least up until the fall of Jerusalem, is restricted to the delivery of the divine sentence of judgment: "This is what the Sovereign LORD says." Whoever has ears to hear, let them hear those words (3:27).

Bridging Contexts

WE ARE USED to thinking of the offices of priest and prophet in the neat and tidy categories of systematic theology. Thus, Louis Berkhof is expressing a widely held view when he states: "The prophet was appointed to be God's representative with the people, to be His messenger and to interpret His will. . . . The priest, on the other hand, was man's representative with God."

In our society, when we think of a "prophetic figure," we think of a wild-eyed man, delivering a message from God in thundering tones regardless of how it is received. In fact, both offices normally had a two-way function. The priest, just as much as the prophet, was the interpreter and teacher of God's will, while the prophet, just as much as the priest, was the representative of the people, interceding with God on their behalf.¹² Because Ezekiel's ministry fits our preconceptions of what a prophetic ministry "ought" to look like, we may fail to see how unusually restricted he is in his prophetic calling. Further, just as not everyone is called to be a prophet, so not every prophet is called to exercise his ministry in the way Ezekiel did. That means that we will have to be careful in universalizing the principles of Ezekiel's calling.

On the other hand, the very strangeness of Ezekiel's behavior tends to make it difficult for us to bridge the gap. Not a few people have sought, if not to tie Ezekiel up with ropes, at least to place a straightjacket on him, arguing that he suffered from dangerous psychoses. Placed on the psychiatrist's couch, Ezekiel is then analyzed and diagnosed as having suffered extreme problems in his relationship with his mother, probably in addition to serious childhood sexual abuse.¹³ To those without a relationship with the living God, the idea of someone giving oneself over completely to become God's slave will inevitably seem nonsensical or abhorrent, the sign of certain mental disorder.

Yet though Ezekiel's obedience required of him harder and stranger tasks than those who preceded him, his basic orientation was simply that expressed by the prophet Isaiah: "Here am I. Send me!" (Isa. 6:8). Similarly, the apostle Paul persisted in his calling to ministry to the Gentiles in spite of the catalog of hardships he faced (2 Cor. 6:4–10) and the settled conviction from the Holy Spirit that this would always be the way of ministry for him (Acts 20:23). Though his life was dogged by "a thorn in [my] flesh" (2 Cor. 12:7), he had the confidence to pour out his life in the service of God, assured that no matter what happened to him, the gospel was not chained (2 Tim. 2:9). Such total self-sacrifice in the cause of the gospel is undoubtedly rare in our day and age and might well be considered a sign of mental imbalance by psychoanalysts, but we are all the poorer for its absence.

But why is the prophet thus constrained? On the one hand, his bonds bind him even more closely to the exiles, for whom "bondage" was a typical image of their fate (Isa. 49:9; 61:1). On the other hand, it serves as a real restriction on his proclamation. He may not go where he wishes to go or speak what he wishes to speak. There is no room in his life for any spirit of independence or for any involvement with lesser tasks. He is entirely shut up to his fate as God's mouthpiece, proclaiming as a watchman the warning of impending judgment, but unable in any way to avert it.

Contemporary Significance

Our CALLING. Recently, as my wife and I were driving along the highway, we saw a hand-made road-side sign that read, "Repent, the end is nigh!" Our first thought was to wonder if there was some unseen road hazard ahead into which we were about to run! Perhaps around the corner the road simply ran off the edge of a cliff! That slogan has been so overused as the butt of jokes that it is hard, even for us as Christians, to take its message seriously. It seems old-fashioned and out of date. Nowadays, we are far more likely to say to people whom we wish to reach for Christ: "God loves you and has a wonderful plan for your life," or, "Do you know for sure that you are going to heaven when you die?" We like to focus on the "good news" aspect of the gospel.

Yet Ezekiel's calling, at least during the first part of his ministry, is to be the bringer of bad news, the news of impending judgment. The people need to know that God's patience with them is running out and the ax is about to fall. So great is God's determination to judge their sin that Ezekiel is not even allowed to act as mediator between God and Israel, seeking to bring the two parties together. Though it may have seemed for generations that God's mercy and his love towards Israel was such that he would never judge them, now that the sentence has been pronounced it will fall so swiftly and terribly that it may seem as if God will never again be merciful. Ezekiel would certainly have agreed with the writer to the Hebrews when he wrote, "It is a dreadful thing to fall into the hands of the living God" (Heb. 10:31). In order that the people may know that this is not just a random event but the bringing of the covenant curses on his rebellious people, God calls Ezekiel to be his prophet and to act as watchman for the people.

We said above that not all are called to fulfill the distinctive kind of prophetic ministry to which Ezekiel was called; yet as Christians, we too have a calling from God. According to Paul, we share in the work of reconciliation that God is doing in the world: "We are therefore Christ's ambassadors, as though God were making his appeal through us" (2 Cor. 5:20). We are God's messengers, just as the Old Testament prophets were, taking God's Word to the world. The Spirit of God that inspired the prophets now indwells us; only instead of swallowing a scroll, as Ezekiel did, we imbibe a book, the Bible, through whose pages God continues to speak to his people and to the world. This is the message we have been given to communicate and to which we are confined. Though we may be creative in the way we communicate the message, we are not free to be creative in the content of the message that we are to deliver.

God's message to the world. God's message to the world contains both good news and bad news. Naturally, we prefer to tell people good news. After all, which job would you prefer: to be the one who goes around telling people they have won millions in the lottery, or the bailiff who goes around telling the bankrupt person he is here to take away one's possessions?

The first challenge that this passage presents to you and me, then, is to present a balanced picture of who God is and who we are in relation to God. We must tell people that by nature, we are in rebellion against God and objects of his wrath (Eph. 2:3); we are darkened in our minds, separated from the life of God and hardened in our hearts (4:18), sinners deserving eternal death (Rom. 6:23). Indeed, the bad news of the Bible is far worse than the average person believes. Forget the problems of global warming and the world economy; left to ourselves we face the certainty of eternal judgment. The bailiff is at the door, waiting to strip God's rebellious subjects of even the few possessions they have and drive the unrepentant out into outer darkness.

But the good news of the gospel is also far better than the average person believes. Some churches have spent so much time proclaiming hellfire and damnation that they never got around to the positive message of the gospel. God loved the world so much that he stepped into the midst of our rebellion to bring about reconciliation. By his great love and rich mercy, he has intervened on our behalf in Jesus Christ, transferring us out of the family of the evil one and into the family of God. Jesus went to the cross to make our bad news his, and the good news concerning him ours. Through his death he not only paid off the debts that would have forced our bankruptcy, but he also endowed us with all spiritual riches through his perfect life. The gospel is thus both good news and bad news for the world, and we are called to proclaim both clearly.

We are also called to bring the news to everyone, without distinction. Ezekiel was not to seek out a congenial audience of the righteous, who might be expected to give his message a fair hearing. He was to proclaim it to righteous and wicked alike and to let God sort them out. The watchman must proclaim his message to everyone, without distinction. Like the sower in the parable of the soils (Matt. 13:1–23), Ezekiel was to scatter his seed all over the field.

Here too there is a challenge to you and me. We tend to sort our friends and family into "likely prospects" and "hard cases," focusing our efforts on those who we think are most likely to listen. But who are you to say that one person is more likely to listen than another? The Bible is full of "hard cases" who have come to faith in Christ, like the apostle Paul, formerly the great persecutor of the church. Equally, it records the cases of those who are "not far from the kingdom," like the rich young ruler (Matt. 19:16–22), who turn and walk away. Thus, our calling as watchmen is not to engage in endless soil analysis so that we can deliver the gospel with pinpoint accuracy to those who we think are ready to receive it. Rather, we are to be faithful shouters of the Word, proclaiming the good news and bad news faithfully into the lives of all those around us.

Suggestions for ministry in our day. To my mind this is one of the advantages of what may be considered the rather old-fashioned practice of taking the gospel from door-to-door in the neighborhood of the church. Almost no other form of witnessing enables you to meet such a complete cross section of the community who live next door to you. Not everyone, of course, will appreciate your efforts: To those being saved the gospel is the aroma of life, while to those who are perishing it is the stench of death (2 Cor. 2:15–16). The four kinds of soil that receive the seed in the parable of the sower display the differences of their nature by their responses. The result of the sower's sowing is not that the whole field bursts into fruitfulness, but that the good soil bears fruit. As with Ezekiel, some will hear your message gladly and turn and live; others will fail to hear your message and consequently will die. But at least they will never be able to claim that no one loved them enough to tell them about Jesus.

For the preacher, this kind of door-to-door witness has the added advantage of bringing you face-to-face with real people and their real objections to the gospel. In consequence, if you are willing to listen to what these men and women tell you of their struggles, you will not be so likely to waste your sermons answering objections with which no one wrestles. Instead, you will have a store of real-life questions to answer from the Scriptures in a way that rings true to people in the pew, who are frequently far more in tune with their non-Christian neighbors than their pastors are.

The perseverance of the saints. Moreover, the good soil continues to bear fruit. The distinction between the righteous and wicked, between good soil and bad soil, is not a matter of past history but of inward response to the Word. It doesn't make any difference whether you have lived a notorious life of sin or have been a pillar of the Sunday school all your days; what counts to God is your response to his Word. Do you receive the gospel, turning away from your sins and trusting in what Jesus has done for you on the cross as your only hope in life and death? Do you accept fully the bad news, that you are indeed a sinner, by nature a rebel against God, deserving of eternal judgment? Do you delight in God's righteousness and holiness, which is too pure to coexist with sin? Do you see the good news of the gospel not only as a good idea in general, but personally good news for you? Is your present trust not in any goodness of your own, but solely in the righteous life and atoning death of Jesus as your substitute? That is the key test of whether you are a Christian.

Nor can we make premature assessments of where others stand. It is possible for the seemingly righteous to fall and the defiantly wicked to repent, just as it is possible for the seed that sprang up quickly to wither through the absence of depth of soil or being choked by thorns. In high school, I helped lead a Christian club with two other young men, both of whom seemed at the time far more committed in their love for the Lord than I. One of them is now a pillar in his church, still passionately devoted to following the Lord; the other has not, to my knowledge, darkened the door of a church in years. To be righteous in the Old Testament means to be in right relationship with God; this is not something that can be stored up for a rainy day, but must be a constantly renewed reality. Thus the biblical doctrine of the perseverance of the saints is not a kind of cosmic ski lift, which once you are seated carries you all the way to your destination without effort. Rather, it is the truth that those who are indeed saints will actually persevere.

God's preservation of the saints. The reverse side of that doctrine is its partner, the preservation of the saints. This encourages believers that what counts in our persevering is not our weak grip on our heavenly Father, but his strong grasp on us. This twofold combination of human responsibility and divine assurance is brought out clearly in 2 Timothy 2:19. There Paul, having mentioned the apostasy of Hymenaeus and Philetus, concludes: "God's solid foundation stands firm, sealed with this inscription: 'The Lord knows those who are his,' and, 'Everyone who confesses the name of the Lord must turn away from wickedness.' " So the saints are those who persevere to the end, but they do so because of God's preservation.

This is good news for the weak sinners that we are. As I write this, I am shortly to go to a church where I will meet with an elder, a man I love and respect, who has abandoned his family and gone off with another woman. He knows that what he has done is wrong, but does not seem to know whether it can be put right. The good news of the preservation of the saints is that even those who have made shipwreck of their faith can be rescued and brought safely home to their heavenly Father. The Lord knows those who are his, and even in their attempts to flee from him, they cannot escape his loving embrace. I hope to be able to tell this man that those whom God loves, he will not let go.

But to be such a channel of God's good and bad news is often a costly, self-denying business. If you say to God, "Here am I, send me," frequently he will! Sometimes, God sends his children to be his witnesses in uncomfortable situations—whether halfway around the world, to preach to villagers in Irian Jaya, or round the corner, to speak God's word in the jungles of corporate America. Such total yieldedness to God will often be regarded as certifiably foolish, or perhaps even worse, by a world that does not know God, especially when there seems little fruit to show for the sacrifice. But who is really the one being unwise? Jim Elliot, who met his death at the hands of the Auca Indians with whom he had planned to share the gospel, once wrote in his journal: "He is no fool who gives up what he cannot keep to gain that which he cannot lose." ¹⁶

Our example in all of this is the self-sacrifice of Jesus Christ. Was Ezekiel confined to his house? Jesus was "despised and rejected by men, a man of sorrows, and familiar with suffering" (Isa. 53:3). Was Ezekiel made dumb? Jesus was "led like a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep before her shearers is silent, so he did not open his mouth" (Isa. 53:7). Was Ezekiel bound with ropes? Jesus was nailed to the cross and suffered there not for any transgressions of his own but for ours. The shackles of death designed for our wrists were placed on his. Thus has the greater "Son of Man" fulfilled the ministry of the earlier "son of man," giving us the good news of the gospel, which is the antidote to the bad news of our natural state. What price, then, can be too great for us to play our part in the great work of the triune God, bringing to himself a harvest of men and women from every tribe, nation, and language group, that they too might receive eternal life in Christ Jesus?

Now, son of Man, take a clay tablet, put it in front of you and draw the city of Jerusalem on it. ²Then lay siege to it: Erect siege works against it, build a ramp up to it, set up camps against it and put battering rams around it. ³Then take an iron pan, place it as an iron wall between you and the city and turn your face toward it. It will be under siege, and you shall besiege it. This will be a sign to the house of Israel.

⁴"Then lie on your left side and put the sin of the house of Israel upon yourself. You are to bear their sin for the number of days you lie on your side. ⁵I have assigned you the same number of days as the years of their sin. So for 390 days you will bear the sin of the house of Israel.

⁶"After you have finished this, lie down again, this time on your right side, and bear the sin of the house of Judah. I have assigned you 40 days, a day for each year. ⁷Turn your face toward the siege of Jerusalem and with bared arm prophesy against her. ⁸I will tie you up with ropes so that you cannot turn from one side to the other until you have finished the days of your siege.

9"Take wheat and barley, beans and lentils, millet and spelt; put them in a storage jar and use them to make bread for yourself. You are to eat it during the 390 days you lie on your side. ¹⁰Weigh out twenty shekels of food to eat each day and eat it at set times. ¹¹Also measure out a sixth of a hin of water and drink it at set times. ¹²Eat the food as you would a barley cake; bake it in the sight of the people, using human excrement for fuel." ¹³The LORD said, "In this way the people of Israel will eat defiled food among the nations where I will drive them."

¹⁴Then I said, "Not so, Sovereign LORD! I have never defiled myself. From my youth until now I have never eaten anything found dead or torn by wild animals. No unclean meat has ever entered my mouth."

¹⁵"Very well," he said, "I will let you bake your bread over cow manure instead of human excrement."

¹⁶He then said to me: "Son of man, I will cut off the supply of food in Jerusalem. The people will eat rationed food in anxiety and drink rationed water in despair, ¹⁷for food and water will be scarce. They will be appalled at the sight of each other and will waste away because of their sin.

Original Meaning

IN EZEKIEL 1–3, we saw how the prophet was called and commissioned to bring a message to his people. There were hints throughout that the message, when it came, would not be good news. The Lord appeared in the form of the divine warrior, ready to deliver judgment, and he came from the north, like Israel's traditional enemies. In the face of this impending danger, Ezekiel was appointed as a watchman, to cry out a warning of the wrath to come. But just how bad is the bad news? The full extent of the bad news begins to become clear in the first message Ezekiel is given to deliver to the exiles (chs. 4–5), which is made up of a series of related symbolic actions, or "sign-acts," along with their explanation.

The first of Ezekiel's sign-acts symbolizes the siege of the city of Jerusalem and the reason for it. He is to take a clay brick (perhaps the size of one or two sheets of standard 8–1/2" x 11" paper), and draw on it a map or picture of Jerusalem. Having created this visual model, he was to "lay siege to it" (4:1–2). The extent of the depiction of the siege with its accompanying siege works, ramps, army camps, and battering rams seems to have a deliberate element of overkill in it; clearly this was no halfhearted effort but the extension of the entire might of the Babylonian army to crush errant Jerusalem.

Yet something more is at work in the onslaught than Babylonian imperialism. In Ezekiel's depiction, the invisible aggressor who stands behind the Babylonians becomes visible. Acting the part of the Lord, Ezekiel is to set up a large iron plate between himself and the city (4:3), symbolizing the cutting off of relationships between God and his people. There is now no channel by which the people can communicate with God, even if they wanted to do so.²

In the previous chapter, the prophet had been told that he would not be able to act as an intercessor for the people; the appeals process had been exhausted. This is now visually depicted. The prophet is told to "turn [his] face toward" Jerusalem (4:3), adopting an implacable attitude toward it. The iron wall and Ezekiel's expression communicate God's abandonment of the city (cf. chs. 8–11), and the dual agency of destruction (human and divine) emerges in 4:3: "It will be under siege, and you shall besiege it." The catastrophe will not simply be an event of human history ("It will be under siege") but specifically the result of direct divine action ("You [i.e., the prophet, representing the Lord] shall besiege it"). By his pantomime, Ezekiel is to make the invisible aggressor visible.

At this point the sign changes to a new, though related figure, in which the prophet shifts into the role of siege victim. This sign-act is more complex than the previous one, not so much in terms of the act described, which is straightforward enough,3 but of interpretation. The prophet is instructed to lie first on his left side for 390 days, "bear[ing] the sin [tis's'ā' 'et-'awonām] of the house of Israel," then to lie on his right side for forty days, "bear[ing] the sin of the house of Judah" (4:4–6). While in a prone position, he is to continue to prophesy against Jerusalem (4:7), and he is to subsist on siege rations (4:9–17). The latter is a near-starvation diet, a mere eight ounces per day of an unpalatable mixture of grains and legumes, along with two-thirds quart of water (4:9-11). According to Moshe Greenberg, the strange mixture symbolizes a situation where the scarcity was such that no one kind of grain was plentiful enough on its own to make a whole loaf. He also records an interesting experiment carried out in the third century A.D. that apparently demonstrated that even a dog would not eat Ezekiel's bread!4

Not only were the rations small and unappetizing, Ezekiel was further instructed (at first) to prepare them by baking them over human excrement, a way that would have rendered him ceremonially unclean—representing the unclean food that the Israelites would eat in exile. This would be particularly abhorrent to a priest like Ezekiel. However, in response to Ezekiel's protest, the Lord permitted the prophet to substitute animal dung as the fuel.

What are we to make of this strange activity? There are several interconnected exegetical difficulties here. (1) Who is intended by "the house of Israel" and the "house of Judah"? In the context of the remainder of the Old Testament, one thinks immediately of the northern and southern kingdoms of Israel and Judah, which split apart during the reign of Rehoboam. Is that their meaning here? (2) What does it mean for the prophet to "bear their sin" (nās'ā' 'awōnām)? This can mean either "bear their guilt"—as the priests were said to "bear the iniquity" of Israel and thus atone for them (cf. Ex. 28:38; Lev. 10:17)—or it can mean "undergo punishment" (as in Num. 14:33, where Israel must "suffer for [their] unfaithfulness" [lit., "bear your punishment"] for forty years). (3) Finally, what is the significance of the time periods, 390 days and forty days respectively, which are said to represent periods of years?

In answer to the first question, though Ezekiel can speak of the northern and southern kingdoms in terms of "Israel" and "Judah" (see, e.g., Ezek. 37), this is not his normal practice. Moreover, if we adopt this approach, we run into insuperable difficulties when we attempt to interpret the time periods. Rather, for Ezekiel the "house of Israel" is the whole covenant people of God, and their sins are centered in the Jerusalem temple, the heart of the southern kingdom. Their 390-year history of sin, pictured by the prophet's 390-day prostration on his left side, stretches back in time to around the construction of the first temple. Likewise, the "house of Judah" appears here to be a designation for the community of the exiles in Ezekiel.

When we combine this approach with the dual significance of the phrase "bear their sin," the following interpretation emerges: Ezekiel is to lie on his left side for 390 days, representing 390 years, bearing the guilt of the entire covenant community of Israel. The iniquity of the community is placed on him (4:4). During this period he symbolizes Israel's long history of accumulated sin, which culminates in the siege and fall of Jerusalem, concretely depicted by eating siege rations throughout the 390 days (4:9). Then during the period of forty days, he represents the punishment of the Exile, which he depicts in terms of the symbolic figure of forty years. Just as Israel's ancestors in the desert were a lost generation, spending forty years in the desert for their sin (Num. 14:34), so the exilic generation is condemned to a similar fate for the nation's long history of sin. 10

It is clear that Ezekiel's "bearing sin" for the people has no substitutionary purpose. The siege and destruction of Jerusalem are not averted by his sufferings. Thus, throughout his period of prostration he is to continue prophesying against Jerusalem with bared forearm and set face (Ezek. 4:7). The purpose of his action is to illustrate the accumulation of the people's sin rather than to be effective in removing that sin. In this respect, his action is comparable to the whole Old Testament sacrificial system, which, according to the writer to the Hebrews, could not effectively remove sin (Heb. 10:1–11), but rather served as "an illustration for the present time" (9:9). By this means, Ezekiel is to communicate graphically to the people the weight of the accumulated burden of their history of sin as the cause for the impending conflagration of Jerusalem and the exile of the people in a land not their own. The punishment for that sin is coming upon them with full force, no matter what the optimistic false prophets may be saying (Jer. 6:14; 8:11).

But, as with the opening vision, at the end of the judgment a glimmer of hope surfaces. Though the tunnel may be long and dark, there is a tiny light at its end. For the total number of days of the sign-act is 430, a number that parallels Israel's years of sojourn in Egypt (Ex. 12:40). Judgment must come, a judgment that effectively wipes out the entire present generation, just as the desert generation was wiped out. Yet by depicting the total period of sin and judgment in terms of a renewed Egyptian bondage, the prophet invites the hope, even the certainty, that at the end of the appointed time of punishment there will be a new exodus and a new entry into the land." Forty years may be a long time—a lifetime—for Ezekiel's hearers. But God's abandonment of his people is not forever. The rainbow continues to shine through the gathering gloom.

Ezekiel's diet during this period has a twofold aspect: As indicated above, the rations are small and poor quality, symbolizing the siege diet of the people of Jerusalem. Moreover, Ezekiel is instructed to cook them in a ceremonially unclean way, symbolizing the defiled food that the Israelites will eat in exile (Ezek. 4:13). By this means, the twofold message of judgment is proclaimed on all Israel, both those who remain in Jerusalem and those who are in exile. Yet another aspect emerges, however, as the prophet protests the divine decree in verse 14. Ezekiel asserts that he has never consumed anything defiled, and the decree is promptly emended by the Lord to allow the prophet to maintain his ceremonial purity. Ezekiel thus stands as a picture of a righteous remnant: Though he is in exile, living among the nations just as the people of Israel will do, he nonetheless has managed to maintain his purity. Though the majority of the people may eat defiled food, through the grace of God and their commitment to him others will not.

Bridging Contexts

SIGN-ACTS OF the prophets. One of the great difficulties for the contemporary reader of Ezekiel is the outlandish nature of his behavior. We are uncomfortable with extreme commitments to religious beliefs, identifying those as typical of the "cults." If one of our relatives were to behave similarly to Ezekiel under the influence of his or her religious beliefs, we would probably seek some means of "deprogramming" that person. The recent mass suicide of about thirty members of the "Heaven's Gate" cult, who believed that there was an alien space ship concealed behind the Hale-Bopp comet waiting to take them up to "the next level," illustrates the presence of such cults within our society. But the problem with the Heaven's Gate cult was not, as many seem to suppose, the irrationality of their belief that there is something more to existence than this life. Rather, the problem was that what they believed was not true.

Of course, we should not make the mistake of thinking that Ezekiel's behavior was considered normal in his society either. By their standards too, his behavior was distinctly odd. But, unlike us, they would not have found it hard to believe that someone should be so taken up by the message he had received from God that it became the sole determining reality in his life. "Sign-acts" were a regular part of the way prophets went about their business.

Many of the prophets were instructed by God to perform dramatic actions to accompany their verbal messages. These ranged in content from simple sermon illustrations, such as when Jeremiah publicly smashed a clay jar to depict the coming destruction of Jerusalem (Jer. 19:1–13), to more complex acted-out parables, such as when the unnamed man of God pretended to be a soldier who had abused his trust by failing to guard a prisoner committed to his care (1 Kings 20:35–43).

It has been pointed out that there are basically two possible motivations for such actions: the belief that they have an influence on future events through the process of "sympathetic magic," and the desire to provide a dramatic visual aid to increase the impact of the message. These are, of course, not mutually exclusive motivations. However, since the words of the true prophet were nothing less than the word of the Lord and thus certain of coming true (Deut. 18:22), it is not clear how symbolic actions could have been perceived as having any greater power on events than the prophet's word.

Moreover, the essentially public nature of the symbolic acts of the prophets (whether that public was the general populace or a select group of disciples), along with the importance attached to an interpretation of the sign-act, suggest that the second motivation was more significant. "Sympathetic magic" would do its work ex opere operato, regardless of the presence or absence of an audience, but communication only takes place where an audience is present. Word and action support one another to create effective communication. As Leslie Allen comments: "If actions speak louder than words, here they were a megaphone for the prophetic words." 15

The language of "visual aid" is altogether too weak, however. Ezekiel's sign-acts are not diagrams on overhead projector slides with which he helps the slow-witted capture a difficult theological idea. They are "affective aids," aimed not at people's eyes but at their hearts and wills, the seat of their "affections." They are designed not merely to help people see the truth, but to feel the truth. In the same way as the sacraments are not merely visual aids to the gospel but are "signs and seals of the covenant of grace," so also the sign-acts are given not so much to clarify the message of the prophet as to drive it home to the people's hearts.

Ezekiel's communication style. Why, though, should the presence of sign-acts be "particularly characteristic of Ezekiel"? Why, out of all the prophets, should he have been required to act out his message so frequently? Perhaps it is due to the especially difficult communication task that faced this prophet. Up until the fall of Jerusalem, he had to preach a message of that city's destruction to a people who believed it inviolable; after its fall, he had to communicate a vision of hope to a people tempted to despair. To a people well supplied with prophets telling them what they wanted to hear, Ezekiel had to say what God wanted them to hear, a task likened to being surrounded by briers and thorns and sitting on scorpions (Ezek. 2:6).

To get his message across, Ezekiel adopted some extreme measures at the Lord's command, including the performance of an unusually large number of sign-acts, which not only reinforced the content of his message but also underlined the extent of his self-commitment to the message.¹⁹ One might think of similarities to the Civil Rights movement in the 1960s in the United States. Speeches were all very well, but dramatic actions such as boycotting the buses or breaking the rules against eating at "all-white" lunch counters had more impact on the unconverted. They were much harder to ignore.

Ezekiel's communication style was as unique as his situation. He had swallowed the word of God, and now that message "took flesh" before the eyes of the exiles in the visible form of the acted-out scene of judgment on Jerusalem. No one could doubt his commitment to communicate that message, even though it would fall on deaf ears. The form of communication was ideal for a potentially hostile audience: a graphic, "inyour-face" message that would not easily be forgotten.

Contemporary Significance

VISUAL AIDS FOR the contemporary church. How do we communicate the message of God's wrath to a lost and dying world, a message that sinners would much rather suppress than hear? How, in our day and age, do we "make the invisible aggressor visible," as Ezekiel was called to do? In the past, people used vivid word pictures. Older preachers worked to portray in technicolor vocabulary and dramatic word pictures the pains of hell and the horror of sinners swept away unheedingly into the awful void. Thus, George Whitefield once depicted the sinner as being like an aged and blind beggar. This old man was being led by a little dog on a leash and was feeling his way along by tapping the ground in front of him with a cane. Gradually and unwittingly, he approached a yawning chasm; as he got nearer it, he first lost the dog's leash, then dropped his cane, and as he stepped forward to retrieve it his foot found only empty air. At that point in the depiction, we are told that Lord Chesterfield leapt to his feet shouting out, "He's gone! He's gone!" In this case, the message had been effectively communicated.

But word pictures have their limitations in an increasingly visual age. The impact of television and video technology has transformed our time from a "word-centered" to an "image-centered" society.²¹ In such a visual age, many churches are experimenting with the use of drama and other visual aids in their worship services in a desire to communicate to modern people. Frequently, the prophetic sign-acts are cited as biblical justification for this approach. Is this a justified comparison?

Certainly, there are points of contact. Well-executed drama has an affective function, touching emotions not easily reached by words while stimulating and holding interest.²² It communicates to an indifferent audience more powerfully than words alone, which is why drama is particularly valued by "seeker-sensitive churches." Yet we should not fail to see the differences between the prophetic sign-acts and contemporary dramas. The prophetic sign-acts were more than mere visual aids or attention-getting devices. They were delivered with divine authority and thus functioned as the divine word made visible and sure. In Ezekiel's case, the message took over the messenger in a life-dominating way.

The ultimate sign-act. The real significance of the prophetic sign-acts emerges when we ask the question, "How did God communicate his wrath and his love to a lost and dying world?" He did so through the ultimate prophetic sign-act of the Incarnation, whereby the Word became flesh and dwelt among us, not to act out a ten-minute dramatic sketch but to live in our midst for thirty-three years. God did not merely put on human costume, he became a human being. The culmination of Jesus' earthly ministry was the profound sign-act of the cross, where God's wrath and mercy met. There that wrath was visibly depicted as the Sinless One was abandoned by God the Father. Just as Jerusalem was once abandoned by God because of her sins, so also Jesus was abandoned by God because of his people's sins. Jesus was not playacting when he cried out, "My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?" (Matt. 27:46).

Unlike Ezekiel, however, Jesus was genuinely doing away with the accumulated guilt of his people as their substitute, which meant enduring the turning away of the Father's face. No wonder the sky grew dark and the earth shook! There on the cross was also depicted the love of God, whose passion for sinners was such that he would rather die than let them go. In the words we know so well that we frequently forget their awesome profundity, "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life" (John 3:16, KJV).

The cross is an "in-your-face" message of God's love and his wrath, his justice and his grace. That is why the message of the crucified Christ is a stumbling block and foolishness to many (1 Cor. 1:23). It refuses to trivialize sin, insisting that only the death of the Son of God was sufficient to atone for it. It refuses to compromise with our cozy delusions of adequacy, whereby we fondly imagine that our best efforts will be enough to satisfy the demands of God's holy law. It refuses to flatter our religious pride that demands a complicated scheme of salvation that allows us to earn our way to heaven.

Moreover, in the sacraments we perform dramatic reenactments of God's once-and-for-all sign-act. We are baptized into his death, visibly passing through the waters—a sign that assures us that if by faith we are crucified with Christ and if his death was for our sin, then we will certainly also be raised with him. We receive the broken bread, just as his body was broken for us, and the poured out wine, just as his blood was poured out for us, which remind and assure us that the efficacious sacrifice was made for us personally.²³ In liturgical churches, this personal aspect of the Lord's Supper is underlined by the repetition of the sentence, "The body of Christ broken for you; the blood of Christ shed for you." These sacraments are given not simply to feed our senses, as if the preached word by itself were insufficient; rather, they are given to minister to our affections, to drive home to our hearts the reality of our salvation in Christ, the message that has been preached to us.

In but not of the world. But the cross is not simply something that has been borne for us, it is also something that we are called on to bear (Matt. 10:38). God's "wonderful plan for your life" may easily involve suffering or even martyrdom for the sake of Jesus. Like Ezekiel, we are to be totally taken up by the message with which we have been entrusted. Many people will find our behavior odd in consequence, as we seek to remain pure in a world that is not our home. We are called to be "Puritans" in the best sense of the word, living in a compromised world as those whose lives are uncompromisingly committed to obedience to God's Word and "perfecting holiness out of reverence for God" (2 Cor. 7:1). Our very lives are letters to the world from Christ, inscribed by his Spirit (3:3).

At the same time as our lives may be too pure for the taste of those outside the kingdom, we are not to be so separate from sinners in our desire for holiness that we fail to share the gospel with them. In the New Testament, the apostle Peter had a similar vision to Ezekiel's, in which he too was commanded to eat unclean food (Acts 10:13). His response echoed that of Ezekiel: "Surely not, Lord! . . . I have never eaten anything impure or unclean" (10:14). But unlike Ezekiel, he is instructed not to call impure that which God has made clean (10:15). This vision, so important to the book of Acts that it is related three times,²⁴ forms the theological basis for the mission to the Gentiles. The old laws of cleanliness, with their emphasis on separation from that which was unclean, had now been transformed on the basis of the new revelation in Jesus. As a result, the doors of the kingdom are now thrown open to "unclean sinners" and Gentiles alike, through faith in Christ.

In obedience to this vision, we are not to build walls to keep the prostitute and the drug addict out of our churches, nor are we to treat those who come into the kingdom with a checkered sexual or marital history as second-class citizens. These too, if they have washed their robes in the blood of the Lamb, are declared by God as clean (cf. 1 Cor. 6:11). Like Jesus and Ezekiel, we are called to lives of identified purity, living in the world but not of it, loving every one of our neighbors even while living radically different lives from them.

Now, son of Man, take a sharp sword and use it as a barber's razor to shave your head and your beard. Then take a set of scales and divide up the hair. ²When the days of your siege come to an end, burn a third of the hair with fire inside the city. Take a third and strike it with the sword all around the city. And scatter a third to the wind. For I will pursue them with drawn sword. ³But take a few strands of hair and tuck them away in the folds of your garment. ⁴Again, take a few of these and throw them into the fire and burn them up. A fire will spread from there to the whole house of Israel.

5"This is what the Sovereign LORD says: This is Jerusalem, which I have set in the center of the nations, with countries all around her. ⁶Yet in her wickedness she has rebelled against my laws and decrees more than the nations and countries around her. She has rejected my laws and has not followed my decrees.

7"Therefore this is what the Sovereign LORD says: You have been more unruly than the nations around you and have not followed my decrees or kept my laws. You have not even conformed to the standards of the nations around you.

8"Therefore this is what the Sovereign LORD says: I myself am against you, Jerusalem, and I will inflict punishment on you in the sight of the nations. Because of all your detestable idols, I will do to you what I have never done before and will never do again. Therefore in your midst fathers will eat their children, and children will eat their fathers. I will inflict punishment on you and will scatter all your survivors to the winds. Therefore as surely as I live, declares the Sovereign LORD, because you have defiled my sanctuary with all your vile images and detestable practices, I myself will withdraw my favor; I will not look on you with pity or spare you. ¹²A third of your people will die of the plague or perish by famine inside you; a third will fall by the sword outside your walls; and a third I will scatter to the winds and pursue with drawn sword.

13"Then my anger will cease and my wrath against them will subside, and I will be avenged. And when I have spent my wrath upon them, they will know that I the LORD have spoken in my zeal.

14"I will make you a ruin and a reproach among the nations around you, in the sight of all who pass by. ¹⁵You will be a reproach and a taunt, a warning and an object of horror to the nations around you when I inflict punishment on you in anger and in wrath and with stinging rebuke. I the LORD have spoken. ¹⁶When I shoot at you with my deadly and destructive arrows of famine, I will shoot to destroy you. I will bring more and more famine upon you and cut off your supply of food. ¹⁷I will send famine and wild beasts against you, and they will leave you childless. Plague and bloodshed will sweep through you, and I will bring the sword against you. I the LORD have spoken."

Original Meaning

THE IMAGE OF RELENTLESS judgment that we saw in Ezekiel 4 reemerges at the beginning of chapter 5. Here Ezekiel is called upon to shave his head and his beard, a sign of humiliation (cf. 2 Sam. 10:4). The instrument of this humiliation is described as both a "sharp sword" and a "barber's razor" (ta'ar haggallābîm). The first term serves to link this image with what precedes and what follows, underlining the military nature of the coming disaster, while the latter term shows that what God calls Ezekiel to do is to act out in concrete form the imagery of Isaiah 7:20. In that passage, the prophet spoke of the Lord hiring a razor (ta'ar) from beyond the river (i.e., from the region on the east of the Euphrates) to shave the head, beard, and feet of Israel. Here Ezekiel records the arrival of the razor to do its work on the prophet, representing the people.

The prophet's hair itself becomes the medium for the last sign-act of the prophet in this sequence. Using a set of scales, he is to divide it carefully into three parts, representing the different fates that will meet the inhabitants of Jerusalem (Ezek. 5:2–4). God's judgment is not delivered in a haphazard fashion but is meticulously measured. Some of the hair is to be burned with fire, symbolizing those who die in the city; some he is to strike with the sword all around the city, symbolizing those who die outside the city; the remainder he is to scatter to the winds, symbolizing those in exile. A few of this last group he is to gather up and store in the apparent safety of a fold of his garment, which acted like a pocket. But even there they are not free from danger, for he is to take some of those hairs from their refuge and throw them back into the fire.

The interpretation of these last two signs is given in Ezekiel 5:5–17. The thoroughness of the devastation needs little clarification; that much was clear from the original sign. However, the reason for the devastation becomes clearer: Israel has transgressed her covenant relationship with God. The language Ezekiel adopts in these verses is not his own creation but is largely borrowed from Leviticus 26, a chapter that lays out the blessings and curses attached to the covenant. There covenant obedience is defined in terms of submission to the Lord alone, specifically through the avoidance of idolatry and respect for the Lord's sanctuary (Lev. 26:1–2). This matches the nature of the charge made against Israel in Ezekiel 5: They have committed idolatry and thus defiled the sanctuary (Ezek. 5:9, 11). More generally, they have not followed the Lord's decrees or kept his laws (5:6; cf. Lev. 26:14–15).

As a result, the curses of Leviticus 26 will be operative in their midst. The Lord's face will be set against them (Lev. 26:17). The result will be plagues of wild animals (Lev. 26:22; Ezek. 5:17), the sword and pestilence (Lev. 26:25; Ezek. 5:17), famine through a cutting off of the food supply (Lev. 26:26; Ezek. 5:16), eating of one's own children (Lev. 26:29; Ezek. 5:10), being scattered among the nations, and being pursued by the sword (Lev. 26:33; Ezek. 5:12). This threatened exile will be a consequence of the iniquities of that generation and their fathers (Lev. 26:39; cf. Ezek. 4:5).

Even the Jerusalem-centered focus of the judgment reflects on an aspect of Israel's covenant relationship with her Lord, this time related to the Lord's covenant with David. When the Lord established that covenant, Jerusalem became, in his eyes, "the center of the nations" (Ezek. 5:5). When he chose Mount Zion as the site for the temple, that city was designated the dwelling place for his name (Deut. 12:11). Thereby, the Lord staked his name particularly on the land of Canaan, on the people of Israel, whom he had established there, and on the Davidic house. But the Lord's immediate presence, the crowning blessing of the covenant relationship, is no blessing to a rebellious people but rather a curse. For the Lord who is there is no longer with them but against them.

This covenant context is important because it demonstrates that the judgment that will befall Jerusalem is neither arbitrary nor unfair. The judgments coming on that city are not random afflictions thought up on the spur of the moment, as if God has lost his temper; they are the execution of the curses on the covenant breakers. Indeed, Israel has not merely failed to live up to God's standards; they have not even lived up to the standards of the nations around them (Ezek. 5:7). Instead of being a light to the nations, they have led the nations further into the darkness. For this reason, God must act to judge. As in Deuteronomy 13:9, where Israelites were forbidden to show compassion toward even their nearest and dearest or to spare them if they were attempting to lead others into apostasy, so the Lord will not show pity or spare his beloved but rebellious people (Ezek. 5:11).

The focus of each of the sign-acts is on the gloom rather than the rainbow, the tunnel rather than the light. Yet each contains within it, hidden away yet nonetheless present, the possibility of hope. The final sign-act is no different, for recalling the covenant curses of Leviticus 26 should also lead to remembering the promise of 26:44–45:

Yet in spite of this, when they are in the land of their enemies, I will not reject them or abhor them so as to destroy them completely, breaking my covenant with them. I am the LORD their God. But for their sake I will remember the covenant with their ancestors whom

I brought out of Egypt in the sight of the nations to be their God. I am the LORD.

Both Leviticus 26 and Ezekiel 5 hold out the hope that the Lord's anger will reach an end before Israel will. Yes, God's anger and wrath must be poured out on Israel so that they may know the Lord as a jealous God (Ezek. 5:13; cf. Ex. 20:5), a God who will not share the devotion of his people with another. For now, they will be a ruin and reproach in the sight of the nations (Ezek. 5:14). But God's anger will cease and his wrath will subside once it has been fully vented (5:13), for the Lord is merciful and gracious as well as jealous (Ex. 34:6, 14). To put it more precisely, God has covenanted himself to his people and has made a commitment he will not break, even though his people are unfaithful (Lev. 26:44). The purpose of this present chastisement, therefore, is not to destroy them utterly and forever but in order that the Lord may once again amaze the nations by accomplishing a new exodus of his people.

Bridging Contexts

THE SUZERAINTY TREATY. The idea of the relationship between God and his people as a covenant is central to the Old Testament, and it is a key idea underlying Ezekiel 5. As already indicated, the judgments coming on Jerusalem are not random afflictions but curses attached to the covenant between Israel and her God. In the ancient Near East there were different kinds of covenants, but one of the forms most commonly compared with biblical covenants is the suzerainty treaty, known from Hittite sources.⁷

This type of treaty was a kind of diplomatic surrender document, whereby a great king (the suzerain) agreed to enter into a relationship with a lesser king (the vassal). In return for the protection and benefits of a good relationship with the suzerain, the vassal king agreed to submit to the suzerain, to serve him alone, and to pay tribute to him. A vassal could only have one suzerain, though a suzerain might have many vassals, who would have obligations to respect the rights of the other vassals as well as the suzerain. At the end of these treaty documents, there were attached blessings and curses, which invoked the power of the only higher authority in international politics, the gods. In the absence of any appeal to a United Nations, the gods formed the ultimate sanction and were called upon to deliver blessings if the vassal king was faithful and curses if he broke the terms of the covenant.

Like these Hittite treaty documents, the Lord's covenant established with Israel on Mount Sinai concluded with blessings and curses (Lev. 26). If the people were faithful in obeying the stipulations of the covenant, they would experience material blessings in their land of peace and prosperity, culminating in the crowning blessing of the Lord's dwelling in their midst (26:11). But if they were disobedient to the terms and conditions of the covenant, serving other gods and rejecting their true suzerain, then they and their land would experience curses, culminating in the crowning curse of exile from God's land (26:33–39).

Ezekiel's point in picking up the language of Leviticus 26 is that because of Israel's unfaithfulness in her relationship to the Lord, pursuing other gods and serving them instead of the true God, all of the curses of the covenant are now falling on her. God's jealousy, power, and faithfulness to his Word are good news as long as Israel is faithful to him; but when she turns away, she cannot expect him not to act. Sure, certain, devastating judgment will fall on the unfaithful city and people.

Christ and the covenant(s). In the New Testament period, the covenant relationship made with Israel on Mount Sinai, as well as the earlier covenants made with Adam, Noah, and Abraham, find their consummation in Christ.⁸ He is the One who fulfills the conditions of the covenant for us, enabling us as his people to experience every blessing in him (Eph. 1:3). He is the One who took upon himself the curse that we deserved as covenant breakers, so that we might be redeemed by his blood (1:7). He is the One in whom the nations can find their inclusion into the one new people of God, the new Israel, the new temple in which God dwells by his Spirit (2:19–22).

For this reason, blessing and curse in the New Testament take on a different complexion from the Old Testament. The blessing we pronounce on God's people is that they may experience God's grace and favor in Jesus Christ through the ministry of the Holy Spirit: "May the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the fellowship of the Holy Spirit be with you all" (2 Cor. 13:14). This blessing of life in God's presence is for all who keep the words given in God's book (Rev. 22:7). However, there still remains a place for curse in the New Testament, specifically on those who attempt to pervert the gospel, either by proclaiming a different gospel (Gal. 1:8–9) or by tampering with the true gospel (Rev. 22:19).

If that is true, what then is our relationship, as New Testament believers, to the concepts of blessing and curse? We should note that the New Testament blessings and curses are spiritual, pertaining to life in God's presence or death separated from God. The Old Testament shadows, whereby the blessings and curses were associated with material prosperity or disadvantage in the land of promise, have passed away; the reality is found in Christ. For us, then, blessing is not a new Cadillac and a house on the golf course, but to be united with Christ in his death and resurrection. The curse that we have avoided is not poverty and a dull life but eternal separation from the One who makes life worth living. Praise God, then, from whom all spiritual blessings flow!

Contemporary Significance

GOD, SIN, AND JUSTICE. If you have ever talked to people about God and the world, then I am sure that someone somewhere will have brought this up to you as an objection: "Where is this good God you talk about in a world gone mad? If he were really half as good as you say and half as powerful as you say, then evil would be instantly eliminated. Where is this God of justice? Why are there so many pointless wars and so much suffering in this world? Why doesn't God step in and do something?"

Ezekiel's message to the Israelites is that God is about to step in and do something. He is about to act against unrighteousness and injustice. But that is not good news for Ezekiel's contemporaries, because he is coming as their judge. It is as if in an old Western movie the beleaguered cowboys hear the bugle call that sounds to announce the arrival of the Seventh Cavalry—only to find that this time the cavalry are fighting on the side of the dispossessed Indians. Our basic problem in longing for justice is that we ourselves are sinners. For such as ourselves, the coming of the judge brings with it a problem: "Who can endure the day of his coming?" (Mal. 3:2).

Is there then no hope? Are we all doomed? The early chapters of Ezekiel certainly give a more negative outlook than we are accustomed to. We must not undercut the prophet's message by focusing exclusively on the glimmers of light and ignoring the tunnel. The prophet would have people understand the depth of their sin—greater transgression than that of the nations around them, who did not know God (Ezek. 5:7)—and the extent of the wrath of God against sin, especially the sin of idolatry. When the Bible says that God is of purer eyes than to look upon evil (Hab. 1:13), what that means is that his face is set against sinful men and women. In other words, we all are under his judgment—or, to use Pauline language, we are all "by nature objects of wrath" (Eph. 2:3). Thus, left to ourselves, we have nothing to hope for on the last day except judgment and eternal separation from God. Because of our sin, we all sit on death row.

This fact is true not merely because of our own sin, which is bad enough, but also because of our history of sin. Indeed, humankind has a history of sin that stretches back not merely 390 years, as symbolized in Ezekiel 4, but back to the beginning of time and the sin of the first couple in the garden. Our problem is not simply that we have broken the covenant made at Mount Sinai and defiled the temple, making the place where God has chosen to dwell with his people unfit for divine habitation. Rather, in Adam we have all broken the original covenant relationship between God and humanity and made the world unfit for divine habitation. We were intended to be vassal rulers under God, ordering the world in submission to the Great King, serving him and him alone. In Instead, we rebelled against him, pursuing the idolatries of our hearts and bringing down on ourselves the sentence of death. Thus, for us as sinners, encounter with the living God can never be "a delightful and thought-provoking hour," but rather an awesome and terrifying encounter (cf. Heb. 12:21).

The flicker of hope and its fulfillment in Jesus Christ. Yet if we must not overplay the flickering candle of hope in Ezekiel 4–5, we must also not ignore it altogether. Even on death row, God has his people. If Ezekiel himself is a model of the righteous remnant, undefiled in the land of exile, if there may be some preserved through the judgment, even if only a small fraction, if there is the possibility of a renewed exodus on the other side of the renewed Egyptian bondage, then there is hope. But how can that be? Justice must be done and the covenant curses must fall. If the wages of sin are indeed death, how can we survive payday?

Ezekiel does not yet begin to answer the question how. But by pointing his listeners back to Leviticus 26 and the covenant nature of the forthcoming destruction, he is already inviting them to consider the grounds of hope implicit within the covenant itself, the faithfulness of the One who established the covenant, God himself. God has purposed in establishing the covenant in the first place to win for himself a people, and he will not allow that purpose to be thwarted, not even by the sins of those whom he has chosen. As Malachi 3:6 puts the equation: "I the LORD do not change. So you, O descendants of Jacob, are not destroyed."

But still how can this be? Even though God is faithful and loving, he is also just. He is a holy God, of purer eyes than to look upon evil. So how can he forgive the guilty and still be just? Ezekiel does not give us a very clear answer to that question. He leaves it open. He knows that it is true, for God has revealed it to him, but he doesn't know how it can be true. But we who live this side of Christmas have a much clearer understanding. How can God be just and still forgive the guilty? How can the fire pass over us and not completely burn us alive? It is only because it has already passed over Jesus and poured its heat out on him.

The judgment that was to fall on Jerusalem for her sins was truly horrendous, so awful that few, a bare remnant of a remnant, would live to tell the tale. Yet it was nothing compared to the wrath of God that was poured out on his beloved Son on the cross for the sins of his people. The sword of God's wrath descended on Jesus; the fire of God's wrath burned him. He became an object of reproach to those passing by, who taunted him, "Come down from the cross, if you are the Son of God" (Matt. 27:39–40). But the result was that the wrath of God was exhausted on him; he has been avenged on sin, his wrath is spent (Ezek. 5:13).

As a consequence, there is now no condemnation for us who are in Christ Jesus (Rom. 8:1). As Paul puts it in 1 Thessalonians 5:9–10: "For God did not appoint us to suffer wrath but to receive salvation through our Lord Jesus Christ. He died for us so that, whether we are awake or asleep, we may live together with him." The wrath of God came on him once and for all, so that it might not now or in the future have to fall on us, his people.

THE WORD OF THE LORD came to me: 2"Son of man. set your face against the mountains of Israel; prophesy against them ³ and say: 'O mountains of Israel, hear the word of the Sovereign LORD. This is what the Sovereign LORD says to the mountains and hills, to the ravines and valleys: I am about to bring a sword against you, and I will destroy your high places. ⁴Your altars will be demolished and your incense altars will be smashed; and I will slav your people in front of your idols. ⁵I will lay the dead bodies of the Israelites in front of their idols, and I will scatter your bones around your altars. ⁶Wherever you live, the towns will be laid waste and the high places demolished, so that your altars will be laid waste and devastated, your idols smashed and ruined, your incense altars broken down, and what you have made wiped out. ⁷Your people will fall slain among you, and you will know that I am the LORD.

8" 'But I will spare some, for some of you will escape the sword when you are scattered among the lands and nations. 9Then in the nations where they have been carried captive, those who escape will remember me—how I have been grieved by their adulterous hearts, which have turned away from me, and by their eyes, which have lusted after their idols. They will loathe themselves for the evil they have done and for all their detestable practices. 10And they will know that I am the LORD; I did not threaten in vain to bring this calamity on them.

11" 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says: Strike your hands together and stamp your feet and cry out "Alas!" because of all the wicked and detestable practices of the house of Israel, for they will fall by the sword, famine and plague. ¹²He that is far away will die of the plague, and he that is near will fall by the sword, and he that survives and is spared will die of famine. So will I spend my wrath upon them. ¹³And they will know that I am the LORD, when their people lie slain among their idols around their altars, on every high hill and on all the mountaintops, under every spreading tree and every leafy oak—places where they offered fragrant incense to all their idols. ¹⁴And I will stretch out my hand against them and make the land a desolate waste from the desert to Diblah—wherever they live. Then they will know that I am the LORD.'"

Original Meaning

LIKE THE EVER-WIDENING circle of ripples that come from dropping a stone into still water, Ezekiel 6 builds on the previous judgment oracle and expands it. Whereas before the prophet addressed the city of Jerusalem, the political and religious center of the land, now he is told to set his face against the mountains of all Israel. The geographical boundaries of judgment have been widened. The focus on judgment is clear from the structure as well as the content. The chapter divides into two parts, verses 2–10 and 11–14, each of which begins with a hostile gesture on the part of the prophet ("set your face," v. 2; "strike your hands together and stamp your feet," v. 11) and concludes with the recognition formula ("they will know that I am the LORD"). The Lord's wrath has been aroused and he will not be ignored.

There is more at stake in Ezekiel's choice of the expression "the mountains of Israel" for the central region of Israel than a mere nostalgia for the lost mountain grandeur of their homeland among the exiles living in the flat terrain of Babylon.³ While the borders of Israel expanded and contracted at different times in Israel's history, the hill country was always Israel par excellence. It was the Lord's "home turf," as the Arameans recognized (1 Kings 20:28), though they were also to discover that he could win fixtures "on the road" just as easily! Moreover, Ezekiel's preference for phrases combined with the patronym "Israel" ("mountains of Israel" [hārê yis rā'ēl], "land of Israel" ['admat yis rā'ēl]) emphasizes the fact that this land will always be Israel. Even though the people may be in exile and another nation rule the territory, they can never own it, for these are in a special way "my [the LORD's] mountains" (Isa. 14:25; 65:9; Ezek. 38:21), which he has irrevocably given to his people Israel.

Yet it is precisely into that home turf that idolatry has penetrated. Ezekiel 6 expands the accusation of the previous chapter with clearer accusations of the nature of Israel's offenses. For the hill country is also the location of "high places" ($b\bar{a}m\hat{o}t$, 6:3). These are "high places" not necessarily in the sense of geographical elevation, for they can be located in a valley as easily as on a hilltop (Jer. 7:31; 32:35), but in the sense of a raised stone platform on which an altar and other cultic objects are constructed. Alongside the altars for animal sacrifice are frequently buildings for the associated festivities (hammanîm), which may also have housed idols (gillûlîm).

Prior to the building of the Jerusalem temple, the people were permitted to use the high places as locations for offering sacrifices to the Lord (1 Kings 3:2). Once that structure was completed, however, the worship of Israel was to be centralized in Jerusalem (Deut. 12). But in practice old habits died hard, especially when the old ways offered more convenient locations and more flexible rules. These local high places became the entry points for Canaanite religious ideas and images, whether the figures of Baal and Asherah or the practices that went along with Canaanite fertility religions. For that reason, the repeated failure of the reigning monarch to suppress the high places in both the northern and southern kingdoms is a major concern in the book of Kings; only Hezekiah and Josiah attempted to destroy them. Syncretism was at some times actually officially encouraged, while at other times the authorities simply turned a blind eye to it.

But Israel's rulers were not free agents in their choice of worship location; they were vassal kings under the rule of God. Though the vassal kings might ignore the breach of covenant that this false worship involved, with the people serving other gods instead of the one true God, the Great King would no longer tolerate it. Once more, as in Ezekiel 5, an echo of Leviticus 26 is unmistakable, as the covenant curses fall on the rebellious people. Leviticus 26:30 threatens: "I will destroy your high places [bāmōtêkem], cut down your incense altars [ḥammānêkem] and pile your dead bodies [pigrêkem] on the lifeless forms of your idols [gillûlêkem]." Similarly in Ezekiel 6:3–5 the Lord says: "I will destroy your high places [bāmōtêkem]... and your incense altars [ḥammānêkem]... I will lay the dead bodies of the Israelites [pigrê benê yis rā'ēl] in front of their idols [gillûlêhem]."

It was not uncommon in the ancient world to defile altars by burning corpses on them, putting the profane in the place of the holy (1 Kings 13:2; 2 Kings 23:16). Here, however, the corpses are not burned on the altar but scattered around the altar so that they surround ($s\bar{a}bab$) it. This acts as a macabre parody of the ritual dances around ($s\bar{a}bab$) the altar, which served to sanctify it as a sacred place (Ps. 26:6; 118:27). The effect is nonetheless the same: The places of idolatry will be rendered unfit, and the idolaters themselves will be put to death (cf. Deut. 13:9). God will do what successive generations of kings failed to do and put an end to this abomination.

When God acts decisively in this way, the result will be that Israel "will know that I am the LORD" (Ezek. 6:7). This so-called "recognition formula" is characteristic of Ezekiel and occurs no fewer than four times in this chapter (6:7, 10, 13, 14). It stresses the fact that the knowledge of the Lord comes about not through self-examination and navel-gazing but rather as a direct result of God's actions in history. A remnant will survive the coming judgment, who will look back from exile and recognize that the Lord is the God who acts in history and that the fate suffered by his people is no more than just. There in exile they will become aware of their sinful state and God's righteous judgment. His words, whether those brought by Ezekiel or the covenant curses of Leviticus 26 or both, are not empty threats (Ezek. 6:10). They will know that the Lord is there and is not silent, to quote Francis Schaeffer's memorable phrase. In the control of the covenant curses of Leviticus 26 or both, are not empty threats (Ezek. 6:10). They will know that the Lord is there and is not silent, to quote Francis Schaeffer's memorable phrase. In the covenant curses of Leviticus 26 or both, are not empty threats (Ezek. 6:10).

This raises the question, however, as to what kind of knowledge of God they will attain in exile. Is it the forced knowledge of the rule of God in the world such as the Egyptians received, when after plague upon plague, they saw their horses and chariots drowned in the Sea of Reeds? The purpose of that power encounter was so that "the Egyptians will know that I am the LORD" (Ex. 14:4, 18), yet the knowledge they received is the knowledge of despair, not hope. Or is it the knowledge of God that comes to the repentant, whose attachment to sin is broken through discipline?

Both possibilities seem present in this passage. "To remember" in the Old Testament is never simply the recalling to mind of the past, but includes the idea of a present action that flows from that recollection. Remembering the Lord seems to be universally positive in the Old Testament and elsewhere can clearly be used to describe repentance (e.g., Jonah 2:7). The content of what the people will remember about the Lord is his grief at their adulterous actions, and the result flowing from that remembrance will be self-loathing at their evil ways (Ezek. 6:9). This seems to imply the possibility on the part of at least some of the exiles of a repentant return to the Lord. This provides a model to Ezekiel's exilic audience, "overhearing" his words directed to the distant mountains: Even now they can act the part of the righteous remnant by remembering the God who acts and repenting of their sin and the sins of their fellow countrymen in going after dead idols who cannot save (Isa. 44:6–20). As much as their sin of idolatry delighted them in the past, now it will become an object of horror in their eyes.

However, in keeping with the focus on the dark side in these chapters, Ezekiel does not end his oracle on this happy thought. Instead, he returns to the theme of judgment on the house of Israel because of their abominations (Ezek. 6:11–14). The threefold judgment of sword, famine, and plague is once again unleashed on the land (v. 11). This fearsome trio is familiar from Leviticus 26 and Ezekiel 5, and they are three of the four "horsemen of the Apocalypse" in Revelation 6. The comprehensiveness of their activity is underlined in Ezekiel 6:12: Normally the two categories of "he that is far away" and "he that is near" comprehensively include everyone (e.g., Isa. 57:19), but here a third category is added: "he that survives and is spared." Even those seemingly fortunate ones who fall into this last category and escape immediate destruction will be subject to death, just as some of the hairs that Ezekiel preserved in Ezekiel 5:3 were later taken out again and thrown into the fire. Then, when the people are slain around their idolatrous altars and the entire land from south to north¹⁵ is turned into a desolate waste, the knowledge of the Lord will be established.

This twofold ending to the two oracles seems to envisage two opposite possibilities: repentance and return to the Lord (Ezek. 6:8–10), or the total devastation of the land and the wiping out of the entire people (6:11–14).

Both are indeed possible endings to Israel's story; in either event, the Lord's justice will be seen and known. Both are likewise possible endings to the story for each individual in Ezekiel's audience: They can remember the Lord and find hope, or they can simply continue on their present course and be utterly destroyed. By including both endings, Ezekiel invites his hearers to ponder their own condition. By choosing to end with the picture of total destruction, however, he underlines the dark future for the land of Israel: total desolation from one end to the other.

Bridging Contexts

ATTITUDE TOWARD OTHER religions. To a contemporary pluralistic society, Ezekiel's words of judgment seem unduly harsh. Indeed, even that statement may be too mild. For Ezekiel's favorite word for idols, gillûlîm, appears to be deliberately offensive, artificially formed out of the words for "to roll" (gālal) and "detestable objects" (šiqqûṣîm). This imagery of round, rolling objects that defile evokes the idea of excrement and amounts to calling the idols "sheep droppings," only in rather less polite terminology.

Such is not the typical language of interfaith dialog in our culture. We are used to seeing the practice of different religions and the operation of cults of one kind or another all around us, and are typically tolerant of their practices, provided they will be tolerant of ours. We do not normally expect judgment to fall on our nation as a result of the proliferation of differing religious viewpoints and practices. In the light of Ezekiel's words, is this a mistake? Ought we instead, as Christians, be working to ensure that the true worship of God alone is legally enforced in our land?

To do so would, I think, be to misunderstand the special position that Israel held as a nation in the Old Testament. She was uniquely God's chosen nation, called at Mount Sinai into a special covenant relationship with God. Part of that special relationship was a commitment on the part of Israel to be separate from the nations, belonging to the Lord alone. He would be their God and they would be his people, as the repeated covenant refrain goes. That special relationship was not in effect in the same way prior to Sinai, with the result that the patriarchs lived with a quite different attitude towards the religious beliefs of the surrounding nations. As Gordon Wenham characterizes it:

Though the patriarchs are faithful followers of their God, they generally enjoy good relations with men of other faiths. There is an air of ecumenical bonhomie about the patriarchal religion which contrasts with the sectarian exclusiveness of the Mosaic age and later prophetic demands.¹⁸

Nor does the relationship between God and his people carry over in the same way in the New Testament era of redemptive history. Thus, while Paul is distressed by the rampant idolatry of the Athenians (Acts 17:16), he addresses the assembled Areopagites in relatively complimentary terms, saying, "I see that in every way you are very religious" (17:22). He does not threaten the immediate judgment of God on their nation for their idolatry, though he urges them in no uncertain terms to abandon their futile idols and turn to the true and living God (17:30–31). The reason for Paul's different approach from Ezekiel is that Athens as a city-state was not in covenant with God and therefore not subject to the blessings and curses of the Sinai covenant.

Modern nation-states are likewise no longer in a covenant relationship with the Lord. Instead, it is the church that is the covenanted people of God. For this reason, Paul's harshest language is reserved for those who claim to be Christians but actually are preaching a false gospel. With such people there can be no polite dialog; for them, Paul is willing to envisage eternal condemnation (Gal. 1:8; cf. also the strong language of 5:12). They are no better than "dogs" (Phil. 3:2; Rev. 22:15), a term whose strong emotive content is not easily conveyed in our context. Jude is similarly scathing in his verbal assault on false teachers (Jude 8–16). Therefore, our application of this passage should be in terms of the faithfulness (or otherwise) of the church rather than the state. We should explore the dominant idolatries that readily invade the church and are advocated and encouraged by some within the church itself, and be ready to condemn them in the strongest possible terms.

Contemporary idolatry. What kind of idolatries is Ezekiel addressing, however, and how do they relate to the contemporary situation? The idolatries of the high places, with their representations of Baal and Asherah and altars for offering sacrifices, seem distant and foreign. Bowing down to stone and wood seems a mark of ancient credulity to us. Yet if you analyze the appeal of Baal and Asherah, it is possible to see that their hold continues down to the present, even though their form has changed. Baal was the storm god, the chief god of the pantheon, the god of power and fertility, who if appeased could deliver victory in battle, and in peacetime the rain so vital to cultivation in Canaan. Asherah, his consort, was the goddess of fertility, perhaps better known to us in her Greek form as Aphrodite. By worshiping these gods, the Israelites sought to impose order on the chaos of the world around them and to invoke the aid of a higher power on their behalf. The idols promised power and security.

In addition, the sexual practices of ritual prostitution that were probably associated with the fertility cult needed little theological justification. To put it in the contemporary vernacular, Baal and Asherah were in effect the patron saints of sex and guns and rock 'n' roll, promising to deliver a potent mixture of satisfaction to the desires for power, success, and pleasure. This promise remains as attractive to people of the contemporary world as it was to those of ancient times, as any quick review of the recent offerings from Hollywood will demonstrate. However, the security and satisfaction that these sources offer is both illegitimate and ephemeral. God alone deserves the worship that these idols demand from us, and he alone is able to deliver the lasting satisfaction that we seek. Though our hearts restlessly wander from one idol to another, they will never find rest until they submit to the one true and living God.

But could Israel ultimately have been totally destroyed by God, no matter what their sin? God had set his name on her, allying his reputation intimately with her fate. This consideration had saved Israel before in the time of Moses when they worshiped the golden calf (Ex. 32:9–14). This remains a powerful and valid argument down into New Testament times, where Paul regards as unthinkable the possibility that God has rejected his own people (Rom. 11:1). But the ultimate certainty that God will be faithful to his covenant promises to redeem his people must never be transposed into a complacent attitude toward the threats he makes concerning those who break the covenant. Though God will preserve for himself a remnant for the sake of his name, yet he may equally definitively judge those who continue to rebel against him, be they Abraham's children or not, for our God combines in himself both kindness and severity (11:22).

Contemporary Significance

A MATTER OF life and death. How many times have you heard people say, "It doesn't matter what you believe as long as you are sincere"? That is not an idea Ezekiel would have endorsed. According to him, judgment was coming on Israel, a judgment that was nothing less than the outpouring of God's wrath from heaven, which would level everything in its path. It was not coming because the Israelites had mistreated one another (although, as we will see, they had). Nor was judgment coming because they had taken advantage of the poor or been unfaithful to their wives, or even because they had robbed each other and filled the land with violence, but essentially because they held to a false religion. For them, what they believed would literally be a matter of life and death.

If what you believe is indeed a matter of life and death, then it is not nearly enough to be sincere. It is intensely important to be right. When you jump out of an airplane, you are not content merely to believe sincerely that your parachute is strapped on correctly. Rather, you will check and double-check that it is really so, because you understand all too clearly the consequences of getting it wrong. Indeed, the lengths to which people go to check the correctness of their beliefs in a particular matter is an accurate marker of how important they believe the matter to be. The people who say, "It doesn't matter what you believe about God as long as you are sincere," are those to whom it doesn't matter what you believe about God. But if, in fact, there is a God who designed the whole cosmic and human story with a purpose, so that the chief end of humanity is indeed to glorify this God and enjoy him forever, then what you believe becomes a matter of supreme and decisive importance.²¹

It matters intensely to God what his people believe about him. He entered a covenant with Israel at Mount Sinai, where he declared himself a passionate God, whose name is Jealous, who would not share his people's affections with another (Ex. 34:14). His faithfulness to his covenant commitment meant a curse descending inexorably on those who broke the covenant and went after other gods, just as surely as it would mean blessing for those who faithfully sought after him (Lev. 26). Ezekiel's warning is that the time is at hand for God's jealousy to overflow into action as he judges his rebellious people.

A renewed people. But that outpouring of God's wrath can never be the end of the story. Though God is faithful to his covenant commitment to bring judgment on the rebels, he is also faithful to his deeper purpose to establish a renewed people, a restored remnant. That is small comfort to the people of Judah, who live in the path of the oncoming storm. To them, the gestures of Ezekiel bespeak God's settled attitude: God is determinedly against them and will not relent. But to the exiles, who overhear the conversation, there is a ray of hope. They are already in the situation described in Ezek. 6:9 and can identify with the remnant by remembering their own sin and recognizing God's righteous judgment.

Today, we too live in a world full of idolatry. In our situation, the idols are not of wood and stone, but they are nonetheless real. Each of us has "personal centers," areas of our lives in which we seek to find our identity and significance. These centers come in a variety of shapes and forms, ranging from pleasure and work to spouse and family. Even church can function as an idol, the place from which we seek approval and affirmation.²² Our "high place" may be the office, where we sacrifice our relationships to win the blessing of the god "career." It may be the family room, where we consecrate our "prime time" to the god of entertainment, or the kitchen and laundry room, where we devote ourselves to ensuring that our children have all of their physical and material needs met perfectly.

We measure our value and success by the extent to which these gods smile on us and consider ourselves of little value when they frown. In that respect, nothing has changed between ancient Israel and us. Like the rich young ruler who came to Jesus and asked him, "What good thing must I do to get eternal life?" (Matt. 19:16), something other than God is driving our lives. How ashamed we will be to stand before the Maker of the universe and realize how much of our thinking has been controlled by and centered on things that are not gods, to which we attributed godlike significance! Of how many will it be revealed that they spent their lives mucking about in the sandpit of life, living for insipid pleasures and weak fancies instead of launching out in dependence on the only true God? Truly, we will all have much of which to be ashamed. As C. S. Lewis put it:

Indeed, if we consider the unblushing promises of reward and the staggering nature of the rewards promised in the Gospels, it would seem that the Lord finds our desires, not too strong, but too weak. We are half-hearted creatures, fooling about with drink and sex and ambition when infinite joy is offered us, like an ignorant child who wants to go on making mud pies in a slum because he cannot understand what is meant by the offer of a holiday at the sea. We are far too easily pleased.²³

Not all of us will face the kind of judgment Ezekiel prophesied over Israel during our lifetimes, however. Many, like the rich young ruler, appear to prosper in their idolatry. But those whose idols are blessing them, in whose lives there is apparently no difficulty and disappointment, are more to be pitied than to be envied, for the judgments of God often serve as a wake-up call to our deaf ears. As Calvin comments: "The scourges of God are more useful to us, because when God indulges us, we abuse his clemency and flatter ourselves and so grow hardened in sin."²⁴

Two possible outcomes. Yet the judgments of God in this life do not work automatically. Two outcomes are possible, just as they were for Ezekiel's hearers. We may be moved by the pain of the situation to remember God's grace, and therefore to be disgusted over our sin and turn from it. Our eyes may be opened from our self-deceptive stupor to see the hatefulness of what we have given ourselves over to, so that we thrust it away from us as eagerly as we would a poisonous spider or a scorpion. Or we may continue unmoved, perhaps even further hardened in our sin, inexorably hastening towards final destruction. It is a sobering fact that those who fail to listen to God speaking to them become increasingly unable to hear God speak to them. But in either event, whether in the final destruction of those who continue to be rebellious against him or in the final salvation of those whom he brings to himself, God's justice is vindicated.

THE WORD OF THE LORD came to me: ²"Son of man, this is what the Sovereign LORD says to the land of Israel: The end! The end has come upon the four corners of the land. ³The end is now upon you and I will unleash my anger against you. I will judge you according to your conduct and repay you for all your detestable practices. ⁴I will not look on you with pity or spare you; I will surely repay you for your conduct and the detestable practices among you. Then you will know that I am the LORD.

Disaster! An unheard-of disaster is coming. ⁶The end has come! The end has come! It has roused itself against you. It has come! ⁷Doom has come upon you —you who dwell in the land. The time has come, the day is near; there is panic, not joy, upon the mountains. ⁸I am about to pour out my wrath on you and spend my anger against you; I will judge you according to your conduct and repay you for all your detestable practices. ⁹I will not look on you with pity or spare you; I will repay you in accordance with your conduct and the detestable practices among you. Then you will know that it is I the LORD who strikes the blow.

10"The day is here! It has come! Doom has burst forth, the rod has budded, arrogance has blossomed! 11 Violence has grown into a rod to punish wickedness; none of the people will be left, none of that crowd—no wealth, nothing of value. 12 The time has come, the day has arrived. Let not the buyer rejoice nor the seller grieve, for wrath is upon the whole crowd. 13 The seller will not recover the land he has sold as long as both of them live, for the vision concerning the whole crowd will not be reversed. Because of their sins, not one of them will preserve his life. ¹⁴Though they blow the trumpet and get everything ready, no one will go into battle, for my wrath is upon the whole crowd.

15"Outside is the sword, inside are plague and famine; those in the country will die by the sword, and those in the city will be devoured by famine and plague. ¹⁶All who survive and escape will be in the mountains, moaning like doves of the valleys, each because of his sins. ¹⁷Every hand will go limp, and every knee will become as weak as water. ¹⁸They will put on sackcloth and be clothed with terror. Their faces will be covered with shame and their heads will be shaved. ¹⁹They will throw their silver into the streets, and their gold will be an unclean thing. Their silver and gold will not be able to save them in the day of the LORD's wrath. They will not satisfy their hunger or fill their stomachs with it, for it has made them stumble into sin. ²⁰They were proud of their beautiful jewelry and used it to make their detestable idols and vile images. Therefore I will turn these into an unclean thing for them. ²¹I will hand it all over as plunder to foreigners and as loot to the wicked of the earth, and they will defile it. ²²I will turn my face away from them, and they will desecrate my treasured place; robbers will enter it and desecrate it.

²³"Prepare chains, because the land is full of bloodshed and the city is full of violence. ²⁴I will bring the most wicked of the nations to take possession of their houses; I will put an end to the pride of the mighty, and their sanctuaries will be desecrated. ²⁵When terror comes, they will seek peace, but there will be none. ²⁶Calamity upon calamity will come, and rumor upon rumor. They will try to get a vision from the prophet; the teaching of the law by the priest will be lost, as will the counsel of the elders. ²⁷The king will mourn, the prince will be clothed with despair, and the hands of the people of the land will tremble. I will deal with them according to their conduct, and by their own standards I will judge them. Then they will know that I am the LORD."

Original Meaning

MANY PEOPLE THINK of the message of the prophets as, "Repent, the end is near." Ezekiel's message in this chapter, however, is: "It's too late to repent; the end has come." Just as in the days of Noah's Flood (Gen. 6), the sins of the people have reached such a pitch that it is time to wipe the land clean of them.

There is a twofold expansion in Ezekiel 7 in the scope of the judgment from that described in his previous messages. (1) It is once more expanded geographically. Just as Ezekiel began with the city of Jerusalem in Ezekiel 5 and moved on to the heartland of Judah, the mountains of Israel, in Ezekiel 6, so now he widens his scope of attention to include judgment on the whole "land of Israel" (7:2). Indeed, judgment has come upon the "four corners of the land [world]." The global language may be applied to a judgment that affects "only" Judah since, as Greenberg puts it, "from the prophet's viewpoint, the doom of his people is tantamount to the end of the world."

The phrase "land of Israel" ('admat-yis'rā'ēl) is unique to Ezekiel. 'adāmâ ("land," "ground") has a substantial semantic overlap with 'ereṣ ("land," "earth"), and in some contexts the former term may be chosen simply to provide a contrast with the latter. Thus in 11:17 the "land of Israel" ('admat-yis'rā'ēl) contrasts with "the lands where you have been scattered." Yet the physical and agricultural overtones that 'adāmâ contains may still be present, especially on the lips of an exile, denoting the land of promise as a place intended for fruitfulness and blessing (see, e.g., its repeated use in the covenant blessings of Deut. 28). However, as Ezekiel 7 unfolds, it emerges that what has been growing in this fertile soil has been something other than what God intended.

(2) Ezekiel insists repeatedly that doom is not merely imminent but has actually arrived. Whereas the previous oracle spoke of a certain judgment to come at an unspecified time in the future, here we see a certain judgment now present. Thus verses 3 and 8 in Hebrew both start with the word "now," while verse 7 announces (lit.): "The time has come, the day has arrived." Further, in this chapter for the first time there is not even a glimmer of the light at the end of the tunnel, no mention of a possible remnant. The focus is entirely on the darkness of the descending gloom that is now falling over the land.

The language that Ezekiel adopts is influenced heavily by the traditional language of the Day of the Lord. This "Day" was frequently longed for during times of difficulty as the day when the Lord would come to judge the nations; however, the prophets had pointed out that it was also the time when God would judge his own people Israel (cf. Amos 5:18–20). The outcome of that Day of Judgment was likely to be far from positive. Thus Amos was shown a vision of ripe summer fruit ($q\bar{a}yi\bar{s}$, Amos 8:1), a vision that leads into an oracle of Israel's end ($q\bar{e}\bar{s}$, 8:2). Likewise, in Genesis 6:13, God had told Noah that he was about to bring an end ($q\bar{e}\bar{s}$) to all people, and the result was the Flood. So here, when Ezekiel speaks repeatedly of the coming of an end ($q\bar{e}\bar{s}$) on the people, what Judah is being threatened with is nothing less than complete and immediate annihilation. What Amos had foreseen concerning the northern kingdom is now happening in parallel fashion to the southern kingdom.

Ezekiel 7 opens with a brief oracle that summarizes the themes of the chapter (vv. 1–4). The prophesied end is coming on the whole land of Israel (v. 2), and it is coming now (v. 3). That devastating event is nothing less than the personal "sending" (šālaḥ) of the Lord's anger against them, just as earlier he had threatened to "send" his arrows of famine against them (5:16). But the Lord's action in destroying them is neither arbitrary nor unfair; it is simply judging them according to their conduct and repaying them for all their detestable practices. Measure for measure, they will receive what they deserve for their abominations (7:3), without favoritism or pity, resulting in an understanding of the Lord's power and holiness.

The second oracle (7:5–9) picks up from the first oracle the theme of the personal nature of divine judgment on the people's sin. All of the first person verbs from the first oracle expressing the outpouring of the Lord's wrath recur, along with a significantly modified version of the recognition formula, "Then you will know that it is I the LORD who strikes the blow" (7:9). No longer does the Lord reveal himself to his people as "the LORD, who heals you," as he did during the wanderings in the desert (Ex. 15:26); rather, he has now become "the LORD who strikes."

The third oracle (Ezek. 7:10–27) unfolds the theme of the comprehensiveness of judgment from the first oracle. It begins with a brief introduction (vv. 10–11), which draws out the organic connection between Judah's sin and her punishment. This was already prepared for by the agricultural background of the language of the "end" ($q\bar{e}s$); the "end" is the time for harvesting ripe fruit. Now the sin of Judah has reached full ripeness and it is time for the harvest of God's judgment. According to verses 10–11, Israel's "doom[?]³ has burst forth, the rod has budded, arrogance has blossomed! Violence has grown into a rod to punish wickedness." Alongside Israel's blossoming pride and violence, however, the rod of God's judgment has been growing, namely, Babylon. It will mete out punishment corresponding to the crime until there is nothing left. The people who filled the city with violence (7:23) will themselves be attacked by violent men (7:22; NIV "robbers"); the wicked will be turned over to "the wicked of the earth" (7:21); the arrogant will be humbled (7:24).

Suitably to its theme of comprehensive judgment, the oracle is itself massive and wide-ranging, consisting of two parallel cycles of judgment scenes that move from the general to the particular.⁴ These may be broken down as follows:

A: the futility of commercial transactions (vv. 12–13)

B: the announcement and arrival of war and devastation (vv. 14–16)

C: universal ineffectiveness, terror, and mourning (vv. 17–18)

A': the futility of gold and silver (vv. 19–20)

B': dispossession, looting, and desecration (vv. 21–24)

C': ineffectiveness, terror, and mourning by all classes (vv. 25–27)

When the threatened judgment falls, commercial transactions will lose their meaning; there will be no such thing as a good deal or a bad deal, whether for the buyer or the seller (Ezek. 7:12). The use of the traditional pairings of opposites ("buyer/seller," "rejoice/grieve") underlines once more the comprehensiveness of the disaster, while the following verse underlines the lasting nature of the disaster: "The seller will not recover the land he has sold as long as both of them live" (7:13). Even gold and silver will be worthless, able neither to save their owners nor to satisfy them (7:19). Indeed, these precious metals will be worse than worthless; they will not simply be regarded as trash, to be carelessly disposed of, but as something ritually unclean, contaminated in itself and with the power to contaminate anyone whom it touches (7:19). The reason for that loathing is because gold and silver furnished the materials for the people's idolatry (7:20), "for it has made them stumble into sin" (v. 19); it was the iniquity that caused their downfall.⁵

The nature of the disaster is the focus of the next section in the cycle: Though preparations are made for war, no battle will be joined, for God's wrath is on all her masses ($h^a m \hat{o} n \bar{a} h$, Ezek. 7:14; NIV "crowd"). Judah will be given over into the hand of her enemies, and all her possessions will be handed over as plunder (7:22). This is a reversal of the normal themes of holy war, whereby no battle would be necessary for the Israelites because the Lord would fight on their behalf, giving their enemies into their hand as plunder (cf. 2 Chron. 20). Now, however, the Lord will turn away his face (Ezek. 7:22), allowing the wicked of the earth to pollute the land and even to desecrate "my treasured place" ($s^e p \hat{u} n \hat{r}$; v. 22).

That change of attitude toward Judah meant that even the temple, where David had earlier expressed confidence that God would hide him (sāpan; Ps. 27:5), is no longer a safe place. It would be defiled along with their other (pagan) sanctuaries (Ezek. 7:24). Since Israel failed to distinguish between true and false places of worship and did not destroy the high places, now God's judgment will be similarly nondiscriminatory, destroying not only the pagan sanctuaries but his own temple.

In the face of this disaster, no coherent policy will be formulated or implemented. All hands will hang passively by their sides. Paralyzing fear will result in loss of control of bodily functions (Ezek. 7:17). The people will put on a show of mourning by means of their clothes and their shaven heads (7:18), yet no mercy or forgiveness will be found there, as God already announced (7:4). The people will seek peace and not find it (7:25), whether they seek it through the channel of religious leadership or political leadership. There will be no effective guidance through the religious leadership, whether the prophet (from whom a vision might be sought), the priest (from whom Torah, or instruction from the priestly law, might be sought), or the elders (from whom wisdom and counsel might be expected). Nor will there be effective leadership in the political realm. Not a "king" or a "prince" or any of the "people of the land" will act decisively to save the day (7:27). Rather, they too will be judged "by their own standards."

Bridging Contexts

A DAY OF RECKONING. The immediacy and comprehensiveness of the judgment of which Ezekiel speaks may, at first sight, seem to distance his situation from ours. We live in a world where immediate, comprehensive justice is not poured out on nations that transgress God's laws. However, judgment delayed is not justice denied. The fact remains that there will be a day of reckoning for all sin and for all sinners, when comprehensive justice will be done. Thus the writer to the Hebrews tells us: "Man is destined to die once, and after that to face judgment" (Heb. 9:27), while Jude writes: "The Lord is coming with thousands upon thousands of his holy ones to judge everyone, and to convict all the ungodly" (Jude 14–15). Though this judgment may not be immediate, it will surely be comprehensive and also entirely fair: The just desserts ("wages," in Paul's terminology) of a life of rebellion against God is eternal death, exclusion from the presence of the one who is himself Life (Rom. 6:23). Those wages will have to be collected, sooner or later.

Notwithstanding that final judgment, there are also situations here on earth where our sins catch up with us. In Romans 1, Paul speaks of sinners who have "received in themselves the due penalty for their perversion" (Rom. 1:27). Because the world is God's world, to sin is to act in violation of the basic structure of the universe and thus to call down on oneself the consequences of one's action. Because of God's mercy and common grace, we do not immediately receive the full consequences of all of our actions; otherwise each of our lives would be short and pain-filled. Yet God's mercy is not to be presumed upon and his judgments are not to be ignored.

If we presume on God's mercy, we assume that "of course God will forgive me; it is his job." To the contrary, Ezekiel asserts that sometimes God reaches the point where he will not look on us with pity or spare us, but instead will repay us for our sins (Ezek. 7:4). Instead, the kindness of God is intended to bring us to repentance while there is yet time (Rom. 2:4). Nor are we to ignore his judgments on us, for they too can have the gracious effect of breaking our stubborn attachment to our sins. Yet to remain stubborn and unrepentant in the face of all of God's patience is nothing less than "storing up wrath against yourself for the day of God's wrath, when his righteous judgment will be revealed" (Rom. 2:5).

The agents of justice. It is not hard to envisage the perfect meting out of judgment on the last day by the Judge of all the earth, the One "to whom all hearts are open, all desires known and from whom no secrets are hid." The agents of God's justice here on earth, however, are often less than just themselves. In fact, in Ezekiel's situation the agents of divine wrath are themselves termed "the wicked of the earth" (Ezek. 7:21). But how can justice be done by the wicked? And how can God use the wicked to achieve his purposes without becoming tainted by them? There is an element of mystery here, as Calvin freely admits: "God works through them in such a way that he nevertheless has nothing in common with them. They are borne along by a depraved disposition, but God has a wonderful plan, incomprehensible to us, according to which he impels the wicked here and there—without becoming involved in their guilt." 12

God is able to write straight with a crooked pencil and to achieve his perfect ends through the use of less than perfect instruments, without himself being tainted or hampered by their imperfection. Indeed, it must necessarily be so if God is to do anything through the agency of human beings in this world, since "all have sinned and fall short of the glory of God" (Rom. 3:23). The statement that "in all things God works for the good of those who love him" (8:28) applies just as much to the wicked persecutions of the Roman emperor Nero and the genocides of the contemporary world as it does to the "impersonal" forces of nature. That is why it is not simply famine and danger that cannot separate us from the love of God but even persecution and the sword (8:35).

What is more, God's power is demonstrated not merely in restraining such outbreaks of wickedness, but even in harnessing them. Do we find that surprising? Perhaps the fact that we are astonished that God can achieve his purposes through someone like Nero or Hitler, while at the same time being unsurprised at God's achieving anything through us, shows how shallow an understanding we really have of the depths of our own sin and defilement. In truth, it is really no more of a miracle that God accomplishes his purposes through the sin-tainted acts of Pol Pot or Stalin than that he does so through your sin-tainted acts or mine.

Contemporary Significance

THE ISSUE OF BLAME. Passing the buck for sin is an intrinsic part of present-day human nature. As the contemporary saying goes, "It's not whether you win or lose, but how you place the blame." Whenever something goes wrong, we seek to find someone else who is responsible. When we sin, we seek to pass the buck for our sin by saying, "It wasn't my fault; it's just the way that I was made"; or, "It's my parent's fault, or my family's fault, or my environment's fault." Interestingly, animals never do this. My dog can, and frequently does, do wrong. When you find him with his head in the garbage (again!), he can look as guilty as can be. He knows that he should not do it. But he never points the paw at someone else and says, "It was all his fault. He made me do it." Only humans do that.

This is, of course, not merely a modern condition; it goes back all the way to the Fall. When God confronted the first man and woman with their sin, immediately the excuses began to flow (Gen. 3:12–13). The man said: "The woman you put here with me—she gave me some fruit from the tree, and I ate it." In the Hebrew, the word order is revealing: Adam starts off blaming God ("The woman you gave to be with me"), then he moves on to the woman (the feminine pronoun is emphatic, "she gave it to me"); only with the last word of the sentence do we get to anything close to a confession ("and I ate," which is a single word in Hebrew).

Then God turns to the woman: "What is this you have done?" She, in turn, starts her list (lit., "The serpent, he deceived me"), and then with the final word of the sentence the single word confession ("and I ate"). God's judgment, however, falls on them all—in spite of their excuses—for all have sinned. So it is with contemporary men and women. All of our excuses will not save us from the judgment to come because that judgment is truly comprehensive: All will stand before God to give an account of their lives.

Appearing before the judgment seat. The reality and certainty of the coming Day of Judgment is what exposes the futility of all the idolatries to which we give ourselves. Is your idol your career? Do you really expect your position in the company to impress anyone on that day? Is your idol your possessions? Your Cadillac and your mansion in Beverly Hills will not be with you on that day. Is your idol your children? Will they be able to gain you preferential treatment on that day? Is your idol your church? There will be no "fast track" for those who have belonged to the "correct" denomination on that day, or for those who have filled respected positions such as pastors, elders, and deacons. Gold and silver will be of no value either, nor will connections—all the things in which we have trusted will turn to dust. On that day, the separation between the sheep and the goats will simply be based on the presence or absence of a living relationship with the Living God, through Jesus Christ.

But if that is the end of all things, why do we live in the meantime as if the present reality is what is really important? Why do we strive so hard to accumulate possessions that will not last and to gain influence and power that will not ultimately benefit us? The reason is that we have given ourselves over to our various idolatries and have forgotten our inescapable accountability to the one true God. Even believers will have to give an account for their actions, as the apostle Paul reminds us: "For we must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ, that each one may receive what is due him for the things done while in the body, whether good or bad" (2 Cor. 5:10). We need to learn to see the end from the beginning, to envisage the future vividly here and now and to let that vision dominate our lives.

Living in the light of the future. Have you never wondered why the Bible gives us such vivid depictions of heaven and hell? Do you ever sit down and imagine yourself joining in the praise and worship with a full heart of thanksgiving for what Jesus Christ has done for you? Do you imagine yourself hearing the Lord saying to you, "Well done, good and faithful servant" (Matt. 25:21)? Do you see yourself walking down the streets of gold, meeting and sharing fellowship with loved ones who have gone before and with the great Christians of the past?

And do you also hold before your eyes the awesome reality of the eternal damnation of the lost? Part of our problem is that this world seems very real and solid, and the other world shady and unreal. Thus, we think to ourselves, "Yes, I would like the Lord to return . . . but not before I get married, or before I finish this project at work, or before I go on this trip." But of course, it is really the other way about. It is heaven that is real and solid and substantial, while this world is shadowy and unsubstantial.

In his book The Great Divorce,¹³ C. S. Lewis pictures a group from hell on a day trip to heaven. One of the things they find bothersome is that everything there is far more real than they are. Even the grass is more substantial than they are and so it does not bend under their weight, making it painful for them to walk. In just the same way, the things that are so real and substantial to us in this world are unreal and unsubstantial when compared to the world to come.

Have you ever had a powerful experience of God's presence and closeness, perhaps in prayer or in a worship service? That is nothing compared to the presence of God that we will experience in glory. Or have you experienced the frustration of a single night without sleep, even in a comfortable bed, or weeks and months of unrelenting pain? That is nothing when set beside the fearsome reality of eternal separation from God, eternal torment, and frustration. As you replay over and over in your mind the videotape of the scriptural presentation of eternity, it becomes more real and substantial in your thinking. For Christians, that should mean a growing longing for that day; for those that are not Christians, repeated exposure to the truth of eternity should mean a growing (and appropriate) fear of the prospect. For that reason, heaven and hell should feature prominently in the preaching of our churches.¹⁴

It is striking that those for whom the present world holds least attraction are most passionate in their desire for the new world. Those experiencing persecution for their faith die witnessing to their expectation of immediately being present with the Lord. Those whose bodies are worn out or broken down look with eagerness to being free of their shackles, even as they may fear the pain of the process or lament leaving the ones they love. I have preached on the Beatitudes several times in different churches but never with such power as when I spoke to a congregation traumatized by the recent discovery of a recurrence of breast cancer in the wife of a beloved elder. In that pain, the proclamation of the reality and nearness of heaven became infinitely precious to those who were there.

Experiencing God's grace in the here and now. Some, however, will experience greater consequences here and now for their sin, just as the generation of Ezekiel's day found the ax of God's judgment descending on them. Pride, while it may precede a fall, is rarely fatal. Sexual immorality, on the other hand, may lead to contracting AIDS, with all of its deadly consequences. That does not mean that sexual immorality is a worse sin than pride, or that all those who have AIDS are under God's wrath. The present judgments of God (those times when we do receive in this life the consequences of our sin) and the present mercies of God (all those times when we do not receive the consequences of our sin) are both intended to lead us to repentance. If God were never gracious to us, we would have little reason to expect forgiveness from him; but if God never judged sin, we would be likely to consider it a matter of little importance to him. The balance in the world is intended to reinforce the biblical teaching that God is a God of holiness and mercy, of justice and grace.

What specifically do the present judgments of God achieve in our lives? In the first place, as mentioned above, they act as a demonstration of his justice and a restraining influence on the spread of sin. When someone abandons a spouse and children and runs off with someone else, and then lives to regret the pain he or she has caused to all concerned, that may deter others from committing the same sin. But in addition, when the judgment of God falls upon us in the present, it exposes the nature of all the false hiding places to which we run.

Judah was warned they would find no hiding place in their wealth, for the whole commercial endeavor would be undermined (Ezek. 7:12, 19). They had turned their wealth into idolatry—in their case literally, by constructing idols out of their silver and gold. But in the day of distress, it would be evident that their idols could do nothing for them. If God does not intervene, they may never discover how empty of lasting value their lives are. But if God causes them to lose the objects of their idolatry, it becomes clear that the blessings their idol offered were empty, unable to fill the yawning void in the soul. As a precursor of the final judgment, a present judgment may become the means for turning a life around. The pain of the lives we have shattered, including our own, may cause us to be humbled and return to our heavenly Father.

Or it may not. There are plenty of people whose idol has been shattered by God's intervention, yet they have not turned to God. Their wealth may be gone, yet they cling to the hope that someday it will return. Their health may be broken, yet they may simply become embittered and despairing. Their long-term friendships may be destroyed, yet rather than listen to the appeals of those friends they turn in on themselves. There is nothing automatic about repentance. Only under the sovereign grace of God do his judgments produce the fruit of changed lives.

We must, therefore, take God's grace seriously while it is offered to us. It is possible for a society to reach a point of hardness where God removes his witnesses from it, leaving it to its fate. The countries of Asia Minor, where many of the first churches were established, have been in many cases virtually without a gospel witness for centuries. We cannot presume that our case as a nation will be different. Nor can we as individuals assume that the offer of the gospel will be forever open to us. Even if our lives are spared, yet it is possible to become hardened to the gospel to such a point that there is no return. We become so inured in our pride that we are deaf to the only good news that can save us. God's only word to us is then imminent and comprehensive doom.

Ezekiel 8–9

In the sixth year, in the sixth month on the fifth day, while I was sitting in my house and the elders of Judah were sitting before me, the hand of the Sovereign LORD came upon me there. ²I looked, and I saw a figure like that of a man. From what appeared to be his waist down he was like fire, and from there up his appearance was as bright as glowing metal. ³He stretched out what looked like a hand and took me by the hair of my head. The Spirit lifted me up between earth and heaven and in visions of God he took me to Jerusalem, to the entrance to the north gate of the inner court, where the idol that provokes to jealousy stood. ⁴And there before me was the glory of the God of Israel, as in the vision I had seen in the plain.

⁵Then he said to me, "Son of man, look toward the north." So I looked, and in the entrance north of the gate of the altar I saw this idol of jealousy.

⁶And he said to me, "Son of man, do you see what they are doing—the utterly detestable things the house of Israel is doing here, things that will drive me far from my sanctuary? But you will see things that are even more detestable."

⁷Then he brought me to the entrance to the court. I looked, and I saw a hole in the wall. ⁸He said to me, "Son of man, now dig into the wall." So I dug into the wall and saw a doorway there.

⁹And he said to me, "Go in and see the wicked and detestable things they are doing here." ¹⁰So I went in and looked, and I saw portrayed all over the walls all kinds of crawling things and detestable animals and all the idols of the house of Israel. ¹¹In front of them stood seventy elders of the house of Israel, and Jaazaniah son of Shaphan was standing among them. Each had a censer in his hand, and a fragrant cloud of incense was rising.

¹²He said to me, "Son of man, have you seen what the elders of the house of Israel are doing in the darkness, each at the shrine of his own idol? They say, 'The LORD does not see us; the LORD has forsaken the land.' " ¹³Again, he said, "You will see them doing things that are even more detestable."

¹⁴Then he brought me to the entrance to the north gate of the house of the LORD, and I saw women sitting there, mourning for Tammuz. ¹⁵He said to me, "Do you see this, son of man? You will see things that are even more detestable than this."

¹⁶He then brought me into the inner court of the house of the LORD, and there at the entrance to the temple, between the portico and the altar, were about twenty-five men. With their backs toward the temple of the LORD and their faces toward the east, they were bowing down to the sun in the east.

¹⁷He said to me, "Have you seen this, son of man? Is it a trivial matter for the house of Judah to do the detestable things they are doing here? Must they also fill the land with violence and continually provoke me to anger? Look at them putting the branch to their nose! ¹⁸Therefore I will deal with them in anger; I will not look on them with pity or spare them. Although they shout in my ears, I will not listen to them."

9:1Then I heard him call out in a loud voice, "Bring the guards of the city here, each with a weapon in his hand." ²And I saw six men coming from the direction of the upper gate, which faces north, each with a deadly weapon in his hand. With them was a man clothed in linen who had a writing kit at his side. They came in and stood beside the bronze altar.

³Now the glory of the God of Israel went up from above the cherubim, where it had been, and moved to the threshold of the temple. Then the LORD called to the man clothed in linen who had the writing kit at his side ⁴and said to him, "Go throughout the city of Jerusalem and put a mark on the foreheads of those who grieve and lament over all the detestable things that are done in it."

⁵As I listened, he said to the others, "Follow him through the city and kill, without showing pity or compassion. ⁶Slaughter old men, young men and maidens, women and children, but do not touch anyone who has the mark. Begin at my sanctuary." So they began with the elders who were in front of the temple.

⁷Then he said to them, "Defile the temple and fill the courts with the slain. Go!" So they went out and began killing throughout the city. ⁸While they were killing and I was left alone, I fell facedown, crying out, "Ah, Sovereign LORD! Are you going to destroy the entire remnant of Israel in this outpouring of your wrath on Jerusalem?"

⁹He answered me, "The sin of the house of Israel and Judah is exceedingly great; the land is full of bloodshed and the city is full of injustice. They say, 'The LORD has forsaken the land; the LORD does not see.' ¹⁰So I will not look on them with pity or spare them, but I will bring down on their own heads what they have done."

¹¹Then the man in linen with the writing kit at his side brought back word, saying, "I have done as you commanded."

THE VISION OF Ezekiel 8–11 is a unified whole, as readily becomes apparent when 8:1–3 is compared with 11:24–25. Nevertheless, for the sake of simplicity, we will divide it up into two parts: chapters 8–9 and 10–11.

The vision opens with a date: the fifth day of the sixth month of the sixth year (of Jehoiachin's exile); in our reckoning, that would be September 18, 592 B.C. In other words, some fourteen months have passed since the opening vision of the book. The intervening time has been largely spent in performing the sign-acts of Ezekiel 4; depending on the interpretation of the 390 plus 40 days, Ezekiel has either just completed that period or is close to completion of that period.

However, although the date formula serves to mark chapters 8–11 off from what precedes, the close connection with chapter 7 is maintained. Ezekiel 8 unfolds and details the accusation of "detestable idols and vile images" made in 7:20, while the theme of "the land . . . full of bloodshed and the city . . . full of injustice" (9:9) echoes the charge of 7:23. The divine response to this state of affairs is: "I will not look on them with pity or spare them, but I will bring down on their own heads what they have done" (9:10; cf. 7:4). In the same way, the divine destruction of chapter 9 corresponds to that threatened in chapter 7. Thus, it would not be inappropriate to say that Ezekiel 8–9 depicts in visionary form what Ezekiel 7 stated in oracular style.

Nevertheless, there are also differences. The vision of Ezekiel 8–11 is intended for a specific audience, "the elders of Judah," who have gathered at Ezekiel's house. Though the purpose of their visit is not recorded, they were presumably seeking a favorable oracle, perhaps one proclaiming an early end to the Exile.² 2 Kings 6:32 describes the elders of Samaria sitting with Elisha and receiving an encouraging word from the Lord (see 7:1), while Ezekiel 14:1 and 20:1 record similar visits by the elders to Ezekiel.³ What the elders receive from the prophet is no word of comfort but rather a categorical denunciation of their sins and the sins of the community they represent. They are not simply the audience to whom the vision is related, but also one of the chief targets of the vision.⁴

As the vision opens, Ezekiel sees a glowing figure in human form, corresponding to what he had seen in 1:27. Once more he is transported by the agency of the Spirit and shown a vision of the glory of God (ch. 10); the context of the vision, however, is no longer the situation of the exiles but the defiled city of Jerusalem. The prophet is shown four scenes of increasing abomination, with the offense to God being greater as the scenes in which they take place move nearer to the center of the temple.

- (1) His tour begins with a vision of an "idol of jealousy" at the north gate of the city (8:3–6). This seems to have been an idol in the shape of a human being, perhaps the Canaanite goddess Asherah, whose location at the outer north gate suggests that she was intended to guard the city from attack. As we saw in Ezekiel 1, the north was the traditional direction from which Jerusalem's enemies approached. If so, then the goddess is powerless to prevent the sack of the city by the Lord's appointed destroyers in Ezekiel 9. The focus of the attention here, however, is the effect that this image has on the Lord. It "provokes [him] to jealousy" (8:3; cf. Deut. 32:16); God will not share Israel's worship, which rightfully belongs to him, with other gods, and he has proof of her infidelity.
- (2) However, abominable though this idolatry is, worse is yet to come. Next, Ezekiel is shown seventy elders of the house of Israel, leaders among the lay community, offering incense to idols in a secret chamber (Ezek. 8:7–13). What was done in public at a distance from the temple is also being done in private at the entrance of the temple courtyard. The elders are portrayed as standing before a wall of carved animal figures, each offering clouds of incense from a burner (8:11).

In contrast to the Canaanite origin of the Asherah idol, the practice of offering incense to animal figures may well have an Egyptian provenance. The motivation was probably apotropaic, that is, to ward off dangers from demonic forces. Their actions provide a shocking contrast to the seventy "elders of Israel" in the Pentateuch, Israel's leaders in the desert period, who received the unique privilege of seeing God (Ex. 24:1–11) and were endowed with the same Spirit as Moses (Num. 11:16–30). Here these "non-Spirit-filled" elders find justification for their conduct in the belief that the Lord does not see (Ezek. 8:12). One of their number is named as Jaazaniah, who is designated the son of Shaphan—and thus equally shockingly associated with a family that was prominent in the reforms of Josiah's days (2 Kings 22:3–14).

The identity of these secret transgressors as "elders of the house of Israel" is repeated for emphasis in the next verse (Ezek. 8:12), along with their own self-justification for their idolatrous acts: "The LORD does not see us; the LORD has forsaken the land." In the light of what they saw as God's abandonment of them, they felt justified in pursuing other deities who might help out. The Lord's response to this statement will emerge in 9:9; however, for the present it is sufficient to point to the vision itself as contradicting their belief. The Lord does indeed see, as the repeated refrain "Son of man, do you see . . . ?" underlines (8:6, 12, 15, 17). Far from the Lord's having abandoned the land, it is they who have driven the Lord away (8:6). Far from their incense-burning being an effective means of warding off dangers, it is one of the causes of God's impending judgment on them. Ironically, it is their vision that is clouded, not the Lord's.

- (3) Worse still is the sight of women weeping for Tammuz at the north gate of the temple itself (8:14–15). With each new scene we approach closer to the heart of Israel's worship. Weeping for Tammuz was a Babylonian ritual, marking the death and descent into the underworld of the god Dumuzi, whose mythological course of death and "resurrection" (or more accurately, "return") was thought to be parallel to the annual rhythm of nature. The cultic act of mourning was believed to counteract the loss of power of new life, thus hastening the return of fertility. Lamentation for the dead had been substituted for the worship of the living God. 12
- (4) The final and supreme act of idolatry takes place within the inner court of the temple itself, where Ezekiel sees twenty-five men turning their backs on the temple proper and prostrating themselves to the east, in worship of the sun (8:16).¹³ This is the ultimate abomination: Instead of bowing down to worship the Lord and seeking his face, they turn their backs on God and worship the created order.

In four brief scenes, then, Ezekiel has been shown the comprehensive nature of the sins of Jerusalem. Their sin extends from outside the city gate to the inner courtyard of the temple itself. It involves both men and women, even the seventy elders, symbolic of the leadership of the whole people. It includes idolatry imported from all sorts of surrounding nations (Canaan, Egypt, and Babylon) and involving all kinds of gods (male and female human figures, animal figures, and stellar bodies). This is a unified, universalized religion, the ultimate multifaith worship service. From the Lord's perspective, however, the picture is one of abomination piled on abomination.

The combination of such a mass of idolatry with their sins against humanity (summarized in 8:17 under the general title "violence") is an explosive mixture. They have continually provoked the Lord to anger and will now receive their just desserts. Even as the ax is poised to fall, their last gesture is one of defiant idolatry, "putting the branch to their nose" (8:17). They will receive what they deserve as the Lord deals with them in his wrath, neither pitying nor sparing. He will be deaf to their loudest cries for help.

What is more, the Lord will do some shouting of his own, and unlike their ineffectual cries, his voice will make things happen (Ezek. 9:1).¹⁵ He summons six "guards," each of whom appears armed with a club. These guards would normally have had the responsibility of standing at the gates, protecting the realm of the sacred from profane intrusion.¹⁶ Here they appear together with a priestly figure dressed in linen, armed only with a writing kit.

These figures are normally interpreted as angelic beings because of their superhuman role in the vision and the symbolic nature of their total number (seven). However, it is worth noting that if 9:1–2 existed as a fragment, without the surrounding context, we would naturally understand it as speaking of normal human figures obeying the summons of the king. This helps us to remember the dual nature of these figures. On the one hand, in the vision they are the angelic servants of the Most High, wreaking his judgments on the earth; on the other hand, those same judgments are carried out in history through human agency, so the six destroyers may equally aptly be seen to represent the Babylonian invaders. If this much is true, is it not also true that the seventh figure, the priestly writer, acts in some sense as Ezekiel's own alter ego? He obediently passes among the people prior to the judgment, distinguishing the righteous from the wicked, marking out those who sigh and cry¹⁷ over the detestable things done in Jerusalem (9:4).

Hard on his heels come the agents of destruction, who themselves take on the attitude of God toward the people (9:5): They are to strike (cf. 7:9) without pity or compassion (cf. 8:18). Their destructive work is a kind of reenactment of the first Passover, only with Judah instead of Egypt as the scene of the devastation. Just as the Lord passed through ('ābar, Ex. 12:23) Egypt, handing over those without a protective mark to the destroyer (mašhît, Ex. 12:23), so also the six are to "pass through" ('ābar) the city,

"slaughtering to destruction" (tahargû l^emašḥît) anyone who does not bear the mark. All those without the mark are to be slain—young and old, male and female (Ezek. 9:5–6).¹⁸ The categories listed demonstrate that even the defenseless, the frail, and the innocent are condemned to destruction.¹⁹

The slaughter is to begin at the temple with the chief idolaters: the twenty-five elders who were worshiping the sun (9:6; cf. 8:16). Unlike in the case of Queen Athaliah, who was dragged out of the temple complex before being executed so that it would not be defiled by her blood (2 Kings 11:15–16), now the killing takes place within the temple itself (Ezek. 9:7). It is already so contaminated by their idolatry that God himself has no compunction about defiling it further (9:7; cf. 7:22: "They will desecrate my treasured place").

In the midst of the carnage, Ezekiel is left alone (9:8) before the Lord. He begins to fear that he may really be all alone—a remnant of one—and he cries out "Ah, Sovereign LORD! Are you going to destroy the entire remnant of Israel in this outpouring of your wrath on Jerusalem?" The Lord's answer to the prophet's question appears to be yes. He points to the depth of the abominations and sin of the house of Israel and Judah. The land is full of bloodshed and the city full of injustice. The attitude of the elders is summed up in this phrase: "The LORD has forsaken the land; the LORD does not see" (9:9). Therefore, they can expect no pity or compassion, but just retribution for their actions, which is the final proof that he has indeed seen everything that has transpired.

Yet at this critical juncture, precisely when it appears that all hope is gone, suddenly the priestly figure with the writing kit reappears, saying, "I have done as you commanded" (9:11). His appearance also answers Ezekiel's question concerning the remnant, for he stands mute testimony to the Lord's purpose to save those who sigh and mourn over the abominations of Jerusalem. We are not told how many he has marked—indeed, we are not even told that he has marked any—yet his presence acts to mitigate slightly the awful severity of the judgment, just as the rainbow of 1:28 tempers slightly the coming windstorm of God's wrath. As at the time of the Exodus, there is shelter from God's destruction for those who are willing to take refuge in the appointed sign. But on this occasion, it seems that those being saved will indeed be few.

Bridging Contexts

ROTTEN TO THE CORE. When interpreting these chapters, it is essential to remember that what is recorded here is a vision. That does not mean that the events recounted here are unrelated to reality: For instance, the destruction of Jerusalem that Ezekiel witnessed was the foreshadowing of the very real destruction of that city by the Babylonians in 586 B.C. But it does mean that they are not directly related to historical events. The six armed guards represent the Babylonian forces,²⁰ but they are not the same as them. This distinction means that we should not assume that the view Ezekiel received of Jerusalem would have been that open to anyone touring the temple precincts in 592 B.C.; rather, it is a stylized representation of reality intended to make a particular point.²¹

That particular point is not hard to find: The core of Israel's being is rotten with idolatry. The people as a whole had abandoned the true God and instead gone after every possible alternative god. Even when the worship took place in the temple precincts (under the title of Yahwism?), the true God was not being worshiped. The incompatibility of the alien religions with the true religion is nowhere clearer than in the case of the twenty-five sun-worshipers, who turn their backs on the temple building proper (and thus on the Lord) to carry out their devotions (8:16). If the bastion of true religion has thus been infected, then there must be no true worship left anywhere in Israel.

Yet in the midst of this comprehensive catalog of idolatry, we should not miss the essentially lay and democratic nature of the cults described.²² There are no priestly or royal figures leading the worship; instead, the leading figures are repeatedly identified as "elders." It is thus the mass of the laity, represented by the elders, who are identified as primarily responsible for the idolatrous abominations that fill the land.²³ This observation, of course, grows in significance when it is remembered that Ezekiel's audience is composed of "the elders of Judah" (8:1). There is no one else on whom to lay the blame for Jerusalem's destruction.

The Lord as a God of judgment. The result of comprehensive idolatry is apparently comprehensive slaughter. The practice of holy war, whereby all the inhabitants of a town were to be slaughtered, was commanded by God when Israel occupied the Promised Land. On that occasion, Israel filled the place of the armed angelic beings, acting as agents of God's righteous judgment. They functioned as the human equivalent of the burning sulfur from heaven that destroyed Sodom and Gomorrah and all its residents, young and old. The Canaanites were not to be destroyed because they were in the way of progress, innocent bystanders mown down by the juggernaut of God's gentrification of their neighborhood. They were judged because their sin reached full measure, as Abraham had been informed (Gen. 15:16). Now, however, Israel has become exactly like the Canaanites they replaced; their sin has reached full measure, and God's judgment will descend likewise on them.

This is an aspect of God's character that we do not often think about. We like to think of God as "the LORD, the LORD, the compassionate and gracious God, slow to anger, abounding in love and faithfulness, maintaining love to thousands, and forgiving wickedness, rebellion and sin" (Ex. 34:6–7). Yet he goes on to reveal himself also as the One who "does not leave the guilty unpunished; he punishes the children and their children for the sin of the fathers to the third and fourth generation." As one writer comments about the fate of Sodom and Gomorrah: "The Lord waits long to be gracious, as if he knew not how to smite. He smites at last as if he knew not how to pity."²⁴ When judgment fell on Canaan, it was swift, inexorable, completely lacking in pity. Now the "new Canaanites," Israel will experience the same inexorable wrath of God.

Such a concept of judgment is not palatable to modern minds. But we may not realize that it was no more palatable to ancient "civilized" thought either. The ancient heretic Marcion drew a radical distinction between the wrath-filled God of the Old Testament and the purely loving God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, revealed in the New Testament. In response, Tertullian pointed out what an emasculated, inconsistent figure Marcion's god was. This supposed deity:

plainly judges evil by not willing it, and condemns it by prohibiting it; while on the other hand, he acquits it by not avenging it, and lets it go free by not punishing it. What a prevaricator of truth is such a god! What a dissembler to his own decision! Afraid to condemn what he really condemns, afraid to hate what he does not love, permitting that to be done which he does not allow, choosing to indicate what he dislikes rather than deeply examine it!²⁵

Such an attitude of speaking forcefully against evil, while all the time being unwilling to act against it, is considered utterly reprehensible in world leaders. Yet Marcion's modern followers, who shy away from the idea of God's wrath against sin, have a picture of God that makes him appear not unlike Neville Chamberlain, returning from Munich waving a piece of paper proclaiming, "Peace in our time!" unwilling to confront the growing power of Hitler with actions. In Niebuhr's classic description of liberal theology, they picture "a God without wrath, who brought men without sin into a kingdom without judgment, through the ministrations of a Christ without a cross."²⁶

Holy war stands as the clearest possible declaration of God's commitment to the purity and holiness of his people, totally separate from possibly defiling influences. God's holiness remains implacably opposed to sin. In the present, we are therefore enrolled as his people in a no-holds-barred contest with the forces of the evil one (Eph. 6:10–18), while in the future there will yet come a day when God's wrath will be poured out comprehensively on the wicked (Rom. 2:5).

Vengeance belongs to the Lord. At the same time, there is a danger with being too comfortable proclaiming the wrath of God. In those periods of history where the church has been entirely comfortable with divine judgment, people have sometimes been quick to call it down on their opponents or set themselves up as the agents of divine vengeance. Jesus had to rebuke James and John for wishing to initiate eschatological vengeance (fire from heaven) on a village that would not receive Jesus (Luke 9:54). In our present situation in redemptive history, we are not to slaughter our enemies but to win them over with inexplicable deeds of tolerance and kindness (Matt. 5:39–42; Rom. 12:17–21). Now is the time for the preaching of the gospel to all nations, the bringing in of those who are outside into the covenant community.

What gives urgency to our task is the knowledge that there is a sure and certain Day of Judgment coming. Perhaps it may be a morning like this, when people are out taking their kids to school and doing the shopping. They may be planning weekend trips to Disneyland and the lake, looking forward to weddings and family gatherings, busy with the chatter of what they did yesterday and what they plan to do tomorrow. On just such a day the heavenly shout will be heard, just as Ezekiel heard it in his vision, and the time of judgment will begin. Those spared in that judgment will be only those who, like Ezekiel's remnant, sigh and mourn over the abominations that surround them and whose foreheads have been marked out with the name of the Lamb and of his Father (Rev. 14:1). For the rest, there will be nothing to expect but eternal fire. The destruction of the idolaters of Jerusalem stands for us as an awful warning of God's wrath to come.

Contemporary Significance

CONTEMPORARY IDOLATRIES. In all good soap operas—and most bad ones as well—the plot revolves around the various idolatries of the characters. Now I have to confess at this point that I am not a regular watcher of soap operas, so I cannot really speak from first-hand experience. But while doing some academic research on the subject I came across this summary of the characters in Melrose Place:

Sydney has been a hooker, an exotic dancer, and a drug addict. Jo harpooned Reed, the father of her child, then Kimberly kidnapped the kid, forcing Jo to go to the authorities, who put the child up for adoption so that neither one would have it. Matt was framed for the murder of his lover; Jake pushed his half-brother off a building; Alison became an alcoholic; went into recovery, then fell off the wagon again, before temporarily going blind in the 1995 explosion (courtesy of Kimberly) that blew the apartment complex to bits.²⁷

Just an everyday tale of ordinary folk, isn't it? It tells the story of the usual selection of lust, love, murder, mayhem, and addictive behaviors. Well, perhaps it is not exactly everyday, but what makes these soap operas so fascinating to people is the fact that these characters have no restraints on the expression of their idolatries. Why do they fall into bed with one another so easily? It is because their feelings of lust have become an idolatry, an idolatry that says that nothing in the world is of comparable significance to meeting the demands of these feelings right now. God's law, which forbids immorality and adultery, is considered by them a matter of relatively insignificant weight.

Why do they murder one another at the drop of a hat? It is because their feelings of jealousy and anger have become an idolatry that says, "Feed me or I will make your life miserable!" Why do they lie and cheat and steal? It is because their covetous hearts have fastened onto an idol that they must have, regardless of the consequences. These are idolaters who live out the full scope of their idolatries. Face it, without idolatry every soap opera would be reduced to the most basic, not to say boring, story lines.

In Ezekiel 8, the prophet depicted abominations of Melrose Place proportions. In this chapter, he sees four visions of idolatrous groups operating within the Jerusalem temple itself, turning it from the Lord's place into Marduk's Place . . . and Asherah's Place and the home of every idolatry under the sun. To those involved in these idolatrous practices, he gives the warning that the result of comprehensive idolatry will be comprehensive slaughter, which he describes in visionary form in Ezekiel 9.

The dangers of practical polytheism. We too face an abundance of idols all around us in our multicultural age. Frequently, people speak of ours as being an age of pluralism, as if that somehow makes our time distinct from the past. This is palpable nonsense, for at many times in the past, not least during the New Testament era and the time of the Exile, God's people have found themselves placed in a melting pot of world religions. The options available in the "marketplace of religions" have often been just as diverse in previous centuries as they are at present.

In the face of such diversity, several responses are possible. Some take a smorgasbord approach and "mix and match" elements from a variety of religions according to their own taste.²⁸ Such a "practical polytheism" may well be popular with the man or woman in the street, for it demands only what you wish to give and offers whatever you wish to ask. It makes no unwanted ethical demands, though it can take an ascetic form if that is your preference. The reward it offers can be an ethereal nirvana or materialistic success or a combination of both, depending on your taste.²⁹ In short, the hallmark of any pluralistic age is that idolatry comes in all shapes and sizes and encourages us to attend regularly the church or religious institution of our choice.

In contrast, the Bible urges us that the "choice" facing us is not between equally valid methods of expressing our spirituality but between truth and falsehood, between worshiping the God who created us or bowing down to abominations that are not gods at all. The essence of idolatry is not so much denying the reality of God but the relevance of God. Thus the saying of the elders of the house of Israel was, "The LORD does not see us; the LORD has forsaken the land" (8:12). They did not deny the existence of God but simply asserted his irrelevance. This perhaps sheds some light on the repeated finding in the polls that an overwhelming proportion of Americans believe in God's existence and in the Bible as his Word, yet never go to church or read the Bible. They are practical polytheists, who have created a religion to fit their own preferences.

Sometimes such practical polytheism even invades the church. There are those who support the idea of "multifaith" services, on the grounds that we are really all worshiping the same God, only under different labels. Ezekiel's vision, on the other hand, would categorically condemn such an approach. All of the worship that he sees, no matter what its source or how exalted and noble its liturgy, is a matter of turning one's back on the Lord, of foul abominations for which the judgment of God is coming on his people.

Nor is that simply a matter of Old Testament narrow-mindedness on Ezekiel's part. The apostle Paul is equally insistent on the incompatibility of Christianity and other religions. He urges the Corinthian Christians to flee from idolatry (1 Cor. 10:14). They are not to participate in pagan sacrifices alongside their Christian profession, for as he says: "You cannot drink the cup of the Lord and the cup of demons too; you cannot have a part in both the Lord's table and the table of demons. Are we trying to arouse the Lord's jealousy? Are we stronger than he?" (1 Cor. 10:21–22). For Paul, just as much as for Ezekiel, participation in idolatry will rouse the Lord's jealousy, a thing greatly to be feared.

Baptism as an identifying mark. This radical distinction between the community of God's people and the rest of the world is the reason why we are baptized. Baptism, similar to circumcision in the old covenant, functions as a mark placed on an individual, identifying him or her as belonging to the covenant community.³⁰ It is a sign that they are under the authority of the covenant overlord, God himself. This aspect of baptism as marking one out from the world and under the authority of Christ is frequently not understood today. William Willimon tells of an experience he had after participating in a panel discussion on "Homosexuality and the Church." After the discussion, a young man came up to him saying that he was "a baptized Episcopalian" and "none of you have a right to tell me who I am. I define myself." Willimon's response to this person was to point out that if his first declaration were true ("I am a baptized Episcopalian"), his second declaration ("none of you have a right to tell me who I am") was necessarily false. In baptizing the young man, the church had staked a clear claim to tell him who he was.³¹

As those who have been baptized, we do not have the right to "choose for ourselves" whom we will serve or how we will serve. We are members of Christ's army, men and women under authority, who have been given our marching orders in the Scriptures. We must march in step with our commander or face the consequences. Within the church there is no room for compromise. Our devotion and loyalty must be uniquely committed to the Lord. Within our hearts we must be aware of our own idolatries and root them out remorselessly through the repeated application of the Truth, God's Word. Moreover, we need to practice in our churches the kind of challenging preaching and biblical church discipline that confronts people's comfortable idolatries with the truth of God's wrath and the danger of being deceived into thinking that such idolatry can safely coexist with a Christian profession of faith. As Richard Lovelace puts it:

We may need to challenge more, and comfort less, in our evangelism and discipleship. We need to make it harder for people to retain assurance of salvation when they move into serious sin. . . . We need to tell some persons who think they have gotten saved to get lost. The Puritans were biblically realistic about this; we have become sloppy and sentimental in promoting assurance under any circumstances.³²

A proper attitude toward idolatry outside the church. Yet that does not mean that we must adopt a belligerent attitude to members of other religions. As we have already noted, Paul's attitude among the philosophers of Mars Hill in Athens, recorded in Acts 17, was different both from that of Ezekiel's vision and his own attitude toward the Corinthians. Surrounded by the temples of false religion, far from calling down fire and brimstone on them, he instead addressed them respectfully as people who were very religious (Acts 17:22). His attitude to idolatry outside the church was thus radically different to idolatry inside the church. To the pagans he spoke with great politeness, seeking to present the gospel to them in a winsome manner. But to those who sought to bring pagan practices from the outside into the church, he had no tolerance.

Similarly, we should be polite and respectful in our dealings with people who are not Christians. Whether they come to your door attempting to share their faith with you or you encounter them in your regular course of life, your motto should be 1 Peter 3:15–16: "Always be prepared to give an answer to everyone who asks you to give the reason for the hope that you have. But do this with gentleness and respect, keeping a clear conscience, so that those who speak maliciously against your good behavior in Christ may be ashamed of their slander." Yet as we answer them with politeness and gentleness, we must be under no illusions that they are simply seeking God by a different route, far less that "it doesn't matter what you believe as long as you are sincere." On the contrary, we are to remember with Peter that there is a judgment coming that begins "with the family of God; and if it begins with us, what will the outcome be for those who do not obey the gospel of God?" (1 Peter 4:17).

I LOOKED, AND I SAW the likeness of a throne of sapphire above the expanse that was over the heads of the cherubim. ²The LORD said to the man clothed in linen, "Go in among the wheels beneath the cherubim. Fill your hands with burning coals from among the cherubim and scatter them over the city." And as I watched, he went in.

³Now the cherubim were standing on the south side of the temple when the man went in, and a cloud filled the inner court. ⁴Then the glory of the LORD rose from above the cherubim and moved to the threshold of the temple. The cloud filled the temple, and the court was full of the radiance of the glory of the LORD. ⁵The sound of the wings of the cherubim could be heard as far away as the outer court, like the voice of God Almighty when he speaks.

⁹I looked, and I saw beside the cherubim four wheels, one beside each of the cherubim; the wheels sparkled like chrysolite. ¹⁰As for their appearance, the four of them looked alike; each was like a wheel intersecting a wheel. ¹¹As they moved, they would go in any one of the four directions the cherubim faced; the wheels did not turn about as the cherubim went.

The cherubim went in whatever direction the head faced, without turning as they went. ¹²Their entire bodies, including their backs, their hands and their wings, were completely full of eyes, as were their four wheels. ¹³I heard the wheels being called "the whirling wheels." ¹⁴Each of the cherubim had four faces: One face was that of a cherub, the second the face of a man, the third the face of a lion, and the fourth the face of an eagle.

¹⁵Then the cherubim rose upward. These were the living creatures I had seen by the Kebar River. ¹⁶When the cherubim moved, the wheels beside them moved; and when the cherubim spread their wings to rise from the ground, the wheels did not leave their side. ¹⁷When the cherubim stood still, they also stood still; and when the cherubim rose, they rose with them, because the spirit of the living creatures was in them.

²⁰These were the living creatures I had seen beneath the God of Israel by the Kebar River, and I realized that they were cherubim. ²¹Each had four faces and four wings, and under their wings was what looked like the hands of a man. ²²Their faces had the same appearance as those I had seen by the Kebar River. Each one went straight ahead.

11:1Then the Spirit lifted me up and brought me to the gate of the house of the LORD that faces east. There at the entrance to the gate were twenty-five men, and I saw among them Jaazaniah son of Azzur and Pelatiah son of Benaiah, leaders of the people. ²The LORD said to me, "Son of man, these are the men who are plotting evil and giving wicked advice in this city. ³They say, 'Will it not soon be time to build houses? This city is a cooking pot, and we are the meat.' ⁴Therefore prophesy against them; prophesy, son of man."

⁵Then the Spirit of the LORD came upon me, and he told me to say: "This is what the LORD says: That is what you are saying, O house of Israel, but I know what is going through your mind. ⁶You have killed many people in this city and filled its streets with the dead.

7"Therefore this is what the Sovereign LORD says: The bodies you have thrown there are the meat and this city is the pot, but I will drive you out of it. ⁸You fear the sword, and the sword is what I will bring against you, declares the Sovereign LORD. 9I will drive you out of the city and hand you over to foreigners and inflict punishment on you. ¹⁰You will fall by the sword, and I will execute judgment on you at the borders of Israel. Then you will know that I am the LORD. ¹¹This city will not be a pot for you, nor will you be the meat in it; I will execute judgment on you at the borders of Israel. ¹²And you will know that I am the LORD, for you have not followed my decrees or kept my laws but have conformed to the standards of the nations around you."

¹³Now as I was prophesying, Pelatiah son of Benaiah died. Then I fell facedown and cried out in a loud voice, "Ah, Sovereign LORD! Will you completely destroy the remnant of Israel?"

¹⁴The word of the LORD came to me: ¹⁵"Son of man, your brothers—your brothers who are your blood relatives and the whole house of Israel—are those of whom the people of Jerusalem have said, 'They are far away from the LORD; this land was given to us as our possession.'

16"Therefore say: 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says: Although I sent them far away among the nations and scattered them among the countries, yet for a little while I have been a sanctuary for them in the countries where they have gone.'

17"Therefore say: 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says: I will gather you from the nations and bring you back from the countries where you have been scattered, and I will give you back the land of Israel again.'

¹⁸"They will return to it and remove all its vile images and detestable idols. ¹⁹I will give them an undivided heart and put a new spirit in them; I will remove from them their heart of stone and give them a heart of flesh. ²⁰Then they will follow my decrees and be careful to keep my laws. They will be my people, and I will be their God. ²¹But as for those whose hearts are devoted to their vile images and detestable idols, I will bring down on their own heads what they have done, declares the Sovereign LORD."

Then the vision I had seen went up from me, ²⁵and I told the exiles everything the LORD had shown me.

Original Meaning

WHILE FOR THE purposes of simplicity we have treated Ezekiel 8–9 separately from Ezekiel 10–11, it must not be forgotten that they belong together as a single vision. In fact, there is a structure underlying the whole sequence of these four chapters, which may be analyzed as follows:

- A: Introduction to the vision, including reference to divine glory (8:1–4)
 - B: Four visions of cultic abominations, along with accusations of social wrongdoing, centering on the elders (8:5–18)
 - C: A vision of divine judgment on account of cultic abominations and social wrongdoing, beginning with the elders (9:1–10:7)
 - D: The prophet intercedes with God to preserve a remnant (9:8)
 - E: The departure of the divine glory from the temple and city (10:8–22)
 - B': Accusation of social wrongdoing, centering on the leaders of the people (11:1–6)
 - C': A message of divine judgment on the leaders, followed by a vision of divine judgment on Pelatiah, one of the "leaders of the people" (s'ārê hā'ām; 11:7–13)
 - D': The prophet intercedes with God to preserve a remnant (11:13)
 - E': The promise of the divine presence with the exiles as a temporary "sanctuary" and the eventual return of the exiles (11:14–21)
- A': Conclusion of the vision, including reference to the divine glory (11:22–25)

The structure of the vision makes its fundamental message clear: It is about the location of the presence of God. If God were still present in his temple in Jerusalem, then the confidence of those who remain in the land would perhaps be justified. But what this temple vision shows conclusively is that because of the sins of the inhabitants of Judah, both in terms of their responsibilities toward God and of their responsibilities toward their fellow human beings, the glory has departed from Judah and gone to dwell with those living in exile. The first have become the last and the last have become first.

Chapter 10 opens with a continuation of the judgment scene of Ezekiel 9. There we saw the city being overrun by divinely appointed executioners, scattering dead bodies in their wake as if starring in a cosmic Rambo movie. Now, on top of that destruction of life, follows the destruction of property. The seventh angel returns to the fray. This is a priestly figure, who in Ezekiel 9 is the sole mediator of life in the midst of the cataclysm, marking out for salvation those who sigh and mourn over the abominations of the city. This time, however, his action is not intended for salvation but for destruction. At the Lord's command, he takes burning coals from beneath the heavenly throne in order to burn the city to the ground (10:2). Like the city of Sodom, who Ezekiel calls Jerusalem's "sister" in 16:46, Jerusalem will be burned up by fire from on high.

Ezekiel is here simply giving us a glimpse behind the scenes at the cosmic realities that underlie history. When the physical Jerusalem fell to Nebuchadnezzar and was razed to the ground in 586 B.C., the Babylonians were nothing more than the human instruments in the hands of an angry God. In the ancient Near East, it was a commonplace that a city could not be captured unless its gods were either defeated or had abandoned it to its fate. Thus the Cyrus Cylinder, which records the victory of the Persians over Babylon in 539 B.C., tells how Marduk was angry at the cultic and social sins of the Babylonian king and therefore departed from the city, leading to its destruction and the annihilation of its population. Similarly here, the Lord's wrath at the sins of the people leads to his departure from his chosen city and its consequent destruction.

After the priestly figure departs to carry out the Lord's bidding, there follows a renewed description of the divine chariot with its supernatural attendants. The lengths to which the prophet goes to describe the vision of the divine glory may seem redundant to us, but they serve to underline its status as the central feature of the whole temple vision. What Ezekiel sees is exactly the same vision as he saw in chapter 1 (in Babylonia!), but here in the temple context, certain features snap into sharper focus. In the building filled with representations of cherubim, it becomes clear to the prophet that the "living creatures" he saw in chapter 1 are themselves cherubim.³

On top of the cherubim, the prophet sees a throne, at first empty (Ezek. 10:1). The divine chariot is drawn up on the south side of the temple (10:3), as far away as possible from the abominations on the northern side of the city. Then Ezekiel sees a cloud filling the inner court and the glory of God on the move once more, just as it had been in the days of the desert wanderings (cf. Ex. 40:34–37). It departs slowly, haltingly, as if reluctant to leave.4 First it passes from the earthly cherubim in the Most Holy Place to the threshold of the temple (Ezek. 10:4), then from the threshold of the temple to the divine chariot over the (real) cherubim (10:18). From there the glory moves to the east gate of the temple courtyard (10:19), where there is a pause during which the prophet receives a further oracle and vision. Finally the glory moves on to the Mount of Olives, east of Jerusalem, outside the city limits. The city itself is now effectively doomed, cut off from divine aid from its true protector, waiting for the ax to fall. The Lord has abandoned the city to the empty hope offered by the idols for which the people abandoned him.

Not everyone within the city of Jerusalem has the same perspective, however. At the entrance to the east gate, Ezekiel sees a group of men whose number (twenty-five, Ezek. 11:1) and whose function (giving advice, v. 2) suggest them to be elders. Included in their number are two "leaders of the people" ($s'\bar{a}r\hat{e}\ h\bar{a}'\bar{a}m$), who are named as Jaazaniah ben Azzur (not the same as Jaazaniah ben Shaphan in 8:11) and Pelatiah. The "leaders" ($s'\bar{a}r\hat{i}m$) were a small council of high officials of the king, who wielded considerable power in Judah. During the reign of Zedekiah, they apparently extended their powers in the face of his weakness and were even able to act independently of the king to some degree (see Jer. 38:25).

In the vision, Ezekiel is told that these leaders have been "plotting evil and giving wicked advice in this city" (Ezek. 11:2). In opposition to the prophetic word of forthcoming judgment on Jerusalem, they have apparently been arrogantly asserting the security of their position. The exact meaning of the terse expression in 11:3a (lit., "not near building houses") has been much debated. The NIV, along with most translations and commentators, takes the "near" in a temporal sense, construing the phrase as a question: "Will it not soon be time to build houses?" However, a better sense is obtained if "near" is taken in a spatial sense, so that the inhabitants of Judah are referring to themselves as those who are "near," in contrast to the exiles as those who are "far away" (cf. 11:15). The phrase then becomes, "It is not for the one who is near to build houses," with an obvious reference to the letter that Jeremiah sent the exiles urging them to "build houses" (Jer. 29:5). As Fairbairn paraphrases it: "Those who are far off in the land of exile may, if they please, take the prophet's advice and set about building houses for themselves; that does not concern us." 10

This understanding seems to fit better with the second half of their statement: "This city is a cooking pot, and we are the meat" (Ezek. 11:3b). This may be interpreted as a statement of the relative value of those who remain in Jerusalem and the exiles (the best part, the "meat," is put in the cooking pot while the undesired portion, the offal, is thrown into the fire). Alternatively, it may speak of the relative safety of the Jerusalemites (the cooking pot, while not a safe place to be, is at least better than being in the fire—as is implied in our proverb "Out of the frying pan, into the fire), or it may imply both. In either case, a contrast is implied between those who remain in Jerusalem and the exiles, a contrast that favors the inhabitants of the city.

To pick up the further quotation of their thoughts in 11:15, on the Jerusalemites' view, "They [the exiles] are¹⁴ far away from the LORD; this land was given to us as our possession." On the grounds that "possession is nine-tenths of the law," they regard the de facto situation as an expression of God's favor on them and displeasure with those in exile. They think of themselves as the true remnant while those in exile are under God's judgment.

In the oracle that follows, the Lord rejects their claim. Because of the violent crimes committed by these leaders, by which they have filled the city with corpses, the city will provide no protection for them (11:7). The sword that they fear will come on them and they will fall by it (11:8, 10). The land will not be their possession; rather, the Lord will bring them out of the city to judge them at the very edge of the land, at the "borders of Israel" (11:10–11).

In this prophecy there is not simply reference to the actual events of history, whereby many of the leading citizens were put to death by Nebuchadnezzar at Riblah (2 Kings 25:21), but more fundamentally there is a challenge to the Jerusalemites' claim to possess the land. The language is carefully chosen to depict their fate as a kind of anti-exodus. The Lord will "drive them out of the city," just as he earlier brought Israel out of the land of Egypt (Ezek. 11:9; cf. Ex. 6:6). Whereas once he promised to deliver Israel from the hand of the Egyptians (Ex. 3:8), now he threatens to give them into the hand of foreigners (Ezek. 11:9). The judgments that once fell on Egypt (Ex. 6:6; 12:12) now fall on the inhabitants of Jerusalem (Ezek. 11:10). In this context, the phrase "the borders of Israel" evokes the division of the land under Joshua, where the borders of all of the tribes were established (Josh. 15–19; cf. Ezek. 48!). Far from the land of Canaan being their "possession" (Ezek. 11:15; cf. Ex. 6:8), which they may divide among themselves without regard to the exiles, the inhabitants of Jerusalem will die outside the land because of their failure to keep the Lord's decrees and laws. It will be shown that they are not a privileged "remnant" after all.

Ezekiel then once more sees enacted in visionary form God's judgment. As in Ezekiel 9, where he saw the idolatrous elders cut down as the firstfruits of God's judgment (9:6), so also here he sees one of the "leaders of the people," Pelatiah, die while Ezekiel is carrying out the Lord's command to prophesy against him (11:4). In both instances, Ezekiel's response to this demonstration of the reality of God's judgment is to fall on his face and cry out the question: "Sovereign LORD! Will you completely destroy the remnant of Israel?" (11:13; cf. 9:8). Up to a point, Ezekiel shares the presuppositions of the Jerusalemites. God's land and God's people are an indivisible unity. Those already in exile are therefore, by definition, "far from God." If then, in addition to the previous catastrophe, comprehensive judgment falls on those who remain in the land, who will be left? Surely the whole house of Israel will then be destroyed. The end of the tunnel will have been reached, with no way out.

The Lord responded with words of judgment without compassion—yet the reappearance of the priestly figure with his writing kit left room for hope that some righteous remnant might have been found to survive the holocaust (9:9–11). But the response to Ezekiel's second cry (11:13) is a glorious declaration that the future of Israel lies among the exiles: It is Ezekiel and his brothers and "blood relatives" —his fellow exiles—who constitute "the whole house of Israel" (11:15). Yes, they have been sent far away from the land of Israel, but even there they have not been cast out of the Lord's presence because "for a little while I have been a sanctuary for them in the countries where they have gone" (11:16). By this we see that the Lord's movement is not simply a departure from Jerusalem, on account of the idolatries that have profaned the sanctuary there (8:6), but also a departure to Babylon, to be a sanctuary for his true people there.

But the Lord's exile, like that of his true people, is only a temporary state of affairs.¹⁷ The counterpart of the anti-exodus of the Lord's nonpeople from Judah will be a new exodus of the Lord's true people from all the nations to which they have been scattered. They will be brought back once more (11:17; cf. Ex. 6:6); the land that Ezekiel cannot redeem for his redemption relatives (Ezek. 11:15) will be redeemed for them by the Lord (cf. Ex. 6:6).¹⁸ The detestable idols and vile images with which the former inhabitants filled the land (Ezek. 7:20; 8:3–17) will be removed by the new inhabitants (11:18).

The reason for this change in behavior is, quite literally, a change of heart. The Lord will create in his new people "an undivided heart," not so much in the sense of mutual agreement among the people, but rather in the sense of undivided loyalty to the Lord, a single-minded commitment to him (cf. Jer. 32:39). In place of the old spirit, whose mindset resulted in death (Ezek. 11:5–6), God's new people will be given "a new spirit." They will receive "a heart of flesh" that will respond to the Lord in place of their old stony heart (cf. 3:7). In contrast to the present occupants of the land, who neither follow the Lord's decrees nor keep his laws (11:12), his new people will observe both decrees and laws (11:20). The result of such renewal will be nothing less than the fulfillment of the goal of the first exodus: "They will be my people, and I will be their God" (11:20; cf. Ex. 6:7). This is the first substantive indication in Ezekiel of a solid hope for the future for God's people in exile.

There is, however, no such promising hope for those who remain in the land: They remain committed to idolatry and abominations, for which the judgment they receive will be fully deserved (Ezek. 11:21). Thus ends Ezekiel's temple vision: The glory departs from the temple and moves off onto the Mount of Olives, across from Jerusalem, as if waiting to see the judgment on the rebellious city completed, while the prophet is returned to his own people in exile.

Bridging Contexts

DIVINE ABANDONMENT and identification. The temptation to believe that God is statically tied to one location is not one that immediately occurs to us. Yet that difference of perspective is not simply a matter of "evolutionary progress" in our thought, as if modern people like us have advanced beyond such "primitive" ideas. Solomon himself recognized the incongruity of supposing that the One who created the universe would dwell in a house made with human hands (1 Kings 8:27). Yet he also recognized that the Lord had chosen to link himself and his honor in a unique way with the temple in Jerusalem. It was the place he had chosen to set his Name (1 Kings 8:29; cf. Deut. 12:11), the sole place where sacrifices were to be offered to the Lord.

It was therefore no light thing when Solomon's successors repeatedly failed to honor the temple as such, allowing or even encouraging idolatry and syncretistic worship at the high places throughout the land. If God really were the true God and not simply an ineffectual idol, such a history of unfaithfulness and abominations, which culminated in Ezekiel's vision of chapter 8, could only lead to disaster. So it did in 586 B.C. The One who had sovereignly set his Name on Jerusalem could, and finally did, remove his favor and protection.

It is hard for us, as modern people, to relate to the scale of such a catastrophe in the minds of God's people. Yet Ezekiel's message was not simply one of divine abandonment. It was also one of divine identification. God was leaving Jerusalem to its fate but he was not leaving himself without a remnant. The answer to Ezekiel's twice-posed question: "Are you going to destroy the entire remnant of Israel?" was "Yes and No." Yes, the remnant who remained in Judah were slated for further catastrophic judgment, from which the survival of any was an entirely moot prospect.²⁰ But no, that did not mean the end for God's people. A remnant already existed in exile, who would experience God's presence with them in exile for a little while, after which there would be a new exodus and a return to the Promised Land.

God's true presence among the human race. But even the experience of exile and return did not bring about the full blessings of the covenant. True, there was a kind of "second exodus" during the time of Cyrus, with the return of many Jews to their homeland (Ezra 1).²¹ With the encouragement of the prophets Haggai and Zechariah, the second temple was built. Yet there is a pervasive feeling of incompleteness in the postexilic writings—a sense that there is something more to come.²² There was no physical manifestation of the Lord's presence in the second temple to match that at the dedication of the first temple (1 Kings 8:11) or that expected by Ezekiel (Ezek. 43:1–5).

That fulfillment awaited the New Testament era. With the coming of Jesus, the presence of God is no longer located in the physical, man-made temple, but the presence once again "made [a] dwelling" (lit., "tabernacled") among his people (John 1:14), just as it had during the desert period and, according to Ezekiel 11:16, during the Exile. In the person of Jesus, God's presence is once more mobile, no longer tied to a mountain, whether Mount Gerazim or Mount Zion; the time has now come when true worshipers will worship the Father in spirit and in truth (John 4:23). In Jesus is also the coming of the glory that Ezekiel looked for. Thus John comments: "We have seen his glory, the glory of the One and Only, who came from the Father, full of grace and truth" (John 1:14). In other words, with the coming of Jesus there is a fundamental redemptive-historical change in the manifestation of God's glory and presence.

If, however, Jesus is the personal manifestation of the divine glory in the New Testament, then this passage in Ezekiel 10–11 casts a fascinating light on Matthew 23:37–24:3. There Jesus laments Jerusalem's history of hard-heartedness towards the prophets and her refusal to come to him (23:37). As a result, her house will be left desolate (23:38), and Jerusalem will not see Jesus again until they are willing to welcome his coming (23:39). He then prophesies the forthcoming destruction of the temple (24:1) and removes himself to the Mount of Olives. Once more, the glory has departed from Jerusalem to the Mount of Olives, leaving behind a magnificent but doomed structure.

Names. From our modern perspective, we may also easily miss the appropriateness that marks the personal names of those singled out for judgment. Old Testament narratives often have names that fit and prefigure the action to unfold. Thus when an Old Testament audience read that Esau was given his name because it apparently means "hairy" and Jacob was sonamed because it was understood to mean "he grasps the heel" (or "deceives," Gen. 25:25–26), that information would have been immediately recognized as significant for the story that follows, in which Jacob cheats Esau out of his inheritance by pretending to be the hairy brother (27:23). Similarly, the identification "Saul" (meaning "asked for/dedicated to") is on one level deeply appropriate for the king that Israel asked God to provide for them (1 Sam. 8:5), yet raises the question of Saul's dedication to God. At the same time, however, the alert Hebrew reader remembers that 1 Samuel 1:27–28 has already identified Samuel as the one "asked for" from God and "dedicated to" ($\check{s}\check{a}$ ' $\hat{u}l$) him, whereby God is suggesting that Samuel may be a better "Saul" than Saul himself.

In the light of this, we should probably not regard the personal names in Ezekiel 8–11 as mere social identifiers. Though the persons involved were presumably real historical figures (like Saul and Jacob), their names underline the message. For if Jaazaniah ben Azzur means "the LORD hears, son of [divine name] helps," it is hardly coincidental that the Lord has indeed heard. He has heard not just what Jaazaniah and the other elders have been saying but even the thoughts of their hearts. The absence of a specific divine name element in his patronym (Azzur) may not immediately appear significant, but is perfectly fitting in this context where the question of which deity these people have been seeking their help from is left open. Moreover, Pelatiah ben Benaiah means "the LORD delivers [causes to escape], son of the LORD builds up," yet he is the one who derides the Lord's command to build and does not escape. In every respect, the judgment of God exactly fits those on whom it falls.²⁴

THE VEIL PULLED BACK. In the Wizard of Oz Dorothy and her three friends, the tin man, the scarecrow, and the cowardly lion, journey along the yellow brick road until they arrive at the famed city of Oz, where they hope that the powerful wizard will grant them their heart's desire. When they arrive, the enigmatic wizard appears to them in a variety of fearsome and beautiful forms and sends them off on a quest to prove themselves by disposing of the wicked witch of the west; if they succeed, he promises to grant them their wish. However, when they finally return after having successfully completed their mission and enter the great and mighty wizard's throne room, Dorothy's dog Toto pulls back a curtain in the corner. In that way, the foursome learns that the "great and mighty wizard" is in fact a failed fairground conjurer, who does everything by illusion. With the screen taken away, they discover that the world of Oz is not at all what they thought it was.

In Ezekiel 8–11, the screen is taken away from the course of Judah's history, and it is revealed to the prophet that things are not at all what they had appeared to be. The fundamental reality that Judah had always relied upon, the presence of God in their midst in the temple on Mount Zion, is revealed to be now nothing more than a hollow shell. The glory of God has departed from their midst, leaving the city ripe for destruction. What that means is that those who seem to themselves to be in the better situation—in the frying pan rather than in the fire, those confidently depending on God's commitment to Zion—are actually next on the menu. God has abandoned them to their doom. To continue the culinary metaphor, their goose is cooked.

By contrast, the ones who seem like the offscouring and leftovers—those who seem to be abandoned by God and sent off into exile—are actually the ones with whom the future of God's people rests. For God has not simply departed from Jerusalem, he has departed to the exiles, to be their sanctuary. Because God is with them, they have a future, a future that will bring them back to the land of promise and to receive the goal of the promise: God's dwelling in the midst of his people. The rejected ones are those invited to the banquet, while those who felt secure will be rejected (Luke 14:16–24).

Most of us see life with the screen up. We assume that things are as they appear and that we can easily identify those on whom God's favor rests. We may put our confidence in the traditions of the past, for example, and assume that forms hallowed by repeated usage must be pleasing to God in the present. How far in the past we look may vary from person to person: We may insist on forms that stretch all the way back to the early church, the Reformation, or the Puritans, or simply the forms to which we have been accustomed as individuals. Alternatively, we may place our trust in numbers: If many people attend a particular church or type of church, then surely God's blessing rests on it and we should model our church after that style.

God's presence is not so easily discerned. He does not always continue to bless forms and institutions that he has blessed in the past, nor is he always found in the large and apparently successful churches. In the Bible, he is most often found with the poor and the weak, the despised and rejected, those whom the world regards as castoffs. So when Jesus comes, he visits the temple, but his primary teaching and ministry takes place in the open air. He will eat with the scribes and the Pharisees when they invite him, but he is known rather as the friend of tax collectors and sinners (Matt. 11:19). When he seeks twelve disciples, he goes not to the religious training schools but to the work places of ordinary men and women. The essence of his training program is not a rigorous course of book study, but three years of being in his presence.

The temple in the New Testament era. The reason for this is that in the New Testament the temple has taken human form in the body of Jesus (John 2:19). In him, God's glory lives among us (1:14). Herod's temple, for all its outward glory, is an empty shell, abandoned by God and now simply awaiting its destruction by human hands (Matt. 24:1–2). Ironically, it still stood while Christ experienced the heartrending abandonment on the cross, where his Father forsook him on account of the sins of his people. Its stones remained intact while his physical body was torn down. But that divine abandonment of Christ was only the necessary precursor to its refilling with even greater glory and resurrection as a spiritual body.

As a result of that death and resurrection, the future lies not with the Jerusalem temple but with the body of Christ, the church. In their assembly, they have the presence of God with them in the person of Jesus. This is the significance of Jesus' statement that "where two are three come together in my name, there am I with them" (Matt. 18:20). Paul describes the church in this way: "We are the temple of the living God. As God has said: 'I will live with them and walk among them, and I will be their God, and they will be my people' " (2 Cor. 6:16). Wherever the true church assembles, there God is present in their midst. Or, to put it the other way around, it is the presence of Christ that constitutes the church.

The prerequisite, then, for worship to be possible in the New Testament context is not a building chosen by God and accepted by him, but a people chosen by God and accepted by him. God dwells in the hearts of his people, not in a building made with hands. This surely has implications for how we assess different churches. All too often we make our judgment based on whether the programs a church offers seem to meet our needs or on its denominational label, rather than attempting the harder task of discerning the reality of Christ's presence.

But how do you discern the reality of Christ's presence in a church? The Reformers argued that the marks of the true church were the pure preaching of the Word of God, the sacraments rightly administered, and church discipline properly applied.²⁵ These are not three entirely separate things, since pure preaching ought to result in reformation of sacramental practice, and laxness over church discipline will necessarily affect the administration of the sacraments. However, these marks provide us with a good place to start in assessing the health or otherwise of a church. The ministry of the Word and the sacraments are the two means of grace by which the Lord feeds his people, so that where the Lord is present, we should expect to find both sound preaching and a proper administration of the Lord's Supper and of baptism.

Moreover, Ezekiel's message should underline for us the essential importance of personal and corporate holiness, which is addressed by (among other things) proper church discipline. God's presence in the midst of his people is not to be taken lightly or presumed upon. Those at Pergamum who were treating idolatry and immorality within the church carelessly are warned in Revelation 2:16 to repent, lest Jesus should come and fight against them with the sword of his mouth. God's presence can be removed from a church, just as it abandoned the temple, leading to that church becoming nothing more than a hollow shell. Outwardly, everything may still seem to be in place, but without the internal reality of God's presence it is merely a matter of time before the whole edifice collapses.

Hope for believers. Yet while there is no room for complacency, there is solid hope for the believer in the most trying of times. For even while God may abandon parts of his professing church, he never abandons his covenant commitment to save for himself a people. If the religious leaders of the day and the major denominations turn their backs on him, he will leave them to their fate—but only in order to do a new work through the small and despised, those neglected and considered insignificant. God will choose the weak in order to shame the strong (1 Cor. 1:27). If the Jews will not receive their Messiah, then the gospel will go to the Gentiles. If the West turns its back on Christianity, then God will open up new doors in the other two-thirds of the world. In every generation, God's work of giving to men and women a new spirit and a new heart continues until the full harvest of his people is brought into his kingdom.

The exact formulation of that renewing work in Ezekiel 11:19 is striking. Literally, it reads "I will remove the heart of stone from their flesh and I will give to them a heart of flesh." The stony heart, a heart that is unresponsive to God, is not in the deepest sense something natural to us. Rather a heart that responds joyfully and obediently to God's commands is "flesh of our flesh"—what we were created to be. Yet since the time of Adam's fall into sin our humanity has been so perverted that we have become "by nature objects of [God's] wrath" (Eph. 2:3). Unless God performs divine heart surgery on us, we cannot obey him or please him. What we need is not simply to keep a series of New Year's resolutions or to turn over some new leaves. We need radical surgery, nothing less than a new birth from above (John 3:3). Thanks be to God, therefore, for the gift of Jesus Christ, in whom we are a new creation, reconciled to God (2 Cor. 5:17). As Calvin expressed it, in the form of a prayer:

Almighty God, as we have completely perished in our father Adam, and no part of us remains uncorrupted so long as we bear in both body and soul grounds for wrath, condemnation, and death, grant that, reborn in your Spirit, we may increasingly set aside our own will and spirit, and so submit ourselves to you that your Spirit may truly reign within us. And then grant, we pray, that we not be ungrateful to you, but, appreciating how invaluable is this blessing, may dedicate and direct our entire life to glorifying to your name in Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.²⁶

THE WORD OF THE LORD came to me: ²"Son of man, you are living among a rebellious people. They have eyes to see but do not see and ears to hear but do not hear, for they are a rebellious people.

³"Therefore, son of man, pack your belongings for exile and in the daytime, as they watch, set out and go from where you are to another place. Perhaps they will understand, though they are a rebellious house. ⁴During the daytime, while they watch, bring out your belongings packed for exile. Then in the evening, while they are watching, go out like those who go into exile. ⁵While they watch, dig through the wall and take your belongings out through it. ⁶Put them on your shoulder as they are watching and carry them out at dusk. Cover your face so that you cannot see the land, for I have made you a sign to the house of Israel."

⁷So I did as I was commanded. During the day I brought out my things packed for exile. Then in the evening I dug through the wall with my hands. I took my belongings out at dusk, carrying them on my shoulders while they watched.

⁸In the morning the word of the LORD came to me: ⁹"Son of man, did not that rebellious house of Israel ask you, 'What are you doing?'

¹⁰"Say to them, 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says: This oracle concerns the prince in Jerusalem and the whole house of Israel who are there.' ¹¹Say to them, 'I am a sign to you.'

"As I have done, so it will be done to them. They will go into exile as captives.

12"The prince among them will put his things on his shoulder at dusk and leave, and a hole will be dug in the wall for him to go through. He will cover his face so that he cannot see the land. ¹³I will spread my net for him, and he will be caught in my snare; I will bring him to Babylonia, the land of the Chaldeans, but he will not see it, and there he will die. ¹⁴I will scatter to the winds all those around him —his staff and all his troops—and I will pursue them with drawn sword.

15"They will know that I am the LORD, when I disperse them among the nations and scatter them through the countries. ¹⁶But I will spare a few of them from the sword, famine and plague, so that in the nations where they go they may acknowledge all their detestable practices. Then they will know that I am the LORD."

¹⁷The word of the LORD came to me: ¹⁸"Son of man, tremble as you eat your food, and shudder in fear as you drink your water. ¹⁹Say to the people of the land: 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says about those living in Jerusalem and in the land of Israel: They will eat their food in anxiety and drink their water in despair, for their land will be stripped of everything in it because of the violence of all who live there. ²⁰The inhabited towns will be laid waste and the land will be desolate. Then you will know that I am the LORD.'"

Original Meaning

THE MESSAGE OF Ezekiel 8–11 may well be summed up as: "Nothing escapes the Lord's notice." Contrary to public opinion in Jerusalem, which held, "The LORD does not see us; the LORD has forsaken the land" (Ezek. 8:12; cf. 9:9), the Lord had indeed seen everything and laid it out in a vision before his prophet. Likewise, the Lord's acute sense of hearing had picked up the pronouncements of the wicked counselors in 11:3, though he would be signally deaf to any cries for help from his people (8:18). Because of their abominations and idolatry, he would indeed abandon the land, leaving it at the mercy of the Babylonian army. This was the message that Ezekiel was to bring to the exiles; it was a vision intended for their ears (11:25).

But if Ezekiel cherished any hopes of seeing a revolutionary change in the thinking of the exiles as a result of his message, he is quickly disabused of his notions in chapter 12. Like the Jerusalemites, his fellow exiles are a rebellious people. They do not see what the Lord shows them, nor do they hear what the Lord says, not because they lack the physical organs of sight and hearing, but simply because they are rebellious (12:2). They have eyes to see but they do not see; ears to hear but they do not hear (12:2). In the language of 11:19, they are still characterized by the heart of stone, a stubborn will that rejects obedience.

This saying of 12:2 underlies the sign-acts that follow it. This section is made up of a sign-act of exile (12:3–7), the interpretation of this sign-act (12:8–17), and a second sign-act of fear and trembling (12:18–20). The dominant motif throughout is of looking and not seeing. Repeatedly, Ezekiel is instructed to carry out his actions "as they watch" (*l'enêhem, seven times in 12:3–7). His actions are not particularly obscure, depicting as they do an event in which the exiles had all personally taken part. Yet the result of his actions, noted by the Lord in verse 8, is not dawning comprehension on the part of the exiles but inability to understand. They ask him: "What are you doing?" Nor does the second sign-act make things clearer to them. Though they have seen with their eyes what he has done, they still do not get the message.

What is more, even when he delivers the word of the Lord to them, explaining in oracular form what the sign-act means, the people's response is that recorded in 12:27: "The vision he sees is for many years from now, and he prophesies about the distant future." Though they hear every word he speaks, it is clear that they have understood nothing at all. Indeed, they are a rebellious people, who have ears and do not hear, eyes and do not see.

The initial sign-act that the prophet performs depicts the action of going into exile. Ezekiel is first to put together an exile's pack, containing the few belongings an exile might be able to carry along on the long journey. This may consist simply of an animal skin to hold food and act as a pillow, a mat to lie on, and a bowl out of which to eat and drink. These preparations are to be made in the daytime, though the departure is delayed until evening.

This delay serves both the practical purpose of allowing time for a crowd to gather to witness the sign-act and a symbolic purpose, representing God's delaying of judgment until the proper time, the gathering gloom of evening (12:4).²

The growing darkness provides a frighteningly appropriate backdrop for the drama. At that time, Ezekiel is to dig through the adobe wall of his house and go out through it, taking his pack with him (12:5). Moreover, he is to cover his face so that he cannot see the land (12:6). All of this has symbolic meaning: The Jerusalemites and their prince will go into exile just as he has acted out (v. 11).

The symbolic meaning of the otherwise rather enigmatic sign is expounded in 12:10–16. It concerns the fate of Zedekiah, the prince $(n\bar{a}s\,\hat{i}^2)$, along with the house of Israel in Jerusalem (12:10). Many of the details of the sign-act are capable of more than one interpretation. Does the breaking through the wall symbolize something Zedekiah does in his attempt to escape³ or the breaches made by the Babylonians through which they bring out their prisoner?⁴ Does the covering of his face represent an attempt at concealment,⁵ or shame and grief?⁶

Some of these complexities may be due to reading the text in the light of its historical fulfillment recorded in 2 Kings 25:4–7; however, some are due to the prophet's penchant for complex, multivalent images, which involve plays on words and sounds. Thus the prince $(n\bar{a}s'\hat{i}^2)$ is both the one who "lifts up" $(yis's'\bar{a}^2)$ his pack and also "the burden" $(m\bar{a}s's'\bar{a}^2)$ to be carried (Ezek. 12:10, 12). He is both the one who goes out and the one who is brought out, as a literal translation of verse 12 makes clear: "As for the prince who is among them, he will lift up [his pack] upon his shoulder in the darkness and he will go out; through the wall they will dig to bring [him] out through it."

Though the imagery is complex, the essential message seems reasonably straightforward. Not only will there be a further exile, bringing out those still remaining in Jerusalem and Judah, but this anti-exodus will center on the person of the prince, Zedekiah. His personal transgressions have not yet been the object of Ezekiel's prophecies (though they will be later on, e.g., in Ezek. 17 and 19). Here he is in view primarily as the representative of the people. Because he shares their inability to see the coming judgment, that judgment will take the form of no longer being able to see the land, that is, he will never return from exile. This motif is found regularly in extrabiblical curses¹¹ and was fulfilled historically when the Babylonians blinded Zedekiah at Riblah and took him into exile, never to return (2 Kings 25:7).

All this will happen not because of the desire of Nebuchadnezzar for a little more Lebensraum ("room to live"), as Adolf Hitler later designated his expansionist ambitions. More fundamentally, it is because the Lord has set a snare for Zedekiah and for the people he represents (Ezek. 12:13). The Lord is the One who will bring Zedekiah to Babylonia and will scatter his forces to the winds, pursuing him with drawn sword (12:14). The Lord is the One who will disperse his followers among the nations, a mere handful surviving Ezekiel's favorite apocalyptic triad of "sword, famine and plague" (12:15-16). These (lit.) "men of number" ('anšê mispār; i.e., a number small enough to be counted) will "acknowledge" (yesapperû) among the nations their abominations and come to acknowledge the Lord's preeminence (12:16). The implication is not necessarily that they will exhibit repentance for their actions but that at least they will recognize that it is the Lord who has acted against them. Their defeat and dispersal are evidence of the Lord's wrath in action, evidence aimed at curing the willful obtuseness of those remaining in Judah.

To this initial sign-act and interpretation, a further one is then added: Ezekiel is to eat and drink with trembling and shuddering, depicting the anxiety that the inhabitants of Jerusalem and Judah will feel. The violence with which they have filled the land will return on their own heads, with the towns being destroyed and the land devastated. This time, however, those emerging from the devastation with a knowledge of the Lord's preeminence are not those in Judah but "the people of the land" (v. 19), that is, the exiles. The land of Judah and all who remain in it are doomed. They are not to be the objects of envy, as the exiles must have been tempted to view them, but rather of horror and pity. At the same time, those whom the inhabitants of Judah would have regarded as landless unfortunates will turn out to be the inheritors of the land (11:16–17).¹²

God is not impotent even in the face of ears that will not hear and eyes that will not see; one way or another, he will get his message through. The exiles will come to see that they indeed are the fortunate ones who have escaped the total judgment of God on his rebellious people. But in order for them to receive their inheritance in the land, God must first of all act in judgment on those who remain. It is this unpalatable truth that they are so reluctant to see.

Bridging Contexts

THE NEED FOR and value of visual aids. In our churches, we are used to preaching to the converted. Few have experience of the difficult task of street preaching, attempting to bring God's message to an audience that, by and large, is not predisposed to listen. Those who do have such experience generally recognize the need to grab people's attention in some way. In some respects, therefore, Ezekiel's sign-acts functioned as a kind of "street theater," a means of drawing a crowd.

Yet Ezekiel's sketches were not merely a prelude to the message, they were themselves the message. Because of their vivid, visual nature, they were able to penetrate past the blind eyes and deaf ears into the consciousness beyond. These visual images would sit there, like the sower's seed, waiting to germinate into an awareness of the reality of God and of his purposes in history. God's self-revelation that "I am the LORD" was written on the life of his prophet; he was their "sign" (12:11). That "sign" would not bear the same kind of fruit in every life. The knowledge that "I am the LORD" was not necessarily a saving knowledge. Yet one way or another, through the actions of God in history, revealed first to his prophets, all would come to know that there is a God and there is a judgment on sin.

This is an unpalatable truth at all times and in all places. It is not just the modern era that finds it hard to accept that "all have sinned and fall short of the glory of God" (Rom. 3:23). But perhaps particularly in the contemporary American setting, where positive thinking carries such weight, the language of sin and judgment is considered out of place. Thus Rabbi Harold Kushner's most recent book seeks to counter the notion "that God holds us to strict standards of Right and Wrong, that God knows every secret, nasty thing we ever do, even our secret, nasty thoughts, and that every sin separates us from God's love." Like the exiles of Ezekiel's day, Rabbi Kushner prefers to think rather more optimistically about the future. But the biblical perspective is ruthlessly honest about our own failures and their consequences. This truth is important because only those whose eyes have been opened to the true danger of their position as objects of God's wrath will be persuaded to flee to the refuge God offers.

God's definitive "visual aids." Supremely, of course, God's self-revelation of his own existence and of the reality of judgment on sin comes through Jesus Christ. His life, death, and resurrection are God's ultimate acts of judgment on sin and salvation of his people. If sin does not separate us from God's love, why was Jesus separated from his Father on the cross? But also the resurrection demonstrates visibly God's acceptance of Jesus' death in place of his people. The cross and the empty tomb are God's definitive visual aids.

In the meantime, through the work of the Holy Spirit, God is opening the eyes and ears of the spiritually blind and deaf to the reality of salvation in Christ. Though his people may be despised and rejected by other people, like their Savior, they are accepted by God and incorporated into his family. On the last day, however, every knee will bow and every tongue will confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father (Phil. 2:10–11). At that time the knowledge of his lordship will be universal.

In the meantime, we as the people of Jesus have a unique role to play as signs, as witnesses before a watching world (Acts 1:8). To the world around us, we are a letter from Christ, to use Paul's phrase (2 Cor. 3:3). That testimony, like Ezekiel's witness, must not only be verbal but also visual, aimed at the eye-gate and the ear-gate alike. This will be particularly true in cultures and locations that are not hospitable to our message. Words by themselves may suffice to communicate to those who have ears to hear, but those whose ears are tightly shut must see the Word become flesh again in the lives of his followers. We must speak clearly of the tragic and dangerous state of men and women without Christ: They are sinners under the wrath of God, at risk of eternal lostness. But we must also make visible clearly, in word and deed, the love of God demonstrated in this awesome fact, that while we were still sinners, Christ died for us (Rom. 5:8).

Contemporary Significance

God's Word becoming flesh. How do we demonstrate the reality of the Word who became flesh in our contemporary world? For Ezekiel, the word he received took flesh in his actions—actions that were uncomfortable and costly (breaking through his own wall with his bare hands!), actions that were embarrassingly odd (pretending to go into exile, eating and drinking with violent trembling). Through his actions, along with the accompanying words, a message of judgment on their dearest hopes was imparted to his hearers, so that when God's judgment occurred, the people would know that God was the One who had brought it about. Ezekiel had to tear down the things on which his hearers depended in this present world, in order that they might see the greater thing that God wished to do in and through them.

For Jesus, the Word becoming flesh meant leaving the heavenly glory he shared with the Father to come to earth, taking on himself humanity with all its weaknesses and limitations. He was no armchair warrior; in his incarnation, he was willing to get down and dirty and become part of humankind, bearing the consequences of Adam's sin along with us. He experienced the frustrations of living in a world where things do not work as they ought to; he wept at the graveside of his friend Lazarus, overcome by the pain of human loss. He wrestled with the forces of evil and darkness and death and won the struggle, so that we might be liberated from our bondage to sin and take part in the new exodus of God's people. He died so that we might share in an exodus, not from Egypt or Babylon but out of the kingdom of this world into the kingdom of God. In his crucified flesh, he demonstrated both the judgment of God on sin and the love of God toward sinners.

How though does God's Word take flesh through us? Evangelicals have sometimes been accused of making the Word who became flesh back into words again. We can talk a good talk, but don't always have the walk to match it. A world with ears tightly closed against the truth needs to see the reality of our faith written in changed lives. It needs to see what Harvie Conn calls "show and tell" evangelism: costly witness in word and deed, where our deeds underline the reality of our words, while our words explain the meaning of our deeds.¹⁴

These actions need not be as peculiar or complex as Ezekiel's sign-acts. One church I know of offered free gift-wrapping at Christmastime at a local store, handing out also a leaflet about the real gift of Christmas. Another might offer a free car wash, while explaining our need as humans for the washing that Jesus offers. The church of which I was pastor in Oxford ministered to older people who had no connection with the church by cutting their grass, as a means of demonstrating in practical ways the love of Jesus.

In this, we were simply following the ancient tradition of the church. The fourth-century emperor Julian complained to the pagan priests of his day that the "impious Galileans" were looking after the pagan poor as well as their own. Free service offered in self-sacrificial ways may indeed seem to many people as bizarre as Ezekiel's actions in an age where so many people are motivated solely by the bottom line. Yet it simply reflects the fact that word and deed together can penetrate to the heart in a way that words alone cannot.

Going out to people. As our culture becomes more and more opposed to the gospel, it will become more and more necessary to take the message out to people rather than waiting for them to come in to the church. Street preaching is one method, while street theater may also be a means of sparking spiritual conversations. These are not in any sense a substitute for the regular ministry of the church, but they are a means of bringing the gospel out to those who are a rebellious people, who have eyes to see but do not see, and ears to hear but do not hear (Ezek. 12:2).

However, even creative communication efforts cannot by themselves open up closed eyes. Even after we have shown the gospel and told the gospel, the fundamental truth remains that those around us are not merely spiritually blind and deaf but dead in their transgressions and sins (Eph. 2:1). What they need is not simply a vivid depiction of the truth of sin and judgment and God's love; rather, they need new hearts, something only God can give people. Unless the Lord opens their ears and eyes and hearts, all our labors will be in vain.

But what gives us hope in our evangelistic efforts is that God wants to bring men and women to know him, to see his hand as the Prime Mover in everything that happens in this world. Our task is not to sit about debating whether the size of that redeemed remnant will be few in number, but rather to enter the kingdom ourselves and make every effort to encourage others to do likewise in word and deed (Luke 13:23–24).

Ezekiel 12:21–13:23

The word of the LORD came to me: ²²"Son of man, what is this proverb you have in the land of Israel: 'The days go by and every vision comes to nothing'? ²³Say to them, 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says: I am going to put an end to this proverb, and they will no longer quote it in Israel.' Say to them, 'The days are near when every vision will be fulfilled. ²⁴For there will be no more false visions or flattering divinations among the people of Israel. ²⁵But I the LORD will speak what I will, and it shall be fulfilled without delay. For in your days, you rebellious house, I will fulfill whatever I say, declares the Sovereign LORD.'"

²⁶The word of the LORD came to me: ²⁷"Son of man, the house of Israel is saying, 'The vision he sees is for many years from now, and he prophesies about the distant future.'

²⁸"Therefore say to them, 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says: None of my words will be delayed any longer; whatever I say will be fulfilled, declares the Sovereign LORD.'"

13:1The word of the LORD came to me: ²"Son of man, prophesy against the prophets of Israel who are now prophesying. Say to those who prophesy out of their own imagination: 'Hear the word of the LORD! ³This is what the Sovereign LORD says: Woe to the foolish prophets who follow their own spirit and have seen nothing! ⁴Your prophets, O Israel, are like jackals among ruins. ⁵You have not gone up to the breaks in the wall to repair it for the house of Israel so that it will stand firm in the battle on the day of the LORD. ⁶Their visions are false and their divinations a lie. They say, "The LORD declares," when the LORD has not sent them; yet they expect their words to be fulfilled. ⁷Have you not seen false visions and uttered lying divinations when you say, "The LORD declares," though I have not spoken?

8" 'Therefore this is what the Sovereign LORD says: Because of your false words and lying visions, I am against you, declares the Sovereign LORD. 9My hand will be against the prophets who see false visions and utter lying divinations. They will not belong to the council of my people or be listed in the records of the house of Israel, nor will they enter the land of Israel. Then you will know that I am the Sovereign LORD.

10" 'Because they lead my people astray, saying, "Peace," when there is no peace, and because, when a flimsy wall is built, they cover it with whitewash, 11 therefore tell those who cover it with whitewash that it is going to fall. Rain will come in torrents, and I will send hailstones hurtling down, and violent winds will burst forth. 12 When the wall collapses, will people not ask you, "Where is the whitewash you covered it with?"

says: In my wrath I will unleash a violent wind, and in my anger hailstones and torrents of rain will fall with destructive fury. ¹⁴I will tear down the wall you have covered with whitewash and will level it to the ground so that its foundation will be laid bare. When it falls, you will be destroyed in it; and you will know that I am the LORD. ¹⁵So I will spend my wrath against the wall and against those who covered it with whitewash. I will say to you, "The wall is gone and so are those who whitewashed it, ¹⁶those prophets of Israel who prophesied to Jerusalem and saw visions of peace for her when there was no peace, declares the Sovereign LORD."

says: I am against your magic charms with which you ensnare people like birds and I will tear them from your arms; I will set free the people that you ensnare like birds. ²¹I will tear off your veils and save my people from your hands, and they will no longer fall prey to your power. Then you will know that I am the LORD. ²²Because you disheartened the righteous with your lies, when I had brought them no grief, and because you encouraged the wicked not to turn from their evil ways and so save their lives, ²³therefore you will no longer see false visions or practice divination. I will save my people from your hands. And then you will know that I am the LORD.'"

Original Meaning

THE PROBLEM OF distinguishing between true and false prophecy had a long history in Israel. Alongside the true messenger of God, who brought God's word to his people, were many imitators who bore a message of a different stamp. In Ezekiel 13, the prophet addresses the men and women who had appointed themselves Israel's spiritual guardians. First, however, he turns to address a related issue in 12:21–28, the cynicism and general confusion that resulted from the conflicting messages that the people were hearing.

Confusion Over Prophecy (12:21–28)

As HE DOES on a number of other occasions, Ezekiel addresses these issues by presenting two current popular sayings or slogans. (1) The first "proverb" of the people asserts the ineffectiveness of the prophetic word in general: "The days go by and every vision comes to nothing" (12:22). The people had grown so used to hearing visions proclaimed that never came about that some had come to the conclusion that all prophetic visions were nothing more than empty words. There was no such thing as genuine revelation from God, and the prophets could thus safely be disregarded. Time passed and nothing happened. Therefore, these people reckoned, nothing would ever happen. The Lord's response through Ezekiel to such people was to throw a slightly revised form of their saying back in their faces. By changing the verbs of their formulation, he affirms: "The days are near when [lit., and] every vision will be fulfilled" (12:23).

Indeed, every vision would be fulfilled because of a twofold action on the Lord's part. In the first place, there would be no more false visions or flattering divination among the people of Israel (12:24). The mention of the "false vision" ($h^2z on \check{saw}$) points forward to the worthless activities of the so-called "prophets of Israel," which are criticized in the next chapter (cf. 13:6), while with the expression "no more" ($l\bar{o}$)... ' $\hat{o}d$), we encounter a characteristic idiom of the prophet's contrast between the way things were in the past and the way they would be in the future. False prophecy would be silenced, so that the people might no longer be led astray by it. In addition, however, true prophecy would be vindicated: The Lord will speak, and what he speaks will happen with no more delay (12:25).

The people had grown tired of waiting so long for the Lord to act in fulfillment of the words of the true prophets (Hab. 2:2–3). When the prophesied judgment of Jerusalem took place and the false prophets were cut off, then the people would know who were the true prophets, and that they had indeed spoken at God's command (cf. Ezek. 2:5). This is God's answer to the skeptics of Ezekiel's day.

(2) Yet alongside these unbelievers was apparently a second party, the delayers. This group of people did not deny the effectiveness of the prophetic word in general. They simply hoped that this particular word of judgment would not take effect until a future generation. Their motto was, "The vision he sees is for many years from now, and he prophesies about the distant future" (12:27). Such an attitude was not without historical justification. Isaiah's prophecy to Hezekiah of a future Babylonian invasion of Judah and the enslavement of his descendants at their hands was recognized by Hezekiah as implying "peace in our time" (Isa. 39:5–8). Had not a whole series of prophets foretold the coming doom of Israel down through the years? Might not at least one more generation pass before the ax of judgment descended? This second group also receives a "no more" answer from the Lord: There will be no more delay; the Lord will fulfill whatever he has spoken (Ezek. 12:28).

The Lord's commitment to fulfill whatever he has spoken (12:25, 28) brings us to the crux of the issue between the true and the false prophets—the source of their words. Not every word spoken by someone claiming to be a prophet would be fulfilled, for not all spoke the word of the Lord. In order for every prophetic word to be fulfilled, it was necessary that judgment should come to silence the self-proclaimed prophets. This idea, mentioned in passing in 12:24, is unfolded throughout chapter 13 in two halves that show considerable symmetry. Ezekiel first addresses the false prophets ("the prophets of Israel," 13:1–16) and then the false prophetesses ("the daughters of your people who prophesy out of their own imagination," 13:17–23).

Address to the False Prophets of Israel (13:1–16)

THE VERY TITLE Ezekiel gives his opponents—"the prophets of Israel" (13:1)—raises a paradox. In spite of the existence of a body of men who could be addressed thus, their ineffectiveness to accomplish the Lord's purpose is such that he must still raise up someone like Ezekiel so that the people "will know that a prophet has been among them" (2:5).⁴ The foundational difference between Ezekiel and "the prophets of Israel" is the origin of their prophecy: The false prophets "prophesy out of their own imagination," whereas Ezekiel declares the vision that the Sovereign Lord has revealed to him (cf. 11:25).

In 13:3 Ezekiel calls these people "foolish prophets [a pun on the similar sounding words $n^eb\hat{i}\hat{i}m$, prophets, and $n^eb\bar{a}l\hat{i}m$, fools] who follow their own spirit and have seen nothing." They confidently proclaim the divine origin of their words, saying, "Hear the word of the LORD" (13:2), and using the oracle formula, "The LORD declares" (13:6–7). They even hope to see what they have prophesied established (13:6), though in actuality they have no calling from Yahweh (13:7).

Because the message of the false prophets originates in their own hearts rather than in the Lord's revelation, Ezekiel also criticizes the content—or rather, lack of content—of their messages. Their visions are false and their divinations a lie (13:6); this phrase and its variations form a constant refrain in 13:6–9. What their message consists of is revealed in verse 10: They have been prophesying "Peace," when in fact no peace is to be expected.⁵

Such false comfort has had catastrophic results. In speaking according to their own hopes rather than the word of the Lord, they have seduced God's people into a false security that will be devastatingly exposed on the coming day of judgment. This criticism of the prophets is expressed in a series of pictures. (1) They have acted "like jackals among ruins" (13:4). The Hebrew word translated "jackals" ($\sin a$) also covers smaller scavengers such as "foxes." Clearly this is not a positive image. The average jackal is not busy among the ruins with a trowel and construction helmet, rebuilding what has fallen down; rather, his presence there is a matter of self-interest, looking to pounce on any small animals hiding in cracks in the rocks. It seems from other passages in the Bible that the picture may be even more negative than that. The jackal/fox may be thought of as an agent of destruction, as in Nehemiah 4:3: "What they are building—if even a fox ($\sin a$) climbed up on it, he would break down their wall of stones!"

(2) Intent on pursuing their own prey, these skulking scavengers have failed to take on the dangerous, but necessary, task of standing in the gaps to build up a solid protection for Israel on the Day of the Lord (Ezek. 13:5). In this verse, the picture is changed to that of a besieged city. In ancient warfare, the attackers would build up a siege ramp, frequently to a corner of the city, in order to breach the walls higher up where they were thinner. Meanwhile the defenders would build a counter-ramp on the inside to enable the easy supply of materials to repair any breaches that were made.⁸

Only the bravest would be found at the breaks in the wall, for there the fighting would be at its fiercest. The false prophets, however, are more interested in their own personal security than the safety of the city.

(3) The third picture Ezekiel uses to describe the "prophets of Israel" also involves a wall. In 13:10–16 the image is of a poorly constructed wall, which the prophets rather than rebuilding properly merely cover with "whitewash," thus giving it a misleadingly solid appearance. Its true nature will be exposed, however, by the coming of the storm. When the rain comes down in floods, with hailstones and violent winds, the wall will collapse to the destruction of all concerned in the venture (13:12–15).

The concern of the passage is not so much the fate of those who trust in the whitewashed wall, but that of those who have whitewashed it, that is, the false prophets. The divine hand will be raised in judgment on them," and it is decreed that "they will not belong to the council of my people or be listed in the records of the house of Israel, nor will they enter the land of Israel" (Ezek. 13:9). (1) To be excluded from "the council of my people" (sôd 'ammî) was to be cut off from their place in the assembly of the righteous, the true Israel. It is surely a fitting fate that those who have falsely claimed to be prophets, and thus to have access to the council of the Lord (sôd yhwh), will ultimately be excluded even from the council of his people.

- (2) Further, their names will not "be listed in the records of the house of Israel" (13:9). To be left off the records of the people means being excluded from full participation in the community. The importance of such a list may be seen from Nehemiah 7, where the finding of a register listing those who first returned from exile became the basis on which certain families were excluded from the priesthood (Neh. 7:63–64 = Ezra 2:62–63).
- (3) They will not "enter the land of Israel" (13:9). When Israel returns from exile, the false prophets will not participate in that return. Like rebellious Israel in the desert, they will not [re-]enter the Promised Land.

Address to the False Prophetesses of Israel (13:17–23)

THE CHARGE AGAINST the women who prophesy in the second part of Ezekiel 13 is both similar to and different from that against the prophets of Israel. In common with Ezekiel's criticism of the prophets of Israel, the source of the women's prophecy is identified as "out of their own imagination" (13:17). However, whereas the prophets of Israel were apparently prophesying in forms indistinguishable from those used by Ezekiel, the practices adopted by the women seem to have had magical overtones. Exactly what those practices are has been a matter for some debate because of the obscure terminology employed. It seems that the women were involved in tying magic bands of some kind ($k^e s \bar{a} t \hat{o} t$, 13:18), though whether the object being tied up was the medium herself, the inquirer, or an image of the victim is not clear.

Further, the prophetesses are charged with making mispāḥôt for their heads (13:18). mispāḥôt occurs only here and in 13:21, and the common translation "veils" is at best a tentative suggestion on the basis of the context; they may equally well have been amulets worn around the neck. How those veils or amulets functioned is also a matter of conjecture. Whatever the precise form of their actions, however, they are not those of a true prophet (or prophetess) of the Lord.

The prophesying women are apparently concerned more with the future of individuals than the fate of the nation. They mediate life and death to "the righteous" and "the wicked" (13:22). There is certainly nothing wrong in such concerns; such themes are part of Ezekiel's own calling to prophetic ministry (see 3:17–21; 33:1–9). The women are not criticized for dealing with the wrong questions but for giving the wrong answers. They "disheartened the righteous with [their] lies, when I had brought them no grief, and . . . encouraged the wicked not to turn from their evil ways and so save their lives" (13:22). In other words, their magically derived oracles are upsetting the moral and spiritual order, afflicting those who ought not to have been afflicted and comforting those who ought not to have been comforted.

In doing this, the prophesying women are motivated not by divine calling but by pursuit of personal profit in the form of small payments of barley and bread. The result of their activities is deadly, killing "those who should not have died" and sparing "those who should not live" (13:19). They are, in a graphic image, "ensnar[ing] people like birds" (13:20), that is, regarding both their clients and their communities as disposable objects, to be exploited in whatever ways proved profitable. These statements should be read against the background of Ezekiel's own call to be a watchman, warning the wicked to turn from their ways and encouraging the righteous to remain steadfast (3:17–21; 33:1–9). Fulfillment of this role is a means of turning the wicked from death to life and releases the prophet from responsibility for them. The women's destructive work in this area, however, prevents the wicked from becoming aware of their true state, putting both their lives and the women's own lives in jeopardy (13:18).

As with the condemnation of the prophets of Israel, there is a focus on the negative results of the activities of the prophesying women. They have lied to the people, who in turn have listened to their lies (13:19). Out of concern for the people of Israel, referred to as "my people" five times in this chapter (Ezek. 13:9, 10, 19, 21, 23), the Lord will act to break the power of the prophesying women over the people, destroying their equipment so that the people will no longer be their victims (13:20–21).

The closing verses of the chapter (13:22–23), while still grammatically addressed to the women, pick up themes from the first section to round off the whole. The "prophets of Israel" and the "[women] who prophesy" both oppose in different ways the ministry to which God has called Ezekiel. The "prophets of Israel" are a stumbling block to the reception of Ezekiel's message of national judgment by the people, while the "[women] who prophesy" undermine his calling to proclaim life to the righteous and to warn the wicked to turn from their ways. To be opposed to the prophet God has sent is to be a false prophet (ess), ensnaring the people rather than setting them free, causing distress to the righteous and false confidence to the wicked.

In this way, both righteous and wicked are trapped as they come to believe inaccurate and false ideas about God's plan for his people. Ezekiel asserts that the future fate of his opponents will show him to have been the true prophet of the Lord. When the Lord acts to destroy the works of his opponents, then the people "will know that I am the LORD" (Ezek. 13:14, 21, 23) and (by implication) that Ezekiel has acted as his true prophet. The coming of the truth will indeed set them free. Then the unbelievers and delayers will be answered in full.

Bridging Contexts

SPEAKING GOD'S WORD TODAY. It may seem as if the world of ancient prophets and prophetesses is very different from ours, until we consider what a wide variety of sources people around us turn to in order to determine the future. We too live in a world where many people claim to speak for God, both inside and outside the church.¹⁷ We too live in a world where people readily turn to superstition for guidance, consulting their daily horoscope in the newspaper or calling "dial a psychic." Though we may not have an officially sponsored "magical" worldview, as the Babylonians did, popular attitudes are often much closer to the old paganism than we might expect.¹⁸ These false ideas trap people by making it harder for them to hear God's Word.

What has changed for us, however, is the form in which God's revelation comes. For Ezekiel, God's word came to him directly. To be sure, in some instances he had God's earlier self-revelation to judge it by. Thus his prophecies are strongly influenced by references to the events of biblical history and in places he adapts the words of other prophets, notably Jeremiah and Zephaniah (e.g., cf. Ezek. 22:25–28 with Zeph. 3:3–4). His prophecies did not come to him in a vacuum, but what marked him out from his opponents was that he spoke as one directly and inerrantly inspired by God. He had stood in God's council, heard his words, and received his commission; therefore he spoke. When Ezekiel said "This is what the Sovereign LORD says. . . ," he spoke the truth.

The false prophets, by contrast, spoke out of their own imagination. They pretended to such inspiration, even adopting similar formulas ("The LORD declares. . . ," Ezek. 13:6–7), yet there was no reality of revelation to back up their words. The visions they claimed to have seen were empty lies, not the real thing.

Our situation is different from Ezekiel's. We who speak God's word today do so "second-hand," as it were. We do not speak as those who have received a direct, personal message from God, but as those who have the full and completely inspired Word of God, the Scriptures. Our task is to take that word and apply it to our contemporary situation. The contrast in our day between "true prophet" and "false prophet" is not so much as to who has really received the word of God, but rather who is rightly handling the Word of God.

At first sight, it might seem to be a disadvantage to be living in a time of mediate rather than immediate revelation. It might seem attractive to be able to declare to our congregations as the prophets did, "This is what the LORD says . . . ," and then proceed with God's direct revelation for today. Yet the difficulties experienced by God's people in discerning between true and false prophets and between true and false prophecies, then and now, point us in the other direction. Actually, we are the advantaged ones, for our congregations can test our words against an infallible measuring rod, the completed Scriptures.

However, even though the Scriptures are infallible, our exegesis of them is not. Not everything in the Bible is equally clear, nor is it always clear which particular text is appropriate to a particular situation, or which texts provide the context in the light of which other texts should be read. These facts should lead us to cautious humility when it comes to identifying our opponents as "false prophets." Other believers may, while seeking to apply Scripture to the same situation as ourselves, come to different conclusions from us. The issue between us in this case is not whether there is a revelation from God or whether Scripture applies to a particular situation, but what that revelation requires us to do. With such people, we should be willing to enter patient dialogue, seeking to grow in our mutual understanding of how the Word applies to this particular problem.

Misreading God's Word. But we also encounter in our situation those who disbelieve in the reality of any revelation at all, just as Ezekiel did. Here our concern is not so much with those holding other religious convictions or no religious convictions, but with those who while claiming to be Christians actually undermine the Bible as the basis for theology. This may take the form of a soothing semiorthodoxy, proclaiming a partial message that sounds like the truth, but is actually a distortion. Such preachers may mention only the positive aspect of salvation, while ignoring the uncomfortable realities of God's wrath on sin and the judgment to come.

Or it may take the form of a more radical revisioning of Christianity in the likeness of pagan religions, addressing God as "Divine Father/Mother" or "Sophia." The basis of these first two positions is ultimately a denial of the reality of the Bible as the ultimate revelation of God and the sole standard for faith and practice.

In addition, we have those who, while recognizing the Bible as a revelation from God, blunt its message by applying it to a time other than our own. This may take the form of an eschatologically overworked imagination, which pushes the significance of the Bible into the future. On this approach, the Bible is seen as a source book for end-times prophecies rather than a message that speaks to us in our everyday life.

However, perhaps more common in our situation is a more subtle form of this problem, which pushes the significance of the Bible back into the past. For such people, the historical and cultural rootedness of the Scriptures provides a reason for abandoning its teaching in our present historical and cultural context. For instance, instead of considering how Paul's teaching on the role of women both challenges and affirms aspects of our own culture, it is held that while Paul may have had something true (and even inspired) to say to the people of his day, before it can say anything to us, his teaching must be brought up to date and into line with the times in which we live.

Even such a well-respected evangelical scholar as F. F. Bruce could fall into this error. In discussing Paul's view of the role of women in the ministry of the church, he concluded: "Whatever in Paul's teaching promotes true freedom is of universal and permanent validity; whatever seems to impose restrictions on true freedom has regard to local and temporary conditions." For Bruce, this extrabiblical criterion—"true freedom"—became the means by which Scripture's less palatable teachings were ruled of no relevance for the present day. Now this is not to suggest that there are not difficult questions to answer about how particular Scriptures should be applied in changed cultural conditions; however, in principle the answer to that difficulty is fundamentally to allow Scripture to interpret Scripture, rather than to submit it to modern consciousness for arbitration.²¹

Such teachings are no less destructive in our era than they were in days of old. The result of both kinds of teaching is that people are confused about what the Bible says and how, if at all, it relates to us. The word of warning to the false prophets and prophetesses is still valid. There is no place among God's people for those who seek to lead them astray. Yet the comfort for God's people remains. When the Lord ultimately acts, it will be seen definitively who has rightly handled his Word.

Contemporary Significance

RESPONDING TO THE present Babel. "If the trumpet does not sound a clear call, who will get ready for battle?" (1 Cor. 14:8). So Paul describes the babble of conflicting voices heard in the Corinthian church. There was no clear message—no "revelation or knowledge or prophecy or word of instruction" (14:6)—and the result was an unedifying confusion. A similar confusion reigns in the church of our day. There have never been more different denominations and factions within denominations, each proclaiming a different message to the world. No wonder the world is confused as to what the essential message of Christianity is!

How should we who make up the church respond to the present Babel? On the one hand, it is more essential than ever that those within the church who affirm the Scriptures as the divinely inspired Word of God, the sole rule of faith and practice, should work together to seek to resolve old problems and bury irrelevant distinctions. Past history should not keep us apart where the Scriptures do not. The force of Jesus' high priestly prayer for the full unity of those who will believe in him should be fully felt (John 17:23), not least because the result of that unity will be the world knowing that the Father has commissioned and sent the Son. It is a travesty when racial, social, and historical differences divide the church of Christ.

On the other hand, however, we should recognize that the current cacophony is not simply the result of a disagreement among family members. Satan's strategy is to imitate God's means of self-revelation in order to confuse the message. Wherever there are prophets, there are also false prophets. Wherever there are those preaching the truth, there are also those propagating lies. Remember the words of Jesus in Matthew 7:22–23: "Many will say to me on that day, 'Lord, Lord, did we not prophesy in your name, and in your name drive out demons and perform many miracles?' Then I will tell them plainly, 'I never knew you. Away from me, you evildoers!' "It is not enough to be sincere; it is not enough to make great claims about yourself; what counts is knowing God and faithfully declaring his Word.

We are therefore not automatically to believe those who claim to be speaking the Word of God to us. As John instructs us, we are to test every spirit (1 John 4:1). If someone is of God, then he or she will confess that Jesus Christ has come in the flesh (4:2). The need to test those who claim to bring God's message to us did not come to an end in Ezekiel's day; it was true in New Testament times and it is true today. We are to apply the test that the Bereans are commended for: They "examined the Scriptures every day to see if what Paul said was true" (Acts 17:11). We are not to be taken in by lofty claims, but rather to test all things by the standard of the Word of God. In some instances, that may mean separating from those who claim to be Christians but fail the test. We should not allow historical accidents to hold us together with those from whom the Scripture insists that we part.

Motivation behind failure to prophesy correctly. What was it, though, that motivated the false prophets? Why would people claim to speak for God when they had received no such commissioning? Why would someone prophesy a peace for which he had no evidence? It's really very simple, isn't it? People want to hear good news. When the terminally ill patient comes to his physician and says, "Tell me the truth, Doctor, is it serious? Am I going to die?" which is easier: to tell the uncomfortable truth or gloss it over with optimistic words? It is much easier to tell people happy news than sad news—especially if that sad news involves a judgment on their lifestyle. The bottom line for the false prophets was comfort for themselves, self-interest rather than telling the people what they really needed to hear. It is so much easier to build on sand than to dig down to the solid rock. But when the flood comes, the difference in foundation is immediately apparent (Matt. 7:24–27).

In truth, all of us who preach or talk to others about Christianity are familiar with the temptation to be a false prophet from time to time. Sometimes the temptation is to be a jackal. As a jackal, the ruins of other people's lives are of no account to you so long as you have the things you need. You have little concern for those around you going to a lost eternity in hell; your own interests are more important.

At other times, perhaps the temptation is to be a draft-dodger, happy to let others stand in the gap rather than you. Your security and safety are what are really important to you. So you do not witness to those at work or at school because they might laugh at you or think you are weird. Not for you a place on the front lines of evangelism. You'd rather watch from the sidelines.

At still other times, the temptation comes to be a whitewasher. You never confront anyone about their sinful lifestyle. Instead, by your silence, you whitewash their wall. Should I witness to that family member who is a Mormon? Why, he lives such a good moral life! Splish, Splash! On goes another coat of whitewash. Should I inquire whether my family members are really trusting in Jesus for their salvation? But they all go to church, don't they? Splish! Splash! The appearance is all that counts. If the truth be told, there is a little bit of each of these categories of false prophet within each of us.

Jesus Christ, the true prophet. We should not leave this passage, however, without considering how Christ has fulfilled the role of true prophet. The man who stood in the gap in the city wall on the day of battle was risking his own life for the good of others. Jesus not only risked his life but gave his own life freely, pouring out his blood on the cross for you and me. Jesus did not let his own security stand in the way of doing God's work, nor did he guard his own comfort. Instead, for the sake of his people, he "made himself nothing, taking the very nature of a servant, being made in human likeness. And being found in appearance as a man, he humbled himself and became obedient to death—even death on a cross!" (Phil. 2:7–8).

Nor was Jesus ever willing to whitewash over people's sins, as a cursory glance at the Gospels will show. He had a better way of dealing with human sins than to cover them with whitewash; he covered them with his atoning blood. As a result, Christ's people are those who have "washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb" (Rev. 7:14). He is himself both the foundation on which they build and the One who is able to make what they have built stand forever. The wise person is indeed the one who is built on such a rock, which is alone able to withstand the storm of the Final Judgment.

Ezekiel 14:1–11

Some of the elders of Israel came to me and sat down in front of me. ²Then the word of the LORD came to me: ³"Son of man, these men have set up idols in their hearts and put wicked stumbling blocks before their faces. Should I let them inquire of me at all? ⁴Therefore speak to them and tell them, ⁵This is what the Sovereign LORD says: When any Israelite sets up idols in his heart and puts a wicked stumbling block before his face and then goes to a prophet, I the LORD will answer him myself in keeping with his great idolatry. ⁵I will do this to recapture the hearts of the people of Israel, who have all deserted me for their idols.⁷

⁶"Therefore say to the house of Israel, 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says: Repent! Turn from your idols and renounce all your detestable practices!

7" 'When any Israelite or any alien living in Israel separates himself from me and sets up idols in his heart and puts a wicked stumbling block before his face and then goes to a prophet to inquire of me, I the LORD will answer him myself. ⁸I will set my face against that man and make him an example and a byword. I will cut him off from my people. Then you will know that I am the LORD.

9" 'And if the prophet is enticed to utter a prophecy, I the LORD have enticed that prophet, and I will stretch out my hand against him and destroy him from among my people Israel. ¹⁰They will bear their guilt—the prophet will be as guilty as the one who consults him. ¹¹Then the people of Israel will no longer stray from me, nor will they defile themselves anymore with all their sins. They will be my people, and I will be their God, declares the Sovereign LORD.'"

Original Meaning

EVEN IN EXILE, the people were not left without leadership. The vacuum left by the absence of the old structures, built around the monarchy, was filled by "the elders," the heads of the exiled families. Though they had presumably come to the prophet seeking an encouraging oracle from the Lord, Ezekiel turns on these elders with a sharp accusation of idolatry (see also chs. 8 and 20). The charge against them is given in 14:3: "These men have set up idols in their hearts and put wicked stumbling blocks before their faces." The accusation of having set up their "idols in their hearts" is reminiscent of 8:10–12, where the elders are denounced for secret idolatry with "all the idols of the house of Israel."

In other words, the elders in exile are tainted with the same fundamental sin as those left behind in Judah: internal idolatry. Even while externally willing to go through the orthodox motions of inquiring of the Lord, their hearts belonged elsewhere. The phrase "wicked stumbling block," which occurs six times in Ezekiel, is also invariably linked to idolatry.² Because the hearts of the exilic elders are divided between the Lord and idols, the Lord will give the elders no answer to their inquiry except an answer of judgment (14:4). By this means, the Lord will "seize" their hearts, arresting them for their sin (14:5).³ Seeking to serve two masters will result in judgment by the Lord, the only "master" with any real power to act.

The people in exile are equally implicated in this halfheartedness. They may not have given in to the flagrant idolatry going on in Jerusalem, but there was a more subtle form of assault that had affected even those in exile with the prophet in Babylon. They found themselves living in a broken and fallen world, where their regular experience was of dislocation and disorientation, where things were falling apart, where the center could not hold, and where life did not seem to make sense. The temptation they faced was to turn to the idols of this world as a means of, if not making sense out of the world, at least of numbing the pain.

Those who feel abandoned by God find that the pull of seeking out other gods increases, other gods whom they think can deliver the sense of security and significance they seek. If the Lord cannot deliver, why not try Marduk or one of the other Babylonian gods? Their hearts are torn between two loyalties, and they are attracted by the blessings that the idols seem to promise, the greener grass they offer, the more powerful magic they seem to contain.

The result is that all of the exiles have, in their hearts, deserted the Lord for their idols (14:5). Such people—whether native-born Israelite or proselyte (14:7)⁴—should not expect to receive a word of divine guidance through the prophet. God is not deceived by the orthodoxy of their outward behavior, for he looks on the heart (1 Sam. 16:7). Instead, the Lord will answer them himself (Ezek. 14:7), by direct action rather than through a prophet. Do they want a word from the Lord? The Lord will demonstrate his attitude toward them by making them "an example and a byword" (14:8). Just as Lot's wife has become a proverbial example of the dangers of looking back, so they too will become a "byword," a proverbial warning of the dangers of divided loyalties.

The judgment with which they are threatened is being "cut . . . off from [the LORD's] people" (14:8). This punishment has often been interpreted as a form of excommunication;⁵ however, in view of the divine destruction threatened on a prophet in the following verse, the death penalty is more likely indicated here.⁶ In any case, it is doubtful that the people would have seen a big distinction between the two fates as we do. In either case, the sinner would be excised from the covenant community, from the realm of life, and sent out into the realm of death, like the scapegoat on the Day of Atonement.⁷

A similar judgment would apply to any prophet who attempted to provide an oracle for them. There were clearly other prophets present in exile apart from Ezekiel, and the temptation to go shopping around for a more favorable word was significant. Yet any such word would be no true word from the Lord, but rather a deceiving word sent as a judgment on the compromising prophet and people alike (14:9). Those who sought false gods rather than the true God would find what they sought—lies in place of the truth. Those who attempted to counteract God's will by speaking when he had not spoken would find that they were doing nothing other than God's will, confirming the guilty ones in their guilt.

Yet the fact that they are unwittingly doing the sovereign will of God in no way exempts the prophet, as secondary cause, from responsibility for his own words. In Deuteronomy 13:1–5 both elements are brought together: the will of the Lord to test the people (v. 3), and the will of the prophet to lead the people astray from the way of Yahweh (v. 5). If the people refuse to listen to God's prophets who tell them the truth, the Lord will bring judgment on the people by giving them lying prophets, who will tell them what they want to hear.

A similar judgment fell on Ahab in 1 Kings 22: As a judgment for his refusal to listen to prophetic truth, the Lord promised to send him a deceitful oracle through another prophet. Yet the prophet remains responsible for his own actions. Prophet and idolater alike will each "bear their guilt" (Ezek. 14:10), that is, they will bear the punishment their iniquity deserves. The guilt of each is equal (14:10), and so they are destined for a similar fate, that of being "cut off" or "destroyed" from the covenant people.

Yet the goal of God's judgment on the exiles is not their total extermination, but rather their salvation. There is still room for God's people to repent and return to God (14:6). The result of God's purifying judgment will be a faithful and undefiled people, cleansed from their transgressions (14:11). The goal of the covenant—God's dwelling in the midst of his people—will certainly not be thwarted, not even by Israel's sin (14:11).

Bridging Contexts

DIVINE SOVEREIGNTY and human responsibility. The question of the relationship between divine sovereignty and human responsibility is by no means a new issue. Yet perhaps few eras have been less conducive to the acceptance of divine sovereignty than ours. We live in an age that celebrates human freedom above all things. As my wife once heard it put in a women's Bible study: "The debate between divine sovereignty and human free will is too complex to discuss. But of this one thing we can be sure: Human beings have free will." Previous generations (and indeed many contemporary non-Western cultures) would certainly not have framed their conclusions in similar terms. If there was one thing that was clear to them, it was that the gods did what they wished and human beings were powerless against them. In consequence, what modern Westerners may perceive as the key interpretive issue in this passage (How can God deceive a prophet and still hold him responsible for his actions?) would probably not have been a difficulty for Ezekiel's audience.

The Old Testament frequently traces actions that we attribute to secondary causes back to their primary cause in the will of God. Thus, whereas we perceive the abundance or lack of rain to be due to a certain combination of meteorological conditions, some of which we now recognize as due to our own mismanagement of the planet, the ancient Israelite saw the rains as a direct expression of the Lord's pleasure or displeasure with his people (Deut. 11:13–14).

In part, this is due to our different position in the redemptive-historical scheme of things. God no longer deals with our nations directly, in the way he did with ancient Israel, for our nations are not in covenant relationship with him as Israel was. So for us, rain is not directly an expression of the blessings and curses of the covenant. But in part, this attitude is also an expression of a modern form of idolatry, whereby nature is crowned with godlike powers and humanity is perceived as the only significant player in the universe.

In contrast, in the Bible it is God who is the only significant player in the universe. All things can ultimately be traced back to his agency and his will. Even the prophecy of a false prophet, which led people astray, could not be given without the Lord's permission and direction. Does that thereby make God responsible for sin? By no means. For God's action in giving the prophet a deceitful oracle is nothing other than giving him and his hearers what they have sought. It is a judgment of God that in no way violates the free will of prophet or people, for they do nothing other than what their nature inclines towards. The vaunted "free will" of sinful humanity turns out to be nothing more than the "free will" of a hungry lion presented with the choice between a juicy piece of meat and a fresh green salad. It is the lion's nature always (freely!) to choose the meat. Should the zookeeper sovereignly choose to present the lion only with fresh meat and to hold back the salad, the lion's "free will" is not thereby violated. He continues to choose what his nature dictates he will choose.

Our natural human inclination and God's grace. Left to themselves, human beings have a similar "taste" for evil. By nature, they will inevitably choose lies in place of the truth and worship the created in place of the Creator (Rom. 1:18–25). Therefore, God is in no way violating their free will when he gives them over to the sinful desires of their hearts and a depraved mind (1:24, 26, 28), or when he sends a powerful delusion on those who have refused to love the truth (2 Thess. 2:11–12). Those New Testament references demonstrate that this is not merely an "Old Testament" doctrine, but one that persists throughout the pages of Scripture.

Indeed, the truly difficult question to answer is not why God sovereignly allows sinners to persist in the delusion they seek, but why God sovereignly chooses to save some of those selfsame sinners! It is not because those saved are more intelligent or richer or more beautiful or more righteous than those who perish. Far from it, all is of grace, not of works, so that no one has any grounds for boasting (Eph. 2:8–10). The sovereignty that changes the lion's nature, enabling him to lie down in peace and eat salad with the lamb, is genuinely astonishing and without cause except for God's electing love! How indeed can it be that sinful men and women can acquire a taste for righteousness? There is the true cause for wonder. As Charles Wesley put it in his great hymn:

And can it be that I should gain
An interest in the Savior's blood?
Died He for me, who caused His pain?
For me, who Him to death pursued?
Amazing love! how can it be
That Thou, my God, shouldst die for me?

Contemporary Significance

THE STANDARD OF "just good enough." When I used to work in the oil industry, we had a problem that we called the problem of "just good enough." Things would always be manufactured just good enough to meet the standard you set—and no better. If you simply specified a car, what you got was the most basic vehicle on four wheels, not a Mercedes. If you wanted a Mercedes, you had to ask for a Mercedes. Similarly, most people, most of the time, are content to coast through life, doing just enough. We don't in general have a massive urge to push back the frontiers of knowledge and goodness. Most of us are content to live lives that are "just good enough."

But what is "just good enough" when it comes to your commitment to God? Is it enough to be 25 percent committed—you come to church one Sunday out of four and obey two and a half of the Ten Commandments? Is it enough to be 51 percent committed—better than the average pew sitter? Or must you be 100 percent, totally, life-dominatingly committed to God? If this was a multiple-choice test, I'm sure we'd all get the right answer. Everyone within the church knows that you ought to be 100 percent committed to God. So why is it that surveys time and time again show that the majority of Christians behave little differently from their secular counterparts? Why is it that the statistics on premarital sex and divorce are not radically different for Christians and non-Christians?

The answer is that all of us who claim the name of Christ have divided hearts. Outwardly, our appearance may "fit": We go to church regularly and appear to be decent, religious people. Yet when it comes to the tough decisions in life, there are other standards operating than God's Word, which demonstrates the existence in our hearts of other gods than the true God. We have deep-seated idolatries in our hearts that drive our various behavior patterns. Like the Laodiceans, our deeds prove us to be neither cold nor hot, but lukewarm, fit only to be spit out (Rev. 3:16).

The fundamental issue of idolatry. Yet when trouble comes, we want the Lord to come to our aid. We seek his help, but at the same time we don't want to give up on our other options. We don't want to give up our cherished sins. Ezekiel tells us that such an approach to God is not an option. You cannot serve the true God and keep one foot in the camp of idolatry at the same time. God sees what we are really like on the inside; we cannot hide the truth from him, and the double-minded person stands to receive nothing from God (James 1:7).

Much of the counseling within the church of our day fails to recognize the key significance of the idolatries that remain within our hearts. On the one hand, there is a moralizing approach that focuses purely on the level of behavior. This approach says, "Your problem is that your anger (or lust, or worry, or whatever) is sin. Repent and change your behavior! If you would just do what is right, then good feelings will follow." The problem with this approach is that in focusing on behavior it doesn't go deep enough. It doesn't recognize the reason for the behavior: the idols and false beliefs that are driving it. The reason why this particular person sins in this particular way is because there are idols and false beliefs in his or her life that say, "By doing this, you will gain what is really important and meaningful in life."

On the other hand, there is a psychologizing approach to counseling that says, "Your basic problem is that you don't see that God loves you and accepts you just as you are. If you could just feel good about yourself, right actions will follow." This approach focuses on the feelings rather than the behavior, but still doesn't go deep enough. It doesn't recognize that behind the bad feelings lies an idolatry, a belief that "even if God loves me, yet while I don't have this, I'm not a worthwhile person." Both approaches fail to see the sin behind the sin, the fundamental issue of idolatry."

A better approach is to recognize that driving both our behaviors and our feelings are deep-seated heart idolatries. Our fundamental problem lies in looking to something besides God for our happiness. This is not a new observation. The church father Tertullian put it this way:

The principle crime of the human race, the highest guilt charged upon the world, the whole procuring cause of judgment, is idolatry. For, although each single fault retains its own proper feature, although it is destined to judgment under its own proper name also, yet it is marked off under the general account of idolatry. . . . Thus it comes to pass, that in idolatry all crimes are detected and in all crimes idolatry. ¹²

What does Tertullian mean by that? He goes on to explain that all murder is idolatry since the motive for killing is ultimately that something is loved more than God—yet in turn all idolatry is murder for it incurs one's own death. Similarly all idolatry is also adultery because it is unfaithfulness to the truth and to God, while adultery is idolatry because it flows from the inordinate desire for a person or for a sensation, a desire stronger than our love for God and our desire to obey his law.

Idolatry, then, is simply the desire for something other than God at the center of our lives as our guiding star, the source of meaning in our life. As such, idolatry is the sin behind every sin, the life-lie that drives all of our choices and values. The object of that idolatry varies from person to person. There are probably as many different idols as there are human beings. However, the fact that we have idols is an inescapable truth. Our hearts are, in Calvin's vivid image, factories that mass-produce idols.¹³

Repentance and freedom from idolatry. The only way to deal with our idols is to come to God in the simple act of repentance. Repentance turns its back on any other source of hope or self-justification and finds its refuge in the Lord alone. It is the attitude expressed by the hymnwriter Augustus Toplady: "Nothing in my hand I bring; simply to thy cross I cling." This attitude is the ultimate idol-smasher, for every idolatry is at root an effort towards self-justification. Every idol promises us salvation, that is, self-worth, if we will just give in to what it demands. The idol "beauty" says: "I can make you a worthwhile person. Just make the sacrifices I require, and you will never lack friends"; the idol "power" says: "Put in the long hours in pursuit of your career, even though it costs you your family, and I will give you a significant life." Idols make promises to those who can meet their demands.

Christianity offers salvation, meaning, and worth only to those who recognize that they can never give what the law demands; their only hope lies in the fact that Christ has fulfilled it for them. "Religion" or "doing good" is a popular idolatry that says: "Be a good person, punish yourself for your sins, turn your back on them, and you will be saved." The difference between Christians and religiously minded idolaters is that Christians repent not only of their sins but also of their very best deeds, their best righteousness, in order to receive in its place the righteousness of Christ, to which they cling single-heartedly.¹⁴

Even that ability to cling single-heartedly to the Lord is itself the gift of God. The promise of Ezekiel 11:19 is that the Lord will give his people "an undivided heart," a single-minded devotion to the Lord. By nature, all of us desert God and go after idols. But our idols will not ultimately have dominion over us. In order to rescue us from ourselves and from the grasp of our idols, God sent Jesus Christ into the world for us. There is nothing halfhearted about Jesus' commitment to his people. He came down from heaven to live among us—that alone is an astonishing commitment. But his commitment is laid out even more plainly for us to see on the cross. His body was torn apart there because of my sins. His blood was poured out as a fountain to cleanse me from my unrighteousness. There on the cross, Jesus won a complete victory for us. Through his complete obedience, the demands of the law were comprehensively met. That's why his final words on the cross were: "It is finished" (John 19:30). It is complete! His work is done.

Christ's finished work on the cross is what gives us freedom from our idols. Their power to threaten us was broken once and for all, there and then. When our idols say to us, "You are not a worthwhile person if you do not have success or beauty or wealth or children or _____" (fill in the appropriate blank with the demand of your idol), now we can simply point them to the cross. There, God demonstrated his love by declaring me worth the death of his sinless only Son; there, God declared me a valued member of his family; there, God accomplished for me the free gift of salvation. That fact, unlike the moralizing or psychologizing approaches, frees me to recognize the full depth of my sin, because I now recognize the full depth of God's love for me in Christ. I am indeed a far worse sinner than I ever thought, but in Christ I am at the same time far more loved than I ever dared hope.

The result of Jesus' wholehearted sacrifice is the salvation of his people and their restoration to the full covenant relationship with God. What Ezekiel looked forward to, the presence of God in the midst of his sinless people on the far side of judgment (Ezek. 14:11), is still that to which the church looks forward. Though even now we experience the presence of Jesus in our midst whenever two or three are gathered together (Matt. 18:20), yet we are still strangers and aliens in this world, all too familiar with sin. Remaining sin in the lives of believers serves God's glory by showing that he has not done anything without cause. It continues to remind us of our own weakness and depravity and thus to point us to the Savior. It continues to remind us of the world's depravity, and thus of our neighbors' utter need of Christ if they are ever to be saved.

But sin will not remain our constant companion forever (Ezek. 14:11). Because of the sin-bearer's death in our place, we look forward to the day when we will join perfectly in the worship on the heavenly mountain. There we will join with the whole community of saints of all times and places, along with the heavenly hosts of angels and archangels. On that day, the dwelling of God will be with his people and he will live with them (Rev. 21:3). On that day, our idols will finally be smashed, and we will be able to worship and serve our beloved God with undivided hearts.

Ezekiel 14:12-23

THE WORD OF THE LORD came to me: ¹³"Son of man, if a country sins against me by being unfaithful and I stretch out my hand against it to cut off its food supply and send famine upon it and kill its men and their animals, ¹⁴even if these three men—Noah, Daniel and Job—were in it, they could save only themselves by their righteousness, declares the Sovereign LORD.

15"Or if I send wild beasts through that country and they leave it childless and it becomes desolate so that no one can pass through it because of the beasts, ¹⁶ as surely as I live, declares the Sovereign LORD, even if these three men were in it, they could not save their own sons or daughters. They alone would be saved, but the land would be desolate.

¹⁷"Or if I bring a sword against that country and say, 'Let the sword pass throughout the land,' and I kill its men and their animals, ¹⁸as surely as I live, declares the Sovereign LORD, even if these three men were in it, they could not save their own sons or daughters. They alone would be saved.

¹⁹"Or if I send a plague into that land and pour out my wrath upon it through bloodshed, killing its men and their animals, ²⁰as surely as I live, declares the Sovereign LORD, even if Noah, Daniel and Job were in it, they could save neither son nor daughter. They would save only themselves by their righteousness.

²¹"For this is what the Sovereign LORD says: How much worse will it be when I send against Jerusalem my four dreadful judgments—sword and famine and wild beasts and plague—to kill its men and their animals! ²²Yet there will be some survivors —sons and daughters who will be brought out of it. They will come to you, and when you see their conduct and their actions, you will be consoled regarding the disaster I have brought upon Jerusalem—every disaster I have brought upon it. ²³You will be consoled when you see their conduct and their actions, for you will know that I have done nothing in it without cause, declares the Sovereign LORD."

Original Meaning

THIS SECTION OF Ezekiel's prophecy focuses on the inevitability and justice of God's decision to destroy Jerusalem. The oracle begins by introducing a hypothetical country that is unfaithful to the Lord. The implied universality of the principle is an important element supporting the justice of God's actions: The rules are the same for any nation and have not been applied unfairly to Israel. However, behind the implied universality, the actual reference is clearly to Israel, for the phrase "by being unfaithful" (Ezek. 14:13) refers elsewhere to a breach of a covenant relationship. This may be through marital infidelity (Num. 5:12, 27), misappropriation of an object belonging by rights to the Lord, as in the case of Achan (Josh. 7:1), or other action that violates the covenant between God and his people (e.g., Lev. 26:40; Ezek. 17:20). Such a breach of the covenant inevitably brings on the offending nation (i.e., Israel) the curses attached to the covenant in Leviticus 26.

These covenant curses are itemized individually in the form of four test cases (Ezek. 14:13–14, 15–16, 17–18, 19–20). In each case, a different covenant curse is envisaged: famine, through cutting off the bread supply (Lev. 26:26); wild beasts (26:22); a sword (26:25); and finally plague (26:25). The prophet has already brought together this fearsome foursome in Ezekiel 5, underlining the nature of judgment as nothing arbitrary but simply the just application of the sanctions of a covenant to which Israel subscribed—and then repeatedly broke. Now, therefore, the curses of Leviticus 26 will descend.

What is common to all four cases is the hypothetical presence in the land of three righteous men: Noah, Daniel, and Job. Each of these men was noted for righteous behavior in the midst of a corrupt generation. Noah is described as "a righteous man, blameless among the people of his time" (Gen. 6:9), while Job was held up by God to Satan as a model of righteousness (Job 1:8). The identity of "Daniel" has provoked considerable discussion, with the majority of scholars arguing that he is not the biblical character of that name, which has a different spelling, but rather a heroic figure of antiquity, Danel. This king is known from Ugaritic sources as a just ruler who "judges the cause of the widow and adjudicates the case of the fatherless." He would fit with Noah and Job as ancient figures of international reputation.

Others have argued, however, that this ruler's unquestioned pagan origins would likely have been problematic for a radically theocentric prophet such as Ezekiel, and that the arguments advanced against the traditional identification with the biblical figure Daniel are not as strong as they may at first sight appear. He too fits the description of a righteous man in a difficult time, and he would probably have been known, at least by reputation, to Ezekiel's hearers.² However, Ezekiel's oracles against the nations (Ezek. 25–32) demonstrate that he is quite capable of utilizing mythical ideas known to his hearers to make his theological points, and in the oracle against the King of Tyre he once again alludes to "Danel" (28:3).³ The bottom line is that both passages are open to either identification. Fortunately, in neither case does the interpretation of the passage rest on the identification adopted. Whether mythical Danel or biblical Daniel was originally intended, in the passage he functions merely as a cipher for a readily recognized wise and righteous man.⁴

The point in each case is that even three such outstanding citizens would be unable to rescue their closest relatives (sons and daughters) out of the divinely decreed disaster for covenant violation (14:14, 16, 18, 20); their righteousness would suffice merely to save themselves. Here, there is reference to the principle of covenant or corporate solidarity, whereby a family unit often stands or falls together.⁵ It may well be that again the apparently universal language serves to deal with a specific situation, for many of those in exile would have left their children behind them and would naturally be concerned for their fate.⁶ The source of their hope would be that, as Abraham noted, God would not surely destroy the righteous along with the wicked (Gen. 18:23).

That basic theological statement is not contested in the hypothetical situation of Ezekiel 14; the righteous would themselves escape the judgment. What is contested, however, is the presumption that the presence of men of sufficient righteousness would save a land under the just judgment of God. If even such men could only save themselves and not their closest relatives, then what hope was there for the families of ordinary people? A similar declaration of the hopelessness of Jerusalem's situation is found in Jeremiah 15. There the Lord declares that he would not heed the intercession of even such famous prophets as Moses and Samuel. The people's fate is decided. It is too late for any change of heart to occur, and it would be useless for Jeremiah to attempt to avert it.

The repetition of the four cases in which the sentence and the outcome are the same, while only the form of the judgment is different, underlines the inevitability of Jerusalem's destruction (14:21). Her situation is worse on two counts than that of the hypothetical land of 14:12–20. Not only does she lack such righteous men as Noah, Daniel, and Job, but in addition she is faced with not one kind of judgment but all four at once. The statement "How much worse will it be . . ." is obvious; the inevitable outcome to be expected is that none can survive."

Yet the next verse introduces a surprising twist. Indeed, unexpectedly, some will survive the catastrophe. There will be sons and daughters brought out of the ruins (14:22). Their survival, however, is not due to their own righteousness or to the righteousness of relatives imputed to them. Indeed, they are not "saved" ($n\bar{a}$, from the city but "brought out" (Hophal of $y\bar{a}$, $g\bar{a}$) from it, a term that focuses on them as prisoners of war rather than trophies of grace. The purpose of saving this remnant is not for their sake but to "console" those already in exile by allowing them to see the extent of Jerusalem's depravity. When the exiles see the impious behavior of this "unspiritual remnant," then they will know that the Lord has not acted without cause (14:23). Justice will not only be done; it will be seen to have been done. Every mouth will be stopped by a recognition of just how bad Jerusalem had become, and therefore how clearly God had no other choice but to act.

Bridging Contexts

CORPORATE RESPONSIBILITY. The idea of corporate or familial responsibility is not a familiar one in contemporary culture. We are thoroughly indoctrinated into the idea of individual responsibility, whereby a person who does wrong is the only one who should receive punishment. Thus, when we read the story of Achan's sin in Joshua 7, we find it hard to understand why Achan's whole family should suffer for his sin. In our culture, we would simply have punished Achan, and though that punishment may have had consequences also for his family (in the loss of a husband and father), those consequences would be an unintentional byproduct of justice, not its goal.

In contrast, the Old Testament is full of examples of corporate responsibility. Representatives of a person's family suffer on account of the sins of the head of that family (e.g., Saul's descendants in 2 Sam. 21:1–9) or are saved on account of the righteous behavior of a family member (e.g., Lot saved out of Sodom because of Abraham's intercession in Gen. 19:29; Rahab's family in Josh. 2:12–13; 6:17).

Nor is this simply an expression of ancient cultural beliefs picked up from the surrounding cultural context, which we can dismiss as irrelevant for us. In the incident of Saul's descendants, God's judgment fell on the people because of Saul's unatoned sin (2 Sam. 21:1), while in the book of Chronicles, Judah's prosperity is inextricably and immediately bound up with the faithfulness of their king. Not only do the people act on the basis of corporate solidarity, so too does God. Indeed, this principle of corporate solidarity is expressed in the very heart of Israel's creed, the Ten Commandments. There the Lord describes himself as "a jealous God, punishing the children for the sin of the fathers to the third and fourth generation of those who hate me, but showing love to a thousand [generations] of those who love me and keep my commandments" (Ex. 20:5–6).

The covenant community. This corporate solidarity is closely connected to the idea of the covenant. When Abraham enters into a covenant with God, he is not the only one to be included in the blessings; they are for his descendants as well (Gen. 17:7). But if his descendants share in the blessings of the covenant as they faithfully follow in Abraham's footsteps, so also they face the consequences that flow from disobedience to the covenant. In the case of the Abrahamic covenant, the curse is simple exclusion from the covenant community (17:14). With the Sinai covenant, however, arrive not only more detailed blessings for obedience (Lev. 26:3–13) but also more extensive sanctions for disobedience (26:14–45). Because of God's covenant with David and his house, the king is assigned a unique place in the economy of Israel, as a channel of God's blessing or curse on his people. The consequences for those who disobey these covenants include not merely themselves but the whole covenant community.

Ultimately, the Bible tells us, the whole world is divided into two communities, under two covenant heads. One community is made up of those who are "in Adam," unregenerate humanity. The other community is made up of those who are "in Christ," God's covenant people. The fate of these two peoples is already determined by the obedience or disobedience of their respective covenant heads: All those in Adam are under sentence of death, while those who are in Christ will reign in life (Rom. 5:12–20).

The point of Ezekiel 14, however, is that this "big picture" of righteousness or sin imputed on the basis of membership of a community must not blind us to the individual demands made on covenant members. Jesus answers the claim of the Jews of his day that they were Abraham's children by saying, "If you were Abraham's children . . . you would do the things Abraham did" (John 8:39). The members of Adam's community prove themselves to be natural children of their father by sinning on their own account; equally, those who claim to be members of the Lord's covenant community must demonstrate a righteousness of their own, reflecting the perfect righteousness they have been given. As the apostle John puts it:

The man who says, "I know him," but does not do what he commands is a liar, and the truth is not in him. But if anyone obeys his word, God's love is truly made complete in him. This is how we know we are in him: Whoever claims to live in him must walk as Jesus did. (1 John 2:4–6)

We cannot trade on the borrowed righteousness of others while ourselves lacking the marks of regeneration. For we too face a judgment to come on the last day in which God's justice will be poured out in full measure. Only those truly trusting in Jesus Christ as their covenant head will escape, and there can be no assurance apart from obedience. Obedience—genuine, idolsmashing obedience—is the mark of a true work of grace in the heart.

Contemporary Significance

THE MYSTERIOUS SIDE of providence. As human beings, one of our persistent traits is the marginalization of evil. We find it hard to believe in the existence of evil inside ourselves and the ones we love; instead, we reserve that sobriquet for the perpetrators of genocide and mass murder. We are ready to recognize that Hitler may have been evil, and perhaps Charles Manson and others of his ilk, but we are reluctant to admit that all of us are tainted with the same brush. We start from the premise that we are all basically good. And if we are basically good, how can a good God permit "bad things" to happen to us?

The Bible has a radically different perspective. All of us are basically bad, as Paul makes clear in Romans 3:23: "All have sinned and fall short of the glory of God." Until we grasp the accuracy of this statement as a description not merely of the worst of people but the very best, we will never understand the nature of the world in which we live. Our hearts will be filled with resentment at the impossible demands that God makes on us and his inexplicable anger at our inevitable failures.

But when we (all too rarely) experience genuine guilt over our actions, then our eyes are finally opened to the truth about our standing in God's sight. We realize that a God who is not moved to anger by what we have done cannot be a good being. If that is so, and we are in fact much worse than we ever thought, then the astonishing aspect of the world is not the bad things that happen to good people but the good things that happen to bad people. Why should God send his rain on good and evil alike? God's patience with sinners is the really mysterious side of providence.

For that reason, the fall of Jerusalem to the Babylonians is not a bad thing happening to good people but a genuinely bad thing (a "dreadful," or more lit., an "evil" judgment; see Ezek. 14:21), which is deservedly happening to bad people. When the exiles learn the truth of Jerusalem's depravity by observing the survivors of the holocaust, then they will come to recognize that God has indeed not acted without cause (14:23). A city and nation can reach a stage where the presence of a few righteous people, be they the most righteous people who ever lived, cannot save it from God's wrath (14:13–20). As it was in the days of Noah and in the time of Sodom, so now judgment without mercy will descend upon the wicked of Jerusalem.

A God of grace and patience. Yet was Jerusalem really worse in its idolatry and social sins than New York or San Francisco or any of our modern cities? Are our small towns and villages really more God-fearing than the ancient Israelites were? The astonishing fact is not that God judged Jerusalem, but that God allows our contemporary society, with all its sins, flagrant and secret, to continue to exist. We should not regard that patience as inability to act, however. God's "slowness" is patience in order to allow time for all of his chosen people to repent. But once that harvest is complete, the Day of Judgment will come with speed and finality (2 Peter 3:9–10). The sheep will be separated out from the goats, the children of the kingdom from the children of wrath, and there will be no room for quibbling at the justice of God.

All will then see that God has indeed done nothing without cause. When the true extent of the evil in our hearts is revealed, there will be no more marveling over how a good God could send anyone to eternal punishment. Instead, there will only be wonder and adoration at the astonishing grace of God that chose to rescue us from the fate we deserved all too well. We will be truly astonished that he chose from before the foundation of the world to save for himself a people of every tribe and nation and language group, through the death of his only Son on the cross. On that day, our refrain will indeed be, in Charles Wesley's words:

Died He for me, who caused His pain?
For me, who Him to death pursued?
Amazing love! How can it be?
That Thou, my God, shouldst die for me?

Ezekiel 15

The word of the LORD came to me: ²"Son of man, how is the wood of a vine better than that of a branch on any of the trees in the forest? ³Is wood ever taken from it to make anything useful? Do they make pegs from it to hang things on? ⁴And after it is thrown on the fire as fuel and the fire burns both ends and chars the middle, is it then useful for anything? ⁵If it was not useful for anything when it was whole, how much less can it be made into something useful when the fire has burned it and it is charred?

6"Therefore this is what the Sovereign LORD says: As I have given the wood of the vine among the trees of the forest as fuel for the fire, so will I treat the people living in Jerusalem. ⁷I will set my face against them. Although they have come out of the fire, the fire will yet consume them. And when I set my face against them, you will know that I am the LORD. ⁸I will make the land desolate because they have been unfaithful, declares the Sovereign LORD."

Original Meaning

IN THE EARLIER CHAPTERS, we saw how Ezekiel was called to use a variety of sign-acts to illustrate and drive home to the people's hearts the great danger facing Jerusalem. The vision of the abandonment of the temple (chs. 8–11) formed essentially the same message in another format. Chapters 15–19 comprises a series of extended metaphorical units, demonstrating Ezekiel's versatility in pounding home the message with which he has been commissioned.¹

Ezekiel 15 is a brief parable, a pictorial story with a sting in the tail; the interpretation of the parable that the prophet adds develops the message of chapter 14 concerning the inevitability of Jerusalem's destruction. The link with the preceding section is apparent in the concluding verse (15:8), which picks up the idea of a land acting unfaithfully ($m\bar{a}'al\ ma'al$; 14:13), that is, breaching the covenant relationship, and consequently becoming desolate ($\check{s}^e m\bar{a}m\hat{a}$; 14:16).² This acts as a kind of inclusio, rounding off this section (14:12–15:8) with its focus on Jerusalem's forthcoming annihilation.³

Yet the message of chapter 15 only becomes plain when the interpretation is added to the parable. Like many parables, the meaning is at first concealed in a homely illustration, so obviously true to life that no one can disagree. Once the audience has accepted the self-evident surface message of the parable, then its less palatable deeper significance can be revealed. In a similarly roundabout way, the prophet Nathan confronts King David with his adultery (2 Sam. 12:1–10). First, he tells a story of a rich man who steals his poor neighbor's single lamb rather than kill one of his own. Only after David has recognized the self-evident truth that such behavior is reprehensible ("The man who did this deserves to die") does Nathan reveal its true application: "You are the man!" David is condemned out of his own lips. Similarly in Isaiah's "Song of the Vineyard," the prophet lays out the deplorable state of the Lord's vineyard in metaphorical form before stating explicitly that the vineyard in question is the Lord's vineyard, the house of Israel and the men of Judah (Isa. 5:1–7).

Thus, Ezekiel starts out with a familiar agricultural picture. The prunings cut from the vine were familiar objects, and it is immediately apparent to all that they serve no useful purpose. They cannot be manufactured into anything of value, not even a peg to hang something on—the most basic of all uses. They have neither strength nor beauty to commend them. The only thing therefore to do with these agricultural by-products is to burn them. Now frequently among the ashes of the fire, half-burnt pieces of vine would be found, the ends burned away and the middle charred. Were such pieces thereby made more useful? The conclusion of Ezek. 15:5 is inescapable: "If it was not useful for anything when it was whole, how much less can it be made into something useful when the fire has burned it and it is charred?" No one can disagree with Ezekiel's presentation thus far.

He then proceeds to apply the metaphor, to press home a less acceptable proposition: Jerusalem is like that vine wood, and its fate is therefore (inevitably) going to be that of half-burnt vine branches, fit for nothing but to be thrown back onto the fire and consumed completely. Just as the Lord has "given" vine wood to be burnt because of its uselessness, so also the inhabitants of Jerusalem have been "given" by the Lord (15:6). This implies not only a comparable divinely determined fate (burning) but a comparable divinely determined assessment of value (useless).

But even this first "burning," the initial defeat of Judah in 597 B.C. and the first exile, has not achieved a redemptive purpose: The people have not been made any more fit for God's purposes, but on the contrary even more useless than before. Again, the conclusion is inescapable: "Although they have come out of the fire, the fire will yet consume them" (15:7). Back into the fire they will go, for they are fit for nothing else, and this time the destruction will be complete. As in 14:12–23, the unfaithfulness of the land to its covenant overlord in pursuing idols will result in its being made desolate.

Bridging Contexts

BECAUSE WE ARE not familiar with vines and vine branches in our everyday experience, the temptation for us is to connect this parable too quickly to the usage of that imagery in the rest of Scripture. The Bible is the only place where we are accustomed to encounter vines and branches. Yet in so doing we may miss the point of the parable, which moves from obvious everyday experience to establish unpalatable spiritual truth. Ezekiel's hearers would not immediately have recognized the vine branch as a picture of Israel, and it is important for the effectiveness of the parable that they should not do so until after they have accepted the surface meaning as inescapably true. Like David, they must not recognize their reflection in the mirror until they have pronounced sentence on themselves. Parables characteristically pull the rug out from underneath us, sweeping away our comfortable certainties and showing us an unexpectedly unfamiliar landscape where a moment earlier we thought we found ourselves at home.⁴

Having said that, once the application has been made, the parable invites comparison with other traditional uses of similar imagery, notably the vineyard image and that of fire. The vine is a traditional symbol for Israel, expressing God's loving care for that nation as a vinedresser takes care of what he has planted (Ps. 80:8–9; Isa. 5:1–7). The image also expresses

God's expectation of return from his people: The vinedresser looks for fruit in return for his labors, an expectation in which he has often been disappointed (Isa. 5:2; Jer. 2:21).

Ezekiel takes this metaphor one stage further by comparing the inhabitants of Jerusalem not to the vine itself, from which fruit was to be expected, but to the prunings from the vine, which were inherently useless and fit only for the fire. This fits with Ezekiel's radical emphasis on the congenital nature of Israel's sin, which comes to expression in the following chapter.⁵ There never was a golden age of obedience in the past from which Israel has now declined but only one long history of unfaithfulness, and thus judgment is inevitable.

Yet does Ezekiel's message not also invite the hearer to ask the question: "If those remaining in the land are the prunings, is there still a true vine, a real Israel, somewhere else—perhaps even among the exiles?" This fits with Ezekiel's insistence in Ezekiel 11 that God's presence is no longer in Jerusalem but among the exiles. In contrast to the insistence of those left in the land that they were the choice portion, chosen to inherit the land (11:3, 15), they are actually the part destined for burning, while the remnant exists among those in exile (11:7–12, 15–16).

The imagery of fire has a twofold history in the Old Testament, as a purifying force and as a destroying force. The idea of a refiner's fire cleansing the people from their impurities is found in 1 Kings 8:51; Isaiah 1:25; 48:10; and several times in postexilic literature (e.g., Mal. 3:2–3). Yet the fire is also an image of the power of the Lord to destroy the worthless (e.g., Ex. 15:7; Isa. 5:24). It is only natural for the imagery of fire to be applied to the trials of 586 B.C. But the real question was whether that fire had a refining goal, producing a purified people, or a destroying goal, wiping out an impure people. Ezekiel's contention, which runs contrary to the hopes of many of his fellow exiles, was that as far as Jerusalem was concerned, the fire was that of God's judgment, and its goal was not the redemption of his city (as in Isa. 1:25–26) but its total destruction.

Contemporary Significance

WHY DO BAD THINGS happen to people in this life? The destruction coming on Jerusalem is one specific example of a more general problem: If all things in this world come from the hand of the sovereign Lord, why does he send pains and sorrows into the lives of all people, and some more than others? What purpose do these things serve in the world? The answer to that question is that, like fire, they serve a twofold purpose: to purify and to destroy.

There are two mistakes people commonly make in this regard. The first is to assume that all "bad things" have a destructive, punitive purpose. Why did I lose my job? Why did my spouse die? Why did God allow my exhusband to sexually abuse my child? If we see all of these evils as only the result of God's punitive purpose, then we develop a tragically distorted view of God. God is then seen as a kind of divine policeman, eternally hiding at the roadside to catch us exceeding the speed limit of life.

True, all the evils in this world are the result of sin—for without the Fall there would have been no death or sickness, no cause for tears or mourning. But not all the evils in my life are the direct result of my sin. To take a trivial example, God did not cause it to rain on my picnic because I missed my quiet time yesterday. Jesus addressed this view when his disciples posed the question to him concerning a man blind from birth, as to who sinned: the man himself or his parents. The Lord's response is illuminating: "Neither this man nor his parents sinned . . . but this happened so that the work of God might be displayed in his life" (John 9:3). Jesus' point is not that the man and his parents were sinless; rather, their personal sins were not the determining factor, but God's good purpose.

That purpose may be expressed through profound, life-changing incidents, as in the healing of this man, a sign demonstrating Jesus' power. Pain may indeed be the megaphone through which God speaks in order to get our attention. Or it may be expressed in the apparently trivial disappointments we experience, which cumulatively encourage us to turn our eyes from seeking satisfaction in this fallen world onward to seek our true satisfaction in God's new creation. Without God's redemptive application of the rod of suffering to our lives, we would have no cause to desire something better than this world and thus to turn to God.

Yet not all suffering is inherently redemptive. That was the mistake the exiles had been deceived into making by their eager desire for a better future for their homeland. So also people may imagine that because a person has suffered a great deal, he or she has automatically been made a better person by it. Some suffering may not only result from my sin, it can also confirm me in my sin. Suffering can harden a heart, preparing the person for final destruction, as well as soften it, preparing him or her for final redemption.

What is it, then, that makes suffering fruitful in the life of one person, while in another it is merely a foreshadowing of the wrath to come? This is the question Jesus addresses in his image of the vine and the branches (John 15). Picking up on the Old Testament imagery of Israel as a vine, he declares that he himself is the true vine whom God tends; in other words, he himself is the true Israel (John 15:1). To be "in [him]," that is, to be a member of his body, a living part of the church, is to be part of the true, fruit-bearing Israel (John 15:4), while to be apart from him is to be worthless, fit only to be burned in the fire (15:5–6). There is no place in God's kingdom for the "go it alone" mentality that is so popular in our culture.

Freedom from suffering is precisely not the result to be expected from remaining on the vine: on the contrary, fruitful branches are "pruned" just as fruitless ones are cast off (John 15:2, 6). Suffering is a part of every life, but for the Christian it is a "fruitful" part of life, bearing a harvest of righteousness (cf. Heb. 12:11). As we suffer, we are further conformed to the likeness of Christ, the Suffering Servant. As we suffer, we are detached from our passionate absorption with ourselves and this present world and taught to refocus our attention on the glories that await us in the place where suffering will be no more. Suffering teaches us that God's grace is sufficient for easily broken earthen vessels like us (2 Cor. 4:7–10). For the non-Christian, however, suffering ultimately bears no fruit; it brings about no change in one's course of life. Outside the vine, the outlook is as bleak as that which Ezekiel prophesies for Jerusalem: Unbelievers are headed on a course toward certain destruction.

The word of the LORD came to me: ²"Son of man, confront Jerusalem with her detestable practices ³and say, 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says to Jerusalem: Your ancestry and birth were in the land of the Canaanites; your father was an Amorite and your mother a Hittite. ⁴On the day you were born your cord was not cut, nor were you washed with water to make you clean, nor were you rubbed with salt or wrapped in cloths. ⁵No one looked on you with pity or had compassion enough to do any of these things for you. Rather, you were thrown out into the open field, for on the day you were born you were despised.

6" 'Then I passed by and saw you kicking about in your blood, and as you lay there in your blood I said to you, "Live!" ⁷I made you grow like a plant of the field. You grew up and developed and became the most beautiful of jewels. Your breasts were formed and your hair grew, you who were naked and bare.

8" 'Later I passed by, and when I looked at you and saw that you were old enough for love, I spread the corner of my garment over you and covered your nakedness. I gave you my solemn oath and entered into a covenant with you, declares the Sovereign LORD, and you became mine.

⁹" 'I bathed you with water and washed the blood from you and put ointments on you. ¹⁰I clothed you with an embroidered dress and put leather sandals on you. I dressed you in fine linen and covered you with costly garments. ¹¹I adorned you with jewelry: I put bracelets on your arms and a necklace around your neck, ¹²and I put a ring on your nose, earrings on your ears and a beautiful crown on your head.

¹³So you were adorned with gold and silver; your clothes were of fine linen and costly fabric and embroidered cloth. Your food was fine flour, honey and olive oil. You became very beautiful and rose to be a queen. ¹⁴And your fame spread among the nations on account of your beauty, because the splendor I had given you made your beauty perfect, declares the Sovereign LORD.

15" 'But you trusted in your beauty and used your fame to become a prostitute. You lavished your favors on anyone who passed by and your beauty became his. ¹⁶You took some of your garments to make gaudy high places, where you carried on your prostitution. Such things should not happen, nor should they ever occur. ¹⁷You also took the fine jewelry I gave you, the jewelry made of my gold and silver, and you made for yourself male idols and engaged in prostitution with them. ¹⁸And you took your embroidered clothes to put on them, and you offered my oil and incense before them. ¹⁹Also the food I provided for you—the fine flour, olive oil and honey I gave you to eat—you offered as fragrant incense before them. That is what happened, declares the Sovereign LORD.

²⁰" 'And you took your sons and daughters whom you bore to me and sacrificed them as food to the idols. Was your prostitution not enough? ²¹You slaughtered my children and sacrificed them to the idols. ²²In all your detestable practices and your prostitution you did not remember the days of your youth, when you were naked and bare, kicking about in your blood.

²³" 'Woe! Woe to you, declares the Sovereign LORD. In addition to all your other wickedness, ²⁴you built a mound for yourself and made a lofty shrine in every public square. ²⁵At the head of every street you built your lofty shrines and degraded your beauty, offering your body with increasing promiscuity to anyone who passed by. ²⁶You engaged in prostitution with the Egyptians, your lustful neighbors, and provoked me to anger with your increasing promiscuity. ²⁷So I stretched out my hand against you and reduced your territory; I gave you over to the greed of your enemies, the daughters of the Philistines, who were shocked by your lewd conduct. ²⁸You engaged in prostitution with the Assyrians too, because you were insatiable; and even after that, you still were not satisfied. ²⁹Then you increased your promiscuity to include Babylonia, a land of merchants, but even with this you were not satisfied.

³²" 'You adulterous wife! You prefer strangers to your own husband! ³³Every prostitute receives a fee, but you give gifts to all your lovers, bribing them to come to you from everywhere for your illicit favors. ³⁴So in your prostitution you are the opposite of others; no one runs after you for your favors. You are the very opposite, for you give payment and none is given to you.

35% 'Therefore, you prostitute, hear the word of the LORD! ³⁶This is what the Sovereign LORD says: Because you poured out your wealth and exposed your nakedness in your promiscuity with your lovers, and because of all your detestable idols, and because you gave them your children's blood, ³⁷therefore I am going to gather all your lovers, with whom you found pleasure, those you loved as well as those you hated. I will gather them against you from all around and will strip you in front of them, and they will see all your nakedness. ³⁸I will sentence you to the punishment of women who commit adultery and who shed blood; I will bring upon you the blood vengeance of my wrath and jealous anger. ³⁹Then I will hand you over to your lovers, and they will tear down your mounds and destroy your lofty shrines. They will strip you of your clothes and take your fine jewelry and leave you naked and bare. ⁴⁰They will bring a mob against you, who will stone you and hack you to pieces with their swords. ⁴¹They will burn down your houses and inflict punishment on you in the sight of many women. I will put a stop to your prostitution, and you will no longer pay your lovers. ⁴²Then my wrath against you will subside and my jealous anger will turn away from you; I will be calm and no longer angry.

43" 'Because you did not remember the days of your youth but enraged me with all these things, I will surely bring down on your head what you have done, declares the Sovereign LORD. Did you not add lewdness to all your other detestable practices?

44" 'Everyone who quotes proverbs will quote this proverb about you: "Like mother, like daughter." ⁴⁵You are a true daughter of your mother, who despised her husband and her children; and you are a true sister of your sisters, who despised their husbands and their children. Your mother was a Hittite and your father an Amorite. ⁴⁶Your older sister was Samaria, who lived to the north of you with her daughters; and your younger sister, who lived to the south of you with her daughters, was Sodom. ⁴⁷You not only walked in their ways and copied their detestable practices, but in all your ways you soon became more depraved than they. ⁴⁸As surely as I live, declares the Sovereign LORD, your sister Sodom and her daughters never did what you and your daughters have done.

49" 'Now this was the sin of your sister Sodom: She and her daughters were arrogant, overfed and unconcerned; they did not help the poor and needy. 50 They were haughty and did detestable things before me. Therefore I did away with them as you have seen. 51 Samaria did not commit half the sins you did. You have done more detestable things than they, and have made your sisters seem righteous by all these things you have done. 52 Bear your disgrace, for you have furnished some justification for your sisters. Because your sins were more vile than theirs, they appear more righteous than you. So then, be ashamed and bear your disgrace, for you have made your sisters appear righteous.

53" 'However, I will restore the fortunes of Sodom and her daughters and of Samaria and her daughters, and your fortunes along with them, ⁵⁴so that you may bear your disgrace and be ashamed of all you have done in giving them comfort. ⁵⁵And your sisters, Sodom with her daughters and Samaria with her daughters, will return to what they were before; and you and your daughters will return to what you were before. ⁵⁶You would not even mention your sister Sodom in the day of your pride, ⁵⁷before your wickedness was uncovered. Even so, you are now scorned by the daughters of Edom and all her neighbors and the daughters of the Philistines—all those around you who despise you. ⁵⁸You will bear the consequences of your lewdness and your detestable practices, declares the LORD.

⁵⁹" 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says: I will deal with you as you deserve, because you have despised my oath by breaking the covenant. ⁶⁰Yet I will remember the covenant I made with you in the days of your youth, and I will establish an everlasting covenant with you. ⁶¹Then you will remember your ways and be ashamed when you receive your sisters, both those who are older than you and those who are younger. I will give them to you as daughters, but not on the basis of my covenant with you. ⁶²So I will establish my covenant with you, and you will know that I am the LORD. ⁶³Then, when I make atonement for you for all you have done, you will remember and be ashamed and never again open your mouth because of your humiliation, declares the Sovereign LORD.'"

Original Meaning

IF EZEKIEL 15 presents an oblique parable, sneaking assent from its hearers before confronting them with the realization that they have just condemned themselves, Ezekiel 16 adopts an altogether different approach. It is an "inyour-face" condemnation of Jerusalem, in which the identity and nature of the central figure of the extended metaphor is never disguised and frequently dictates the inclusion of otherwise incongruous details into the story. With graphic imagination and violent force, Ezekiel strips away the popular fiction of "Jerusalem the Golden" and replaces it with the figure of "Jerusalem the Prostitute." Here we have an exposé of Jerusalem's true nature, with the prophet taking the part of prosecuting counsel in the divine courtroom.²

The story starts out by depicting Jerusalem's dubious origins. It began among the Canaanites, of an Amorite father and a Hittite mother (Ezek. 16:3). This was, of course, literally true of the city of Jerusalem. The city predated the arrival of the Israelites in the land of Canaan, and its prior population is called Amorite in Joshua 10:6. The word "Hittite" actually seems to denote two distinct groups of people in the Old Testament. In many passages it describes a local people from Palestine, the descendants of a man named "Heth" (e.g., Ex. 3:8, 17), while in other passages the reference is to the neo-Hittite kingdoms in northern Syria that succeeded the Hittite empire proper (1 Kings 10:29; 2 Chron. 1:17). Here in Ezekiel the reference seems to be to the former group, the native Canaanite variety.³

In contrast to Israel, who in her creed traced her heritage back to "a wandering Aramean" (Deut. 26:5) whose arrival in the land of Canaan was the result of God's action in fulfillment of his promise, the city of Jerusalem's roots in the land are entirely natural and pagan.⁴ Jerusalem's prominent position is based on the accidents of history, not the acts of God; even before David captured it and made it his capital city, it was an important (pagan) city in its own right.

The child Jerusalem was born to heartless parents, however, who revealed their own depravity by abandoning the newborn infant. None of the usual obstetrical practices of cutting the navel cord, washing the child, covering her body in a mixture of salt and oil, and swaddling tightly for a lengthy period of time was carried out. Instead, alone and unloved, she was left in a field to die. The exposure of weak or unwanted children, especially girls, was an all-too-familiar spectacle in the ancient world.

Into that situation of helplessness and hopelessness, however, came God's intervention. Passing by this sorry spectacle, he spoke his life-giving word, causing her to live⁵ and thrive like a plant of the field. To adopt our idiom, she grew like a weed. The word of the Lord was all it took to turn the field from a place of death (Ezek. 16:5) to a place of life (16:7). Subsequently, she grew up, reached sexual maturity (16:7),⁶ and attained an age appropriate for marriage (16:8). Historically, this period corresponds to the pre-Israelite period of Jerusalem's history, during which time she existed and prospered (at the Lord's command!), but was not yet directly included in his purposes.

At the end of this time, she once again came to the Lord's attention, and he spread a corner of his robe over her, symbolically covering her nakedness (16:8). This was an act with quasi-legal status, affirming the choice of a bride, as in the case of Ruth and Boaz (Ruth 3:9). The Lord then gave an oath and entered into a covenant relationship with Jerusalem. In the terms of the metaphor, he married her. Again, the historical reality lies buried beneath the surface in the establishing of the Davidic covenant, which entails not simply the election of David and his descendants (2 Sam.

7) but also the election of Zion, David's city, as the city of the Great King (Ps. 48:2).

The Lord's choice of Jerusalem was not merely a legal and political convenience, however, but a true love match on his part. He did for the girl what no one else had ever done, washing off her blood, anointing her, and clothing her (Ezek. 16:8–9) in a threefold reversal of the circumstance of her birth, when she was not washed, anointed, or clothed (16:4).8 He provided her with a wardrobe fit for a queen, with embroidered dresses and shoes of fine leather (16:10). This is not merely elegant or royal clothing, however. She is clothed in materials that are elsewhere associated with the tabernacle, underlining her symbolic identity as the home of the temple.9

In addition, the Lord lavished on her an extensive supply of fine jewelry: bracelets, necklace, nose-ring, earrings, and crown (16:11–12). Virtually every part of the anatomy that could be bejeweled in the ancient Near East was attended to. Finally, she was fed with the very best: fine flour, honey, and olive oil (16:13). On account of her natural beauty (which itself was the result of the Lord's decision to allow her to live in the first place) and of the splendor with which the Lord had endowed her, her fame spread far and wide (16:14).¹⁰

But another turning point in her fortunes takes place in verse 15. Instead of remembering that it was the Lord who had endowed her with all these blessings, she trusted in her beauty and prostituted her reputation. Like the prodigal son, she wasted her substance in riotous living. The beautiful clothes were used to adorn the high places where idolatrous worship occurred and to clothe the idols housed within. The gold and silver were used to manufacture the idols themselves; the flour, oil, and honey, which had been given to her for food, were offered instead to her idols (16:16–19). Even her children, those whom she had borne to the Lord, were not safe; they were sacrificed to the idols she had made for herself (16:20–21).

Again, this history of idolatry corresponds to the general trend of Israel's behavior according to the account of the book of Kings. Even Solomon used part of his great wealth to build temples for the gods of his foreign wives (1 Kings 11:7–8), and the practice of child sacrifice is attested of Ahaz in 2 Kings 16:3 and Manasseh in 21:6, as well as more widely in the time of Jeremiah (Jer. 7:31; 19:5; 32:35)." The high places were a perennial attraction to God's people, repeatedly seducing them away from the worship of the true God (2 Kings 17:9–10).

This depiction of Jerusalem's idolatry in terms of adultery has its roots in Hosea 2:4–14, where the northern kingdom of Israel is described as an ungrateful wife who takes the gifts of her husband and foolishly lavishes them on her lovers. Yet Ezekiel takes the same basic picture and develops it much further than Hosea had. Hosea's Israel was simply a foolishly promiscuous woman; Ezekiel's Jerusalem is a thoroughly depraved and degraded prostitute. Her behavior descends to ever deeper depths in Ezek. 16:23–34. In place of one type of location for her idolatry (the "high places," $b\bar{a}m\hat{o}t$; 16:16), there are now two (the "mound," geb, and "lofty shrine," $r\bar{a}m\hat{a}$; 16:24, 31). In place of adultery with idols, there now appear liaisons with human partners, with ever increasing promiscuity.

The language of lust becomes stronger: Jerusalem spread her legs for any who passed by (16:25), not least her "lustful neighbors," the Egyptians (16:26). God's judgment in reducing her territory was of no effect (16:27). Indeed, Jerusalem did not even act like a normal prostitute, for they at least are motivated to sin for material gain or out of financial desperation. Jerusalem, however, has been sinning at her own expense, so perverse in her lust that she pays everyone to join in her depravity (16:34).

Again, the historical background stretches the allegory almost to the breaking point. As a description of a woman, it is beyond the reaches even of the fevered imagination of the tabloid press. Yet as a picture of Judah's political strategy, it fits perfectly. Judah had a history of looking for love in all the wrong places, seeking security not in the Lord but in the arms of a foreign power. In the days of Ahaz, it was Assyria (2 Kings 16:7). In the days of Hezekiah, it was Babylon (Ezek. 20:12–19). In the days of Zedekiah, it was Egypt (Jer. 2:36; Ezek. 17:15). These alliances were frequently costly to Judah, for accepting a major power as overlord carried with it a substantial price tag. The suzerain invariably expected to receive silver and gold as tribute in exchange for protection (2 Kings 16:8). Even then, only rarely did they deliver the hoped-for help.

But far more expensive in the eyes of the Old Testament prophets was the cost in religious terms. An overlord may or may not have forcibly imposed his state religion on the vassal state, but religious effects on the vassal nation were nonetheless real.¹² Behind every act of international diplomacy stood the gods of the nations as guarantors of compliance. For this reason, such international cooperation inevitably involved a measure of recognition of the existence and power of the gods of the nations, along with an implicit affirmation that trusting in the Lord alone was not effective. The temptation to appeal to the gods that had apparently made the other nation great was powerful.

It was therefore not a coincidence that Ahaz introduced Syrian-style innovations into the Jerusalem temple immediately after meeting with Tiglath-Pileser, king of Assyria, in Damascus (2 Kings 16:10–16). What may have seemed to politically oriented kings merely a good, if expensive, insurance policy, a means of covering all the bases, seemed to the biblical prophets a clear abandonment of Judah's single-minded covenant commitment to the Lord. For them, imitation was the sincerest form of blasphemy.

For Jerusalem, the natural and inevitable consequence of an adulterous lifestyle was an adulteress's death (Ezek. 16:38). The punishment is in accord with the crime. The normal practice was for adulteresses first to be exposed naked in public (16:37; cf. Nah. 3:5),¹³ followed by their stoning by the assembly (Deut. 22:22; Ezek. 16:40).¹⁴ Similarly, Jerusalem's places of idolatry would be torn down, her wealth and possessions stripped away, leaving her in the state in which she began, naked and bare (Ezek. 16:39; cf. 16:7). Only then, when full circle had been reached and the one initially chosen for life had been sentenced to death and executed, would the Lord's wrath finally be turned aside (16:42). Even then, it would be the silence not of mercy but of completion of the judicial sentence: All that she did had been returned on her head (16:43).

In the description of the death sentence to be carried out on Jerusalem, the historical realities are once again dominant. The sentence is executed by an assembly of Jerusalem's peers, including her lovers (16:37). It involves not simply stoning her but death by the sword (16:40) and the burning down of her houses (16:41). Each of these reflects the actual historical downfall of the adulterous city, rather than the normal punishment of an adulterous woman.

In Ezek. 16:44 the imagery changes from the husband-wife relationship to mother and daughter. Whereas Jerusalem had previously been considered in relationship to her adoptive "family," now her natural genetics are brought to the fore. She has proved herself to be a chip off the old block by despising her husband and children. She is like her mother, the Hittite, who was married to an Amorite (16:45), the people whose sins had led to their expulsion from the land of Canaan at the time of Joshua (Gen. 15:16). This statement serves not only to link this section with the preceding one but also to suggest that she stands to share their fate of being cut off from the land.

In addition, Jerusalem has a family resemblance to her natural sisters, Samaria and Sodom, who are the primary focus of this section. Samaria, the former capital of the northern kingdom of Israel, is described as her older sister—"older" (Ezek. 16:46) refers to her size rather than age. She stands for the larger, northern kingdom, while Sodom, the "younger" (or "littler") sister, is physically smaller. Samaria lives to the north of Jerusalem with her "daughters," that is, in the common Semitic idiom, the surrounding villages, while Sodom is to the south (16:46). Jerusalem is surrounded by sinners and fits naturally into their company, delighting to go along with the crowd.

What Sodom lacked in size, it more than made up for in reputation. Along with its other ugly sister, Gomorrah, it had become a byword for abomination (Gen. 19:4–9; cf. Isa. 1:10)—and consequent complete destruction (Isa. 1:9). As well as the sexual sin to which it gave its name, which may lie behind the "detestable things" $(t\hat{o}\hat{e}b\hat{a})$ of Ezekiel 16:50, Sodom is here cited for being proud, overfed, and untroubled by the cares of life, while neglecting the needs of the poor and needy (16:49). She is the epitome of social sin.

Samaria's history of cultic sin was too well known to require further elaboration by Ezekiel. Ever since Jeroboam introduced his golden calves to the national shrines at Bethel and Dan and allowed a non-Levitical priesthood to preside over them (1 Kings 12:28–33), the northern kingdom had been regarded as theologically suspect. Samaria too had been judged by God for her aberrations and destroyed by the Assyrians (2 Kings 17:3–23).

Yet according to Ezekiel neither of these twin icons of sin could match Jerusalem's record. She did more detestable things than either of them, making them seem (comparatively) righteous (Ezek. 16:51). In comparison to the pot, the kettle is barely scorched! The conclusion is inescapable: If God judged Sodom because of her sin and if he judged Samaria because of her sin, how will Jerusalem escape from his wrath (cf. 2 Kings 21:13)?

However, if the similarity between Jerusalem and her sisters serves to justify further God's action in completely destroying her (Ezek. 16:58), that is not the only focus of attention here. Rather, the purpose of this comparison with her sisters in crime is designed to evoke a sense of shame on Jerusalem's part (16:52). Just as in her pride Jerusalem once scorned Sodom for her sin, so now that Jerusalem's sin has been uncovered, the surrounding nations scorn her (16:57). Now, instead of looking down her nose at Sodom and Samaria as beyond redemption, she will herself only be redeemed alongside them (16:53). Paradoxically, it is in that redemption itself that shame will be experienced as the inhabitants of Jerusalem realize how much worse they have been than the bywords of iniquity, Sodom and Samaria.

Though they have despised God's oath and broken his covenant and must therefore be judged (16:59), yet judgment is not God's last word. For though Jerusalem does not remember the days of her youth (16:22, 43), the Lord will remember the days of her youth and will therefore establish an everlasting covenant with her (16:60). In so doing, he will create in her the two qualities that are signally lacking in her at present, memory and shame (16:61). On the one hand, she will be profoundly aware of having broken the covenant, shattering it so completely that it can no longer stand as the basis of her self-identity vis-à-vis other nations (16:61). She will recognize that there is no goodness within herself to which she can appeal, no obedience that can form the basis for confidence in the presence of the Lord. In the language of Hosea, she will know herself to be "Not My People" (Hos. 1:9). She will be aware of the depths of her sin and ashamed of it.

On the other hand, she can also look back to the days of her youth, the days when, in the imagery of Ezekiel 16:4–6, she was similarly naked and bare before the Lord. If he chose her once, not on the basis of anything in herself but simply his own sovereign will, can he not do so again? If he covenanted with her once, may he not do so once again, this time forever? Were it not for the Lord's own words it would be too much to hope for. Second chances like that simply don't happen in real life. Lightning never strikes twice in the same place.

Yet that is precisely what the Lord affirms. He will remember his original covenant with her and establish it as an everlasting covenant (16:60),¹⁷ a covenant that precisely because it includes wanton sinners is big enough to include Sodom and Samaria alongside Jerusalem. The nations will view Jerusalem as an object lesson of the wideness of God's mercy. On the day when the Lord "makes atonement" (kipper)¹⁸ for Jerusalem (16:63), she will remember and be ashamed; her tongue will be stilled¹⁹ and her pride humbled once and for all.

NO DECORUM HERE. It is perhaps not surprising that this chapter is rarely preached on in our churches. In spite of the conclusion of Douglas Stuart that "those who wish to teach or preach on this chapter . . . can do so quite successfully and with decorum," many still concur with the assessment of C. H. Spurgeon: "A minister can scarcely read it in public"! While certainly discernment must be exercised—it is understandable, for instance, why this passage is not found in children's Bible storybooks—one wonders if contemporary Christians need to be as shielded from unpleasant realities as we tend to think. These same Christians are regularly bombarded with similarly shocking stories on the nightly news.

Furthermore, is it possible to teach this passage "with decorum" and not lose an essential element of its message? There are no new facts here about Israel's history, and if we read it simply as a historical catalog of crime like 2 Kings 17, we lose all that this passage distinctively contributes to the message of Scripture. The whole point is the lack of decorum in Ezekiel's manner. He will not "be polite" about Israel's history of sin; instead, he is instructed to expose it in its full ugliness in the most graphic manner possible. Only thus can he get the point across.²²

Differences in perspective because of cultural distance. But politeness is not the only thing that holds us back in our understanding of Ezekiel 16. Because of the cultural distance between then and now, we are likely to react to its message in significantly different ways from Ezekiel's original message. They too would have been shocked by his graphic depiction of Jerusalem's depravity. But other aspects of the picture would have struck them differently from the way they strike us. For instance, when we read of a passerby picking up an abandoned baby, it elicits no surprise in our minds. Our response is, "Of course he or she would rescue the baby and find someone to take care of it. What other choice is there?" But in the ancient world there was no "of course" about it. In those days, if you adopted every abandoned baby you found, your house would soon be bursting at the seams. It was an accepted tragedy.

Nor could Ezekiel's audience immediately assume, as we do, that the mysterious stranger had favorable plans for the orphan. It was not unknown in antiquity for girl babies to be rescued for the purpose of prostitution rather than adoption. These differences mean that they would recognize more fully than we do the grace involved in the Lord's action, picking up this stray and not merely allowing her to survive or even adopting her, but marrying her, lavishing on her every good thing.

Nor are we used to a wife being completely dependent on her husband. In these days of equality between husband and wife, the image of marriage conveys something quite different to us than it did back then. Our culture thinks of a coequal partnership, in which each party owns half of everything, unless there is a prenuptial agreement to the contrary. In contemporary society, it is also a relationship that can be dissolved as easily as it is made, if a better offer comes along. Indeed, in Hollywood films, adultery is regularly portrayed not only as acceptable but also as praiseworthy if it allows for self-fulfillment. The idea of marriage as a relationship of subordination and obligation on the wife's part is alien to us.

In contrast, it is essential to Ezekiel's metaphor that the wife is not an independent agent, free to seek self-fulfillment in the arms of another, and that death is the appropriate sentence for adultery. Only if we understand those cultural norms will we feel the ingratitude of the woman, who has taken the gifts that were lavished on her by her true husband and squandered them on her many lovers. Only then will we feel the just nature of the sentence imposed on her, feelings that would have been automatic for Ezekiel's original hearers.

The danger is that because we may disagree with the cultural norms of marriage expressed in this chapter, finding them "politically incorrect" and "oppressive to women," we may also therefore dismiss the teaching of the chapter. That would be like dismissing Ezekiel 15 because modern technology has, after all, found a use for charcoal-toasted vine branches. Ezekiel's goal is not to affirm the abiding validity of the details of his picture, nor is he giving any justification to husbands abusing their wives.

Rather, he is utilizing conventional norms to illustrate a deeper reality, namely, the relationship between the Lord and his people.

For whatever we conclude concerning the institution of marriage, the relationship of the Lord and his people is not a coequal relationship, in which we "own" whatever he gives us and we are free to choose whether we will serve him or another god. To think that way is to lose sight of the magnitude of his grace and mercy in choosing us in the first place. Every good thing we have, not just in material terms but even in the ability to think rightly about him and act appropriately in obedience, is a fruit of his Spirit in our hearts (1 Cor. 4:7) and a gift from him (James 1:17). Our relationship is a gracious bond, freely entered into on his part without any merit on ours. To be faithful to him is to experience eternal life; to depart from him is reprehensible adultery and depravity, which can only lead to death.

Contemporary Significance

PRESENTING SIN'S true ugliness. If the sermons preached in our churches were movies, what rating would the distributors give them? In many churches, every sermon would rate a "G" ("General Audiences"). There is nothing in them to offend anyone, young or old, seeker or convert alike. Like the seeker-sensitive church I mentioned earlier, we are eager to present people with "a delightful, thought-provoking hour." We are concerned, as the quote from Douglas Stuart revealingly admitted, always to preach "with decorum." The presence of Ezekiel 16 in the pages of Scripture urges us, at least in some situations, to pull off the kid gloves and present sin in its full ugliness. Fire and brimstone sermons that focus alone on hell and God's wrath may be a serious misrepresentation of the true God, but so also are a continuous diet of polite, decorous sermons that only mention heaven and God's love. Sin is ugly, offensive, and depraved, and people need to hear that side of the Christian message too.

One might illustrate the point by reference to the movie Schindler's List. This film depicted as fully as it could the ugliness of the concentration camps in World War II Germany. It merited the "R" ("Restricted") rating, which it received, limiting it to adult audiences. Now a portrayal of the same facts may perhaps have been made that would have only necessitated a "PG" ("Parental Guidance suggested") rating, by passing over some of the more gruesome details. But the emotional impact of such a film would not have been nearly the same, for only in the details does the full depth of the horror emerge. Only an "R" rating portrayal does justice to the evils of Auschwitz and Belsen; similarly, sometimes only an "R" rated sermon does justice to the outrage of sin.

The ugliness in the cross. How else do you explain the obscenity of the cross? An innocent man—the only truly innocent man who ever lived—is convicted in a rigged trial, abused by his guards until he can scarcely walk, yet forced to carry his own cross on a back that has been flayed raw. Nails are forced through the living flesh of his hands and feet, and he is jerked upright to hang until, too tired to lift himself one more time, he suffocates. What good God could permit such a death? What loving God could permit his own beloved Son to undergo such agony? What awful thing could be so bad that only such an atonement could pay for it?

The answer is sin. In the cross, we see sin revealed in its starkest, most abominable ugliness. There, if we sweep away for a second the prettification with which we sentimentalize that terrible moment, we see God's "R" rated answer to my sin. There is the "atonement" that God made (Ezek. 16:63), the ransom that he paid for his people (cf. Mark 10:45). The cost of our salvation was not silver and gold but the precious blood of the Lord Jesus Christ (1 Peter 1:18–19). This is something that we all too easily forget. As Flannery O'Connor reminds us:

There is something in us . . . that demands the redemptive act, that demands that what falls at least be offered the chance to be restored. The reader of today looks for this motion, and rightly so, but what he has forgotten is the cost of it. His sense of evil is diluted or lacking altogether, and so he has forgotten the price of restoration.²³

Remembering in our lives. The realization of the price of restoration should stir in our hearts remembrance and shame (see Ezek. 16:63). We should remember what we once were—and be ashamed. Perhaps, like the Corinthians, we were ourselves once sexually immoral or idolaters or prostitutes or homosexual offenders or thieves or greedy or drunkards or slanderers or swindlers (1 Cor. 6:9–11). Perhaps we were none of the above and proud of it, as the Jerusalemites prided themselves on not being like the Sodomites and Samaritans (Ezek. 16:56), and the Pharisee prided himself on being better than the tax collector (Luke 18:11). Perhaps we were convinced, like the rich young ruler, that we had fulfilled our obligation to our neighbors perfectly from our youth (18:21).

Whatever our own estimation of our righteousness or lack of it, the Bible tells us that all are alike in this matter. Every mouth is silenced before God, for "all have sinned and fall short of the glory of God" (Rom. 3:23). We were all, good and bad alike, by nature objects of God's wrath (Eph. 2:3). Let us never forget what we once were, for that is the true measure of the greatness of God's work in our lives. As Calvin put it: "If we desire, therefore, our sins to be blotted out before God, and to be buried in the depths of the sea . . . we must recall them often and constantly to our remembrance: for when they are kept before our eyes we then flee seriously to God for mercy, and are properly prepared by humility and fear."²⁴

The same reasoning led John Newton to instruct that his epitaph should simply read: "John Newton, Clerk; once an infidel and libertine, a servant of slaves in Africa, was, by the rich mercy of our Lord and Savior, Jesus Christ, preserved, restored, pardoned and appointed to preach the faith he had long labored to destroy."

The cross should also stir us to remember what we are now in Christ. Remembering what we once were is never to be an excuse for slipping back into our old ways. Though we were once objects of wrath, now we have been made alive with Christ, raised with him, and seated with him in the heavenly realms (Eph. 2:5–6). Those who once belonged on the Corinthian list are now "washed . . . sanctified . . . justified in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ and by the Spirit of our God" (1 Cor. 6:11). Such a change in being must inevitably result in a changed lifestyle, so that we no longer do the things we once did. Remembering in Scripture is never simply a mental exercise but one that issues in a particular course of action, based on the truth remembered.

Nor are we left with mere words to help us in our remembering. For we have been given the Lord's Supper, along with its admonition: "Do this . . . in remembrance of me" (1 Cor. 11:25). In the Lord's Supper, the gospel is made visible before our very eyes. In the tokens of broken bread and poured-out wine, we see with our eyes and recall in our hearts the body of Christ broken and the blood of Christ poured out.

But the Lord's Supper is more than a symbol; it is a sacrament, communicating what it depicts. It is not simply the gospel in pictures; it is the gospel made sure to those who partake. Just as the ancient Israelites participated in the "fellowship offering" by eating together the body of the lamb that had been slain for them, so also we participate in Christ as we eat together the bread and drink the wine, the new covenant tokens of the body and blood of the Lamb of God (cf. 1 Cor. 10:16). The Lord's Supper is, to apply more appropriately the words of the beef commercial, "Real food for real people."

But our remembering of what we once were and, by the grace of God, what we are now must also have an evangelistic impact on our lives. If we were saved by our works, then it would be understandable for us to give up on many of those around us. There's no way that they could earn their way into heaven. But there is room for neither pride nor despair when salvation is all of grace; it can reach down to Sodom as easily as to Jerusalem. It can touch the heart of a prostitute more easily than a Pharisee. Though the city is to be judged, yet it can be restored. Even the height of wickedness, whether you call it Sodom, or Jerusalem, or some other more contemporary name, is not beyond the reach of God's grace. Why? Because of the all-sufficiency of the atonement God made in the death of Jesus Christ, the righteous for the unrighteous. The words of Fanny J. Crosby sum up the awesome magnitude of what Christ has done on the cross, and the impact that reality should have upon our hearts:

O perfect redemption, the purchase of blood!

To every believer the promise of God;

The vilest offender who truly believes,

That moment from Jesus a pardon receives.

Praise the Lord! Praise the Lord! Let the earth hear His voice!

Praise the Lord! Praise the Lord! Let the people rejoice!

O come to the Father, through Jesus the Son:

And give Him the glory! Great things He hath done!

Ezekiel 17

THE WORD OF THE LORD came to me: ²"Son of man, set forth an allegory and tell the house of Israel a parable. ³Say to them, 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says: A great eagle with powerful wings, long feathers and full plumage of varied colors came to Lebanon. Taking hold of the top of a cedar, ⁴he broke off its topmost shoot and carried it away to a land of merchants, where he planted it in a city of traders.

5" 'He took some of the seed of your land and put it in fertile soil. He planted it like a willow by abundant water, ⁶ and it sprouted and became a low, spreading vine. Its branches turned toward him, but its roots remained under it. So it became a vine and produced branches and put out leafy boughs.

7" 'But there was another great eagle with powerful wings and full plumage. The vine now sent out its roots toward him from the plot where it was planted and stretched out its branches to him for water. 8It had been planted in good soil by abundant water so that it would produce branches, bear fruit and become a splendid vine.'

⁹"Say to them, 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says: Will it thrive? Will it not be uprooted and stripped of its fruit so that it withers? All its new growth will wither. It will not take a strong arm or many people to pull it up by the roots. ¹⁰Even if it is transplanted, will it thrive? Will it not wither completely when the east wind strikes it—wither away in the plot where it grew?'"

¹¹Then the word of the LORD came to me: ¹²"Say to this rebellious house, 'Do you not know what these things mean?' Say to them: 'The king of Babylon went to Jerusalem and carried off her king and her nobles, bringing them back with him to Babylon. ¹³Then he took a member of the royal family and made a treaty with him, putting him under oath. He also carried away the leading men of the land, ¹⁴so that the kingdom would be brought low, unable to rise again, surviving only by keeping his treaty. ¹⁵But the king rebelled against him by sending his envoys to Egypt to get horses and a large army. Will he succeed? Will he who does such things escape? Will he break the treaty and yet escape?

16" 'As surely as I live, declares the Sovereign LORD, he shall die in Babylon, in the land of the king who put him on the throne, whose oath he despised and whose treaty he broke. ¹⁷Pharaoh with his mighty army and great horde will be of no help to him in war, when ramps are built and siege works erected to destroy many lives. ¹⁸He despised the oath by breaking the covenant. Because he had given his hand in pledge and yet did all these things, he shall not escape.

19" 'Therefore this is what the Sovereign LORD says: As surely as I live, I will bring down on his head my oath that he despised and my covenant that he broke. ²⁰I will spread my net for him, and he will be caught in my snare. I will bring him to Babylon and execute judgment upon him there because he was unfaithful to me. ²¹All his fleeing troops will fall by the sword, and the survivors will be scattered to the winds. Then you will know that I the LORD have spoken.

²²" 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says: I myself will take a shoot from the very top of a cedar and plant it; I will break off a tender sprig from its topmost shoots and plant it on a high and lofty mountain. ²³On the mountain heights of Israel I will plant it; it will produce branches and bear fruit and become a splendid cedar. Birds of every kind will nest in it; they will find shelter in the shade of its branches. ²⁴All the trees of the field will know that I the LORD bring down the tall tree and make the low tree grow tall. I dry up the green tree and make the dry tree flourish.

" 'I the LORD have spoken, and I will do it.' "

Original Meaning

EZEKIEL HAS ALREADY used a variety of forms of metaphorical language, both subtle and not-so-subtle, with powerful effect. In this chapter, he continues to utilize metaphorical language, this time in a form that combines "riddle" (NIV, "allegory") and "parable" (17:2). A "riddle" (hidâ) is a statement that hides the truth it imparts, while a "parable" (māšāl) elucidates the truth that underlies it by putting it in a fresh light. In other words, this chapter functions both to conceal and reveal. It has a surface meaning that is fairly simple to comprehend, even if its message is not necessarily welcome, but to the discerning reader it also has a deeper, underlying significance. Perhaps this section best fits into the genre of "fable," a story that communicates its concealed message by transposing the realities it describes into the world of plants and animals (cf. Jotham's fable in Judg. 9:7–20).

The story itself concerns two great eagles,² a cedar, and a vine. The first eagle came to Lebanon, broke off the newest growth of a mighty cedar, and carried it off to a land of merchants,³ that is, Babylon (Ezek. 17:4; cf. 16:29). In the cedar's place, the eagle planted a vine, giving it every possible advantage. He provided for it fertile soil and abundant water supply, all the conditions necessary for maximal growth. In those conditions it spread out, producing branches and limbs but remaining low in stature (17:6).

Desiring more from its life, however, and observing that there was an alternative, the vine turned away from its first provider and sent its roots toward the second eagle. This bird is described in similar language to the first eagle—it too was powerful of wing and beautiful of plumage—yet without the same fulsome glory as the first.⁴ It had done nothing for the vine, just as the first eagle had left nothing undone, yet the ungrateful vine turned its allegiance from the first to the second (17:7).

The fate of the vine is predictable. In seeking to gain something more, it will instead throw away everything it has been given. Turning its branches toward the second eagle is already a repudiation of its purpose as a fruitful, splendid vine (17:8). The second eagle will do nothing for it; all the vine will succeed in doing is arousing the anger of the first eagle, who will come and tear off its fruit and uproot it from its place. It will not be a difficult task for this powerful eagle to accomplish, whose activity throughout the parable contrasts with the passivity of the second eagle (17:9). The vine's chosen course of action is worse than foolish, it is suicidal.

As in the case of Jotham's fable in Judges 9, the political realities depicted in this fable are little more concealed from the original hearers than when in contemporary American political cartoons the Republican Party is depicted by an elephant and the Democrats by a donkey. So there is a certain irony in Ezekiel saying to his audience: "Do you not know what these things mean?" (Ezek. 17:12). His hearers could probably have supplied for themselves the interpretation that follows. The first eagle is the king of Babylon, while the cedar sprig is Jehoiachin, whom Nebuchadnezzar carried off to Babylon, along with Ezekiel himself. The "seed of your land" whom Nebuchadnezzar put in his place is clearly Zedekiah, Jehoiachin's uncle, whom Nebuchadnezzar installed in Jehoiachin's place. The second eagle is Egypt, from whom Zedekiah was seeking aid to break free from the Babylonian yoke.⁵

The meaning of the parable is therefore self-evident: Zedekiah's foreign policy is worse than foolish, it is suicidal. His revolt cannot stand on the basis of seeking help from a (disinterested) lesser superpower against the dominant superpower in the contemporary ancient Near East. Will he thrive? No way!

But is the fable's meaning as clear as it appears at first sight? Throughout the fable there are slightly discordant notes that do not fit with the straightforward, surface analysis. These remind us that the fable is a riddle as well as a parable; it conceals a deeper truth as well as reveals an obvious lesson. For instance, Lebanon is not only the proverbial home of all cedars but also the name of one of Solomon's palaces (cf. 1 Kings 7:2; Jer. 22:23).

So the discerning reader is invited to consider who planted "the cedar in Lebanon" in the first place. Who established the Davidic dynasty in Jerusalem? Further back still, who was it who had brought them "to the land of Canaan," just as Nebuchadnezzar brought Jehoiachin "to the land of merchants"?

Moreover, the vine planted in conditions suitable for growth is a classic picture of the Lord's provision for Israel (Isa. 5:1–7); indeed, the imagery of "no effort spared," which seems more than a little overdone with reference to Nebuchadnezzar, fits perfectly for the Lord's care. He is the One who, according to Psalm 80, brought a vine out of Egypt and cleared the ground in order to plant it in the Promised Land (Ps. 80:8–11). Likewise, Ezekiel's address to Judah as "this rebellious house" describes the history of their relationship with the Lord much better than their history (to date) with Babylon.

Taken together, these hints supply a deeper significance to the breaking of Zedekiah's oath of loyalty to Nebuchadnezzar. It is not simply that breaking an oath lawfully taken is a serious matter. It is not even that the oath Zedekiah was forced to swear was taken in the Lord's name and therefore he would act as guarantor to bring into effect the covenant curses attached to it. It is that there is a fundamental analogy between Zedekiah's rebellion against his covenant overlord, Nebuchadnezzar, and Israel's rebellion against her covenant overlord, God himself. If Zedekiah's abandoning of his (relatively) prosperous situation in favor of the Egyptian option is a suicidally foolish breach of the covenant relationship, what may we say about Israel's abandonment of the Lord and their history of rebellion against him?

Thus, at just the moment when it might seem that Ezekiel has unpacked the meaning of the fable, he launches into its real meaning with the word "therefore" (Ezek. 17:19). The fundamental significance of the picture is not exhausted by the political observation that a breach of the covenant with Nebuchadnezzar, sworn on oath, is suicide. Rather, as Greenberg notes, "the political transaction is used as a model from which a theological analogy is drawn." The political leadership in Judah has not only despised and broken Nebuchadnezzar's covenant (an act for which they will face the consequences); on a deeper level they have despised and broken the Lord's covenant (17:19; cf. the similar wording of 16:59). The result is that the coming judgment is not merely a harsh taste of Realpolitik, but the judgment of God on a rebellious house. If the risk of rousing the Babylonian wrath ought to give pause to plans to send to Egypt for help (and it ought), how much more should the risk of the Lord's wrath give pause to a people willfully headed away from the One who planted them in a land flowing with milk and honey?

The deeper message of the fable thus paints the hopelessness of Zedekiah's revolt against Nebuchadnezzar in its blackest hues, pointing out that he was not just rebelling against the mighty Babylonians, but against the sovereign Lord, the God who made heaven and earth. At the same time, however, the latter part of this chapter also reworks the fable in more positive terms (17:22–24). The Lord himself, no longer acting through intermediaries, will take a new shoot from the cedar and plant it on a high and lofty mountain (17:22). A new cedar will grow on the mountain heights of Israel into a lofty tree, which will provide in its branches shelter for birds of all kinds (17:23). In contrast to the vine, which even in ideal conditions rebelled and failed to fulfill its potential (17:8), the cedar will achieve the eagle's initial purpose. In that way, all the trees of the field (the nations) will be brought to an understanding of the Lord's sovereignty in history, seeing that the rise and fall of empires is entirely his doing (17:24).

The interpretation of this postscript to the earlier fable is a straightforward development from the deeper level of meaning of those verses. What does the future hold after the Lord's judgment on Judah? Is there any hope for the uprooted vine? The logical answer would be no, but Ezekiel affirms, against all logic, that the Lord will intervene to reverse the failures of the past. Just as Nebuchadnezzar once installed Zedekiah, so Yahweh will install his own vassal on Mount Zion.⁸ In contrast to the vine that rebelled and would soon wither (17:7–10), the cedar of Yahweh's planting will thrive and bear fruit (17:23).

However, it is not simply a matter of rescuing the cedar sprig that has been carried off to Babylon and restoring Jehoiachin to the throne. The problem lies deeper than that, for the whole history of the monarchy is, from Ezekiel's perspective, one of failure. Yahweh will go back to the source, as it were, for a new shoot, though still from the same cedar tree. Though no hope is held out for the present cedar sprig (Jehoiachin) or the vine (Zedekiah), yet the death of the contemporary Davidides does not mean the end of the road for the Davidic monarchy. The failure of all past Davidic kings to usher in God's kingdom does not mean an abandonment of God's promises to David of an eternal throne (2 Sam. 7:16). A new sprig from that same tree will be planted and will flourish under the blessing of Yahweh's protection. Indeed, his future greatness will far surpass that of the past monarchs of Israel, having a worldwide impact as the nations see God visibly at work establishing his kingdom.

CODED SPEECH AS a tool of communication. In a country where free speech is considered sacrosanct, the vehicle of metaphorical speech is one to which contemporary prophets rarely resort. We can say what we think in plain, unequivocal terms. Such a luxury has not always been afforded to government critics down through the ages and is not permitted to many around the world in the days in which we live. In such situations, various forms of pictorial speech or coded message—parable, riddle, or allegorical or apocalyptic language—become popular. The superficial message may be couched in safely "unreal" terms, while allowing the deeper, coded message to be understood by initiates.¹⁰

But even in a context where free speech is permitted, metaphors, parables, and allegories can be powerful tools of communication, giving a fresh perspective on a familiar situation or bringing to light unrecognized parallels and similarities. That is why art and literature have so often had a critical role in bringing about social change. For example, Harriet Beecher Stowe's famous book, Uncle Tom's Cabin, probably had a far greater impact on the future of slavery in America than all the political speeches of her contemporaries. In a similar way, Ezekiel uses the political reality of Zedekiah's covenant with Nebuchadnezzar and its impending breach to bring home the spiritual reality of Israel's broken covenant with the Lord and its impending consequences. Playing fast and loose with one's covenant overlord is never wise and frequently fatal, whether that overlord is Nebuchadnezzar or God himself.

The consequences of breaking an ancient covenant. Yet some aspects of that comparison may well be lost on us as contemporary listeners. Because we are not familiar with the nature of covenant treaty documents, we may be unaware that to break your oath of covenant loyalty was to call down on your own head all of the curses attached to that covenant. It was customary for such self-imprecatory curses to be attached to the end of an ancient Near Eastern covenant treaty document. Thus, after naming the gods who are summoned as witnesses of the oath, the treaty between the Hittite king Mursilis and Duppi-Tessub of Amurru concludes:

The words of the treaty and the oath that are inscribed on this tablet—should Duppi-Tessub not honor these words of the treaty and the oath—may these gods of the oath destroy Duppi-Tessub together with his person, his wife, his son, his grandson, his house, his land and together with everything that he owns.¹¹

It is not clear whether the Babylonians regularly imposed such an oath of allegiance on vassals in the name of their own gods, although the Assyrians clearly adopted that practice.¹² According to 2 Chronicles 36:13, Nebuchadnezzar had indeed made Zedekiah swear an oath in the name of God. When he broke such an oath, Zedekiah could hardly expect God's aid.

But it may well be that, like so many of his predecessors, it was not the Lord's aid he sought anyway, being content if he could merely gain substantial military assistance from Egypt. He hoped to play the two major regional superpowers, Babylon to the east and Egypt to the west, off against one another. It was a dangerous game to play. Similar strategies of seeking help from Egypt were in place in Isaiah's time, with no significant results (Isa. 30:1–7; 31:1–3). Yet in spite of that negative history, hope of help from Egypt sprang eternal in the hearts of those in power in Judah. Turning their back on their one true refuge, the Lord himself, they placed their hope in the chariots and horses whose ancestors had perished in the Red Sea (Ex. 15:4). Such an attitude was inevitably doomed to disaster.

The monarchy in Israel and Judah. The monarchy itself in Israel and Judah suffered for a similar mismatch between expectations and performance. God had made provision at the outset of Israel's history for that institution: Ancient prophecies had foretold it (Gen. 49:10; Num. 24:17) and the Mosaic Law had regulated it (Deut. 17:14–20). Yet when the people actually made the request for a king, their motivation was entirely wrong. They wanted a king who would lead them and fight their battles for them, so that they could be like all the other nations around them (1 Sam. 8:20). They had forgotten that they were not called to be like the nations around them but to be God's own treasured possession, a kingdom of priests (Ex. 19:6). They had apparently also missed the fact that in the immediately preceding chapter they had fared well enough in the second battle of Ebenezer, with "only" the Lord fighting for them (1 Sam. 7:2–14).

What happened was that they had transferred to the monarchy all the faith that their fathers had placed in the ark of the covenant. At the first battle of Ebenezer in 1 Samuel 4, their fathers looked to the ark to lead them into battle and to bring them automatic victory over their enemies. It did not work. Now their descendants were looking to a king to bring them automatic victory over their enemies. They didn't really trust God as their king, so they wanted to replace him by an earthly king, someone you could see and feel and touch. In that hope, they were going to be disappointed. Their deliverance came not from an ark or an earthly king, but from the Lord, who made heaven and earth.

But God's plan for his people is ultimately gracious. He does not plan to destroy them. Do they want a king? He will give them a king. In fact, he will give them a whole series of kings to rule over them. Over the next five hundred years they will have a succession of all kinds of kings: good kings, bad kings, strong kings, weak kings. They will have more than enough kings for them to see that no earthly king can meet their needs. There will be no king who can provide them lasting shelter against the storms of life, a reality that found poignant expression in Lamentations 4:20: "The LORD's anointed, our very life breath, was caught in their traps. We thought that under his shadow we would live among the nations." What they really need is for the Lord himself to be their king, to establish the monarchy on a new footing as a lofty tree that will produce fruit and shelter, peace and prosperity (Ezek. 17:24).

Having shown the people throughout the pages of the Old Testament what kind of king they need, in Jesus God himself will come to be their king. He is the perfect king, fully obedient to God's laws, a king after God's own heart. He is a king who intercedes for his people like a prophet, a king who offers his own life up as a priest, a king who will not die and pass his kingdom on to a line of depressingly inferior descendants. He is indeed the King of kings.

Contemporary Significance

LACK OF SPIRITUAL insight. We live in an age of intense political analysis. The nightly news is filled with the results of the latest polls, which are scrutinized for their potential impact on political thinking. Whenever major political changes take place, such as an election at home, an international trade treaty, or a major event like the dismantling of the Berlin Wall, there is an outpouring of words explaining how these events will affect our lives. In large measure, governments depend on such analysis to make their decisions. Yet in spite of the intense searchlight of analysis, politicians still can and do make phenomenal mistakes. Right up until the moment Saddam Hussein invaded Kuwait in 1990, intelligence reports apparently regarded such an outcome as unlikely. That miscalculation, along with Hussein's estimation that he could safely annex Kuwait, cost many lives on both sides.

Zedekiah's decision to rebel against Babylon was a miscalculation of similarly costly proportions. Encouraged perhaps by the Egyptians under Pharaoh Hophra, he sought to break free, only to discover too late that the Egyptians were freer with their words than with their military might. The intelligence analysis led him astray. Nebuchadnezzar came, as Ezekiel had warned, and judged the covenant-breaker, executing his sons in front of his very eyes and then putting his eyes out before taking him to Babylon in chains. Yet, disastrous as his foreign policy was for Judah, Ezekiel insists that Zedekiah's basic problem was not lack of political insight but lack of spiritual insight. It was not merely Nebuchadnezzar's covenant he had broken but the Lord's.

We suffer from the same rose-tinted myopia that Zedekiah did. On a societal level, we think the problem with our world is essentially political. If we were just able to kick the present set of bums out of office and elect people who agree with us, the world would instantly be a better place. So we pour our time and energy into political campaigns and boycotts and other efforts to bring about change through political means. On a personal level, we think the solution is to pour our time into gathering the information necessary for wise decision-making. We read the consumer reports before we purchase a new car. We do our homework before we invest money in a particular stock, to ensure, as far as possible, that we will get a good rate of return for our money. We plan our careers years in advance, trying to make sure that we are in the right place at the right time to reach the very top. We try to make wise provision for our retirement years so that we will not be in want.

Now all of these things are good things to do, on a personal and societal level. We should work for political change and we should plan for the future. Yet we can be so busy doing the good things that we miss out on the one insight that is really necessary, the best thing: maintaining our personal and corporate spiritual life with God. But as Jesus reminds us: "What good will it be for a man if he gains the whole world, yet forfeits his soul?" (Matt. 16:26).

How many people have planned for every eventuality they can encounter in life, yet have left out of the reckoning entirely their coming great encounter with God in death? Anyone who has ever talked to people in the streets or in their homes and asked them the question "If you were to die tonight, would you be sure of going to heaven?" can testify that many have never thought about their coming appointment with their Creator. Yet for all of us, the ultimate reality is not how much we have reformed the world or how well we have planned our money and our efforts. It is the fact that we will all one day have to stand before God to give account of what we have done.

God's answer to our hopeless situation. Perhaps one reason why we ignore that ultimate reality is that we do not wish to be confronted with the unpleasant truth. It is easier for us, like Zedekiah, to believe in comforting accounts of our own ability to stand on our own merits rather than to face the harsh facts of the untenability of our own position. We want to believe that we can change the world through our own efforts. We want to think that God ought to be impressed, at least somewhat, by our goodness and righteous acts. We prefer not to remember that we are helpless sinners on a collision course with a God of absolute purity and holiness, in whose presence sin cannot be tolerated. But if we accept the fact that we are all covenant-breakers in Adam as well as covenant-breakers on our own account, how shall we stand on that day? Is our ultimate future as bleak as was Zedekiah's?

The answer lies in the new chip off the old block, the sprig of the cedar tree that God will plant. This new beginning from David's line will be a covenant-keeper, not a covenant-breaker like Zedekiah. He will not simply be a slightly improved version of the past, a political retooling of last year's model, but a radically new beginning. As a result, instead of scattering death and destruction in his wake, he will provide shelter and security not merely for Israel but for all of the nations of the earth.

The fulfillment of this prophecy is found in Jesus Christ. The angel Gabriel says of the child to be conceived in Mary's womb: "The Lord God will give him the throne of his father David, and he will reign over the house of Jacob forever; his kingdom will never end" (Luke 1:32–33). Mary herself speaks in the Magnificat of a reversal of fortunes, furnishing the evidence of God's sovereignty: "He has brought down rulers from their thrones but has lifted up the humble" (1:52). Jesus is the coming King, who reverses the fortunes of Israel by his covenant-keeping.

Jesus is definitively not merely a retooling of the past; rather, he is a radically different kind of ruler. He comes as a king—but a king who rides on a donkey (Matt. 21:5). He comes as the Prince of Peace—yet meets a bloody death on the cross. He is himself the Holy One of Israel—yet he eats with tax collectors and sinners (Matt. 9:11). The One who was by nature exalted humbles himself. In the Incarnation, he takes on human form, the form of a servant, and carries it all the way to the death of the cross. But the humble one is paradoxically also exalted.

His kingdom is like the mustard seed, the smallest of all seeds, which grows into a great tree, in whose branches the birds of the air find shade (Mark 4:30–32). Those who come to him receive in him every spiritual blessing (Eph. 1:3). He is not only the new king, he is himself the new temple planted on the high and lofty mountain of Israel (Ezek. 17:22; see 40:2). As the humble one is lifted up on the cross, he draws to himself by his elevation not only God's own people, Israel, but men and women from all nations as well (John 12:32). Because of his humility, he has now been exalted to the highest place and given the name above every name (Phil. 2:9).

In his humiliation and exaltation, Christ gives us a radically different model for leadership—and indeed for life. How much of our leadership style is based on our own abilities and efforts to get others to serve us? We build our kingdoms and our lives around our own analysis of the world, seeking to make the contacts and build the relationships we think will prosper us, heedless of God and his Word. The irony is that so often our efforts do not even achieve what we aimed at on a human, political level. How much more tragic, though, that in the process we have abandoned God and rebelled against him! Will such rebels prosper? By no means!

The good news, however, is that in spite of our weakness and folly, Christ's kingdom continues to grow and develop, based on his goodness and covenant faithfulness, not ours. Our rebellion and failure may have negative consequences in our own lives, but it cannot prevent God from achieving his purposes in the world. He may work slowly, from our perspective, through imperceptible growth from small beginnings rather than radical revolution, but his work is nonetheless effective. His tree provides perfect shelter and security for all of his own people. As he has planned, he will bring men and women from every tribe and nation to know himself, justified in the perfect obedience of their true king, the shoot of David, Jesus Christ.

THE WORD OF THE LORD came to me: 2"What do you people mean by quoting this proverb about the land of Israel:

" 'The fathers eat sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge'?

³"As surely as I live, declares the Sovereign LORD, you will no longer quote this proverb in Israel. ⁴For every living soul belongs to me, the father as well as the son—both alike belong to me. The soul who sins is the one who will die.

⁵"Suppose there is a righteous man who does what is just and right. ⁶He does not eat at the mountain shrines or look to the idols of the house of Israel. He does not defile his neighbor's wife or lie with a woman during her period. ⁷He does not oppress anyone, but returns what he took in pledge for a loan. He does not commit robbery but gives his food to the hungry and provides clothing for the naked. ⁸He does not lend at usury or take excessive interest. He withholds his hand from doing wrong and judges fairly between man and man.

⁹He follows my decrees and faithfully keeps my laws.

That man is righteous; he will surely live,

declares the Sovereign LORD.

¹⁰"Suppose he has a violent son, who sheds blood or does any of these other things ¹¹(though the father has done none of them):

"He eats at the mountain shrines.

He defiles his neighbor's wife.

12He oppresses the poor and needy.

He commits robbery.

He does not return what he took in pledge.

He looks to the idols.

He does detestable things.

13He lends at usury and takes excessive interest.

Will such a man live? He will not! Because he has done all these detestable things, he will surely be put to death and his blood will be on his own head.

¹⁴"But suppose this son has a son who sees all the sins his father commits, and though he sees them, he does not do such things:

¹⁵"He does not eat at the mountain shrines or look to the idols of the house of Israel.

He does not defile his neighbor's wife.

16He does not oppress anyone or require a pledge for a loan.
He does not commit robbery
but gives his food to the hungry and provides clothing for the naked.

17He withholds his hand from sin and takes no usury or excessive interest.
He keeps my laws and follows my decrees.

He will not die for his father's sin; he will surely live. ¹⁸But his father will die for his own sin, because he practiced extortion, robbed his brother and did what was wrong among his people.

¹⁹"Yet you ask, 'Why does the son not share the guilt of his father?' Since the son has done what is just and right and has been careful to keep all my decrees, he will surely live. ²⁰The soul who sins is the one who will die. The son will not share the guilt of the father, nor will the father share the guilt of the son. The righteousness of the righteous man will be credited to him, and the wickedness of the wicked will be charged against him.

²¹"But if a wicked man turns away from all the sins he has committed and keeps all my decrees and does what is just and right, he will surely live; he will not die. ²²None of the offenses he has committed will be remembered against him. Because of the righteous things he has done, he will live. ²³Do I take any pleasure in the death of the wicked? declares the Sovereign LORD. Rather, am I not pleased when they turn from their ways and live?

²⁴"But if a righteous man turns from his righteousness and commits sin and does the same detestable things the wicked man does, will he live? None of the righteous things he has done will be remembered. Because of the unfaithfulness he is guilty of and because of the sins he has committed, he will die.

25"Yet you say, 'The way of the Lord is not just.' Hear, O house of Israel: Is my way unjust? Is it not your ways that are unjust? ²⁶If a righteous man turns from his righteousness and commits sin, he will die for it; because of the sin he has committed he will die. ²⁷But if a wicked man turns away from the wickedness he has committed and does what is just and right, he will save his life. ²⁸Because he considers all the offenses he has committed and turns away from them, he will surely live; he will not die. ²⁹Yet the house of Israel says, 'The way of the Lord is not just.' Are my ways unjust, O house of Israel? Is it not your ways that are unjust?

30"Therefore, O house of Israel, I will judge you, each one according to his ways, declares the Sovereign LORD. Repent! Turn away from all your offenses; then sin will not be your downfall. ³¹Rid yourselves of all the offenses you have committed, and get a new heart and a new spirit. Why will you die, O house of Israel? ³²For I take no pleasure in the death of anyone, declares the Sovereign LORD. Repent and live!

Original Meaning

THIS CHAPTER CONTINUES the pattern of pictorial speech found in the preceding chapters, but this time the proverb comes from the mouth of the people, not delivered from the Lord. It is an erroneous proverb—or at least a proverb erroneously applied—and such has been its misuse that the Lord swears that all use of it will be eliminated from Israel (18:3). The proverb runs: "The fathers eat sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge" (18:2), thus affirming that sometimes children suffer for their parent's actions rather than the parents themselves.

The application to which the people of Ezekiel's time had put the proverb is not hard to discern: "Our fathers sinned against God, but we their children (the generation of the Exile) are the ones paying the price; that's the way the world is and nothing can be done about it." A similar thought is expressed in Lamentations 5:7: "Our fathers sinned and are no more, and we bear their punishment." Jeremiah also confronted the same proverb (Jer. 31:29–30), which suggests that the idea had considerable currency around the time of the Exile.

The Lord's response to this proverb is a categorical denial of its applicability. Both father and son "belong" to the Lord; indeed, everyone belongs to him (Ezek. 18:4). The Lord is not only sovereign over all flesh, but he is also a just judge. There is no unfair attribution of punishment to the next generation for the sins of the fathers; instead, "the soul who sins is the one who will die" (18:4), a maxim that had already been applied to the earthly judicial realm in Deuteronomy 24:16.

These assertions of the sovereignty and especially the justice of God are not random theological statements drawn from a treatise on the attributes of God. Rather, they are specifically designed to meet and address the temptations of those in exile. To the temptation to fatalistic despair, Ezekiel affirms God's sovereignty. Life is not in the hands of blind Kismet, who capriciously dispenses undeserved sufferings. To the temptation to question God's goodness, Ezekiel affirms the justice of God's ways. These specific temptations and their answers underlie the course of the disputation that follows.

The first part of that disputation is a case study covering three successive generations, presented in the form of priestly case law.² The formula "If a man . . ." followed by the judicial verdict is comparable to that found in Leviticus 20:9–21. The three generations described are a righteous man who is succeeded by a wicked son, who is in turn followed by a repentant, righteous son. The behavior of each is assessed against a "checklist" of righteous behaviors, a kind of miniature Ten Commandments.³

This list covers three basic areas of morality, which may be broadly categorized as piety, chastity, and charity. The first man mentioned is orthodox in his religious practice: He does not eat on the mountains (Ezek. 18:6); that is, he is not involved in the idolatrous cults of the high places (see 6:3–7). Nor does he lift his eyes to Israel's idols—a gesture suggesting an appeal to the idols for help.⁴ As with the Decalogue, undivided commitment to the Lord is the primary token of obedience. Moreover, he does not commit adultery with his neighbor's wife, nor does he lie with a woman during her menstrual period (18:6). The latter was prohibited in Leviticus 18:19 on account of the ritual uncleanness contracted by this flow of blood, as with other bodily discharges.

In addition, this righteous man does not oppress those in debt to him; instead, he returns objects given to him as security for a debt (Ezek. 18:7). This may mean faithfulness in returning the poor man's garment to him by nightfall so that he has something to sleep in, as required in Exodus 22:25, or it may simply mean actually returning the pledge once the debt has been repaid. There were a multitude of ways in which an unscrupulous lender could take advantage of the desperate. Far from robbing, however, this righteous man feeds and clothes the poor out of his own resources (Ezek. 18:7). He does not lend at interest; such "loan sharking" was prohibited in Leviticus 25:36–37, where it is clear that the person concerned was in desperate need and thus open to exploitation. The righteous person draws back from all such wrongdoing and practices true justice between people (Ezek. 18:8). To summarize, this person "follows my decrees and faithfully keeps my laws" (18:9). What is the verdict on such a person? "That man is righteous; he will surely live."

On the other hand, suppose this man's son is the antithesis of all his father stands for. He does everything bad his father abhorred and fails to do any of the good things his father did. Point by point, Ezekiel checks off his sins. What is to be the verdict on such a person? "Will such a man live? He will not!" He will die, and his death will be no one's fault but his own (18:13).

But suppose this second man also has a son who swims against the tide. He is like his grandfather in doing what is good and right, not like his wicked father. He sees what his father does and deliberately follows a different course. His life is again a model of piety, chastity, and charity. What is the verdict on the third generation? According to the proverb of 18:2, he ought to face the inexorable consequences of his father's misdeeds. But according to Ezekiel, "he will surely live" (18:17). His father will be judged on the basis of his sins and die (hence, he will not be rescued by the first generation's righteousness). But the son will be judged on the basis of his own record and will live (hence, he will not die on account of his father's sin). In the heavenly court, as in the earthly court (Deut. 24:16), "the soul who sins is the one who will die" (Ezek. 18:20).

At this point, Ezekiel envisages a hypothetical objection: "What! Does the son not share the guilt of the father?" (18:19a, pers. trans.). By providing this reductio ad absurdum, the complaint of Ezekiel's audience is undermined. In such a clear case, no one can dispute the justice of Ezekiel's assertion: "Since the son has done what is just and right and has been careful to keep all my decrees, he will surely live. The soul who sins is the one who will die" (Ezek. 18:19b–20). But to accept this as God's way is necessarily to abandon the applicability of the original proverb to their situation. If this generation is experiencing the "death" of exile and if God deals justly with each generation, then the only possible conclusion is that they too must also be tarred with guilt before God.

The point Ezekiel is making is not that the previous generation was any less guilty than the present generation. Far from it! He has already characterized Jerusalem's earliest roots as pagan (16:3), and he will shortly describe the history of Israel from the desert period on as one of continuous rebellion (20:4–29). To make the picture match Israel's history, all three generations have to be identified with the second generation: the epitome of wickedness. But Ezekiel's point is that the present generation is not guiltless. They themselves have shared in the sins of past generations, as 20:30–32 makes explicit. Therefore, although the judgment they are now undergoing is certainly in part a judgment on the result of the sins of previous generations, the present generation are not innocent bystanders but guilty bystanders. They too have shared in eating the sour grapes, so they cannot pass the buck for the unpleasant aftertaste onto others. God's dealings with them have been nothing other than perfectly just.

But if that point is accepted, then the possibility of despair becomes real.⁸ If God is indeed judging this generation for its sin, what is the point of even trying to please him? If they are condemned sinners, what room is there for hope? Since their death sentence is decreed, ought they not simply to eat, drink, and try to be merry in the time that remains to them?

By no means! Ezekiel 18:21–32 addresses that question by propounding another pair of case studies. The first concerns a wicked person who turns from his sins and does what is right (18:21). Will such a person not live? Indeed he will, for the Lord takes no pleasure in putting to death the sinner. Grace is possible for the one who repents; his transgressions will be remembered no more (18:22–23). By contrast, the righteous person who "repents" of his righteousness and abandons his service of God will not escape judgment. Right standing before God is not capital that can be banked, either by oneself or one's ancestors, allowing one to live on the accrued interest. Apostasy is always a fearful possibility to be reckoned with.

Thus, just as this generation is not guiltless but brings on its own head divine judgment, so also as long as it exists, this generation is not fixed on its present course. Change, real change, is always possible—for better or for worse! This is fundamentally the reason for which Ezekiel was appointed a watchman back in chapter 3 so that the wicked might be turned from their ways to a godly way of life, and the righteous be warned not to fall away.

In all this, is God not just? The problem, says Ezekiel, is not God's lack of justice. The problem is with Israel's lack of justice. The problem is not that God has not judged this present generation according to what they deserve. Rather, it is that they deserve all too fully the judgment that has fallen on them. But that is only part of the story. The essential point the prophet is making is introduced by the word "therefore" in verse 30.9 Judgment is coming! God will judge Israel, not unjustly or capriciously but according to their ways. In the past, he has shown justice abundantly tempered with mercy to Israel. They have repeatedly fallen short of God's standard, loving their transgressions more than they love God. What is more, in the present they continue in the way of their fathers. If the proverb were true, they would be condemned for sure.

But even now it is not too late! Even wicked, condemned sinners can still leave their transgressions behind, repent, and acquire for themselves¹⁰ a new heart and new spirit (18:31). Even now death is not inevitable. They can still return to the God of all grace and live (18:32). If they do so, God will not turn them away but will give them what they seek and what he has already promised: a new heart and a new spirit (11:19). Everything that precedes it—the case studies, the declaration of God's justice, the statement of God's mercy—everything leads up to the passionate appeal to turn from death, to choose life and live (cf. Deut. 30:15–20)!

Bridging Contexts

THE CORPORATE NATURE of Ezekiel 18. All too often Ezekiel 18 has been treated as if drawn from the pages of a systematic theology textbook. Frequently, the result of this approach has been to hail the prophet as introducing a new theological idea into Israel, that of "individual responsibility." Previously, so the argument goes, Israelites thought in terms of "corporate responsibility," but Ezekiel cleared the way for the New Testament by asserting the standing of the individual soul before God.¹² Such an idea appeals to our individualistic age, but it is not founded in the text.

In our exposition, we have demonstrated that the case studies, though they describe hypothetical individuals, actually are building an argument that applies to Ezekiel's generation as a whole. It was the corporate group (the "house of Israel," 18:25, 29–30) on whom judgment had come and who is urged to repent and turn once more to the Lord. This same corporate emphasis is found elsewhere in Ezekiel. Israel's long history of sin has now made their final doom inevitable (cf. Ezek. 20).

However, that fate does not descend on an innocent generation but one that is also guilty of the same sins as its predecessors. The corporate nature of judgment is not arbitrary, any more than is the corporate aspect of salvation, but it is bound up with the transmission of those same sinful characteristics on to the next generation. Following the example of the fathers, the children have also been eating sour grapes. Just as the blessings of the covenant community are not transmitted to the next generation as something separate from their parent's faith, so also the covenant curse is transmitted in company with unbelief.

A similar theme emerges in the books of Judges to Kings, where repeated cycles of apostasy reach a point of no return with the excesses of Manasseh, from which not even the reform of Josiah can rescue Judah (2 Kings 23:26).¹³ Yet at the same time, the generations after Manasseh are not excused. Though Josiah is righteous and receives the reward of at least being buried in his own tomb (23:30), the four kings leading up to the exile (Jehoahaz, Jehoiakim, Jehoiachin, and Zedekiah) each do evil in the eyes of the Lord. Punishment for the sins of their forebears falls not on the heads of the innocent but the guilty. The question being addressed by Ezekiel, then, is not whether judgment is corporate, but whether that corporate judgment is just or not.

Indeed, the very categories Ezekiel utilizes—"righteous/unrighteous," "life/death"—are corporate categories in the Old Testament. The "legal lists" were not expressions of some impersonal entity called "Right" or "Natural Law" or "Truth." The prophets would never have begun their arguments with the words: "We hold these truths to be self-evident. . . ." To be righteous was to be in right relationship with the Lord, to accept him as your overlord, and therefore to accede to his demands on your life.

Necessarily, rightly relating to the Great King involved rightly relating to his friends and enemies as well. Thus, righteousness prohibited idolatry (giving allegiance to any other overlord) and taking advantage of the poor (oppressing the King's people). Chastity and purity were prerequisites to entering his presence. To be unrighteous, on the other hand, was to live as the antithesis of an obedient vassal, consorting with the King's enemies and doing the things he had forbidden. The law was an expression of the wisdom of the Great King that provided opportunity for the vassal to express loyalty.

The one who is faithful to these requirements will "live," that is, enjoy the fullness of relationship with the Great King that flows from obedience. Such life is not merely physical existence, or even the future hope of return from exile, but a place among the people of the King in the presence of the King. Death, on the other hand, means estrangement from both God and the covenant community, along with all of the blessings that went with that status. To be cut off from God's people is to be "dead" even while physically still alive, for one would be separated from the source of life. There is no life apart from the Source and Giver of life; as Deuteronomy 30:20 puts it: "The LORD is your life, and he will give you many years in the land he swore to give to your fathers, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob."

The individual dimension. Yet this stress on the corporate nature of both life and death, of blessing and curse, should not blind us to the fact that these elements have always had an individual dimension to them in the Bible. As early as the Flood, God was concerned to rescue the righteous out of the midst of the judgment (Gen. 6:9). "Righteous" Lot (as Peter calls him in 2 Peter 2:7) was similarly delivered out of the judgment of Sodom and Gomorrah, though his unbelieving sons-in-law were consumed in the conflagration. Joshua and Caleb, the two spies to bring a positive report of the Promised Land, were the only two from that generation to enter it (Num. 13–14). When Ahab's sin resulted in drought, God provided supernaturally for Elijah first by means of ravens and then by means of a foreign widow (1 Kings 17). In the midst of the judgment that finally falls on the wicked for their sin, God is able to protect his own.

Contemporary Significance

THE PROBLEM OF EVIL. When I was growing up, two of the top three things we were never allowed to say were, "It's not my fault," and, "It's not fair."

(The other was, "I couldn't help it.") Those very phrases are, in effect, what Ezekiel's contemporaries were saying to God by using the parable about the fathers having eaten sour grapes and the children having their teeth set on edge. As they suffered the discipline of God in the Exile, their first response was, "This is not our fault," which in turn led logically to the accusation, "God, that's not fair." Ezekiel's response is to affirm that, along with previous generations, it is indeed their fault. It is not God's unfairness but their sin that is the problem. They are simply in denial about the true nature of their case. But Ezekiel doesn't take away their excuses in order to leave them crushed under the full impact of God's law. He pleads with them even now to turn and live.

The question of why bad things happen in this world is a problem for anyone who thinks about the world at all, who lives beyond the level of momentary feelings. That's why Rabbi Harold Kushner's book *When Bad Things Happen to Good People*¹⁵ was such a best-seller. The issue he posed is a real one—even if the answer he gave to that question was seriously flawed. His solution is that God means well but is ultimately unable to prevent everything bad from hitting home. According to him, God is like a good parent, doing everything in his power to protect his children, but ultimately powerless against the intrusions of chaos into the order of the world and the free expression of evil on the part of those he has created.

Those of us who believe in the God whom the Bible reveals have a problem with Rabbi Kushner's "solution," however. ¹⁶ It is based on a wrong picture of God. The Bible portrays God as victorious over the forces of chaos from the beginning of Genesis on. Nothing can stand against his omnipotent, creative word. The mighty Egyptian army is smothered by the Red Sea when it seeks to make bad things happen to God's people. As a general principle, the writer of Proverbs teaches us that there is no such thing as chance in this world: "The lot is cast into the lap, but its every decision is from the LORD "(Prov. 16:33). Nor is the Lord helpless even against the decisions of wicked people. Indeed, he declares in Isaiah 8 that he will use the fierce and godless ruler of the Assyrians to execute judgment on his own people. No, the problem is not with God's power.

Recognizing that reality, the temptation is for us to oversimplify in a different direction. We may baldly reply to Rabbi Kushner in words that sound superficially like those of Ezekiel: "Bad things don't happen to good people, for there are no good people. Bad things only happen to bad people, for we are all bad." Certainly there is a strong element of biblical truth in that statement. "All have sinned and fall short of the glory of God," says Paul in Romans 3:23. Thus, we are all bad people, who deserve much more in the way of bad things than we ever receive in this life.

A "pro-life" God. Yet that approach oversimplifies the problem in a different direction by suggesting that there is only one reason why these bad things are happening, which is as a punishment from God because of our sin. Ultimately, this approach leads to the kind of question we find the disciples asking Jesus when they encountered a man born blind: "Who sinned, this man or his parents, that he was born blind?" (John 9:2). In the face of profound personal tragedy, we are content merely to debate suffering as an interesting theological issue, considering our duty done if we prove God "not guilty" of the charge of unfairness.

Not so, says Ezekiel! Certainly he answers the theological issue, but important though the issue is, he doesn't stop there. He is concerned not merely to demonstrate that God is just in condemning his people to death, but also to show that in spite of everything they have done, God is resolutely "pro-life." Even when the "life" in question is the life of those who have rebelled against him, God desires that they should turn and live. He therefore presses on from the abstract theological issue ("Where does this suffering come from?") to the intensely personal issue ("What is your relationship to God?").

You see, though suffering in this life ultimately flows from Adam's sin, a sin in which we corporately share not as innocent bystanders but as guilty coconspirators, yet it also has a multitude of diverse purposes in the providence of God. Some suffering has indeed as its purpose the judgment of sinners, here and now. Those who flout the Word of God find that there is often a price to pay. In other cases, however, suffering has a redemptive purpose, providing the occasion for those outside the kingdom to be brought to an awareness of their need for God. So Ezekiel faces his contemporaries with the challenge posed by their exile. He confronts them passionately with the need to choose between life and death, to choose between repenting and turning to God or continuing on their present course, with all of its ultimate consequences.

What did Jesus say in answer to the disciples' question as to which one had sinned, the man born blind or his parents? His answer was: "Neither this man nor his parents sinned . . . but this happened so that the work of God might be displayed in his life" (John 9:3). This suffering, says Jesus—indeed all suffering—is a work of God in the world. As we have noted, it sometimes has a redemptive purpose and sometimes a purpose of judgment. The latter should indeed not surprise us since we are sinners, born to sinners. God will certainly be glorified in executing judgment on sin. The truly surprising part is the first part: that God, through suffering, works for good in us and others, redeeming us, deepening our devotion to him, and drawing others to himself through us. The real question we face in this topsy-turvy world is: "How can bad things achieve a good purpose in bad people?"

The ultimate answer. The full answer to that question comes only at the cross. There God brought to remembrance my sins and the sins of all of his people so that they might not be remembered finally against us (Ezek. 18:22). Those sins must be dealt with. They cannot simply be swept under the carpet. The death penalty that they deserve must be executed. Someone must surely die for them. But there at Calvary, instead of putting me to death, or even me and my children for my sins, he put to death rather his own Son, his own beloved Son, who had no sin of his own.

We have not begun to grasp the reason why we suffer if we have not first considered the suffering of Christ in our place. For it was on the cross that his suffering made it possible for my suffering to be for good, for God's glory in my redemption, for God's glory in my growth in grace. That doesn't make it any less suffering. It is indeed painful, frequently very painful, as we endure it. But it does mean that for Christians, suffering is not for our judgment but is the means of God's gracious work in our lives, by which we are increasingly conformed to the image of Jesus Christ.

Ezekiel's passion to convey that message of life for everyone who will repent fits the cost paid by Jesus to make it possible. What can we say, however, about our own anemic efforts to share the good news? Faced with the reality of millions going to a lost eternity, do we form debating clubs to bat around the issue of the fate of those who have never heard of Jesus? Do we sit around and argue about the sociological factors that have caused so many fewer people to go to church nowadays than thirty years ago? Or do we rather determine that if sinners will go to hell, it will at least be over our dead bodies? As Charles Haddon Spurgeon put it:

Oh, my brothers and sisters in Christ, if sinners will be damned, at least let them leap to hell over our bodies; and if they will perish, let them perish with our arms about their knees, imploring them to stay, and not madly to destroy themselves. If hell must be filled, at least let it be filled in the teeth of our exertions, and let no one go there unwarned and unprayed for.¹⁸

The only appropriate response to the cross is to plead and exhort and pour out our lives to communicate the gospel of Jesus Christ. Like Ezekiel, we must confront men and women here and now with their desperate need to turn from their sins and to receive forgiveness and new life through Christ, and thus live forever with God and his people.

TAKE UP A LAMENT concerning the princes of Israel ²and say:

"'What a lioness was your mother among the lions! She lay down among the young lions and reared her cubs. ³She brought up one of her cubs, and he became a strong lion. He learned to tear the prey and he devoured men. ⁴The nations heard about him. and he was trapped in their pit. They led him with hooks to the land of Egypt. 5" 'When she saw her hope unfulfilled, her expectation gone, she took another of her cubs and made him a strong lion. ⁶He prowled among the lions, for he was now a strong lion. He learned to tear the prev and he devoured men. ⁷He broke down their strongholds and devastated their towns. The land and all who were in it were terrified by his roaring. ⁸Then the nations came against him, those from regions round about. They spread their net for him, and he was trapped in their pit. ⁹With hooks they pulled him into a cage and brought him to the king of Babylon. They put him in prison, so his roar was heard no longer on the mountains of Israel. 10" 'Your mother was like a vine in your vinevard planted by the water; it was fruitful and full of branches because of abundant water. ¹¹Its branches were strong. fit for a ruler's scepter. It towered high above the thick foliage, conspicuous for its height and for its many branches. ¹²But it was uprooted in fury and thrown to the ground. The east wind made it shrivel. it was stripped of its fruit; its strong branches withered and fire consumed them. ¹³Now it is planted in the desert, in a dry and thirsty land. ¹⁴Fire spread from one of its main branches and consumed its fruit. No strong branch is left on it fit for a ruler's scepter.'

This is a lament and is to be used as a lament."

Original Meaning

BY NOW, WE ARE familiar with the versatility with which the prophet delivers his message. Here, while continuing the pictorial speech of the last few chapters, Ezekiel moves from prose into poetry, adopting the form of a lament or dirge.

A lament was a common and distinctive form of song, frequently sung at a funeral, extolling the virtues of the departed and grieving the tragic circumstances surrounding the person's death. A classic example is found in 2 Samuel 1:19–27, where David mourns the deaths of Saul and Jonathan. In the hands of the prophets, however, the genre underwent a change of perspective, for the catalogue of virtues of the departed became a list of faults, while the tragic circumstances of the demise were projected into the future rather than simply recorded from the past. To conduct a "funeral service" for a still-living patient may not always be considered in the best of taste, but it is an effective way of communicating the certainty with which a death is anticipated! This certainty is particularly striking following on from Ezekiel 18, where the wicked man has been summoned to turn and live.

Ezekiel's lament is made up of two distinct images: a lioness and her cubs, and a vine and its branches. At first sight, these images seem distinct and unconnected. However, both were familiar images for the royal tribe of Judah, and the images are brought together, albeit in a different way, in Jacob's blessing of a ruler who would come from the tribe of Judah (Gen. 49:9–11).³ When the familiar imagery was combined with the familiar meter (and musical style?) of lament, it would have been immediately apparent to Ezekiel's listeners that what they heard was "a lament concerning the princes of Israel" (Ezek. 19:1).⁴

The first image is of a mother lioness who produces a number of cubs.⁵ Out of them, she chooses one to be the leader of the pack. He behaves in lionlike fashion, tearing the prey and even consuming people (19:3). As a result, he is hunted by the nations,⁶ captured, and carried off to Egypt (19:4). In his place, she appoints a second cub, who acts with even greater destructiveness (19:6–7). He too is hunted by the nations, captured, and carried into exile, this time to Babylon.

As with the imagery of Ezekiel 16–17, historical facts are built into the picture, resulting in an occasionally incongruous mixture of metaphor and reality. The first cub clearly represents Jehoahaz, who, after a brief three-month reign in 609 B.C., was carried off to Egypt by Pharaoh Neco (2 Kings 23:33–34). His reign is described as tearing the prey and devouring men (Ezek. 19:3). This carnivorous blood lust is sometimes understood not as a blameworthy feature, but simply as describing the normal growth and development of the king within the chosen metaphor. However, given the extension of the metaphor in 19:6 and further in 22:25, where the behavior is clearly reprehensible, that seems unlikely. Rather, it seems probable that Ezekiel exploited an ambiguity that is inherent within the metaphor.

The comparison of kings and lions was old and well established, yet the imagery contains the possibility of powerful men acting like wild beasts that have the capacity to empty the land (2 Kings 17:26). A poetic figure that in some contexts is strongly positive (Gen. 49:9; Deut. 33:20) can in other contexts become a figure of fierce cruelty (Prov. 28:15; Nah. 2:12–13). In terms of the brevity of Jehoahaz's reign, this negative characterization is probably somewhat stylized, yet he may have begun the policies for which his successor Jehoiakim is criticized in Jeremiah 22:13–17.

The second lion behaves similarly to the first, tearing prey and devouring men (Ezek. 19:6). In addition, he "broke down their strongholds" and devastated their towns," behavior that breaks out of the metaphorical realm (i.e., behavior appropriate to lions) into the literal realm (i.e., behavior appropriate to kings). The lament is unclear as to whose towns are devastated and which land is terrified of him. Normally, such language would apply to the lion's foes. Yet it is sufficiently ambiguous to cover the actual destruction wreaked on the lion's own country, Judah, whose towns and cities were destroyed as a result of the foolish policies of successive kings.9 This second lion too, having behaved like a wild animal, was hunted down.

The identity of the second lion has been the object of much debate. The primary choices are Jehoiachin, with whom Ezekiel was exiled, or Zedekiah, his successor, who was exiled in 586 B.C. If the lion metaphor is taken as a separate unit, then Zedekiah is probably the best choice. However, if the entire chapter is viewed as a two-image picture, with a change of metaphor between the first and second images, then Jehoiachin fits best as the second lion, while Zedekiah is then reserved for the second image, that of a vine and its branches. Although much attention has been devoted to the question, the meaning of the passage is not significantly altered by which identification is adopted; the point is that the current rulers of Judah are simply the latest outcroppings of the rock of oppression and pride from which they were hewn.

In the second image, a vine is planted in a vineyard¹² beside abundant waters. The perfect conditions provided for her lead to abundant growth, and in particular many strong branches suitable for a ruler's scepter (19:11). It towers high above the clouds¹³ but, as may be expected, pride goes before a fall, and the lofty vine is uprooted, withered by the east wind and stripped of its fruit (19:12). Its strong branches are burned, and the vine is replanted in the desert, in a dry and thirsty land (19:13). Indeed, the destructive fire itself comes from one of the branches and consumes its fruit; the result is that no strong branch is left suitable for a ruler's scepter (19:14).

Once more, the picture is not difficult to decode. The vine is Judah, planted by the Lord in perfect conditions. As a result, she produces many scions capable of ruling. But pride is her downfall. In wrath, the Lord uproots her and withers her, replanting her outside the Promised Land, back in the desert of exile. The fire, which started in one of the branches (Zedekiah), results not simply in a loss of the fruit (destruction of land/people) but also in the annihilation of all the other strong branches (potential rulers). In Zedekiah, the Davidic dynasty will come to a sudden end, at least for the present.

Echoes of chapter 17 are evident throughout this second picture. Both describe a vine planted in conditions suitable for growth (17:5–6), then uprooted in wrath (17:9) and shriveled by the east wind (17:10). The tall tree is brought low (17:24). Though the focus is different, placed on divine action rather than human action, the conclusion for Zedekiah is the same: no escape.

Bridging Contexts

THE OPTIMISM OF contemporary culture. The genre of lament is not a familiar one to contemporary readers, especially in an American context. We live in a culture that is inherently optimistic, which cannot accept the possibility of a definitive verdict of death. We believe in surprising comebacks, in victory snatched from the jaws of defeat, and especially in happy endings. The writer Christopher Lasch comments: "American historical writing takes little account of the possibility of tragedy—missed opportunities, fatal choices, conclusive and irrevocable defeats. History has to have a happy ending."¹⁴

Perhaps the closest we normally come to encountering this genre in our culture is in the character of Ebenezer Scrooge, who has become traditional Christmas viewing in one film incarnation or other of Charles Dickens' novel A Christmas Carol. Like the princes of Israel, Scrooge hears ahead of time the sound of his own funeral. In keeping with the dictates of our culture, however, Scrooge receives the warning in time and is reformed, resulting in the requisite happy ending.

For Judah under Zedekiah, there is no prospect of a happy ending. Her fate is sealed, along with his; doom, defeat, and despair await them. The lions will be trapped; the vine will be chopped down from its lofty position and replanted not in the Promised Land but in a dry and desert land. The ruler's scepter is gone. Even though there is ultimate hope, as Ezek. 17:22–24 makes clear, the present situation is one of unmitigated doom. What makes it worse is the fact that it is unmitigated doom in spite of God's good promise. For back in Genesis 49:8–12, a passage with close links in imagery to Ezekiel 19, God promised that the scepter would never depart from the line of Judah, whom he compares to a young lion. But even God's promises cannot be presumed on, if taken out of context. The scepter will indeed depart from Judah, at least for the present time, because of the sins committed by those who held it.

Often the optimism of our culture carries over into the church. During a conversation on the difficulty of church planting in England, an American pastor once remarked to me, "Given $60,000 and two years, I can plant a church here in the United States." Of course, such invincible optimism is not all bad. The pessimism that characterizes my own British culture adopts as its favorite text, "[This is] the day of small things" (Zech. 4:10). It needs to hear the words of Jeremiah: "Ah, Sovereign LORD, you have made the heavens and the earth by your great power and outstretched arm. Nothing is too hard for you" (Jer. 32:17). We should indeed believe that with God all things are possible. But to be true to God's Word, optimism must always be optimism in God's power combined with a healthy pessimism in our own abilities. God can do all things with or without us; without him, we can do nothing (compare Ps. 127:1–3).

Even where that basic point is affirmed in theory, cultural optimism sneaks into our assessment of the church and its mission in practice. Our natural tendency inclines us to believe that small churches ought to grow into larger churches, that missionaries ought to see significant numbers of converts, and that our ministries will certainly prosper, provided we faithfully follow biblical guidelines. This is particularly evident in the exclusive adoption of the biblical imagery of farming and harvest by the church growth movement in their description of missions.

The logic of the argument goes as follows: The church's mission is to gather God's harvest; like any good farmer, God seeks to maximize his production; his strategy (and therefore ours) will be to send workers to where the harvest is most ripe. The possibility of God's calling people to the kind of ministry exercised by Isaiah or Ezekiel may be acknowledged, but it is immediately discounted as an unusual situation. According to this position, the norm ought to be successful ministry! But where does such confidence come from? Is it not a version of the view of history described by Christopher Lasch, only given a Christian spin, so that it issues in the conviction that church history must have a happy ending?

A reality check. Ultimately, of course, church history does have a happy ending. The final chapters of Revelation assert that no matter what happens in between now and then, the church's position is ultimately secure. In the person of Christ, the promise of God that the scepter will not depart from the line of Judah will be ultimately fulfilled. As the bride of Christ, we are being prepared for the day when Christ will return to make all things new. But does that ultimate optimism allow for, indeed require, a similar optimism for the present, the time between the times? Can we say that we should expect the progress of the church to be smoothly and consistently in a forward direction?

Church history to date hardly seems to support such a notion. What we need is a strong reality check. Areas where the early church was strong are now virtually without a gospel witness; areas that were at the heart of the Reformation now see empty churches and cold hearts. Is that indeed a call for God's workers to go elsewhere? The apostle Paul would not seem to support such an idea. He warned Timothy about the prospect of hard times ahead in ministry, with hearers who would rather turn aside to myths than hear the truth. However, instead of urging him to move on to find "whiter harvests," he told him to keep his head, endure hardship, do the work of an evangelist, and discharge the duties of his ministry (2 Tim. 4:1–5).

The truth is that there is no "norm" in God's work. He calls some to white harvests and notable "success." He calls others to faithful labor with little or no visible reward. Still others live in a day of cold, hard hearts, in which the lack of faithfulness of God's people can only result in disaster for the church, unless God graciously sends revival. Sometimes he chooses not to send revival, and a church dies. In the short term, even if not in the long term, the possibility is real that church history may indeed be a record of tragedy—of missed opportunities, of fatal choices, of conclusive and irrevocable defeats. We may need to learn how to lament and weep before the Lord and recognize our sins and those of our fellow Christians that have caused God to depart from our midst. In the midst of the pain of our lamentation, however, our confidence may yet be placed in God's faithfulness. As Lamentations 3:22–24 puts it:

Because of the LORD's great love we are not consumed, for his compassions never fail.

They are new every morning; great is your faithfulness.

I say to myself, "The LORD is my portion; therefore I will wait for him."

Contemporary Significance

GOD'S WONDERFUL PLAN? "God loves you and has a wonderful plan for your life." So runs one part of the presentation of the gospel known as "The Four Spiritual Laws," which has been popularized by Campus Crusade for Christ. This encouraging thought is certainly in line with our culture's optimistic outlook, but is it true? Can we legitimately tell people that God has a wonderful plan for their lives?

Criticism of the statement often runs along the lines that since some of the people to whom we speak are not going to be saved, it is inappropriate to tell them that God's plan for their life is wonderful. What is so wonderful about a plan that ends up in hell? But is it even legitimate to say to Christians, "God has a wonderful plan for your life"? May we legitimately address Christians with the proof text of this position, the Lord's words in Jeremiah 29:11: "I know the plans I have for you . . . plans to prosper you and not to harm you, plans to give you hope and a future"?

In one sense, of course, we may. Ultimately, God does have a wonderful eternity prepared for his people. "No eye has seen, no ear has heard, no mind has conceived what God has prepared for those who love him" (1 Cor. 2:9). But the more pressing question involves the here and now, the inbetween time. The assertion that God has a wonderful plan for our lives often rings hollow when measured up against the realities of day-to-day life. Our lives are frequently more desert than well-watered place. We seem to spend more time at Marah, where the wandering Israelites found the water too bitter to drink, than at Elim, the place of rest with its twelve springs and seventy palm trees, overflowing with abundance (see Ex. 15:22–27).

If we have been sold a promise as Christians that "it's a wonderful life," then we may spend much time struggling with that reality. We may live in permanent denial of life's unpleasant realities or blame ourselves for failing to measure up, because if we were "really spiritual" life wouldn't be this way. The truth is, however, that our present existence is frequently less than wonderful, and the Bible never pretends that it ought to be otherwise. Jeremiah's words were addressed to people living in exile, experiencing in its full harshness the bitterness of life, who needed to be assured that in the midst of the distress, there was still hope for the future. He goes on to denounce those who promise short-term relief (Jer. 29:21–23)! Those who are living comfortably back in Judah, on the other hand, are addressed not with hope but with a message of certain destruction (e.g., Ezek. 24:8–10).

That destruction was coming on Judah in part because of the sins of their royal leaders. Proud and violent, they had led the people astray from God. Now God was indeed announcing his plan for their life, but it was not what they would call wonderful. Instead, it is a lament, a messenger of sure and certain death. That death would fall not only on the individuals concerned but also on the present Davidic house as a whole. There would be no more second chances, no replacement for Zedekiah as head of the line of David. Just as Isaiah's prophecy of a shoot growing from the stump of Jesse proclaimed the coming of the chain saw of God's judgment on the existing royal line (Isa. 11:1; how else, after all, would you end up with a "stump"?), so also Ezekiel surveys the recent history of the Davidic monarchy and writes on it in large letters, "Failure."

The fulfillment of God's ultimate plan. None of Israel's kings, not even the greatest, David himself, had been able to establish God's kingdom on earth. All of them ultimately failed. None of them could lead God's people into their rest. So the prophet takes out his correction fluid and whites them out as the source of hope. In spite of God's promises, all that is left is a lament. What a depressing truth for Ezekiel's hearers! It means that all of their present hopes in any existing human figure must be crushed, and they must depend entirely on something new that God will do. Nor is there any direct statement in this passage of what form this "new thing" will take.

But the links back to Ezekiel 17 remind us not to forget how that chapter ends, with the promise of a fresh start, a new sprig from the cedar, a new Son of David, who will bring in nothing less than a new world (17:22–24). Isaiah's old prophecy likewise was not simply a statement that God would reduce the house of David to a stump, but that out of that stump a new shoot would grow, through whom God's purposes would be fulfilled (Isa. 11:2–16). Though Ezekiel laments the fate of the house of David, which is as good as dead, he serves the God who brings life from the dead. God's promises cannot ultimately be destroyed by human weakness and failure, not even by a long history of weakness and failure. In the end, every one of his promises to David will not fail but will be fulfilled in the true Son of David, Jesus Christ.

This passage thus gives both comforting and challenging news for all of us. What makes it challenging news for us is the fact that the same verdict delivered against the house of David stands against us and all of our best efforts. It is not simply the rulers of old who abused their position of power who have fallen short of the glory of God, it is all of us. Like the line of the kings of Israel and Judah, our personal histories are littered with a trail of wrecks. No matter who you are, no matter how squeaky clean your image, when God looks at your life, he writes across it in large letters, "Failure" (cf. Rom. 3:23).

Worst of all, that is true not simply of your most wicked moments, but of your best. It is not just when you are stabbing somebody in the back, or gossiping or stealing or committing adultery that you offend God. It is when you are helping a little old lady across the street, while underneath there is the sneaking thought, "Is anybody seeing what a wonderful person I am?" It is while you are praying in a prayer meeting, or giving to the poor, or feeding the hungry, while all along there is a corner of your heart that is a little impressed with your own goodness and that feels God ought to be impressed too.

Like Judah of old, what you need is not just another (slightly better) version of the same. We make New Year's resolutions and plans to quit this bad habit and abandon that sin and start to do this good thing and generally overhaul our lives. We think, "Next year, I'll be a little better than this. This year wasn't so great, perhaps, but next year things will be different." Ezekiel's lament tells us that New Year's resolutions aren't enough, just as a new Davidic king wouldn't be enough. God will have to do something far more radical to save us.

The good news is that in Jesus Christ God has done precisely such a radical new work. In spite of the failure of all of Judah's kings, good as well as bad, God sent another King, the true "Lion of the tribe of Judah" and "Root of David" (Rev. 5:5). In spite of your personal repeated failure, God has triumphed in Christ to win the salvation of all his people. But this Lion, far from tearing the prey and devouring men (Ezek. 19:6), has conquered by appearing as a Lamb, who has been slain on behalf of his people (Rev. 5:6).

The appearance of this Lamb of God opens a window into heaven that transforms our experience of present realities. Though the present we live in and the immediate future we face may be bleak and forbidding, "a dry and thirsty land" (Ezek. 19:13), that fact no longer devastates us because this world is not our home. It is merely our place of pilgrimage on a journey to our real home. Though now we lament, soon we will go to the place where laments will be no more. Though we now suffer, soon we will be worshiping at the feet of the Lamb in heaven. Though we place no confidence in the flesh, knowing that the glory of this world is passing away and people here will continually disappoint us and fail us, we have full confidence in God and in the efficacy of his promises. We believe that the ruler's scepter has been given into the hand of the Lord Jesus Christ, and ultimately he will rule the nations as King of kings and Lord of lords (Rev. 19:15–16). In that promise lies a sure and certain hope that our failures are not the end of the story. God's faithfulness is.

Ezekiel 20:1-44

IN THE SEVENTH YEAR, in the fifth month on the tenth day, some of the elders of Israel came to inquire of the LORD, and they sat down in front of me.

²Then the word of the LORD came to me: ³"Son of man, speak to the elders of Israel and say to them, 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says: Have you come to inquire of me? As surely as I live, I will not let you inquire of me, declares the Sovereign LORD.'

⁴"Will you judge them? Will you judge them, son of man? Then confront them with the detestable practices of their fathers ⁵ and say to them: 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says: On the day I chose Israel, I swore with uplifted hand to the descendants of the house of Jacob and revealed myself to them in Egypt. With uplifted hand I said to them, "I am the LORD your God." ⁶On that day I swore to them that I would bring them out of Egypt into a land I had searched out for them, a land flowing with milk and honey, the most beautiful of all lands. ⁷And I said to them, "Each of you, get rid of the vile images you have set your eyes on, and do not defile yourselves with the idols of Egypt. I am the LORD your God."

8" 'But they rebelled against me and would not listen to me; they did not get rid of the vile images they had set their eyes on, nor did they forsake the idols of Egypt. So I said I would pour out my wrath on them and spend my anger against them in Egypt.

9But for the sake of my name I did what would keep it from being profaned in the eyes of the nations they lived among and in whose sight I had revealed myself to the Israelites by bringing them out of Egypt. 10Therefore I led them out of Egypt and brought them into the desert. ¹¹I gave them my decrees and made known to them my laws, for the man who obeys them will live by them. ¹²Also I gave them my Sabbaths as a sign between us, so they would know that I the LORD made them holy.

13" 'Yet the people of Israel rebelled against me in the desert. They did not follow my decrees but rejected my laws—although the man who obeys them will live by them—and they utterly desecrated my Sabbaths. So I said I would pour out my wrath on them and destroy them in the desert. ¹⁴But for the sake of my name I did what would keep it from being profaned in the eyes of the nations in whose sight I had brought them out. ¹⁵Also with uplifted hand I swore to them in the desert that I would not bring them into the land I had given them—a land flowing with milk and honey, most beautiful of all lands—¹⁶because they rejected my laws and did not follow my decrees and desecrated my Sabbaths. For their hearts were devoted to their idols. ¹⁷Yet I looked on them with pity and did not destroy them or put an end to them in the desert. ¹⁸I said to their children in the desert, "Do not follow the statutes of your fathers or keep their laws or defile yourselves with their idols. ¹⁹I am the LORD your God; follow my decrees and be careful to keep my laws. ²⁰Keep my Sabbaths holy, that they may be a sign between us. Then you will know that I am the LORD your God."

²¹" 'But the children rebelled against me: They did not follow my decrees, they were not careful to keep my laws—although the man who obeys them will live by them—and they desecrated my Sabbaths. So I said I would pour out my wrath on them and spend my anger against them in the desert. ²²But I withheld my hand, and for the sake of my name I did what would keep it from being profaned in the eyes of the nations in whose sight I had brought them out. ²³Also with uplifted hand I swore to them in the desert that I would disperse them among the nations and scatter them through the countries, ²⁴because they had not obeyed my laws but had rejected my decrees and desecrated my Sabbaths, and their eyes lusted after their fathers' idols. ²⁵I also gave them over to statutes that were not good and laws they could not live by; ²⁶I let them become defiled through their gifts—the sacrifice of every firstborn—that I might fill them with horror so they would know that I am the LORD.'

²⁷"Therefore, son of man, speak to the people of Israel and say to them, 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says: In this also your fathers blasphemed me by forsaking me: ²⁸When I brought them into the land I had sworn to give them and they saw any high hill or any leafy tree, there they offered their sacrifices, made offerings that provoked me to anger, presented their fragrant incense and poured out their drink offerings. ²⁹Then I said to them: What is this high place you go to?'" (It is called Bamah to this day.)

³⁰"Therefore say to the house of Israel: 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says: Will you defile yourselves the way your fathers did and lust after their vile images? ³¹When you offer your gifts—the sacrifice of your sons in the fire—you continue to defile yourselves with all your idols to this day. Am I to let you inquire of me, O house of Israel? As surely as I live, declares the Sovereign LORD, I will not let you inquire of me.

³²" 'You say, "We want to be like the nations, like the peoples of the world, who serve wood and stone." But what you have in mind will never happen. ³³As surely as I live, declares the Sovereign LORD, I will rule over you with a mighty hand and an outstretched arm and with outpoured wrath. ³⁴I will bring you from the nations and gather you from the countries where you have been scattered—with a mighty hand and an outstretched arm and with outpoured wrath. ³⁵I will bring you into the desert of the nations and there, face to face, I will execute judgment upon you. ³⁶As I judged your fathers in the desert of the land of Egypt, so I will judge you, declares the Sovereign LORD. ³⁷I will take note of you as you pass under my rod, and I will bring you into the bond of the covenant. ³⁸I will purge you of those who revolt and rebel against me. Although I will bring them out of the land where they are living, vet they will not enter the land of Israel. Then you will know that I am the LORD.

³⁹" 'As for you, O house of Israel, this is what the Sovereign LORD says: Go and serve your idols. every one of you! But afterward you will surely listen to me and no longer profane my holy name with your gifts and idols. ⁴⁰For on my holy mountain, the high mountain of Israel, declares the Sovereign LORD, there in the land the entire house of Israel will serve me, and there I will accept them. There I will require your offerings and your choice gifts, along with all your holy sacrifices. ⁴¹I will accept you as fragrant incense when I bring you out from the nations and gather you from the countries where you have been scattered, and I will show myself holy among you in the sight of the nations. ⁴²Then you will know that I am the LORD, when I bring you into the land of Israel, the land I had sworn with uplifted hand to give to your fathers. ⁴³There you will remember your conduct and all the actions by which you have defiled yourselves, and you will loathe yourselves for all the evil you have done. ⁴⁴You will know that I am the LORD, when I deal with you for my name's sake and not according to your evil ways and your corrupt practices, O house of Israel, declares the Sovereign LORD.' "

Original Meaning

AFTER FIVE CHAPTERS of largely pictorial speech—proverbs, riddles, parables, and laments—the prophet returns to the language of straightforward history. This change is marked by a renewed interaction between the prophet and his public. In Ezekiel 15–19, the word of the Lord comes to the prophet unsought, though in some cases in response to sayings that had become common currency among God's people. Now, however, the prophetic speech is triggered by an attempt on the part of the "elders of Israel" to inquire of the Lord, as in Ezekiel 14.

The "elders of Israel" were the lay leaders of the exilic community (see Jer. 29:1), and they appear at key points of Ezekiel's indictment of the people (Ezek. 8:1; 14:1; 20:1). In each case, the charge leveled against the elders is secret idolatry (8:11; 14:3), a sin they share with the people at large. The very ones who once led the people in receiving a foretaste of the pouring out of the Spirit (Num. 11:24–25) now lead the people in their spiritual adultery.²

It is now the summer of 591 B.C. The elders have assembled before Ezekiel in order to "inquire of the LORD" (Ezek. 20:1). Now, as a life-stance, "inquiring of the LORD" or "seeking the LORD" would have been commendable; indeed, in Amos 5:4 the Lord addresses the house of Israel in precisely those terms: "Seek me and live." But as Amos goes on to point out, seeking the Lord can never be simply one part of a broadly based religious strategy. Seeking the Lord is, by definition, exclusive: To seek the Lord means not to seek the calf idols of Bethel (Amos 5:5). But this is precisely where the elders fail the test. Because they are involved in the idolatrous practices of their ancestors, the Lord will not answer them.³ The door is so firmly closed in their faces that the prophet does not even bother to record the substance of their request. They might just as well not have said a word. In fact, they may not even have reached the point of framing their question before they are cut off. It is not what they ask that the Lord finds unacceptable but who they are.4

Yet (perhaps surprisingly) the chapter does not end here. Although the Lord will not answer them in terms of what they are seeking, he has a message for them to hear, addressed directly to their sin (Ezek. 20:4–5; cf. 14:4). Ezekiel is called to join God in judging the elders by confronting them with their sin. He is to present to them a history of Israel from God's perspective. That is, it is a history that focuses not on Israel's history of cultural and political achievements but rather on their history of idolatry. Ezekiel is to confront the elders with "the detestable practices of their fathers" (20:4).⁵

The way in which Ezekiel challenges the elders with Israel's history has more than a little in common with chapter 18. It is essentially a story of three consecutive generations, with intended application to the present generation. The choice laid before each generation is obedience to the Lord's life-giving laws (Ezek. 20:11, 21; cf. 18:9) or death-dealing disobedience (20:23–25; cf. 18:13). The three generations Ezekiel chooses here for his case study are the generation who lived in Egypt at the time of the Exodus (20:5–10), the desert generation (vv. 11–15), and their children (vv. 18–23). Each generation's history is presented as a six-stage cycle:

- (1) The Lord's self-revelation (vv. 5–6, 11, 18–19)
- (2) A challenge to exclusive devotion (vv. 7, 12, 19–20)
- (3) Israel's rebellion (vv. 8, 13, 21)
- (4) The threat of the Lord's wrath (vv. 8b, 13b, 21b)
- (5) Wrath limited/deferred for the sake of the divine name (vv. 9, 14, 22)
- (6) Act of limited judgment (vv. 10, 17, 23)

According to this schema, each new generation is confronted for itself with a fresh revelation of the Lord. To each comes the gracious self-announcement "I am the LORD" (20:12, 20, cf. v. 5). The basis for this self-revelation is not Israel's merit but divine election and a covenant oath sworn by God to bring them to the Promised Land (Ezek. 20:5). His care for them was demonstrated in "searching out" the perfect location for them to inhabit, "a land flowing with milk and honey, the most beautiful of all lands" (20:6). But this decisive act in Israel's history required a response on the part of Israel of exclusive devotion to the Lord. To the first generation, it meant getting rid of their vile images and the idols of Egypt (20:7). To the second generation, it meant obeying the Lord's decrees and laws given at Sinai (20:11–12).

Of these decrees, Ezekiel singles out for particular mention the Sabbath law. The Sabbath was foundational to the Israelite view of sacred time and community. In Exodus 31:16–17, the Lord said to Moses:

The Israelites are to observe the Sabbath, celebrating it for the generations to come as a lasting covenant. It will be a sign between me and the Israelites forever. . . .

With its regular one day in seven observance, the Sabbath cut across the nature-based calendars of the pagans, which revolved solely around phases of the moon and agricultural seasons. Instead, it called God's people to march to the beat of a different drum, as a mark of submission to their covenant overlord. It was a sign of their liberation from bondage (for slaves are not in control of their schedule) but also a sign of their distinctiveness from other nations who had not been similarly redeemed. To profane the Sabbath was thus to abandon an essential element of their distinctiveness as the people of the Lord and to attempt, in effect, to "become like the nations around us." It is to refuse to follow the example that God himself set in Genesis 2:1–4. This same requirement ("Follow my decrees and be careful to keep my laws. Keep my Sabbaths holy") is reiterated to the next generation as well (Ezek. 20:18–20).

But Israel's consistent response to this gracious self-revelation was rebellion. Three times that rebellion is detailed, not simply in general terms but specifically as the failure to keep themselves distinct in the terms of the requirements of stage (2) of the cycle (20:7, 12, 19–20). Three times the Lord threatened to pour out his wrath on them once and for all, destroying them utterly. Yet each time he held back his hand, not because such a judgment was in any sense undeserved, but for the honor of his name, lest the nations around Israel read her destruction as the Lord's inability to protect his own (cf. Num. 14:15–16).

Nonetheless, in each case limited judgment does fall: First-generation Israel exits Egypt and finds itself not in a beautiful land flowing with milk and honey but in the desert (Ezek. 20:10). The next generation does not inherit the Promised Land either but are doomed to die in the desert (20:15). The third generation not only fails to inherit the Promised Land but will be scattered among the nations (20:23). The upraised hand, swearing on oath to bring the chosen people into the land of promise (20:5), now becomes an upraised hand swearing on oath that this generation shall never enter (20:15), and finally swearing that they will rather go into exile (20:23). The unfaithful elect experience the covenant curses, not the covenant blessings.

In addition, in place of God's good decrees and statutes (20:11), this generation is handed over to "not good" statutes, laws that led not to righteousness and life but to defilement and death (20:25).¹² These "not good" statutes meant not only death for them but death for their firstborn sons, offered up in the fire to Molech.¹³ The end point of Israel's story is thus the utter reverse of the goal at the beginning. Israel, the Lord's "firstborn son" (Ex. 4:22), was to be freed from Egypt so that he could offer pure worship in the Promised Land (4:23). But through their rebellion the Israelites instead end up sacrificing their own firstborn sons in the pursuit of defiled worship, with the threat of inevitable exile hanging over them like a Damoclean sword.

To this threefold cycle of gracious election, rebellion, and limited judgment, a coda is added in Ezek. 20:27–29, briefly bringing the story up to date. Lest anyone should argue that Ezekiel is raking up old history long forgotten, he replies that the history of Israel's occupation of Canaan is similarly depressing. Their ongoing love affair with the high places and their defiled worship proves that they are under God's judgment, even in the sworn land of promise (20:28), down to this very day ('ad hayyôm hazzeh, the last words of 20:29). Today is, after all, Ezekiel's interest, as the repetition of the phrase in 20:31 makes clear. Israel's present is exactly the same as Israel's past: vile images, child sacrifice, and idolatry (20:31). Surely Israel is a rebellious house, not just in times past but in the present, as the Lord had made clear to Ezekiel in 2:3. Such people need not expect any reply to their attempts to inquire of the Lord (20:31).

But what should they expect from the Lord? The answer given in 20:32–44 may surprise us, though it is already implicit in the account Ezekiel has given of Israel's history. God will act, not to destroy his people utterly but rather to fulfill his original purposes in election: to establish a purified people to worship him (20:40–41). He will do this through a new exodus, not because of any merit on Israel's part but for the sake of his own name (20:44).

This answer, as we have said, is already implicit in Ezekiel's rendering of history. The reason for the focus on the generations around the Exodus rather than the generation of the patriarchs or those during the occupation of the land now becomes clear. There is an analogy to be drawn between the Exodus/desert generation and his own. The present position of the exilic generation in the six-part cycle of sin and judgment is (6): Israel's rebellion has led to a limited judgment on the Lord's part—specifically, the scattering among the nations, mentioned in 20:23. But as the three-generation cycle makes clear, (6) can never be the end of the story! God's people cannot be destroyed completely, not because they do not deserve it but because God has staked the reputation of his own name on the covenant promises made to them. He may and indeed does chastise them and judge them, but he can never abandon them utterly. His divine nature requires faithfulness to his promise, even in the face of unrelenting human sin (cf. Hos. 11:8–11).

Therefore, there must necessarily be a new act of salvation on God's part, a new exodus. Israel cannot be abandoned to "be like the nations, like the peoples of the world, who serve wood and stone," as the elders had thought (Ezek. 20:32)! Whether that thought is one of desire ("We want to be like the nations . . .")¹⁴ or of despair ("We are become like the nations . . .")¹⁵ is not really the issue; rather, the focus is on the impossibility of such a thing happening for God has staked his reputation on them (cf. 36:22–23).

Divine election cannot be revoked; the Lord will reign over them (Ezek. 20:33). The echoes of 1 Samuel 8 are not coincidental. There, too, the people had sought to become "such as all the other nations" by having a king (8:5), which is interpreted as a rejection of the Lord's reign over them (8:7). They are warned of the real consequences of their choice (8:11–18), yet ultimately their election is not revocable. They do not, indeed cannot, become like the nations around them: instead, even their rebellious wish for a monarchy is subsumed in the providence of God. The Lord himself gives them the kings of his own choosing, good and bad, to prepare the way for the coming of the King of kings.

Similarly, the message of God's kingship exercised in a new exodus is not necessarily good news. Yes, his reign comes with a mighty hand and outstretched arm, as in the first exodus (Deut. 4:34 and frequently); yes, he will bring them out of the nations and gather them just as he once brought them out of Egypt (Ezek. 20:34). But in addition, his reign comes with outpoured wrath. Just as the unfaithful Israelites were brought up out of Egypt only to die in the desert, so too the regathered Israel will be purged in the "desert of the nations" (20:35). There God will meet with his people "face to face," just as he met with Moses "face to face" in the tent of meeting (Ex. 33:11).

But this face-to-face meeting will not be that of two friends, as it was with Moses, but rather a meeting of personal judgment. The use of the Niphal of šāpaṭ underlines the legal nature of this encounter. ¹⁶ God will go to court against the rebels among his people, singling out the transgressors from the faithful just as a shepherd counts and separates his sheep by passing them one by one under his rod (Ezek. 20:37).

The application to the present generation comes in 20:39. The choice is, in one sense, theirs to make. They may go and serve their idols, if they wish. But they must remember this: that God's purpose in the election of Israel will stand. A time is coming when in place of the profane worship offered on every high hill and under every leafy tree there will be pure worship offered in the one true place, God's holy mountain, the high mountain of Israel (20:40).

This looks forward in seed form to the full description of the renewed Israel at worship on a high mountain in chapters 40–48. The positive result of the new exodus will be pure worship offered by a purified people, in whom the Lord's holiness is publicly displayed to the eyes of the nations. There the oath made in Egypt (20:5) will be fulfilled (20:42), and there the remnant who survived the desert judgment—not on merit but by grace—will appreciate the immensity of their own sin and the faithfulness of God to his covenant promises (20:44). The future for Israel depends entirely on God and his commitment to his Word. But those who refuse to trust God to fulfill his promises and instead have turned their backs on him will never enter the new Promised Land.

Bridging Contexts

Contemporary choices. In a world of disposable relationships, it is hard for us to grasp the meaning of a covenant bond. We live increasingly in a culture where people change spouses like former generations used to trade in their cars—whenever they start making noises we don't care for, or after three to five years, whichever comes sooner. As a culture, we tend to make and break friendships frequently, as we or our friends move on to new places or as we grow apart from one another. As a culture, we are inclined to abandon the older generation to nursing homes when they become too much of a burden to us. The idea of sticking with a long-term relationship through thick and thin is, if not yet utterly foreign to our experience, at least becoming a rarity. We are, after all, the consumer generation; we tend to view people as products—commodities to be used as long as they meet our needs and fulfill our desires, but always likely to become obsolete or superseded by a "new and improved" product.¹⁷

This attitude has filtered through into our understanding of religion. Thus, we do not have a lifetime commitment to one church or even to one denomination, but change our churches whenever we find one that better meets our needs. According to George Barna, in the near future "people will no longer have a single church home but multiple church homes. On any given Sunday they will wake up and choose a particular church which they feel will meet the needs they feel most keenly that morning."¹⁸

This attitude holds true not merely of one's choice of church but across religions as well. Perhaps as never before people are "choosing their religion," not on the basis of whether the religion is "true" or "false" but whether that particular religious perspective "works for them." In the marketplace of religious ideas, all perspectives are regarded as being equally valid; may the best marketer win!¹⁹

The one nonnegotiable in this process, from a contemporary perspective, is personal choice.²⁰ As the bumper sticker expounds it: "Attend the church or synagogue of your choice this week!" Which church or synagogue most fully expounds the truth about God is apparently not an issue; for many, it is not even a relevant question. The important factor is that this is the religion and church that you have chosen.

Not our choice but the Lord's. It is hard to imagine a viewpoint more radically different from that of Ezekiel 20. For Ezekiel, what is definitive is not Israel's choice but the Lord's choice. Israel in the past had frequently, even invariably, chosen wrongly. "Attending the church or synagogue of their choice" had led to worshiping idols in Egypt and the pagan gods and goddesses in the land of Canaan. Such idolatrous worship frequently had the marketing edge on true worship. People voted with their feet in favor of the false rather than the true. Yet even though the people were unfaithful, God remained faithful to his covenant promises and his own character. God could not walk away from Israel like a manufacturer who simply discontinues an unprofitable or defect-prone line and retools a product to meet the demand of changing times.

The one nonnegotiable for Ezekiel, therefore, is God's choice: Israel's "choice" only occurs in the context of their prior chosenness as the covenant community. They can choose to fulfill their calling, to be a blessing and so to receive life. Or they can choose to rebel against that calling, seeking to be free of that chosenness like the nations around them, and face the consequences. If they choose to be like the nations, by God himself (note the oath formula of 20:33) there will be hell to pay. God's judgment will certainly fall on those who choose the false worship over the true. The salvific event of a new exodus will bring nothing but judgment for them, just as the first exodus led to judgment in the desert for a whole generation. Yet, in spite of that, God's salvation purposes are unshakable: He will establish his chosen ones not in the "church of their choice" but in the holy mountain of his choosing, the new city of God (20:40).²¹

THE WORLD REVOLVES around God. John Corrie identifies the following trends as typical of postmodern culture:

It is a culture characterized by freedom of choice in which we are invited to "pick'n'mix" our own philosophy of life. Furthermore . . . it is hedonistic and materialistic; it generates a breakdown of respect for authority, confusion on moral absolutes and a fierce individualism which destroys community values. It is a culture in search of meaning, significance and purpose, since it breaks down any unified sense of reality, creating anonymity and atomization.²²

Ezekiel has some hard words for such a generation that has institutionalized and glorified rebellion under the banner of "choice." It summons a people who think that the world revolves around themselves to a Copernican change in their thought: We are called to accept the truth that the world rather revolves around God.

But what are the implications for us, who are called to proclaim the gospel in this culture? We need to remind people that what matters is not what we think about God but what he thinks of us.²³ I once met a woman who told me that she kept a Bible and literature from Mormons and Jehovah's Witnesses alongside her child's bed so that when he grew up he could choose for himself what to believe. Such a view is frequently regarded as highly enlightened in our day and age, where everything is tolerated except intolerance.²⁴ Ezekiel would not have been greatly surprised by such a view, for already in his day people sought to match the "enlightened attitudes" of those around them. He has another word for it than broad-mindedness, though: For him, it is rebellion against the one true and living God.

The true nature of rebellion. Rebellion is never simply against an abstract conception of God, however, but against the personal God of grace. Satan always seeks to persuade us, as he did our first parents, that God is a harsh taskmaster who will exploit us and abuse us if we allow him, and that he seeks to deny us things that are good (Gen. 3:1).²⁵ The reality is exactly the opposite, for them and for us. God had made a perfect world for Adam and Eve to live in and placed them in the most perfect spot within it, a paradise. Their area of personal freedom was large; the restriction minuscule. Yet being deceived into reading that minuscule restriction as bondage, they gave in to Satan's temptation, only to discover too late what true bondage was.

Similarly, God came to Israel in the midst of their miserable bondage and offered them the way to the total freedom of pure worship. He promised them not just any land but a beautiful land for their own (Ezek. 20:6). Only the very best would do for God's people. They, however, sought only half-freedom. They wanted freedom from the unpleasant circumstances of their sin and from its messy complications, but not freedom from the sin itself. They would rather keep their idols and perish in the desert than enter the Promised Land without them.

So also in our day many seek meaning, significance, and purpose—but only on their own terms. Spirituality is a growth market. We are surrounded by a generation of seekers, who assume that God can be found whenever and wherever they choose to seek him. For them, "seeking" is another word for "shopping." But, as the elders discovered, God is not a cosmic merchandiser, for whom "the customer is always right." It is possible, indeed inevitable, that the determinedly open-minded seeker will not find an answer from Israel's God.

A downward spiral. What is more, left to itself rebellion naturally heads into a downward spiral. From Adam to Cain is only one generation, but in that time we move from humankind having to be talked into sin by Satan (Gen. 3:1) to humankind unwilling to be talked out of sin by God (4:6–7). By the time we arrive at Lamech, seven generations from Adam, we have already reached the poetic glorification of gratuitous violence, a kind of primeval version of "gangsta rap" (4:23–24). Not even the cosmic judgment of the Flood can reverse the downward trend of sin.

So too for Israel. As the generations pass, Israel's idolatry goes from bad to worse, moving from idolatry in Egypt and disobedience to God's lifegiving law in the desert, to culminate in perverse obedience to laws and statutes that lead to death, even to the sacrifice of their firstborn children. What then shall we say of our own era, in which idolatry is not so much tolerated as celebrated? The cover of a New Age mail order catalog declares as their slogan, "Live fully; laugh often; love all ways; look within." The biblical command to love always (Eph. 5:2) is now enculturated as the injunction to "love all ways."

But at the same time as our society embraces a tolerance that freely encompasses even the intolerable, we also see the growth of death-giving statutes. The idea of euthanasia is finding growing acceptance in this country, as in many others around the world.²⁷ At present, it operates around the fringes of legality, but its supporters continue to press for legal recognition. We too have adopted our own form of child sacrifice, slaughtering countless unborn babies on the altars of the secular gods of convenience and comfort, of reputation and respectability.²⁸

We find ourselves today, then, perhaps more clearly than our parents did, in the midst of a society that is in headlong rebellion against God and is reaping the fruits of that rebellion in seared consciences and irrationally self-destructive behaviors. We live in the midst of a society of adults and children suffering the traumatic effects of broken relationships, in some cases ending up in alcohol and drug addiction as a means of deadening the pain of their deep sense of rejection and alienation. Others have buried themselves in their work and career, seeking some kind of significance for their lives. Thus far Ezekiel's words address us clearly.

Implications of rebellion for contemporary society. What, then, are the implications of Ezekiel 20 for such a generation? Two things come across clearly in this chapter. (1) On the one hand, rebellion will inevitably be punished. Israel can never simply choose to be like the nations and thus remove herself from God's authority. There are only two choices for Israel: She can choose to accept her election and live on the basis of God's laws, or she can rebel as she has so often before and face the consequences of certain death. Likewise, our generation needs people within the covenant community who are prophetically willing to call a spade a spade, to call sin sin, to speak of death and hell and the judgment to come. We need to confront the socially acceptable idols of comfort and success and career progress, which many in our churches attempt to combine with a commitment to Christ, as well as the more blatantly pagan idolatries.

We need to confront in our own hearts the continual temptation to remake our understanding of God into a comfortable reflection of our own image instead of submitting unreservedly to his self-revelation in Scripture. It is not a comfortable message to proclaim in an age that calls idols of wood and stone "different paths to God" and the high places "the church of your choice." But God has not changed and the reality of his wrath must be recognized. Otherwise, we are simply deceiving ourselves and those around us with lies about God.

(2) On the other hand, Ezekiel 20 should also fill Christians with profound optimism. For it asserts that, come hell or high water, with or without the help of his church, God's kingdom will come. His purposes in election are so sure that not even Israel's continual history of sin can thwart them. Though in the providence of God his first exodus did not bring to fruition his purpose of a pure, worshiping people, the second exodus will.

What, however, is this second exodus of which Ezekiel speaks? In some postexilic literature the return to Judah under Cyrus is portrayed as a second exodus, ²⁹ yet the tone of partial fulfillment predominates in these books. Those who participated in the return were well aware of how far short it fell of the extravagant language of the prophets. It is more of a first stage in the second exodus that the exodus itself. Not until Jesus comes proclaiming the good news of liberation does the exodus start in earnest (Luke 4:18–19). Yet, as Ezekiel makes clear, the goal of the second exodus, like that of the first exodus, is not simply liberation. This is the problem with much liberation theology. Though the exodus from Egypt is proclaimed as the paradigm, ³⁰ the goal of that exodus is lost from view. The people are redeemed and purified from Babylon and Egypt so that they can worship. The goal of exodus, indeed of all salvation, is a purified people worshiping the one true God.

Ezekiel describes that pure worship in typical Old Testament terms: sacrifices offered in a restored temple. But even though at the return to the land the temple was rebuilt and sacrifices were offered, something was still missing. The fulfillment of Ezekiel's worship, as for all Old Testament worship, is found in Jesus Christ, who affirmed to the woman of Samaria a new era of worship. In this new era, people will worship neither on Mount Gerizim nor in Jerusalem, nor even on Ezekiel's high mountain, but in spirit and in truth. With the coming of Jesus, as the mediator of the new covenant, the true "new age" of worship has dawned, the age of the worship of the redeemed community in the presence of God himself (Heb. 12:22–24).

Ezekiel 20:45–21:32

The word of the LORD came to me: ⁴⁶"Son of man, set your face toward the south; preach against the south and prophesy against the forest of the southland. ⁴⁷Say to the southern forest: 'Hear the word of the LORD. This is what the Sovereign LORD says: I am about to set fire to you, and it will consume all your trees, both green and dry. The blazing flame will not be quenched, and every face from south to north will be scorched by it. ⁴⁸Everyone will see that I the LORD have kindled it; it will not be quenched.'"

⁴⁹Then I said, "Ah, Sovereign LORD! They are saying of me, 'Isn't he just telling parables?'"

^{21:1}The word of the LORD came to me: ²"Son of man, set your face against Jerusalem and preach against the sanctuary. Prophesy against the land of Israel ³and say to her: 'This is what the LORD says: I am against you. I will draw my sword from its scabbard and cut off from you both the righteous and the wicked. ⁴Because I am going to cut off the righteous and the wicked, my sword will be unsheathed against everyone from south to north. ⁵Then all people will know that I the LORD have drawn my sword from its scabbard; it will not return again.'

6"Therefore groan, son of man! Groan before them with broken heart and bitter grief. ⁷And when they ask you, 'Why are you groaning?' you shall say, 'Because of the news that is coming. Every heart will melt and every hand go limp; every spirit will become faint and every knee become as weak as water.' It is coming! It will surely take place, declares the Sovereign LORD."

⁸The word of the LORD came to me: ⁹"Son of man, prophesy and say, 'This is what the Lord says:

" 'A sword, a sword, sharpened and polished— ¹⁰sharpened for the slaughter, polished to flash like lightning!

"'Shall we rejoice in the scepter of my son LJudah...? The sword despises every such stick.

11" 'The sword is appointed to be polished, to be grasped with the hand; it is sharpened and polished, made ready for the hand of the slayer.
12Cry out and wail, son of man, for it is against my people; it is against all the princes of Israel.
They are thrown to the sword along with my people.
Therefore beat your breast.

13" 'Testing will surely come. And what if the scepter Lof Judah, which the sword despises, does not continue? declares the Sovereign LORD.'

14"So then, son of man, prophesy and strike your hands together.
Let the sword strike twice, even three times.
It is a sword for slaughter—

a sword for great slaughter, closing in on them from every side.

15So that hearts may melt and the fallen be many,
I have stationed the sword for slaughter at all their gates.

Oh! It is made to flash like lightning, it is grasped for slaughter.

16O sword, slash to the right, then to the left, wherever your blade is turned.

17I too will strike my hands together, and my wrath will subside.

I the LORD have spoken."

¹⁸The word of the LORD came to me: ¹⁹"Son of man, mark out two roads for the sword of the king of Babylon to take, both starting from the same country. Make a signpost where the road branches off to the city. ²⁰Mark out one road for the sword to come against Rabbah of the Ammonites and another against Judah and fortified Jerusalem. ²¹For the king of Babylon will stop at the fork in the road, at the junction of the two roads, to seek an omen: He will cast lots with arrows, he will consult his idols, he will examine the liver. ²²Into his right hand will come the lot for Jerusalem, where he is to set up battering rams, to give the command to slaughter, to sound the battle cry, to set battering rams against the gates, to build a ramp and to erect siege works. ²³It will seem like a false omen to those who have sworn allegiance to him, but he will remind them of their guilt and take them captive.

24"Therefore this is what the Sovereign LORD says: 'Because you people have brought to mind your guilt by your open rebellion, revealing your sins in all that you do—because you have done this, you will be taken captive.

²⁵" 'O profane and wicked prince of Israel, whose day has come, whose time of punishment has reached its climax, ²⁶this is what the Sovereign LORD says: Take off the turban, remove the crown.

It will not be as it was: The lowly will be exalted and the exalted will be brought low. ²⁷A ruin! A ruin! I will make it a ruin! It will not be restored until he comes to whom it rightfully belongs; to him I will give it.'

²⁸"And you, son of man, prophesy and say, 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says about the Ammonites and their insults:

"'A sword, a sword, drawn for the slaughter, polished to consume and to flash like lightning!

29 Despite false visions concerning you and lying divinations about you, it will be laid on the necks of the wicked who are to be slain, whose day has come, whose time of punishment has reached its climax.

³⁰Return the sword to its scabbard. In the place where you were created, in the land of your ancestry, I will judge you.

31 I will pour out my wrath upon you and breathe out my fiery anger against you;
 I will hand you over to brutal men, men skilled in destruction.

32You will be fuel for the fire, your blood will be shed in your land, you will be remembered no more; for I the LORD have spoken."

Original Meaning

This section of Ezekiel's prophecy, all one chapter in the Hebrew versification, divides up into four subsections:

- (1) A parable and its interpretation (20:45–21:7)
- (2) The song of the sword (21:8–17)
- (3) An oracle of judgment against Jerusalem and her prince (21:18–27)
- (4) An oracle of judgment against Ammon and against the sword (21:28–32)

The common theme that binds these sections together is the catchword "sword" as an image of God's judgment, which together with the associated image of fire, falls first on God's people, then on the not-so-innocent bystanders, and finally on the agent of judgment, the Babylonians.

The passage begins with the command to Ezekiel to face toward the south of Israel and preach against it (20:46); fire is coming on the southern forest, which will consume every tree, "both green and dry" (20:47). The conflagration will consume the entire land from south to north and scorch the faces of all who are present. It will be publicly recognized as the work of the Lord and will not be extinguished (20:48). But the people's response to this message is apparently total lack of comprehension: They say of Ezekiel, "Isn't he just telling parables?" (20:49).

Like all parables, this one both conceals and reveals. Some things are immediately clear from the parable, for it concerns an all-consuming judgment of the Lord. The judgment is all-consuming in its content, both green tree (i.e., not normally suitable for burning) and dry (i.e., naturally fit for the fire); in its geographical scope (from the south northwards); and in its temporal scope (it has been kindled and will not be extinguished). Yet the precise focus of the parable is not immediately clear: Who is the "southern forest" (20:47)? Without that critical piece of information, the parable remains an obscure riddle.

That information is supplied in the interpretation that follows: The three Hebrew terms for "south" in the parable ($t\hat{e}m\bar{a}n; d\bar{a}r\hat{o}m; negeb$) are matched by three objects of judgment: Jerusalem, the sanctuary,² and the land of Israel (21:2). With that identification in place, other elements of the parable are put into sharper focus. Israel is the southland from the perspective of the traditional "enemy from the north," a motif introduced already in 1:4. The image of fire is linked with that of the sword of the Lord, which is coming against the land to cut off both righteous (the green tree) and wicked (the dry tree), from the south to the north of the land. The sword has been drawn from its scabbard and will not return there.

The focus of the interpretation, like that of the parable, is the all-encompassing nature of the coming judgment. "Righteous" and "wicked," like "green tree" and "dry tree," operate together as a merism, a pair of opposites that includes everything in between. These two are not, however, a randomly chosen pair, which could be replaced by another stock pairing such as "young" and "old." If the judgment includes even the righteous, whom one would expect normally to be spared (9:4), then indeed no one will escape. The coming judgment on Jerusalem will not be selective and short-lived, as was the invasion of 597 B.C., but all-encompassing and all-consuming. Nor is there any hope of a reprieve: The fire is kindled; the sword is drawn; there is only the fearful expectation of judgment.

To underline that fearful certainty, Ezekiel is instructed to perform a signact of publicly sighing and groaning with a broken spirit (21:6). When people ask him why he is sighing, he is to respond with a somewhat cryptic statement: "Because of the news that is coming. Every heart will melt and every hand go limp; every spirit will become faint and every knee become as weak as water" (21:7). What event has come that merits such a response? Ezekiel's hearers would have to think back to Ezekiel 7, where the final judgment was threatened in virtually identical language. The threatened judgment is now a present reality.

The prophet then receives a poetic oracle concerning the sword.⁶ The twin judgment images of cutting (the sword) and burning (the fire) are maintained in the twin actions of sharpening and burnishing (note the connection between polishing and lightning in 21:10, 15). Together, these actions serve to prepare the weapon for action. Once prepared, the sword is handed over to the executioner to use against God's people and the princes of Israel. Ezekiel is to strike his hands together in a threatening gesture,⁷ not once or twice but three times, symbolizing the totality of the judgment (21:14). Israel will be surrounded, hemmed in on all sides with no place to run and no place to hide (21:14–16). The prophet's threatening gesture is merely a public display of the Lord's own threatening gesture and determination to satisfy his wrath⁸ in his decimation of the people.

Thus far "the sword" of the Lord has been an entirely figurative image of divine judgment. In 21:18–27, however, we are introduced to the human agency that executes the divine will, the sword of the king of Babylon. The prophet is instructed to perform another sign-act, this time marking out a three-way road junction with a signpost. One way comes from Babylon; the other two go to Rabbah, the capital of the Ammonites, and to Jerusalem, the capital of Judah. Ezekiel is to act out the forces of the king of Babylon coming to this parting of the ways and deciding which route to follow. To which of those two rebellious cities should they go?

Ezekiel pictures the king utilizing all the pagan means of decision-making: drawing arrows from a quiver (somewhat akin to our practice of drawing straws), consulting the household gods, and examining the liver of a sacrificial animal (Ezek. 21:21). These three means belong properly to different cultural contexts: divination by arrows was typically Arabian (though see 2 Kings 13:15–19), consulting household gods was known in an Israelite context (Hos. 3:4), while the examination of livers was a Babylonian specialty. It may be that Nebuchadnezzar actually used such diverse practices; however, given the prominence of the number three as representative of completeness in this section, it is perhaps more likely that the multiplication of oracles represents comprehensive consultation of the gods. Where three separate oracles agree on a single course of action, is not divine approval sure?

The irony is that this use of pagan means of discerning the will of the gods is here an accurate discernment of the will of the true God. The "lying divinations" that had found such favor with God's people (Ezek. 13:7) now become the very means through which judgment comes on them (21:23). Their broken oath to the Lord is punished by the one with whom they have broken a human covenant. In this way, the king of Babylon is acting as divine prosecution counsel (mazkîr)," bringing out into the open Israel's guilt and arresting them for it. As in a court of law, the point is not so much that the guilty party is "reminded" of their sins, as the NIV suggests, but rather that they are made public and therefore subject to the punishment they deserve (21:24).

That punishment falls not only on the people but also upon Zedekiah, rather dismissively addressed as "O profane and wicked prince." By introducing him by that title rather than by name, Ezekiel puts the focus of the judgment on the office, not the person.¹³ It is not simply that Zedekiah will be stripped of the insignia of royalty, the turban and the crown (21:26), but that in him the old order of things has reached a conclusion. A divine reordering of society is called for, in which the Lord will exalt the lowly and bring down the exalted (21:26; cf. 17:24).¹⁴ His guilt (' ^awōn) is complete; so, with a fittingness that the Hebrew pun brings out, he will be made completely a "ruin" ('awwâ, repeated three times).

This ruinous state will persist until the coming of him to whom judgment (mišpāṭ) belongs, to whom it has been assigned by the Lord. In traditional exegesis, this has been seen as a reference to the coming of the Messiah, the one to whom the "right" (mišpāṭ) of kingship belongs. However, since in Ezek. 23:24b nātattî mišpāṭ refers to the Lord's handing over judgment to the Babylonians, the traditional exegesis seems unlikely. Rather, it seems that Ezekiel has reshaped the traditional messianic oracle of Genesis 49:10 into a threatening oracle of judgment. Now the scepter will not depart from Judah until the coming of the judge . . . Nebuchadnezzar!

Yet precisely this method of framing the judgment oracle reminds us of the Judge behind the judge, the Coming One behind the coming one. Heathen Nebuchadnezzar may be God's chosen instrument of judgment in Ezekiel 21, just as heathen Cyrus may be God's "anointed," his chosen instrument of salvation, in Isaiah 45. Yet the dominant reality in both cases is the plan and purpose of God. God's promise to Judah in Genesis 49 is not retracted in Ezekiel 21, though it may be reshaped because of the sin of God's people. The departure of the scepter may be necessary and appropriate because of the history of sin of the "princes of Israel," which culminates in Zedekiah; yet its departure can only be temporary, because the defining reality is God's election, not humanity's sin.

Judgment is not limited to Judah, however. The (pagan) oracle that directed Nebuchadnezzar toward Jerusalem is more a stay of execution for Ammon than a reprieve. They too, like Zedekiah, are among the profane wicked whose time of punishment has come (cf. 21:29 with 21:25). Therefore they too will feel the cutting edge of the sword of God's judgment. As the initial parable made clear, God's judgment is comprehensive in scope. Indeed, that judgment will eventually include the sword itself. The sword that was drawn from the Lord's scabbard, "not [to] return again" in 21:5, will at last be returned to its sheath in 21:30. There, in the place where it was created, it will be judged (21:30).

Babylon is neither above God nor independent of God in its furious power. Rather, it is merely his creation, a tool to be taken up and used for his purposes and then put down when its usefulness is over. What the Lord has lifted up, the Lord can also reduce once more to nothing. In that way it will become clear that it is the Lord who has raised her up and put her down, not any supposed power of her own gods.

Bridging Contexts

FIRE AND SWORD. The images of fire and sword for God's judgment have a venerable history. They come together already in Genesis 3:24, where the cherubim assigned to guard the entrance to Eden are accompanied by a flaming sword. The flashing sword is God's instrument of judgment on his enemies in Deuteronomy 32:41; his sword is poised against Assyria (Isa. 31:8) and Edom (34:5–6), and the angel of the Lord appears to Joshua with a drawn sword before the battle of Jericho (Josh. 5:13).

But the Lord can fight against his people as well as for them. In 1 Chronicles 21:16 the angel is poised with drawn sword over Jerusalem rather than an enemy city, while Jeremiah prophesies the coming of the sword of the Lord against the whole land from one end to the other (Jer. 12:12). Equally, the Lord's fire continually threatens his unholy people: It burns up those who rebel against him in the desert (Num. 11:1; 16:35) and hangs over the head of their unholy descendants (Jer. 15:14; 17:4).

In no instance, however, is either the sword or fire an entity with a mind of its own. Even when they are figurative representations of human agencies of destruction, they operate entirely within the realm of God's sovereignty as agents of his judgment. He kindles the fire and brings the sword down on his enemies in his wrath. Nor is that simply an Old Testament concept of God. In fact, Jesus describes his ministry on earth in precisely those terms. He came not "to bring peace to the earth . . . but a sword" (Matt. 10:34). In the parallel passage in Luke's Gospel, the sword is replaced by fire as Jesus exclaims: "I have come to bring fire on the earth, and how I wish it were already kindled!" (Luke 12:49). His mission is one of executing God's judgment on earth.

This indeed was what the Old Testament prophesied: Malachi spoke of the appearance of the Lord like a refiner's fire or launderer's soap (Mal. 3:1–2). But if Jesus has come to bring about judgment, how can any survive? Will his judgment not be as comprehensive as that which Ezekiel described, leading to the total destruction of all flesh?

Surviving the refiner's fire. How can the refiner's fire of God's wrath pass over us and not burn us alive? The answer is because it has already passed over Jesus and poured its heat out on him. How can the avenging sword of the Lord pass by us without destroying us? Because it was sheathed in the body of Jesus on the cross so that it cannot further harm his people. God has raised his sword of judgment and brought it down on the shepherd in place of the sheep (Zech. 13:7). His death in our place makes it possible for us to come close to the avenging God of justice and not be destroyed by him. Through Jesus, a safe way has been made for us to approach God, whereby the fire of God's wrath is transformed into the refiner's fire, which purifies and tests but does not destroy (13:9). Because of him, we may return to God and find him coming near to us also.

That is not to say that we do not experience the testing work of God's fire as believers. We do. The quality of all of our work will be tested by that medium, which will expose its true nature (1 Cor. 3:13). If we have built with lasting materials upon the only foundation of our lives as Christians, the finished work of Christ, there will be rewards stored up for us. But if we have built only with shoddy, temporary materials, all that we have labored for on earth will be destroyed. The prospect of the fire to come is a sobering challenge to the believer to examine whether he or she is building suitably for the test. Yet even that believer who has built the least-enduring structure on the foundation of Christ will not be destroyed by the testing fire (1 Cor. 3:15). Though his or her work may count for nothing, he or she will still be saved because the destructive power of the fire has all been absorbed by Jesus.

But that safety is only for those for whom Christ died. Those outside Christ are left exposed to the full weight of the crushing, piercing, burning wrath of God. The fire of God's anger against sin has not been extinguished, nor has the sword of his wrath been blunted. There are no innocent bystanders; none will excuse their actions by reference to God's sovereignty. A day is established for God's final and complete judgment of all flesh, when Jesus Christ will ride forth to battle with a sharp sword, treading the winepress of the fury of God's wrath (Rev. 19:15). He will make war on all the forces that oppose God and anyone whose name has not been written in the book of life will be thrown into the lake of fire (20:14–15).

Imagery and propositional statements. The Bible is a book filled with images and imagery. God delivers his message not in the cold tones of propositional statements (although we may certainly deduce from the Bible propositions about who God is and what he is like) but in a welter of pictures. Supremely, his self-communication takes the form of the visible enactments of the prophets and most particularly of the final prophet, Jesus Christ, the Word become flesh.

Ironically, however, much expository preaching, which seeks to faithfully deliver the message of the Bible, begins by abstracting the proposition (the so-called "big idea of the passage") from its surrounding imagery. That imagery is then tossed away like so much used wrapping paper, while the "big idea" is repackaged in an entirely new format for its delivery to the contemporary congregation. Could that be one reason why people find so much of our preaching boring? We have lost the vivid directness of the fire-filled Word of God, replacing it by the cool logical flow of classical rhetoric. If we wish to regain the power of the original proclamation, we would do well to consider more fully how we can deliver messages about fires that burn and words about the sword that cut to the heart.¹⁹

THE QUESTION OF JUSTICE. One of the biggest questions in contemporary society is the question of justice. Where is the God of justice in our modern world? When children are gunned down on our streets in drive-by shootings, what is God doing about it? Where is God in Bosnia and Rwanda, in the midst of ethnic cleansing and tribal genocide? Deep in their hearts, people are outraged by the lack of justice in this world. Instinctively, they long for justice to reign and have an innate desire to see strong action against the wicked, with right triumphing and evil defeated. Isn't that why virtually every politician is on the side of law and order? Isn't that why there is a whole genre of popular vigilante movies, in which a strong individual establishes justice and peace by shooting, stabbing, or otherwise disposing of a formidable array of bad guys?

But if a standard of complete justice were actually to be imposed, each of us would face a very real problem: The justice for which we say we long would condemn each one of us as transgressors. Far from saving us, Superman would be implacably opposed to our way of life. All would stand condemned and guilty; all would face the fearful prospect of immediate and complete reckoning, with the Man of Steel dedicated to putting us out of circulation.

Imagine yourself as the villain rather than as the innocent bystander in the vigilante movie, and you begin to understand the horror of Judah's situation. They stood condemned as guilty, and now the prophet declared the onset of immediate and complete judgment at the hands of the king of Babylon, Nebuchadnezzar. Nor was it simply the might of Babylon that was dedicated to crushing the life out of them. The sword of the Lord himself was raised against them; the fire of his wrath had been kindled and would not be extinguished. What a fearful prospect! This is Jerusalem's Nightmare on Elm Street, with the Lord himself playing the part of Freddy Krueger.

The fire of eternal punishment. Yet is the situation of modern men and women who are without Christ any more secure? Not at all! Unless they hear the gospel and trust in the death of Christ on the cross, turning from their sins, they face the eternal prospect of the fire and the sword, God's wrath poured out on them. They are, to use the language of Jonathan Edwards, "sinners in the hands of an angry God," suspended over the pit of eternity by a narrow thread of life, in perpetual danger of falling to eternal destruction.

The destruction of Jerusalem in 586 B.C. was terribly comprehensive when God handed over judgment to the sword of Babylon. However, it was merely a sideshow when compared to the comprehensive judgment of the world that awaits the coming of the one to whom judgment belongs. God's wrath is aroused at the rebellious thoughts, deeds, and words of those whom he has created. When the Judge of all the earth comes to settle final accounts, the sword will fall on uncleansed sinners, to their eternal doom.

The doctrine of eternal torment in hell is not popular these days. In fact, it probably never has been, even in the heyday of Puritan preaching. In the modern world in particular, however, it is rarely the topic of sermons. Far more often, it is the subject of attempts to present the biblical teaching in a kinder, gentler light. As John Gerstner so aptly put it: "Modern theology has tended to take either the pain out of eternity or the eternity out of pain." Like the erstwhile inhabitants of Jerusalem, we are convinced that the Judge will choose the other road and we will be spared. We don't really believe that the Bible's teaching on eternal punishment should be taken literally, at least not with reference to ourselves. But it is precisely with reference to ourselves that we should consider this doctrine. As C. S. Lewis reminds us:

In all our discussions of Hell we should keep steadily before our eyes the possible damnation, not of our enemies nor of our friends (since both these disturb the reason) but of ourselves. This [doctrine] is not about your wife or son, nor about Nero or Judas Iscariot; it is about you and me.²¹

The fire of purification. What then are we to do? Is there any hope that we can survive his coming? Is there any future for you and me? The answer, incredibly, is yes. Yes! The fire will descend with purifying power as well as destructive force. Yes, the sword will cut away impurity as well as cut off the impure. A remnant, a purified remnant, will emerge, refined like gold and silver, ready to serve the Lord in righteousness.

So what is the answer to the problem of evil and injustice in this world? On one level, there is no answer. God does not give us information simply to satisfy our philosophical questions. What he does do is to bring the question home personally to each person: What is the answer to your evil and lack of justice? The Christian's answer is to point to the cross: there, once and for all time, the eternal wrath of God that I deserved was poured out completely on Jesus Christ, God's only Son. In that act is God's final answer to the problem of my evil: The Son of God was bruised for my transgression and broken for my iniquity. Because of that death, and only because of that death, I can look forward without fear to the coming again of the heavenly Judge to judge all nations of the earth with righteousness and truth.

But lack of fear of the coming of the fire and the sword does not mean that we can sit back and relax. Our works will be tested by fire as believers, and much of what we spend our time on is far from fireproof. We fill our lives with the trivial, passing our time instead of spending it, living alongside people aimlessly instead of living with them purposefully. Even those closest to us may hardly ever be affected by the ideas that we claim are closest to our hearts. Instead of burning out for God, we are heaping up empty actions for God's grand bonfire. From the perspective of eternity, how wasted will so much of our lives seem to have been?

The word of the LORD came to me: ²"Son of man, will you judge her? Will you judge this city of bloodshed? Then confront her with all her detestable practices ³and say: 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says: O city that brings on herself doom by shedding blood in her midst and defiles herself by making idols, ⁴you have become guilty because of the blood you have shed and have become defiled by the idols you have made. You have brought your days to a close, and the end of your years has come. Therefore I will make you an object of scorn to the nations and a laughingstock to all the countries. ⁵Those who are near and those who are far away will mock you, O infamous city, full of turmoil.

6" 'See how each of the princes of Israel who are in you uses his power to shed blood. ⁷In you they have treated father and mother with contempt; in you they have oppressed the alien and mistreated the fatherless and the widow. ⁸You have despised my holy things and desecrated my Sabbaths. 9In you are slanderous men bent on shedding blood; in you are those who eat at the mountain shrines and commit lewd acts. ¹⁰In you are those who dishonor their fathers' bed; in you are those who violate women during their period, when they are ceremonially unclean. ¹¹In you one man commits a detestable offense with his neighbor's wife, another shamefully defiles his daughter-in-law, and another violates his sister, his own father's daughter. ¹²In you men accept bribes to shed blood; you take usury and excessive interest and make unjust gain from your neighbors by extortion. And you have forgotten me, declares the Sovereign LORD.

13" 'I will surely strike my hands together at the unjust gain you have made and at the blood you have shed in your midst. ¹⁴Will your courage endure or your hands be strong in the day I deal with you? I the LORD have spoken, and I will do it. ¹⁵I will disperse you among the nations and scatter you through the countries; and I will put an end to your uncleanness. ¹⁶When you have been defiled in the eyes of the nations, you will know that I am the LORD.'" of man, the house of Israel has become dross to me; all of them are the copper, tin, iron and lead left inside a furnace. They are but the dross of silver.

19 Therefore this is what the Sovereign LORD says: 'Because you have all become dross, I will gather you into Jerusalem.

20 As men gather silver, copper, iron, lead and tin into a furnace to melt it with a fiery blast, so will I gather you in my anger and my wrath and put you inside the city and melt you.

21 I will gather you and I will blow on you with my fiery wrath, and you will be melted inside her.

22 As silver is melted in a furnace, so you will be melted inside her, and you will know that I the LORD have poured out my wrath upon you.'"

²³Again the word of the LORD came to me:

²⁵There is a conspiracy of her princes within her like a roaring lion tearing its prey; they devour people, take treasures and precious things and make many widows within her. ²⁶Her priests do violence to my law and profane my holy things; they do not distinguish between the holy and the common; they teach that there is no difference between the unclean and the clean; and they shut their eyes to the keeping of my Sabbaths, so that I am profaned among them. ²⁷Her officials within her are like wolves tearing their prey; they shed blood and kill people to make unjust gain. ²⁸Her prophets whitewash these deeds for them by false visions and lying divinations. They say, 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says'—when the LORD has not spoken. ²⁹The people of the land practice extortion and commit robbery; they oppress the poor and needy and mistreat the alien, denying them justice.

³⁰"I looked for a man among them who would build up the wall and stand before me in the gap on behalf of the land so I would not have to destroy it, but I found none. ³¹So I will pour out my wrath on them and consume them with my fiery anger, bringing down on their own heads all they have done, declares the Sovereign LORD."

Original Meaning

THE IDEA OF comprehensive judgment descending on God's people was already present in Ezekiel 21, but in chapter 22 it moves into the foreground. In this chapter, the prophet is called on to act as prosecuting counsel, making known to Jerusalem in detail her detestable ways, which form the basis for both the actuality and the immediacy of divine judgment. The comprehensive nature of her sins means that judgment is necessary and judgment is now.

The prophet begins by presenting his indictment in outline form (22:3–5): Jerusalem's sins involve both social sins—that is, sins against humanity (e.g., "shedding blood," 22:3)—and cultic sins—that is, sins against God (e.g., the manufacture of idols, 22:3). These two broad classes of sins have resulted in two respective consequences: social sins lead to "guilt" ('āšam, 22:4), the forensic state of deserving punishment, while cultic sins lead to "defilement" (tāmē', 22:4), the ritual state of being unfit to appear in the presence of God. The combination of these in Jerusalem's case means that she has brought on herself her "doom," or more literally, "her time" ('ittāh, 22:3); her days have come to a close, and the end of her years have come (v. 4).

Like a virus in the bloodstream, Jerusalem's defilement and guilt have built up to the point where they now initiate a life-threatening crisis. Now the hour of her judgment has struck. The result of that judgment will make Jerusalem into an "object of scorn" to the nations around her. Both those near at hand and those far away will mock her as being an "infamous city" (22:5), that is, famous for her cultic and social sins, which have led to her downfall.

Verses 6–12 give the first catalogue of Jerusalem's crimes, showing how she has offended against God's law. The charges are directed against the "princes of Israel," a phrase normally understood as designating the former kings of Judah. Thus in view are not merely present sins but a continuing history of sin on the part of Judah's leadership.² The kings are specifically indicted because it was their responsibility to establish justice in the community, especially by protecting the poor and weak (Ps. 72:1–4).

The sins listed here are not a random collection of charges, but specifically an accusation of having violated the laws of the Pentateuch, especially those of the so-called "Holiness Code" of Leviticus 18–20; 25.3 Thus in Ezekiel 22:7, the accusation that "they have treated father and mother with contempt" has a basis in Leviticus 20:9, while the claim that they oppressed the alien is based on Leviticus 19:33. The same is true of the remainder of the charges made by the prophet: "despis[ing] my holy things and desecrat[ing] my Sabbaths" (see 19:30), slandering (see 19:16), eating "at the mountain shrines" (see 19:26, LXX), "commit[ting] lewd acts" (see 20:14), "dishonor[ing] their fathers' bed" (see 20:11), "violat[ing] women during their period" (see 18:19), "commit[ting] a detestable offense with [one's] neighbor's wife" (see 20:10), "defil[ing one's] daughter-in-law" (see 20:12), "violat[ing one's] sister" (see 20:17), "tak[ing] usury and excessive interest" (see 25:36), and "mak[ing] unjust gain from your neighbors" (see 19:13).

Though the charges themselves are largely drawn from the Holiness Code, the specific turn of phrase is in many places influenced by Deuteronomy, for instance, in the final concluding phrase: "You have forgotten me" (Ezek. 22:12; cf. Deut. 8:14, 19). The end result, then, is a comprehensive indictment of the former rulers of Judah on the basis of the law of Moses; the covenant bond forged on Mount Sinai has been broken.⁵ The "holy nation" (Ex. 19:6) has become thoroughly unholy.

Such a comprehensive catalogue of sins can have only one outcome. As Deuteronomy 8:19 makes clear: "If you ever forget the LORD your God . . . you will surely be destroyed." So the next two sections (Ezek. 22:13–16, 17–22) deal with the Lord's response to his people's sin under the twin images of judgment by scattering and judgment by gathering. The literary device of using two diametrically opposite images together underscores once again the comprehensive nature of Judah's doom.

Verse 13 acts as the link between the accusation and the threat of punishment, summarizing the accusation by putting together the last charge ("unjust gain") with the first ("blood you have shed in your midst," cf. v. 3) in a reversed arrangement to form a chiasm. Because of these things the Lord will now act, dispersing Judah among the nations and scattering them through the countries (22:15). In this way, the Lord will bring an end to Judah's uncleanness (22:15). Though such a fate for the Lord's people would be "defiling" to the Lord6 in front of the nations, it was a necessary price to pay. As Leslie Allen puts it, the Lord's defilement through Judah's exile "was the lesser of two evils that he was prepared to endure as the price to pay for making his forgetful people remember who and what he was."

But this scattering is not the only dimension of judgment threatened. Paradoxically, there appears also a "gathering for judgment," as the house of Israel is gathered into Jerusalem, into the heart of the smelter's furnace, to experience the destructive impact of the full outpouring of the Lord's wrath (22:18–22). This is paradoxical not merely because "gathering" is the logical opposite of "scattering," but also because the terminology of gathering is elsewhere normally used in a positive sense.

The conventional use of the imagery envisages first a scattering of God's people in his wrath and then, after the judgment has had a purifying effect, a gathering of God's people in his mercy. For instance, in 11:17 the Sovereign Lord promises to gather his people from the countries where they have been scattered.⁸ Although he frequently uses "gathering" in this conventional, positive sense, Ezekiel has already indicated a possible negative aspect of gathering as a precondition for judgment rather than salvation in 20:34.

Here in chapter 22, however, it functions together with its opposite "scattering" to underline the comprehensive nature of the coming judgment.

Nor is this the only conventionally positive theme given a negative twist in Ezekiel 22. The image of judgment as the refiner's fire, purifying the dross to leave only the pure metal, appears several times in the Bible (notably in Isa. 1:21–31; 48:10; Mal. 3:2–3). But in Ezekiel 22, as in Jeremiah 6:27–30, the refining process has a purely negative product, with nothing but unpurged molten dross produced. The purpose of this divine act of judgment, then, is not to purify his people, but merely to pour out on rebellious sinners his fiery wrath.

This outpouring of God's wrath has not yet happened to Judah, notwithstanding the disasters of 605 and 597 B.C. She remains "a land not cleansed or showered in the day of wrath" (Ezek. 22:24). Most commentators understand this as the removal of the covenant blessing of rain, an idea that is certainly common in the Old Testament (e.g., Lev. 26:19). However, in context the "day of wrath" is a future event, so the absence of rain must refer to the absence of an element of judgment. The concept of rain on the land as an element of judgment is present in the Flood narrative (Gen. 7:4, 11), and the expectation of a future destructive flood is reflected in Ezekiel 13:11 and 38:22. It may therefore be better to understand 22:24 as the absence of a cleansing deluge, like the great Flood, which would have purged the land of evildoers in one great day of destruction. Because of this lack of cleansing in the past, the land remains full of oppression, detailed in the following verses, which will lead to a final pouring out of indignation on the people (22:31).

If the first catalogue of the sins of Jerusalem was detailed with reference to the law (esp. Lev. 18–20; 25), the second catalogue of Jerusalem's sins is detailed with reference to one of the prophets, namely, Zephaniah 3:3–4. Though Zephaniah's four categories of leaders charged with wrongdoing (officials, rulers, prophets, and priests) are expanded to five (princes, priests, officials, prophets, and people of the land), the underlying continuity between the charges is clear: All of the leadership classes in Judah are charged and found guilty of wrongdoing.

The "princes," described as being like "a roaring lion," have wreaked havor through a series of social sins (Ezek. 22:25). In effect, they preenacted the societal devastation that the Babylonians would bring to full measure when they destroyed Jerusalem.¹³

The "officials," described as "wolves," have likewise misused their power for the purpose of "unjust gain" (22:27).

Even the "priests," who elsewhere in Ezekiel are not singled out for any blame, except in the explicit reversal of this charge in Ezek. 44:23–24, did "violence to my law and profane my holy things" (22:26). They have failed in their task of protecting Yahweh's holy things by not teaching the proper distinction between holy and unholy, clean and unclean. The unusual phrase "they shut their eyes to the keeping of my Sabbaths" seems to indicate the priests' failure to prosecute those who transgressed the law (cf. a similar phrase in Lev. 20:4).

Meanwhile the "prophets" are condemned in terms similar to Ezekiel 13 as unreliable whitewashers, telling people what they wanted to hear in the Lord's name, when he had not sent them (22:28).

The "people of the land," who in this context should be identified as a group of powerful men in Jerusalem with close ties to the Davidic house,¹⁴ have also been taking advantage of their position. They have been exploiting those unable to defend themselves: "the poor and needy and . . . the alien" (22:29).

After the conclusion of the second catalogue of sins, we again read of the Lord's twofold response. He first of all sought for "a man among them who would build up the wall and stand before me in the gap on behalf of the land" (22:30). In other words, he sought a true prophet (cf. 13:5)—someone who would take on the difficult and dangerous task of interceding for the people, just as Moses did successfully after the incident of the golden calf (Ps. 106:23). But this time no one was found to deflect God's wrath, and thus the all-consuming fiery anger of God will descend on Jerusalem (Ezek. 22:31). As if to emphasize the connection to the destruction of Jerusalem depicted in chapters 9–11, the last, ominous words of the Lord are the same in both cases: "[I will bring] down on their own heads all they have done" (22:31; cf. 11:21).

Bridging Contexts

JERUSALEM AS SPIRITUAL CENTER. Few contemporary readers are aware of the unique place that Jerusalem occupied in preexilic Israel. She was not merely the ancient equivalent of London or Washington, D.C., the seat of government and power; she was the spiritual center of God's people, the one place in all the earth where God had chosen to place his name. Thus in Psalm 48 the praise of God and the praise of Zion go hand in hand. Jerusalem is "the city of our God," Mount Zion is "his holy mountain," the unique place of God's presence (Ps. 48:1, 3).

To describe its significance the psalmist borrows the language of Canaanite mythology: It is exalted above the other mountains, like the uttermost heights of Mount Zaphon, the supposed home of the Canaanite pantheon.¹⁵ It was the very center of the earth, both geographically and theologically (Ezek. 5:5).¹⁶ Of course, Jerusalem gained that spiritual significance from its role as the home of the temple built by Solomon, on which the Lord had promised to set his name (1 Kings 9:3). But the city itself stood within the aura of holiness created by the temple, so that her walls and towers became objects of spiritual meditation (Ps. 48:12–13) and she herself was a place of pilgrimage and a subject of prayer (Ps. 122).

But as a consequence of that unique significance, Jerusalem was also required to be a place of radical holiness. As the psalmist says: "Who may ascend the hill of the LORD? Who may stand in his holy place?" (Ps. 24:3; cf. Ps. 15). The laws governing the entrance ways into the temple and the offering of the sacrifices were designed to prevent the intrusion of the profane into the place of the sacred. The accusation of Ezekiel 22 was that the barriers against the profane had comprehensively broken down. The entirely "holy city" had become the entirely "unholy city." The very heart of Judah, geographically and theologically, had become corrupted by sin. In place of the assertion of the psalmist "God is within her," from which followed the assurance "she will not fall" (Ps. 46:5), Ezekiel charged, with the repeated use of the catchwords $d\bar{a}m$ ("blood[shed]") and $b^et\bar{o}k\bar{e}k$ ("in your midst"), that "you have shed [blood] in your midst" (Ezek. 22:13), from which followed the certainty that God's wrath would fall. There could be no escape for the radically polluted "city of God."

The contaminating nature of blood in ancient Israel. The other aspect of Ezekiel 22 that will not be readily recognized by contemporary readers is the specially contaminating nature of blood in ancient Israel. To be sure, the idea of bloodstained hands being repellent is familiar to us. We need only think of Shakespeare's depiction of Lady Macbeth, a figure tormented by the vision of hands indelibly stained with the blood of her victim, so that even though she washed her hands repeatedly the foul spots could not be removed. But the revulsion in ancient Israelite society to the shedding of innocent blood was even stronger. The blood, whether of an animal or of a person, contained the life and was therefore to be treated with special reverence (Lev. 17:11). When a domestic animal was sacrificed, this reverence required that the blood was to be sprinkled on the altar (17:6); if a wild animal were killed for food, its blood was to be drained onto the ground before the meat could be consumed (17:13).

Anyone failing to observe these measures was deemed "guilty of bloodshed" and was to be cut off from the covenant people. This requirement was intended to underline the sacredness of all life, both animal and human.¹⁷ Those who failed to show respect for the life of others would be excluded from the covenant community, the place where life was to be found. What prospect then awaits the city that has become as deeply defiled as it is possible to be, filled with bloodshed (Ezek. 22:3–4)? It is only a matter of time before she will be cut off—and Ezekiel affirms that the time of Jerusalem's complete destruction has now indeed come.

Contemporary Significance

Dies Irae. When I was a university student I participated in a performance of Mozart's Requiem. We were told the story of how, while seriously ill, Mozart was approached by a mysterious stranger who commissioned him to write a Requiem Mass. Mozart became convinced that this was an angelic visitation, telling him to write a Requiem for himself. Though he did not live to complete his final work—it was finished from his notes by one of his students—the result is a powerful and compelling piece of music. One of the most emotionally charged parts of the Requiem for me was his rendition of the ancient Latin hymn Dies Irae. To the accompaniment of crashing chords, the fortissimo voices cry out, "Dies irae, dies illa, solvet saeclum in favilla, teste David cum Sibylla. . . ." Although I did not really understand the words (one year of high school Latin will only take you so far), I knew it had something to do with the Judgment Day, and the thought of a desperately ill genius composing the music with which to face his own Maker gave it a powerful emotional appeal.

I recently discovered an English translation of the Dies Irae, and realized that I had barely begun to understand the power of its conviction:

Day of wrath! O day of mourning! See fulfilled the prophet's warning— Heaven and earth in ashes burning! Oh, what fear man's bosom rendeth, When from heav'n the Judge descendeth, On Whose sentence all dependeth! Wondrous sound the trumpet flingeth, Through earth's sepulchers it ringeth, All before the throne it bringeth. Death is struck and nature quaking, All Creation is awaking, To its Judge an answer making. Lo! the book exactly worded, Wherein all hath been recorded; Thence shall judgment be awarded. When the Judge His seat attaineth, And each hidden deed arraigneth, Nothing unavenged remaineth.¹⁸

Such a stirring vision of the final judgment is not found in many contemporary worship songs, nor indeed in many hymnbooks in current use. These days we sing of the love of God and of the mercy and grace of God, but not, it seems, of the wrath of God and of the reality and certainty of final judgment. Why not?

Taking sin seriously. I think that the answer lies in our failure to understand the reality and the comprehensiveness of our sin. The person unconvinced of the reality and comprehensiveness of Jerusalem's sin, when faced with its destruction in 586 B.C., asks, "Why wouldn't God save her?" Ezekiel seeks to redirect that question so that the questioner asks: "How could a holy God do anything other than condemn her?" His method was simply to demonstrate the fact and the scope of her sin.

Modern people are equally unconvinced of the reality of their sin. The message of Paul that "all have sinned and fall short of the glory of God" (Rom. 3:23) is not one that finds a ready hearing in today's society. We tend to redefine sin out of existence as dysfunction or psychological weakness. What used to be called sin is now merely an "alternative lifestyle." Our culture has "defined deviancy down" to the point that what used to be considered deviant behavior is the new "normal." 19

This is true not merely in society at large but also in the churches. In a recent television interview, the Archbishop of Canterbury, George Carey, bewailed the fact that Britain was in danger of losing its Christian values and complained that the nation had "lost the language of sin." But earlier in the same interview, when questioned about the marital difficulties of Prince Charles, he reportedly responded: "He is a man who takes faith seriously, who attends worship and someone who has struggled as many people struggle with . . . brokenness in relationships. Therefore it's wrong for you and I to sit in judgment on people who are, as we are, people made in the image of God." Apparently persistent adultery and divorce are no longer to be described as "sin"; now they are "brokenness in relationships."

Even those who still talk about sins have frequently lost the sense of the comprehensive nature of our sin. Preachers (and churches) tend to have a shortened list of actual sins that they preach against. Some churches are strong against sexual sins, foul language, and drunkenness but have little to say about the economic sins of unjust business practices or the societal sins of racism that are endemic around us. Other churches speak strongly against structural evils but almost completely neglect the area of private morality. Perhaps we all have a tendency to dwell more on the sins that dog the lives of others than the faults of our own congregations. Not so Ezekiel: No one can escape the range of the charges he addresses.

Along with the loss of the sense of sin goes the loss of understanding of God's wrath. Paul understood that: "We were by nature objects of [God's] wrath" (Eph. 2:3). Why? Because we "were dead in [our] transgressions and sins" (2:1). A knowledge of sin and the understanding of God's wrath go together. It should therefore be no surprise that in a society where sin is no longer believed in, the wrath of God is not understood.²¹ We increasingly ask the question, "Why would a good God sentence anyone to eternal punishment?" instead of the question, "How can a holy God do anything other than condemn me to the depths of hell?"

Sin and redemption in "the city." The reality of sin, however, is an everyday fact for all of us, perhaps especially for those who live in our major cities. Just as ancient Jerusalem had drawn to itself all manner of detestable practices, so typically the major cities of our world are hotbeds of every kind of vice. This is merely what one would expect, given the origins that the Bible ascribes to the city. In Genesis, the city is Cain's natural territory. It is archetypally the place where no one is his or her brother's keeper. In a small town, everybody not only knows your name and the state of your marriage, they know everything about you, down to how often you change your underwear. That intimate knowledge acts as a powerful brake on public sin. In a big city, by contrast, you can be surrounded by a million people and not know a single soul. Few people know what you do, and fewer still care.

Cain's line is the one that excels in farming, in engineering, and in the arts (Gen. 4:20–22). It increases in power, wealth, and luxury. But paradoxically as it prospers materially it also declines in morals. The problem with the city is not population density but sin. Put a lot of sinners close together and it is not surprising that you will reap degradation. The city draws out what is in humanity, good and bad. It is the place of progress, of technology, of the arts—all of which are good gifts of God, but all of which can so easily be perverted.

Yet God can redeem even the city. The place that in Genesis 1–11 is the home of Cain's descendants and the builders of the tower of Babel becomes in Revelation 21–22 the new Jerusalem, the place where God lives with his people. It will be in a heavenly city that we will know God and be fully known by him, and live in intimate and untroubled fellowship with our brothers and sisters. We were created for society; we were not created to live alone. After the Fall, to be sure, society becomes a mixed blessing. Sin has societal consequences. God's solution, however, is not to call his redeemed people to live a hermit existence in the desert but to form them into a new society, the church, where we share fellowship with those who are our siblings in Christ.

Awakening a sense of sin and presenting God's grace. But how can we awaken a sense of sin in those around us who are as yet outside the church?

In one sense, we cannot. At the heart of the problem is the fact that those outside Christ are dead in their transgressions and sins. How do you wake the dead? Only the Holy Spirit can perform that miracle. Nonetheless, in our preaching we need to have a balance of preaching the law and preaching the gospel.

Ezekiel's methodology for addressing the people of his own day was to show them how far short they had fallen of the standards laid down in God's Word. He indicted his hearers comprehensively of crimes against the Law and the Prophets. The standards he used were not those of contemporary society, with which they might compare favorably, but God's perfect law, before which all stood condemned. He showed them the extent to which sin had contaminated the very heart of their society. He charged them not merely with sin in general, but of detailed specific sins of comprehensive range. Only after they had been confronted with the reality and depth of their sin could they come to an understanding of the rightness of God's wrath against them. Only then could the good news of God's grace be preached to them.

On the basis of the approach of Ezekiel and some of the other prophets, it has sometimes been insisted that the law is a necessary first step toward understanding the gospel, as if only after first understanding fully the claims of the law can one come to Christ.²² In fact, however, law and grace belong together in contributing to our understanding of sin and thus our understanding of our need for Christ. If we merely understand the law without seeing God's grace, we can fall into the trap of seeing God as the cosmic policeman, upholding apparently arbitrary standards that get in the way of our self-fulfillment. This view of God was the serpent's goal in his questioning of Eve in the Garden of Eden. He sought to maximize the restrictiveness of God's law ("Did God really say, 'You must not eat from any tree in the garden'?" Gen. 3:1) and to minimize God's gracious goodness ("God knows that when you eat of it . . . you will be like God, knowing good and evil," 3:5).

Equally, if we merely understand grace without seeing the place of the law, then we may view God as the cosmic grandfather, understanding all and therefore forgiving all. What is important is not so much the order in which law and grace are proclaimed but the fact that both are clearly proclaimed. Perhaps rather than a fixed order of proclamation, it would be better to view their relationship as a dynamic relationship, more of a circle than a straight line.

Law and grace understood together point us to our need for Christ. In Christ, we see that God's law is good and perfect, designed for our utmost fulfillment as human beings; the only utterly fulfilled person who ever lived is also the only person who ever fully kept God's law. Yet in Christ we see the full meaning of God's grace—that grace is (in the children's acronym) God's Riches At Christ's Expense. Forgiveness for us is complete, full, and free. But it was not without cost. The cost of free forgiveness was borne for us on the cross, where Jesus purchased the blood-filled Jerusalem and her (un)spiritual descendants in order to rehab her into his heavenly bride, the new Jerusalem, in whom God can dwell forever.

The author of the Dies Irae understood clearly that law and grace go together. Thus, having trumpeted the threats of the law, he goes on:

What shall I, frail man, be pleading, Who for me be interceding, When the just are mercy needing? King of majesty tremendous, Who dost free salvation send us, Fount of pity, then befriend us! Think, good Jesus! My salvation Caused thy wondrous Incarnation; Leave me not to reprobation. Faint and weary Thou hast sought me On the cross of suffering bought me; Shall such grace be vainly brought me? Righteous Judge! For sin's pollution Grant Thy gift of absolution, Ere that day of retribution. Guilty, now I pour my moaning, All my shame with anguish owning, Spare, O God, Thy suppliant groaning.

Someone to stand in the gap. The problem facing Ezekiel was not simply that he encountered a few defiled individuals, who needed to hear the gospel. Jerusalem herself, the holy city, was completely defiled. There was no righteous remnant; no one in the catalogue of leaders was left free from the taint of sin, not even the priests. There was literally no one to stand in the gap for her. In Abraham's day, a quorum of ten righteous men might have saved Sodom. In Jerusalem, the new Sodom (Ezek. 16:46), there is not even left one righteous Lot who will escape.

Such too is the world in which we live. The best of our righteousness is as filthy rags in the presence of a holy God. As Christians we know that we are saved not by our righteousness, but by the One who stood in the gap for us, Jesus Christ himself, who bore the full weight of the true dies irae, the day of God's wrath. On that day, the sun was turned to darkness while he suffered the full weight of the punishment our sins deserved (Matt. 27:45). The earth itself convulsed and the curtain in the temple, the barrier closing off the presence of God in the Most Holy Place, was torn in two, opening up a gap for us to come to God. As we come, we in turn are called to share in the prophetic ministry of "standing in the gap." We are called to intercede in prayer for the lost, taking the risk of rejection and persecution as we warn them of the wrath to come, and to live lives of purity as we wait so that nothing may hinder the message of life that is proclaimed through us.

The word of the LORD came to me: ²"Son of man, there were two women, daughters of the same mother. ³They became prostitutes in Egypt, engaging in prostitution from their youth. In that land their breasts were fondled and their virgin bosoms caressed. ⁴The older was named Oholah, and her sister was Oholibah. They were mine and gave birth to sons and daughters. Oholah is Samaria, and Oholibah is Jerusalem.

5"Oholah engaged in prostitution while she was still mine; and she lusted after her lovers, the Assyrians—warriors ⁶ clothed in blue, governors and commanders, all of them handsome young men, and mounted horsemen. ⁷She gave herself as a prostitute to all the elite of the Assyrians and defiled herself with all the idols of everyone she lusted after. ⁸She did not give up the prostitution she began in Egypt, when during her youth men slept with her, caressed her virgin bosom and poured out their lust upon her.

14"But she carried her prostitution still further. She saw men portrayed on a wall, figures of Chaldeans portrayed in red, ¹⁵with belts around their waists and flowing turbans on their heads; all of them looked like Babylonian chariot officers, natives of Chaldea. ¹⁶As soon as she saw them, she lusted after them and sent messengers to them in Chaldea. ¹⁷Then the Babylonians came to her, to the bed of love, and in their lust they defiled her. After she had been defiled by them, she turned away from them in disgust. ¹⁸When she carried on her prostitution openly and exposed her nakedness, I turned away from her in disgust, just as I had turned away from her sister. ¹⁹Yet she became more and more promiscuous as she recalled the days of her youth, when she was a prostitute in Egypt. ²⁰There she lusted after her lovers, whose genitals were like those of donkeys and whose emission was like that of horses. ²¹So you longed for the lewdness of your youth, when in Egypt your bosom was caressed and your young breasts fondled.

²²"Therefore, Oholibah, this is what the Sovereign LORD says: I will stir up your lovers against you, those you turned away from in disgust, and I will bring them against you from every side—²³the Babylonians and all the Chaldeans, the men of Pekod and Shoa and Koa, and all the Assyrians with them, handsome young men, all of them governors and commanders, chariot officers and men of high rank, all mounted on horses. ²⁴They will come against you with weapons, chariots and wagons and with a throng of people; they will take up positions against you on every side with large and small shields and with helmets. I will turn you over to them for punishment, and they will punish you according to their standards. ²⁵I will direct my jealous anger against you, and they will deal with you in fury. They will cut off your noses and your ears, and those of you who are left will fall by the sword. They will take away your sons and daughters, and those of you who are left will be consumed by fire. ²⁶They will also strip you of your clothes and take your fine jewelry. ²⁷So I will put a stop to the lewdness and prostitution you began in Egypt. You will not look on these things with longing or remember Egypt anymore.

²⁸"For this is what the Sovereign LORD says: I am about to hand you over to those you hate, to those you turned away from in disgust. ²⁹They will deal with you in hatred and take away everything you have worked for. They will leave you naked and bare, and the shame of your prostitution will be exposed. Your lewdness and promiscuity ³⁰have brought this upon you, because you lusted after the nations and defiled yourself with their idols. ³¹You have gone the way of your sister; so I will put her cup into your hand.

32"This is what the Sovereign LORD says:

"You will drink your sister's cup, a cup large and deep; it will bring scorn and derision, for it holds so much.

³³You will be filled with drunkenness and sorrow, the cup of ruin and desolation, the cup of your sister Samaria.

34You will drink it and drain it dry; you will dash it to pieces and tear your breasts.

I have spoken, declares the Sovereign LORD.

35"Therefore this is what the Sovereign LORD says: Since you have forgotten me and thrust me behind your back, you must bear the consequences of your lewdness and prostitution."

³⁶The LORD said to me: "Son of man, will you judge Oholah and Oholibah? Then confront them with their detestable practices, ³⁷for they have committed adultery and blood is on their hands. They committed adultery with their idols; they even sacrificed their children, whom they bore to me, as food for them. ³⁸They have also done this to me: At that same time they defiled my sanctuary and desecrated my Sabbaths. ³⁹On the very day they sacrificed their children to their idols, they entered my sanctuary and desecrated it. That is what they did in my house.

⁴⁰"They even sent messengers for men who came from far away, and when they arrived you bathed yourself for them, painted your eyes and put on your jewelry. ⁴¹You sat on an elegant couch, with a table spread before it on which you had placed the incense and oil that belonged to me.

down with their swords; they will kill their sons and daughters and burn down their houses.

⁴⁸"So I will put an end to lewdness in the land, that all women may take warning and not imitate you. ⁴⁹You will suffer the penalty for your lewdness and bear the consequences of your sins of idolatry. Then you will know that I am the Sovereign LORD."

Original Meaning

As IN CHAPTER 16, the prophet depicts the history and future of Judah by means of an extended metaphor, picturing Jerusalem and Samaria as two exceedingly wanton women. The shockingly explicit language and not particularly disguised identities of the cities combine to give the resulting picture an "in-your-face" effect, whose emotional impact is far greater than a similar indictment in dry legal terminology would have been. If, as Paul Ricoeur has argued, metaphor involves the "felt participation" of the reader, then in Ezekiel 23 the prophet harnesses all of the emotional impact of a graphic portrayal of sexual perversion to drive home the point that Jerusalem's coming destruction is both the deserved and the inevitable consequence of her past actions.

Two women are introduced in the opening verses as sisters, sharing a common mother (23:2). This is intended to denote not merely the historical fact of a shared heredity between the northern and southern kingdoms but a deeper commonality: Though they are two in number, they are one in nature, living parallel lives.² This essential identity is underlined by the names they are given: Samaria is designated "Oholah" while Jerusalem is named "Oholibah." The meaning of these names ("her tent" and "my tent is in her") does not seem to be in this case of any particular significance; rather, it is the similarity of their names that draws our attention. Oholah and Oholibah go together like Tweedledum and Tweedledee.³

These sisters have behaved alike from their youth. Already in Egypt they gave themselves over to prostitution (Ezek. 23:3). But in spite of that, the Lord "made honest women of them" (to use a Victorian phrase): He married them and they became the mothers of his children (23:4). Thus far, there is nothing controversial about Ezekiel's retelling of history. God had entered an exclusive relationship of overlordship, a covenant, with Israel, in spite of Israel's checkered history. Israel's undistinguished past in terms of their faithfulness to the Lord was not particularly news to those familiar with the events recounted in Exodus and Numbers: the grumbling at Marah (Ex. 15:23–24), the golden calf (Ex. 32), the bad report of the spies (Num. 13:26–33), Korah's rebellion (Num. 16), the immorality with the Moabites (Num. 25). Besides, that was all ancient history.

In the next verses, however, Ezekiel brings his hearers down to the present in a hurry with a brief sketch of the history of the older sister, Oholah (i.e., Samaria, the northern kingdom; Ezek. 23:5–10). Not content with the Lord, she traded her attentions elsewhere. She lusted after the Assyrians, seeking to enter a covenant with them, a politico-religious alliance that implied a repudiation of trust in the Lord as her sole provider. What attracted her to the Assyrians was their power and prestige. They all appeared to her as warriors—horsemen and charioteers, governors and commanders, dressed in splendid garments of blue (23:6).

The historical background of this assertion is not hard to trace. From around 841–840 B.C., Israel was involved in an alliance with Assyria when Shalmaneser III received a substantial tribute from Jehu. Climbing into bed with Assyria may have seemed the logical—perhaps the only possible—political option to Israel's leadership, but it was also tantamount to a rejection of trust in the Lord in favor of Assyria's idols, with which Israel now defiled herself (23:7). It was a return to her former way of life in Egypt, from which the Lord had redeemed her (23:8). The consequences of her lifestyle choice were severe, yet fitting. The Lord gave her over into the hand of her lovers, the Assyrians (23:9). The very things that attracted her to them rebounded against her. Their warrior power was exerted against her, and far from clothing her in similar manner to themselves they stripped her naked and killed her (23:10).

But Oholah is not Ezekiel's real interest. The brief sketch of her history merely sets up a paradigm of sin and punishment to which the subsequent history of her southern sister can be compared. Oholah became a "byword" (lit., a "name") among women, and judgments were done to her (23:10). This is her function in the chapter: Her history is known and (from a southern perspective) regarded as a just fate for her sin. But the question is,

"Has her younger sister applied to herself the lessons to be drawn from the older sister's fate?"

As the chapter unfolds, it is evident that she has not. Oholibah is not merely like her sister; she is worse than her sister. Nor is this depravity the result of ignorance: Her sister "saw" and yet still became more depraved in her lust, committing more adulteries than her sister (23:11). She first sinned in exactly the same way with the Assyrians (23:12, which closely recapitulates 23:5–6), and then added to her little black book the Babylonians (23:14). She was worse in her wantonness than her sister not merely in the number of her lovers (two as against one) but in the nature of their relationship. She was attracted to the Babylonians by a mere wall depiction; entranced by the vision of them she herself sent messengers to Babylon to get them (23:16). She was thus not merely willing to be seduced but was herself the active seductress. They thus became idols come to life for her: Like the idols of the house of Israel in 8:10, they are described as "portrayed on a wall, figures of Chaldeans" (23:14). Though they may be attractively dressed up, they are merely an old idolatry warmed over.

Once more, the historical details lie not far below the surface of the metaphor. Judah's relationship with Assyria went back to at least 734 B.C., when Ahaz appealed to Tiglath-Pileser for assistance against Pekah of Israel and Rezin of Damascus (2 Kings 16:5–7; Isa. 7:1–2). In 714 B.C., Hezekiah entertained ambassadors from the Babylonian ruler Merodach-Baladan, who was seeking to rally support against the Assyrians (2 Kings 20:12–19). When the Babylonian-led resistance crumbled, Hezekiah once again apparently sent tribute to the Assyrians. But by 605 B.C. Babylon had established itself as the dominant power in the region, and Judah was in a vassal relationship toward them.

What his compatriots may have read as political necessity, however, Ezekiel presents in a different light: Submission to these relationships is nothing less than spiritual adultery against their true covenant head, the Lord himself. Once again, the prophet seeks to challenge Judah's complacent sense of moral and spiritual superiority to her former northern neighbor.

Her adulterous liaisons did not satisfy Oholibah. Having been defiled by her lovers, she became disgusted with them and turned away from them (Ezek. 23:17). But in turning away from her adulterous lovers, she still did not turn away from her love of adultery. She continued her prostitution openly, so that the Lord turned away from her, just as he had earlier turned away from her sister (23:18).

Yet even this did not deter her from her course; it was a case of "train a child in the way [s]he should go, and when [s]he is old [s]he will not turn from it" (Prov. 22:6). She remembered the days of her youth in Egypt, not as the time when the Lord delivered her from bondage (as the book of Deuteronomy repeatedly urges Israel to remember Egypt^s) but as the time when they enjoyed pleasures no longer theirs (cf. Num. 11:5). As DeVries puts it: "She had forgotten what she should have remembered and remembered what she should have forgotten." In her lust, she was not even limited by natural relationships; instead, she sought those whose sexual capacities were not merely superhuman but positively bestial ("whose genitals were like those of donkeys and whose emission [lit., floods] was like that of horses," Ezek. 23:20).

The result of such thoroughgoing depravity is predictable: A fitting judgment will fall on the head of the wanton woman. The Lord "will stir up" her lovers against her from all around (23:22), not merely the Babylonians and Assyrians but men from Pekod, Shoa, and Koa as well." As with Oholah, the things that attracted Oholibah to her lovers are now used against her. Their strength and military prowess now become the means of assaulting her on every side; weaponry, chariotry, armor, and numbers are now turned against Jerusalem (23:24). God will "turn [his wayward people] over to them for punishment," and as a result their enemies will be allowed to "punish [them] according to their standards."

This combination of divine and human judgment is further developed in the following verses. The Lord says, "I will direct my jealous anger against you, and they will deal with you in fury" (23:25). As Jerusalem's sins were worse than her sister's, so also will her punishment be. She will not only be stripped but also disfigured, and her children will not only be taken from her but will also fall by the sword and be consumed by fire (23:25). The goal of this judgment is a proper amnesia: forgetting the prostitution begun in Egypt (23:27). Her lovers have now become her enemies, who will strip her and plunder her (23:28–29). As she followed in the pattern of her elder sister, so now she will share her elder sister's fate and drink from the same bitter cup of sorrow, all the way down to its dregs (23:32–34). In her shame, she will tear out the bodily members that led her into sin in the first place, her breasts.¹³

In the remaining verses (23:36–49), Ezekiel is once more cast into the role of prosecuting attorney ("Son of man, will you judge. . . ?") as the point of the metaphor is driven home. Jerusalem¹⁴ is to be confronted with her adultery and bloodshed. This section links together the political charges of the earlier part of chapter 23 with the social and cultic charges of chapter 22. Adultery has taken place at home and on the road, with domestic and foreign idols. At home, sanctuary and Sabbath have been defiled, and even their children have been sacrificed (23:38–39). Not content with such "homegrown" heresies, they have sent messengers far and wide to all comers (23:40). But in spite of their beauty preparations and makeup, their true nature is becoming clear to all: an aging, worn-out prostitute, desired not for her charms but for her availability and price (23:43).

Once more, the conclusion of the sisters' activities is clearly stated: An army will come, plundering them, stoning them, and putting them to the sword. Their children will be slaughtered, their homes burned (23:47). Thus the Lord will bring to an end all such adultery. This time the object lesson will be heeded (unlike in v. 10), and "all women" will be chastened and not do likewise (23:48). The chapter closes with the recognition formula: "Then you will know that I am the Sovereign LORD" (23:49).

Bridging Contexts

THE NATURE OF METAPHOR. Metaphors and related forms of pictorial speech are among the most culture-specific means of expression. Is it truly possible to explain to anyone not brought up in a cricketing nation what it means to be "playing on a sticky wicket"? The entire effectiveness of the metaphor depends on shared "commonplaces," a range of ideas associated with the image used in the metaphor. These ideas are culturally determined. The metaphor "the LORD is my shepherd" naturally means something slightly different in an ancient Near Eastern context from what it does in a Scottish context because Scottish shepherds are associated with a different set of ideas from ancient Near Eastern shepherds—for instance, the use of sheep dogs.

This difficulty may, of course, be overcome in many cases if readers immerse themselves sufficiently in the source culture to understand the ideas associated with the image in question. It becomes problematic, however, when the reader finds the image adopted is not merely alien but antagonistic. The perspective of the metaphor is not simply different from their perspective but is positively repulsive to it. This situation tends to trigger an instinctive response in the reader of rejection toward the metaphor.

This process may happen on a personal level, as when a person who has a bad relationship with his or her own human father finds it hard to accept the biblical image of God as "Father." But this same process can also happen on a cultural level. For example, the Sawi people of Irian Jaya celebrated men who formed friendships with the express purpose of later betraying the befriended one in order to be killed and eaten.¹⁸ This cultural association naturally made it hard for them to understand the gospel, for on their cultural reading Judas was evidently the hero of the story.

By the same token, the metaphor of Ezekiel 23 is not merely alien to our twentieth-century Western culture, it is, to many people, antagonistic. That antagonism may be expressed in mild language ("We cannot but feel ill at ease with the harsh way in which guilt and blame for sexual misconduct is presented . . . as primarily a female responsibility")¹⁹ or in harsh language ("a pornographic fantasy"),²⁰ but it is there in most contemporary expositions. What is alien is not so much the message itself—for the message of Ezekiel 23 is not fundamentally different from that of the preceding chapters—but the form in which the message is delivered, the metaphor itself. It is the envelope in which the letter comes that causes offense, not the letter itself.

Understanding the ancient marital metaphor. What shall we say about this envelope? Perhaps in the face of contemporary revulsion, we do well to recognize how accurately it communicated truth within its own cultural context. It relied on certain cultural commonplaces. It assumed (1) the idea of the capital city as the "wife" of the deity,²¹ (2) the idea that political alliances with foreign nations were a breach of that covenant relationship, analogous to adultery,²² (3) the idea that multiple adultery on the part of a woman was shocking and perverse, and (4) the idea that the appropriate punishment for adultery was death (Lev. 20:10). If those presuppositions are affirmed, then Ezekiel makes his case with considerable logic and great emotional power that the city of Jerusalem has become polluted by her adultery and God is entirely justified in bringing in the agents of his choice. To be sure, attention is uniquely focused in this chapter on the punishment of the adulteress rather than that of her lovers, but the remaining chapters of Ezekiel make it clear that the other nations will not escape God's judgment either (Ezek. 25–32; cf. 21:30–32).

However, we should also recognize that the cultural "commonplaces" affirmed above are different from those generally accepted today. Multiple adultery is now often regarded as self-fulfillment. It is depicted positively in novels and movies as something to be envied and emulated. Violence against women, on the other hand, is one of the few remaining taboos, an act that rightly generates strong feelings of revulsion. What is more, many people in our society question the use of the death penalty for any crime, let alone for adultery. Indeed, most within the church would rightly be uncomfortable with the idea of executing adulterers.²³ So we have to recognize that the envelope in which it is packaged makes it hard for contemporary readers to "hear" the message of Ezekiel 23.

This fact was illustrated personally for me at a recent scholarly conference where a paper was presented on Ezekiel 23. The presenter argued that on close examination the chapter deconstructed its own message, a message the presenter herself found to be theologically problematic. In personal conversation after the lecture, it transpired that part of the presenter's interest in and concern over this particular passage stemmed from her own experience in hearing it used to justify the abuse of women. Because of her experiences and feminist perspective, the metaphor adopted by the prophet was deeply troubling to her, leading her to reject the message contained by the metaphor.

Two ways of using metaphors. However, there are actually two ways of using metaphors to address an audience. One way is to use to the full extent the accepted cultural commonplaces to drive home an unpalatable truth in an inescapable way. That is how the story of the poor man with one ewe lamb, which the prophet Nathan recounted to King David, works (2 Sam. 12:1–4). An inescapable straightforward logic drives the story to its conclusion, at which point the application is made. Alternatively, a metaphor may be used to turn upside down expectations, thus challenging the "cultural commonplaces." So in the parable of the good Samaritan, the "cultural commonplace" that all Samaritans were filthy scoundrels is challenged by placing the expected villain in what turns out to be the hero's role.

To its original audience, Ezekiel 23 was an example of the first category of usage. Though the women were outrageously unlike any that Ezekiel's audience knew, the metaphor itself was unproblematic: There would have been no question in their minds that the fate of the women was thoroughly deserved. No matter how unpalatable the message that Jerusalem would inevitably be destroyed because of the people's unfaithfulness to God, demonstrated in foreign political alliances, the metaphor clearly worked in that setting.

To a contemporary audience, however, it will be difficult to use it in that way unless considerable work is done first, explaining the ancient Near Eastern perspective.²⁴ It may be more profitable to use it in the second mode, to undermine the contemporary cultural commonplaces that what used to be called sin is simply harmless fun, so long as it takes place between consenting adults. Sin is always a serious business, whether it takes the form of actual adultery or spiritual adultery, the worship of literal false gods of wood and gold or the spiritual false gods of materialism, capitalism, socialism, and every other "ism" that seems to offer a way of "salvation." Sin has serious consequences. It has wages that must always be paid, whether by ourselves in eternity or by Christ on the cross. That belief is far from being a contemporary commonplace. It is, nonetheless, true.

Contemporary Significance

ELIMINATING THE CONCEPT of sin. Sin is an unfashionable concept. Christian counselor John Bettler has pointed out how our very language of sexual sins softens the idea of sin: "We don't commit adultery anymore. We have affairs. . . . Adultery sounds harsh and ugly and destructive. An affair sounds kind of gentle and nice and almost acceptable. In the same way, we don't have homosexuals anymore. We have people with alternative sexual preferences. We've softened the concept of sin." But if we don't have sin, we are no longer sinners. And if we are not sinners, we don't need salvation; we need recovery instead.

Jerusalem was beyond help or recovery. She was a sinner of truly shocking proportions: a multiple-timing, "cheating wife" sort of sinner. There was no "twelve-step" program that could bring about her recovery from her sexual addiction. The "Higher Power" was not there to assist her but to pour out his justified wrath on her for her sin. The Babylonians would come—the very ones in whom she had trusted—and they would bring to an end her existence. It was time to write her sorry obituary: She was a sinner from her youth and a sinner to the end. She belonged together with the sexually immoral, the idolaters, the adulterers, the male prostitutes, the homosexual offenders, the thieves, the greedy, the drunkards, the slanderers, and the swindlers; like them, she would certainly not "inherit the kingdom of God" (1 Cor. 6:9–10). It may be countercultural today to assert that "the wages of sin is death" and that those who offend in the smallest way against a pure and holy God deserve to spend an eternity experiencing his wrath, but it is not because that is an unscriptural notion.

All too often in our proclamation of the gospel we shy away from shocking our neighbors with the radical truth of the horrible, hell-deserving nature of sin. In that, we may be motivated by our desire not to put a stumbling block in our neighbor's path. Perhaps we are also motivated by our desire to forget the fact that the personal sins we have ourselves committed are equally hell-deserving. Yet in eliminating the awfulness of sin, we simultaneously eliminate the meaning of the cross, the very heart of the gospel. For if sin is not really all that bad, why did the Son of God have to die to pay the debt that sinners owed?

God's actions to save us. What is the truly remarkable, world-shaking notion in Scripture is not that God's wrath is revealed against all ungodliness (Rom. 1:18). That is simply the logical consequence of his infinite holiness and purity. Rather, what is astonishing is that when that wrath is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness, not all will share Jerusalem's fate. Certainly it is not because some especially righteous human beings do not deserve to share her fate. We all deserve the same judgment. We too are among those on Paul's 1 Corinthians 6:9–10 list—certainly in our thoughts and, in some cases, also in our acts. Paul is speaking of us when he says, "That is what some of you were" (6:11). But God intervened. He acted to save us: "You were washed, you were sanctified, you were justified in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ and by the Spirit of our God." We were sinners, but now in Christ we are saints. What an amazing change!

But once again Ezekiel 23 reminds us that that change cannot be wrought without the payment of a price. A penalty for sin must be borne (23:49); someone must cover my debt. For me to be reclothed in Christ's righteousness, he had to be stripped naked. For me to be crowned with glory, he had to wear the crown of thorns. For me to live, he had to die. The violence I deserved fell on him; it is by his stripes that I am healed. The wrath to come is real, and if it did not fall on Jesus in my place, then I must bear it myself.

Ezekiel 23 is incorporated into Scripture not to give its readers some kind of salacious fantasy of sex and violence, as some contemporary commentators imagine. Certainly it is intended to shock, as was the case with the other "R-rated" section of Ezekiel's prophecy (ch. 16). But the shock is designed to jolt the comfortable into a recognition of the reality and inevitability of the judgment to come so that we might see the utter folly of trusting in anything—or anyone—less than the living God. It is intended to strip away the pretensions of the pseudo-righteous and expose the naked truth that they too deserve the full weight of God's wrath.

There is no message of hope in Ezekiel 23. The stone is rolled away to reveal the gaping mouth of the tomb, which is ready to swallow up defiled Jerusalem, just as it had earlier swallowed up defiled Samaria. But for those reading Ezekiel 23 from a New Testament perspective, the opened mouth of another tomb speaks a word of comfort even to those as defiled as Jerusalem. Because Christ has died in our place, and more than that has risen from the dead, there is now no condemnation for us who are in Christ Jesus! My death is swallowed up in his victory; my defilement is replaced by his purity, credited to my account. In the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, I too have been washed, I have been justified, and I am being sanctified. What is more, this is true in spite of the sins that I continue to commit daily. Although I am unfaithful to my commitment to God and continue to sin against him regularly in thought, word, and deed, the gospel continues to be good news for me, a sinner. In the words of William Cowper's hymn:

There is a fountain filled with blood drawn from Immanuel's veins;

And sinners plunged beneath that flood lose all their guilty stains.

The dying thief rejoiced to see that fountain in his day; And there may I, though vile as he, wash all my sins away.

Dear dying Lamb, Thy precious blood shall never lose its power,

Till all the ransomed church of God be saved, to sin no more.

E'er since by faith I saw the stream Thy flowing wounds supply,

Redeeming love has been my theme, and shall be till I die.

Ezekiel 24

In the ninth year, in the tenth month on the tenth day, the word of the LORD came to me: ²"Son of man, record this date, this very date, because the king of Babylon has laid siege to Jerusalem this very day. ³Tell this rebellious house a parable and say to them: 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says:

"'Put on the cooking pot; put it on and pour water into it.

4Put into it the pieces of meat, all the choice pieces—the leg and the shoulder.

Fill it with the best of these bones;

5take the pick of the flock.

Pile wood beneath it for the bones; bring it to a boil and cook the bones in it.

644 'For this is what the Sovereign LORD says:

" 'Woe to the city of bloodshed,
to the pot now encrusted,
whose deposit will not go away!
Empty it piece by piece without casting lots for them.

7" 'For the blood she shed is in her midst:
She poured it on the bare rock;
she did not pour it on the ground,
where the dust would cover it.

8To stir up wrath and take revenge
I put her blood on the bare rock, so that it would not be covered.

9" 'Therefore this is what the Sovereign LORD says:

" 'Woe to the city of bloodshed! I, too, will pile the wood high.

¹⁰So heap on the wood and kindle the fire.

Cook the meat well, mixing in the spices; and let the bones be charred.

11 Then set the empty pot on the coals till it becomes hot and its copper glows so its impurities may be melted and its deposit burned away.

¹²It has frustrated all efforts; its heavy deposit has not been removed, not even by fire.

13" 'Now your impurity is lewdness. Because I tried to cleanse you but you would not be cleansed from your impurity, you will not be clean again until my wrath against you has subsided.

14" 'I the LORD have spoken. The time has come for me to act. I will not hold back; I will not have pity, nor will I relent. You will be judged according to your conduct and your actions, declares the Sovereign LORD.'"

15The word of the LORD came to me: 16"Son of man, with one blow I am about to take away from you the delight of your eyes. Yet do not lament or weep or shed any tears. 17Groan quietly; do not mourn for the dead. Keep your turban fastened and your sandals on your feet; do not cover the lower part of your face or eat the customary food ∟of mourners」."

¹⁸So I spoke to the people in the morning, and in the evening my wife died. The next morning I did as I had been commanded.

¹⁹Then the people asked me, "Won't you tell us what these things have to do with us?"

²⁰So I said to them, "The word of the LORD came to me: ²¹Say to the house of Israel, 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says: I am about to desecrate my sanctuary—the stronghold in which you take pride, the delight of your eyes, the object of your affection. The sons and daughters you left behind will fall by the sword. ²²And you will do as I have done. You will not cover the lower part of your face or eat the customary food Lof mourners」. ²³You will keep your turbans on your heads and your sandals on your feet. You will not mourn or weep but will waste away because of your sins and groan among yourselves. ²⁴Ezekiel will be a sign to you; you will do just as he has done. When this happens, you will know that I am the Sovereign LORD.'

²⁵"And you, son of man, on the day I take away their stronghold, their joy and glory, the delight of their eyes, their heart's desire, and their sons and daughters as well—²⁶on that day a fugitive will come to tell you the news. ²⁷At that time your mouth will be opened; you will speak with him and will no longer be silent. So you will be a sign to them, and they will know that I am the LORD."

Original Meaning

FOR TWENTY-THREE CHAPTERS now, Ezekiel has been proclaiming the wrath to come on Jerusalem. Finally, in Ezekiel 24, the sword of judgment descends on the city. Verses 1–14 are an oracle delivered to the prophet by God on the very day when Nebuchadnezzar's assault on the city began. The message is received by the prophet on the tenth of the tenth month, and the prophet is to make note of this date, which on our reckoning is January 15, 587 B.C., because this is the day on which the king of Babylon laid siege to Jerusalem (24:2). This date is to be noted because it will subsequently provide further "objective" evidence of the prophet's veracity.

The Day of Reckoning for Jerusalem (24:1–14)

Following the Hebrew more literally, this is the day when Nebuchadnezzar "leaned on" (sāmak) Jerusalem, a word with overtones of the sacrificial system. A worshiper approaching the sanctuary designated the animal to be sacrificed as his through a ritual "leaning on of hands" (Lev. 1:4; 3:2).² By Ezekiel's use of this terminology, Nebuchadnezzar is depicted as designating Jerusalem as the sacrificial lamb—though hardly one without spot or blemish, as the law required—ready to be dismembered for the glory of God.

This sacrificial language leads into a parable to be delivered to³ the "rebellious house" (bêt hammerî, 24:3). This is a favorite expression for Judah in Ezekiel,⁴ one that indicates that their rebellion against Nebuchadnezzar is not a glorious (if doomed) fight for freedom and self-determination but rather an expression of their basic rebellious nature—a rebellion fundamentally directed against God. In the parable, Jerusalem is compared to a cooking pot (sîr) in which abundant meat has been placed to be cooked (24:3), an image familiar already from 11:7–12. The sacrificial animal has been cut up and all of its pieces "gathered" to be boiled, presumably as a fellowship offering. The wood⁶ has been piled up under the pot and the pot has been brought to a nice simmer.⁷

Thus far the expectations of the audience have been moved in a positive direction. But in a classic twist, typical of the genre of parable, what ought to be a tasty sacred meal is, in fact, a foul, profane mess. The "choice pieces" and "the best of these bones" from the "pick of the flock" (24:4–5) turn out to be nothing but defiled filth (hel'ātâ, 24:6). This filth that is inside her will not "come out" (yāṣā'; 24:6; NIV, "go away"), a phrase that has a double meaning. In terms of the imagery of the pot, the filth that will not come out reflects the frustration of a burned-on mess that cannot be removed. On the level of the metaphorical meaning, "come out" is precisely what Jerusalem's inhabitants hope to do at the end of the siege.

As in chapter 11, however, the pot will not protect them; they have defiled the city by their evil and so they (the filth) will not come out from her safely. Their only exit from the pot will be when they are "brought out"

(Hiphil of $y\bar{a}s\bar{a}$) for judgment (24:6; cf. 11:9). Nor will this judgment be partial, with some selected to die and some to live, as when the lot was cast over the two goats on the Day of Atonement, with one chosen for the altar and the other to be driven off into the desert (Lev. 16:8). No lots will be cast over the pot, for all the meat is destined for the same end, reprobation (Ezek. 24:6). There will be no escape.

The blood Jerusalem has shed in her midst is left uncovered, poured out on a bare rock rather than on the ground (24:7). Covering the blood with earth (Lev. 17:13) was required for the blood of all animals slaughtered for meat in Deuteronomy 12:16, 24. Blood left exposed would provoke the wrath of God, so their action was nothing less than a deliberate act of sacrilege. Like the blood of Abel, the blood of the innocent victims of the bloody city cries out for justice, and in consequence Jerusalem's blood will also be poured out uncovered (Ezek. 24:8).

Returning to the imagery of the pot, the Lord declares: "Heap on the wood and kindle the fire. Cook the meat well, removing the broth; and let the bones be charred" (24:10). The empty pot is now transformed into a kind of refiner's furnace in a final attempt to try to melt away the impurities (24:11), as in 22:20–22. But once again, all efforts to remove the defilement have proved ineffective. God's wrath must be satisfied on Jerusalem if she is ever to be clean again (24:13), and it is time for that definitive final action to begin. The time for words has ended; now it is time for deeds (24:14).

The Death of Ezekiel's Wife (24:15–27)

THE SECOND HALF of the chapter shows that the oracle of painful destruction is not delivered from the safety of an armchair in distant Babylon. The sword that is going to strike Jerusalem first strikes the prophet himself in the most painful and personal of his prophetic sign-acts. His own wife, the delight of his eyes, is suddenly taken from him (24:16). This is no random turn of fate, but a sudden stroke directly from God. Yet Ezekiel is not permitted to mourn publicly in the traditional ways, by lamentation and tears, disheveled clothing, and special food (24:17). All he can do is "groan quietly," that is, mourn in privacy and isolation without the usual rites invoking social solidarity and sympathy. Outwardly, he is to behave as if nothing has happened.

This strange behavior is to be a sign to the people of the significance of what is to come (24:24). The temple in Jerusalem was their pride and joy; it had become as precious to the Jerusalemites as the closest of relations (24:21). This building, the delight of their eyes, will be desecrated by God. It will be destroyed along with the sons and daughters whom the exiles had left behind. Yet the people will not weep or wail or mourn publicly for the temple (24:22). This is not because of any absence of grief on their part, but because in the face of such a devastating, all-encompassing judgment, the usual social structures of mourning rites will be overwhelmed. The normal channels of community support will be gone in the face of such universal loss; only inward grief will be possible (24:23).

But in the deepest depths of the gloom comes hope of a turning point in Judah's fortunes. On the very day when the blow falls on Ezekiel's compatriots, when the news of the fall of Jerusalem is confirmed by a fugitive, Ezekiel's lips will be opened and he will be dumb no more (24:27). This dumbness was imposed on him at the outset of his ministry (see 3:26). He was thereby unable to intercede for the people, indeed, unable to speak anything at all except words of judgment. But a time is coming when his dumbness will be removed. With the destruction of Jerusalem, his words of judgment for the city will come to an end; their time will be complete.

Here ends the first lesson, we might say—the lesson of inevitable and incredible judgment poured out on sinners. The prophet's dumbness will be ended, and God's favor will once again be extended toward his people. This promise marks a shift in the nature of Ezekiel's proclamation. In the chapters that follow, it will be time for the prophet to speak words of judgment on the surrounding nations, Israel's enemies (chs. 25–32), and then, when the promise of the removal of dumbness is fulfilled (ch. 33), words of hope to God's chosen people (chs. 34–48).

Bridging Contexts

MEAT AND BLOOD. Filthy pots encrusted with burnt food are familiar to all places and times. Even modern technology has produced little answer to the basic problem; in my experience, the "potscrubber" cycle on the average dishwasher is a hopelessly over-optimistic designation. Old-fashioned elbow grease is required to try and shift the carbonated remains of serious culinary disasters, and even then sometimes all efforts are in vain.

But the moral and cultic dimensions of the intended meal of Ezekiel 24 may easily be lost on us. We are used to eating meat as a daily experience, unless we are vegetarian. In an ancient culture, however, unless you were exceptionally wealthy, eating meat was a rare experience, usually associated with a sacrifice. On this occasion, Jerusalem's inhabitants are themselves the sacrifice, but the end result is unfit for consumption because of the city's defilement. All that is produced at the end of the fiery trial is a defiled pot, filled with a blackened mess, which even the most extreme measures cannot cleanse.

The concern to handle blood appropriately is also rather distant from us. Blood was regarded as a peculiarly sacred liquid in Israel. It contained the life of the creature (Lev. 17:11) and in consequence had to be disposed of properly. If it was the blood of a clean animal, slaughtered as a sacrifice, it was poured out beside the altar (Deut. 12:27). If it was the blood of a profane animal, slaughtered for meat, it was to be poured out on the ground (12:16, 24) and covered with earth (Lev. 17:13). In this way, proper respect was shown for the agent of animate life.

In its original intention, blood was a taboo that emphasized Israel's calling to be "pro-life" in the fullest sense. But Jerusalem had proved careless about bloodshed, even the shedding of human blood. It was a place where life was cheap. Her inhabitants had neglected their responsibility to take seriously the requirement of Genesis 9:6, that human bloodshed be regarded as a crime of utmost seriousness, because of the nature of human beings as created in the image of God. In consequence, her blood also would be shed by God without pity and her life held to be cheap.

The hidden wisdom of God's set purposes. Much more problematic for the contemporary reader is the death of Ezekiel's wife and his prohibition from mourning. On the one hand, the conception is prevalent among Christians that "God loves you and has a wonderful plan for your life." Even though we may steer clear of its excesses, the health and wealth gospel ("God loves you and wants to give you a Cadillac and a mansion by the Country Club") still influences our thinking. We tend to believe that God's loving plan for our lives must surely include reasonable health, a job, a spouse, and a decent standard of living. If any of these things are absent from our lives, we tend to place the responsibility not on God but on the forces of evil in the world. God wants us to have these things, we theorize, but we are caught in the crossfire of the cosmic battle.

Nowhere in his Word does God promise us such an easy ride through life. Nor does he pass off responsibility on others. He is the sovereign Lord, which means that even on the battleground, the buck stops with him. Ezekiel's wife dies not because God is powerless to prevent such a thing happening, but because God has a significant purpose to accomplish through that "evil" also. It is a painful providence for the prophet to bear, but nonetheless he must receive this bitter cup too from the hand of his loving Father. As Job, another Old Testament figure equally tormented by God, put it so succinctly: "Shall we accept good from God, and not trouble?" (Job 2:10).

That God takes such dramatic action to highlight the situation is a measure of the seriousness of Judah's sin and the pain level of the coming judgment—both for Judah and for Judah's God. But what God asks his people to undergo for his sake is no more than what he himself is willing to go through for their sake. His beloved Son, Jesus, is nailed to the cross, the ultimate act of wicked men in consort together, but this itself is nothing other than God's "set purpose" (Acts 2:23). God has the right to do with his creatures as he sees fit. It may not have been the course of events we would have chosen, but that is hardly the point. The point is that God's purposes are determined with a wisdom that is above our wisdom, on the basis of thoughts that are above our thoughts. Submitting to the will of such a good God, who did not spare his own Son but freely gave him up for us, is no stoic fatalism but the freeing dependence of a trusting child.

Ancient mourning patterns. But how could God ask Ezekiel not to mourn for his wife? Isn't this an inhuman demand? Again, our unfamiliarity with the ancient culture leads us to undue psychologizing. In fact, what God asks of Ezekiel is hardly a unique occurrence. As a priest, Ezekiel would have been familiar with the restrictions on public mourning for priests in active service prescribed in Leviticus 21. A priest was not permitted to make himself ritually unclean—as formal mourning would require—for any except the closest of his relatives (21:1–4), while the high priest was not even permitted to mourn for his father or mother (21:11). Similarly, after the deaths of Nadab and Abihu in Leviticus 10, their father Aaron and their brothers Eleazar and Ithamar were forbidden to mourn for them, even though the rest of Israel could (10:6).

That does not mean that they could not feel the pain of the loss in their hearts—undoubtedly they would have—but public mourning was not permitted for the sacred person. Thus what the Lord asks of Ezekiel is not an unfeeling psychological imposition ("your wife whom you love will die and you must pretend nothing has happened") but simply a refraining from the normal social customs. His behavior was certainly regarded as odd, so that the people ask him why he is acting in this way (24:19), but it was not inhuman.

Contemporary Significance

THE CERTAINTY OF God's just judgment. When judgment comes it will always be unexpected, no matter how clearly and often God's messengers have warned of its coming. So it was in the case of Jerusalem. Ezekiel had warned repeatedly of its certain doom, and now he speaks for the final time before that doom was realized. The fire was now kindled, ready to consume the contaminated mess that filled Jerusalem. This fire would not purify the inhabitants of the city, for they were beyond such help. It was designed simply to destroy.

What has this ancient history to do with us? The fall of Jerusalem in 586 B.C. acts as a picture of the ultimate destruction of the world. Though the scoffers may doubt that such a day of the Lord will ever happen, seeing the delay on God's part as evidence that judgment will never come (2 Peter 3:3–4), God's wrath will be poured out on the world in due season. It will come like a thief in the night (3:10), and the visible universe will disappear. God's patience, long-suffering though it is, will ultimately be exhausted, and the fire of his wrath will be poured out on the world.

Why? It is because there is no other suitable means for dealing with recalcitrant, impenitent sinners. Justice must ultimately be done, and it will be. As Abraham put it in Genesis 18:25, "Will not the Judge of all the earth do right?" Indeed he will, and the end result will be destruction for the world, as it was for Sodom and Gomorrah. The purpose of this fiery conflagration is not the purification of the wicked. Having refused to be cleansed (Ezek. 24:13), now God's people have nothing to expect but payment in full for what their actions deserve, which is God's wrath poured out without pity or holding back (24:14).

Living in the light of God's judgment. Is this just an "Old Testament" perspective on God that is out of step with the fullness of "New Testament" revelation of God's love? Not at all. The writer to the Hebrews warns of the fearful fate that awaits anyone who turns his or her back on the revelation of God in Christ:

If we deliberately keep on sinning after we have received the knowledge of the truth, no sacrifice for sins is left, but only a fearful expectation of judgment and of raging fire that will consume the enemies of God. Anyone who rejected the law of Moses died without mercy on the testimony of two or three witnesses. How much more severely do you think a man deserves to be punished who has trampled the Son of God under foot, who has treated as an unholy thing the blood of the covenant that sanctified him, and who has insulted the Spirit of grace? For we know him who said, "It is mine to avenge; I will repay," and again, "The Lord will judge his people." It is a dreadful thing to fall into the hands of the living God. (Heb. 10:26–31)

In the face of this fearful prospect, how should we then live? Unquestionably, the passing away of this present age should be the dominant reality in our thinking. As Paul tells the Corinthians, this knowledge should affect our attitudes to all our relationships, our emotions, and our possessions.

What I mean, brothers, is that the time is short. From now on those who have wives should live as if they had none; those who mourn, as if they did not; those who are happy, as if they were not; those who buy something, as if it were not theirs to keep; those who use the things of the world, as if not engrossed in them.

For this world in its present form is passing away. (1 Cor. 7:29–31)

There will come a day for all of us as individuals and for this world as a whole when "time" will be called on mercy and God's wrath will be let loose. In the meantime we live as Ezekiel did, as men and women under orders. We have been commissioned for the battle, and even the most precious things we possess here on earth we have merely as stewards. We do not own our children, or our wives, or even our own bodies. Bearing God's message to the world can be a costly business for us, just as it was for Ezekiel. This level of commitment is something that the world finds hard to understand.

The fact that Hollywood fails to grasp this level of self-giving was graphically demonstrated to me by a scene in the film At Play in the Fields of the Lord. In this scene, a missionary to South America was depicted burying his only child, who had died of blackwater fever. As the rain came pouring down, he cried out to the heavens, "I didn't give my permission!" Though there may be those whose faith has been shaken to the core by the costly nature of missionary service, the history of centuries of Christian martyr-witnesses¹² is that over and over again Christians have given God "permission"—as if such permission were required! As Martin Luther put it in his great hymn:

And though they take my life, goods, honor, children, wife,
Yet is their profit small: these things shall vanish all
The city of God remaineth.

Nor is it simply missionaries who are mere stewards of the things of this world. The same is true for all of us who name the name of Christ. God has the right at any moment to take from any of us the things that we hold dearest of all in this world. After all, he created both them and us. But more profoundly still, God has the right because he was willing to give up into the hands of sinful people the delight of his eyes, his only Son, the Lord Jesus Christ. He "gave his permission" for Jesus to be beaten and tortured and mocked. What is more, as Jesus hung on that cross, God himself did not show him mercy but instead poured out the full weight of his wrath over our sins on him. The consuming fire of God's wrath against sin was kindled on Jesus, without pity or holding back.

God and the cross of his Son. Yet just as the deepest night for Jerusalem is the beginning of the end of God's wrath on his people and the turning point to hope in Ezekiel's message, so also the death of Jesus Christ on the cross is the turning point in the history of redemption. The blackness of Good Friday causes the light of Easter Sunday to break out with fresh power for Christ's disciples. The taking away of their Lord, the delight of their eyes, to lay him in a tomb, paradoxically, is the means by which they may be enabled to enjoy him forever.

Since God did not spare his own Son, surely he has the right to ask us not to spare even the delight of our eyes, whatever that is. We should be willing to give it up freely for the sake of spreading the good news and for the sake of the glory of this great God. Nor is it enough merely to be willing; sometimes, God actually takes from us that which is most precious to us. In those moments, as we are enabled by his grace to say, "Not my will, but yours be done, Lord," we become living signs to the world around us of God's grace and glory. We become living demonstrations of the fact that we do not regard God as our accomplice, whose job is to ensure that we live comfortable and fulfilling lives. Rather, he is our Lord, who has bought us with a price and owns us and everything we have. Moreover, we do not mourn as the world mourns, for in the midst of our sadness and real sense of painful loss, we know the assurance that just as our Lord has risen, so also will all his people.

But the cross also reminds us of the certainty of judgment on all who refuse its offer of life. It is this reality that lends urgency to our proclamation of the gospel. For us there is still time. The end of the world has not yet been pronounced. Our tongues have not been silenced. Far from it, we have been given a gospel to share with every creature under heaven that there is one name given to people by which they may yet be saved, the name of Jesus Christ. We have been commanded to preach the good news to all freely, that many may come to Christ and experience his forgiveness and mercy. However, we must never forget that the time we have been given is not unlimited, and the final judgment announced repeatedly in the Scriptures will one day become a reality—a joyful reality for all who are in Christ, but a fearful reality for those who remain outside.

Ezekiel 25

THE WORD OF THE LORD came to me: 2"Son of man, set your face against the Ammonites and prophesy against them. ³Say to them, 'Hear the word of the Sovereign LORD. This is what the Sovereign LORD says: Because you said "Aha!" over my sanctuary when it was desecrated and over the land of Israel when it was laid waste and over the people of Judah when they went into exile, 4therefore I am going to give you to the people of the East as a possession. They will set up their camps and pitch their tents among you; they will eat your fruit and drink your milk. ⁵I will turn Rabbah into a pasture for camels and Ammon into a resting place for sheep. Then you will know that I am the LORD. ⁶For this is what the Sovereign LORD says: Because you have clapped your hands and stamped your feet, rejoicing with all the malice of your heart against the land of Israel, ⁷therefore I will stretch out my hand against you and give you as plunder to the nations. I will cut you off from the nations and exterminate you from the countries. I will destroy you, and you will know that I am the LORD."

8"This is what the Sovereign LORD says:
'Because Moab and Seir said, "Look, the house of Judah has become like all the other nations," 9therefore I will expose the flank of Moab, beginning at its frontier towns—Beth Jeshimoth, Baal Meon and Kiriathaim—the glory of that land. 10 will give Moab along with the Ammonites to the people of the East as a possession, so that the Ammonites will not be remembered among the nations; 11 and I will inflict punishment on Moab. Then they will know that I am the LORD.'"

¹⁵"This is what the Sovereign LORD says: 'Because the Philistines acted in vengeance and took revenge with malice in their hearts, and with ancient hostility sought to destroy Judah, ¹⁶therefore this is what the Sovereign LORD says: I am about to stretch out my hand against the Philistines, and I will cut off the Kerethites and destroy those remaining along the coast. ¹⁷I will carry out great vengeance on them and punish them in my wrath. Then they will know that I am the LORD, when I take vengeance on them.'"

Original Meaning

WITH THIS CHAPTER, we move into a new section of Ezekiel's prophecy: a series of oracles against the surrounding nations (chs. 25–32). They are arranged as a series of six oracles addressed to Judah's immediate neighbors (chs. 25–29, the first four in ch. 25), followed by a climactic seventh oracle against the traditional enemy, Egypt (chs. 30–32). The nations around Judah are addressed in clockwise order, starting with Ammon in the Transjordan to the east of the northern kingdom of Israel, and moving south to the other Transjordanian foes, Moab and Edom. After that, the prophet turns his attention west to Philistia in the southern coastal plain and then north to the coastal cities of Tyre and Sidon.

Oracles against foreign nations are a common genre in the prophets and typically include a direct address by God to the nation concerned, charges of arrogant attitudes and/or actions (esp. against Israel), and a prediction of the nation's doom.² All of these elements are found in classical form in the oracle against Ammon (25:1–7).

In this oracle the Lord tells the prophet to set his face toward the Ammonites and prophesy against them (25:2), charging them with rejoicing over Judah's downfall. They exulted in noisy triumph, saying "Aha!" (he hah, the ancient equivalent of cheering) when the sanctuary was desecrated, the land of Israel laid waste, and the people of Judah exiled (25:3). Instead of being appalled at the tragedy that had overcome the sacred place, the holy land, and the chosen people, they regarded their destruction as a cause for celebration. They saw it as proof positive that the triangular relationship between the nation of Israel, her land, and her deity was broken forever. Judah's fall demonstrated to them the superiority of their gods over Yahweh. Hands, feet, and inner emotions were all united in celebration of the Ammonites' hatred of Israel (25:6).4

Because of that attitude, the Ammonites too would experience judgment. Their own land would be laid waste, given to invaders from the East, a perpetual threat for those who inhabited the towns of the Transjordan (25:4). Their produce would be eaten by others and their people cut off, exterminated, and destroyed—a threefold fate to match their threefold rejoicing (25:4, 7).

As a result of this judgment the Ammonites "will know that I am the LORD" (25:7). This recognition formula, which occurs over sixty times in Ezekiel as a whole, is a dominant theme in these foreign nation oracles. The nations will recognize the Lord's sovereignty when he acts to judge not only his own people but them as well. In so doing, he will demonstrate that he is the only one with power to judge or to deliver; in the face of the Lord's fury, their gods are impotent to save them.

The oracle against Moab (25:8–11) charges them with saying, "Look, the house of Judah has become like all the other nations" (v. 8). The irony is that there was not a little truth in that statement: Judah had indeed in large measure become like the nations in the way she lived, giving herself over to idolatry (20:32). But it could never be true in the sense in which Moab had intended, so that this statement is nothing short of blasphemy on her lips.

They meant, "Judah's fall demonstrates that her claims to elect status by the Lord are worthless; she is a reject nation, thrown onto the scrap heap of history along with her god." Instead, it is Moab who will be utterly destroyed, along with Ammon. They are the ones who will be left unremembered on the stage of world history, along with their gods, thus demonstrating the reality and uniqueness of the Lord's existence and sovereign power to act (25:10).

The Edomites (25:12–14) seem not merely to have gloated over the downfall of Judah but to have actively participated in it. The brief statement of verse 12 that "Edom took revenge on the house of Judah" is fleshed out in more detail in the book of Obadiah. There Edom is accused of aiding and abetting the Babylonians, seizing Judah's wealth, cutting down the fugitives, and handing over the survivors (Obad. 11–14). Although they were from a biblical perspective close kin of the Israelites (Num. 20:14–15; Deut. 23:7–8), they had no compassion on their brothers. Moreover, instead of the Lord's judgment on his people putting the fear of Israel's God into their neighbors, they viewed it simply as an opportunity for personal gain and the settling of old scores. The result of their seeking revenge on Judah, however, will be God's execution of vengeance on them, using his own people to do so (Ezek. 25:14).

In 25:15–17 the Philistines are likewise charged with trying to settle old scores, taking revenge with malice in their hearts, and seeking to work out their "ancient hostility" (lit., "eternal enmity") toward Israel in the destruction of the chosen people. They too will experience the vengeance of God: The Kerethites will be cut off (Kereth sounds like $k\bar{a}rat$, the Hebrew word for "cut off") and the Philistines destroyed. It will be vengeance for vengeance. Then they too will recognize the Lord's sovereign power (25:17).

Bridging Contexts

WHY SHOULD A PROPHET who has spent so much time addressing the sins of his own people suddenly turn around and address the surrounding nations? Was it any of his business what these other nations thought and did? Even if the prophet had made it his business, what does it concern us, especially when the nations addressed have long since crumbled into the dust? What possible relevance could these chapters have for the twentieth-century reader? In practice, if not in theory, these chapters tend to be bracketed off and ignored in our thinking about the book of Ezekiel. If the book as a whole is rarely preached, that is doubly true of the oracles against the nations.

Intended audience and message. One answer to the question of relevance might be to see the prophet as a kind of international diplomat, a one-man precursor of the United Nations, addressing war crimes on a transnational level. The problem with that approach, however, is that there is no evidence that these oracles were actually delivered to the nations addressed or were ever intended to be. The real audience for these oracles is the Judean listener, not the putative listener in the nation addressed.

So what message is contained in these foreign nation oracles for the Judean listener? (1) They are being assured that God does not operate on a double standard, whereby he judges only Israel's sins while the nations are free to behave as they like. Judgment may begin with the house of God, but it doesn't end there. The outpouring of God's wrath extends not simply to the rebels in his own house but also to all those who refuse to recognize his sovereignty. They too must come to "know that I am the LORD"; that is, they must and will ultimately acknowledge that he is the only true God, the one who holds the nations in the palm of his hand, who raises up kingdoms and brings them down again according to his own good pleasure (cf. Isa. 40:15–24).

(2) In spite of the outpouring of God's wrath on his people, they nonetheless remain his people, who are infinitely precious to him. It is noteworthy that the charge leveled against each of the foreign nations in Ezekiel 25 is that they have persecuted or insulted God's chosen people, and thereby insulted God. To take God's people lightly is never a safe thing to do in the Old Testament. In spite of the pattern of sin among Abraham's offspring, God's word to Abraham was still effective: "I will bless those who bless you, and whoever curses you I will curse; and all peoples on earth will be blessed through you" (Gen. 12:3). Those who rejoice over Israel's downfall—even over her downfall at the hands of the Lord himself—are simply inviting a curse on their own heads, a curse that Ezekiel pronounces effective.

(3) Ezekiel's Judean hearers are reminded that God has his own consistent designs behind all the events of history, the prime purpose of which is to bring glory to himself. Judgment will fall on these nations who mock and abuse Judah in her hour of distress for the same reason that it fell originally on Judah herself: The Lord will thereby be recognized as a powerful and holy God, who acts in and through history.

This consistency of design on God's part is itself a message of encouragement to God's people. The one who said, "Whoever curses you I will curse," is the same one who said, "All peoples on earth will be blessed through you." If the first statement is still operative, then so also is the second. The fact that this goal had not yet been achieved indicated to the people of Judah that God's purposes were not yet at an end as far as their nation was concerned, no matter how bleak her future outlook may have seemed from a human perspective.

Contemporary Significance

SATAN'S STRATEGIES. The assaults of Satan on the church come in a number of different forms. Essentially, however, they boil down to three basic strategies: persecution, seduction, and deception. When he adopts the strategy of persecution, Satan appears as a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour (1 Peter 5:8). But he can also just as easily dress himself as an angel of light, seeking to deceive God's people (2 Cor. 11:14), or he can utilize the Great Prostitute to seduce God's people (Rev. 18). All three of these strategies have been at work in his assault on Judah through the surrounding nations, as we will see in the next few chapters, and the oracles against the foreign nations give God's answers to Satan's assaults in order to fortify his people.

The nations immediately surrounding Judah, which are the focus in Ezekiel 25, have been Satan's willing tools in persecuting God's people. Taking advantage of God's acts of judgment, they rejoiced at her downfall and made it worse. God's answer to his people's cry of "How long, Sovereign Lord?" (cf. Rev. 6:10) is a declaration of judgment on the persecutors. The blood of the martyrs cries out for justice, and justice it will receive. The message to the church or the Christian undergoing persecution is that God sees what is happening and in due season will act and judge.

The certainty of judgment on those who lift a finger against God's elect applies not merely to Satan's human agents but to the spiritual forces of evil as well. They will ultimately be thrown into the lake of burning sulfur, where they will be tormented day and night forever (Rev. 20:10). Such an eternal punishment is a fitting end for Satan, the one whose "eternal enmity" toward God and his people finds merely a faint echo in the "eternal enmity" between the Philistines and Israel (Ezek. 25:15).

God's delay in judgment. But if God will ultimately act to break the teeth of the wicked, why does he wait so long? Why does he not immediately intervene to bring on them the judgment they deserve, just as he acted to judge Jerusalem? Sometimes, of course, he does, as in the case of Sodom and Gomorrah, but those cases seem to be the exception rather than the rule. One answer to the question of why God delays is so that he may show mercy even to the wicked. The persecutors themselves may yet be shown mercy. Thus Peter answers those who accuse God of tardiness in keeping his promises of justice by the assertion that "[God] is patient with you, not wanting anyone to perish, but everyone to come to repentance" (2 Peter 3:9). God delays the coming of judgment so that Saul the persecutor can be turned into Paul the apostle.

However, the display of God's mercy is not the only reason for his delay. The persecution of the church and the martyrdom of Christians is not simply a means to an end—a way of strengthening the church and bringing about conversions—it is an end in itself. Simply put, martyrs bring glory to God as they lay down their lives. As people freely give up their lives in the service of the gospel, they demonstrate that, for them at least, the Lord is God. He is more precious to them than life itself. In some cases, persecution may strengthen the church. In others, it may seem to succeed in stamping it out.8 But in every case, it brings about a testimony to the lordship of Jesus Christ. That testimony may be accepted or rejected by the persecutors here and now. But ultimately God will not be ashamed to be known as the God of those who have suffered for him, and the knowledge of his universal lordship will then be universally recognized even by those who sought unremittingly here on earth to stamp that knowledge out.

A warning. However, it may also be that in some cases we fill the role of the surrounding nations rather than that of God's suffering people. For a common theme in God's accusation of the nations is that they rejoiced at the divine judgment falling on others. Perhaps we too have been heedless or even happy when our opponents have apparently received their "comeuppance" at the hands of God, whether those opponents be inside or outside the Christian community. We have perhaps been secretly, or not so secretly, glad over the fall of prominent televangelists; some have even gleefully proclaimed that the AIDS virus is a judgment from God against homosexuals.

God's judgment is real in history as well as beyond history, but it should never be contemplated lightly. We would do well to remember the words of Jesus that the measure we use in judging others will be the same one used on us (Luke 6:38). Rather, with reverent fear and trembling before the awful reality of the judgment of God, we should seek to persuade all people to flee the wrath to come (2 Cor. 5:10–11).

Ezekiel 26–27

IN THE ELEVENTH YEAR, on the first day of the month, the word of the LORD came to me: ²"Son of man, because Tyre has said of Jerusalem, 'Aha! The gate to the nations is broken, and its doors have swung open to me; now that she lies in ruins I will prosper,' ³therefore this is what the Sovereign LORD says: I am against you, O Tyre, and I will bring many nations against you, like the sea casting up its waves. ⁴They will destroy the walls of Tyre and pull down her towers; I will scrape away her rubble and make her a bare rock. ⁵Out in the sea she will become a place to spread fishnets, for I have spoken, declares the Sovereign LORD. She will become plunder for the nations, ⁶ and her settlements on the mainland will be ravaged by the sword. Then they will know that I am the LORD.

7"For this is what the Sovereign LORD says: From the north I am going to bring against Tyre Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, king of kings, with horses and chariots, with horsemen and a great army. 8He will ravage your settlements on the mainland with the sword; he will set up siege works against you, build a ramp up to your walls and raise his shields against you. ⁹He will direct the blows of his battering rams against your walls and demolish your towers with his weapons. ¹⁰His horses will be so many that they will cover you with dust. Your walls will tremble at the noise of the war horses, wagons and chariots when he enters your gates as men enter a city whose walls have been broken through. ¹¹The hoofs of his horses will trample all your streets; he will kill your people with the sword, and your strong pillars will fall to the ground. ¹²They will plunder your wealth and loot your merchandise; they will break down your walls and demolish your fine houses and throw your stones, timber and rubble into the sea. ¹³I will put an end to your noisy songs, and the music of your harps will be heard no more. ¹⁴I will make you a bare rock, and you will become a place to spread fishnets. You will never be rebuilt, for I the LORD have spoken, declares the Sovereign LORD.

15"This is what the Sovereign LORD says to Tyre: Will not the coastlands tremble at the sound of your fall, when the wounded groan and the slaughter takes place in you? ¹⁶Then all the princes of the coast will step down from their thrones and lay aside their robes and take off their embroidered garments. Clothed with terror, they will sit on the ground, trembling every moment, appalled at you. ¹⁷Then they will take up a lament concerning you and say to you:

"'How you are destroyed, O city of renown, peopled by men of the sea!
You were a power on the seas, you and your citizens; you put your terror on all who lived there.

18 Now the coastlands tremble on the day of your fall; the islands in the sea are terrified at your collapse.'

¹⁹"This is what the Sovereign LORD says: When I make you a desolate city, like cities no longer inhabited, and when I bring the ocean depths over you and its vast waters cover you, ²⁰then I will bring you down with those who go down to the pit, to the people of long ago. I will make you dwell in the earth below, as in ancient ruins, with those who go down to the pit, and you will not return or take your place in the land of the living. ²¹I will bring you to a horrible end and you will be no more. You will be sought, but you will never again be found, declares the Sovereign LORD."

^{27:1}The word of the LORD came to me: ²"Son of man, take up a lament concerning Tyre. ³Say to Tyre, situated at the gateway to the sea, merchant of peoples on many coasts, 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says:

" 'You say, O Tyre,

"I am perfect in beauty."

⁴Your domain was on the high seas; your builders brought your beauty to perfection.

⁵They made all your timbers of pine trees from Senir; they took a cedar from Lebanon to make a mast for you.

⁶Of oaks from Bashan they made your oars; of cypress wood from the coasts of Cyprus they made your deck, inlaid with ivory.

⁷Fine embroidered linen from Egypt was your sail and served as your banner; your awnings were of blue and purple from the coasts of Elishah.

⁸Men of Sidon and Arvad were your oarsmen; your skilled men, O Tyre, were aboard as your seamen.

⁹Veteran craftsmen of Gebal were on board as shipwrights to caulk your seams. All the ships of the sea and their sailors came alongside to trade for your wares.

10" 'Men of Persia, Lydia and Put served as soldiers in your army.

They hung their shields and helmets on your walls, bringing you splendor.

¹¹Men of Arvad and Helech manned your walls on every side; men of Gammad were in your towers.

They hung their shields around your walls; they brought your beauty to perfection.

12" 'Tarshish did business with you because of your great wealth of goods; they exchanged silver, iron, tin and lead for your merchandise.

¹³" 'Greece, Tubal and Meshech traded with you; they exchanged slaves and articles of bronze for your wares.

14" 'Men of Beth Togarmah exchanged work horses, war horses and mules for your merchandise.

15" 'The men of Rhodes traded with you, and many coastlands were your customers; they paid you with ivory tusks and ebony.

¹⁶" 'Aram did business with you because of your many products; they exchanged turquoise, purple fabric, embroidered work, fine linen, coral and rubies for your merchandise.

¹⁸" 'Damascus, because of your many products and great wealth of goods, did business with you in wine from Helbon and wool from Zahar.

19" 'Danites and Greeks from Uzal bought your merchandise; they exchanged wrought iron, cassia and calamus for your wares.

²⁰" 'Dedan traded in saddle blankets with you.

25" 'The ships of Tarshish serve as carriers for your wares. You are filled with heavy cargo in the heart of the sea. ²⁶Your oarsmen take you out to the high seas. But the east wind will break you to pieces in the heart of the sea. ²⁷Your wealth, merchandise and wares, your mariners, seamen and shipwrights, your merchants and all your soldiers, and everyone else on board will sink into the heart of the sea on the day of your shipwreck. ²⁸The shorelands will quake when your seamen cry out. ²⁹All who handle the oars will abandon their ships: the mariners and all the seamen will stand on the shore.

³⁰They will raise their voice and cry bitterly over you; they will sprinkle dust on their heads and roll in ashes.

³¹They will shave their heads because of you and will put on sackcloth.

They will weep over you with anguish of soul and with bitter mourning.

32As they wail and mourn over you, they will take up a lament concerning you:

"Who was ever silenced like Tyre, surrounded by the sea?"

³³When your merchandise went out on the seas, you satisfied many nations; with your great wealth and your wares you enriched the kings of the earth.

³⁴Now you are shattered by the sea in the depths of the waters; your wares and all your company have gone down with you.

35All who live in the coastlands are appalled at you; their kings shudder with horror and their faces are distorted with fear.

³⁶The merchants among the nations hiss at you; you have come to a horrible end and will be no more.'"

Original Meaning

IN CONTRAST TO the short oracles against the nations in Ezekiel 25, the oracle against Tyre covers almost three chapters (26:1–28:19). The remainder of chapter 28 is taken up by a brief oracle against Tyre's companion town Sidon (28:20–23) and then an oracle of encouragement to Israel (28:24–26), which draws together the oracles to Israel's immediate neighbors. Rather than study such a large section in one piece, we will break it into two parts (chs. 26–27 and ch. 28), but because of the style of composition of the oracle we should remember that the three chapters form a single unit. In that way, we will be reminded to see the scope of the whole as well as the significance of the individual parts.

The oracle against Tyre is composed of three distinct but essentially parallel literary panels, each of which ends with the same concluding phrase about Tyre's going down to the realm of the dead: It will come "to a horrible end" (ballahôt) and "will be no more" ('ênēk 'ad-'ôlām; see 26:21; 27:36; 28:19). The purpose of this panel construction is not to present three separate and different oracles but to invite the reader to place the three oracles side by side and see essentially the same message presented in three different ways.

The First Panel (26:2–21)

THE FIRST PANEL is a straightforward prophecy against the city of Tyre. It is introduced by a date, the first day of an unnamed month in the eleventh year (v. 1). This places the oracle close to the fall of Jerusalem, which occurred in the middle of the eleventh year (cf. 40:1). The charge against Tyre is similar to that raised against Judah's other neighbors: She rejoiced when Jerusalem fell, seeing in that event the opportunity for personal gain: "The gate to the nations is broken, and its doors have swung open to me" (26:2). A potential rival for her trading empire has been eliminated, opening up new avenues to prosperity.²

Ezekiel is quick to point out the flaw in Tyre's thinking. The God who brought judgment on Jerusalem is also against Tyre and will judge her in an almost exactly corresponding manner (26:3). Does Tyre hope to become the new meeting place for the nations? The Lord will bring many nations against her (26:3). Did Tyre rejoice to see Jerusalem's doors shattered? Her walls will be destroyed and her towers torn down (26:4). Did Tyre expect to prosper? She will become plunder for the nations (26:5). Point by point, Tyre's positive expectations are turned on their heads.

The assault of the nations on Tyre is described as being like the waves of a stormy sea (26:3), which is a peculiarly apt image for the city of Tyre. It was originally built on a coastal island about a mile long and half a mile wide, whose strength came from its position surrounded by water. These metaphorical possibilities of Tyre's geographical situation will be utilized to the full in the second panel, where she is described as a great ship.

The second part of the first oracle against Tyre adds specificity to the picture. The general expression "many nations" (26:3) resolves into the specific figure of Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon (26:7). The assault and destruction of Tyre is described in great, if rather stereotypical, detail (26:8–12).³ But the end result is exactly the same: Tyre will be reduced to a bare rock, the haunt of local fishermen rather than of long-distance trading vessels (26:5, 14). Her former glory will never be regained (26:14).

The terrible fall of Tyre will have an impact on her maritime trading partners, the "coastlands" or "islands" (26:15). They will tremble and adopt the customs of mourning, with their rulers coming down from their thrones and setting aside their fine robes (26:16), taking up a lament for the fallen city. It will be as if the island city has sunk into the heart of the chaotic "ocean depths" (thôm, 26:19), its inhabitants condemned to "the pit" (bôr, 26:20), never to return again. These are terms with mythical overtones, though as elsewhere in Scripture the mythical symbols have been completely subjugated in a universe under God's control. The "deep" was an element of the primeval chaos that God transformed into cosmos in Genesis 1, while "the pit" was the shadowy underworld of the dead, the nightmare end of those abandoned by God (see Ps. 28:1; 30:3; 88:4; 143:7). Though people seek for Tyre, she will have utterly vanished, sunk by God's torpedoes, never again to be found (Ezek. 26:21).

The Second Panel (27:1–36)

THE SECOND PANEL (27:1–36) proclaims essentially the same message as the first, but in the form of a lament. The lament genre typically contrasts past glory with present loss, and Ezekiel exploits this format to the full. He describes in great detail the glory of Tyre under the metaphor of a majestic ship. She was a legend in her own mind, beautiful to the point of perfection (27:3), created out of the best resources of the surrounding nations. She was fitted out with prime timbers for her construction, fine cloth for her sails and awnings (27:5–7). Her crew had been recruited from the best manpower available: skilled seamen to form her crew, experienced craftsmen to make necessary repairs, and highly trained soldiers to act as her company of marines (27:8–11b), bringing her beauty to perfection (27:11c). Could there ever have been a more perfect ship?

Nor was her beauty merely cosmetic. The merchant ship Tyre is depicted as a highly efficient business machine, trading in all kinds of costly goods. The seemingly interminable list of her trading partners, whether borrowed from an extant source or modeled after that form, makes clear the astonishing array of her wares. The cargo list seems to be organized by geographic areas, starting with Mediterranean locations and those in Asia Minor (27:12–15) and moving on through Palestinian regions from south to north (27:16–17) to Syria (27:18–19), Arabia (27:20–22), and finally Mesopotamia (27:23–24). By covering all points of the compass and virtually every imaginable precious commodity, the picture is established of Tyre as the commercial crossroads of the world, the Hong Kong of the ancient Near East.

But the paean of praise for her beauty and commercial importance only heightens the tragedy of her downfall. Like the Titanic, she fell victim to her own self-propaganda. Her apparent invincibility contains the seeds of her own downfall. She is "filled with heavy cargo in the heart of the sea" (27:25), a description that fits the city Tyre literally as well as the ship Tyre metaphorically. But when the stormy wind blows, the sea that provides the source of the mariner's wealth can easily become an enemy. An east wind (from Babylon) will start to blow, and the mighty vessel will founder with the loss of all hands (27:26–27). The rapidity with which her demise can be described contrasts starkly with the lengthy description of her beauty. Her beauty and security count for nothing when the storm strikes.

As in the first panel, once again those who watch from the sidelines tremble, and a lament is raised for the doomed city. This time those who adopt the customary forms of mourning—weeping, wailing, sackcloth, dust and ashes, shaving their heads—are the sailors and seafaring people in company with the kings of the coastlands and the merchants (27:28–36). Tyre's joy over the destruction of "the gate to the nations" (26:2) is seen to be thoroughly misplaced, for the one who judged Jerusalem will also judge Tyre, the marketplace of the "nations" (27:33, 36). The end result for Tyre is the same as the first panel: Tyre will "come to a horrible end and will be no more" (27:36).

Bridging Contexts

THE GOAL OF TYRE. This oracle against Tyre is distinctively different from the other oracles against the foreign nations. The remainder of the nations immediately surrounding Israel (Ammon, Moab, Edom, Philistia, and—after Tyre—Sidon) set themselves up in opposition to God's people. Tyre, however, thought to substitute herself for God's city, Jerusalem, and take her place. She thought that the downfall of the chosen city was her opportunity to become the center of the universe, "the gate to the nations" (26:2). It was a role for which she seemed admirably naturally gifted, as the oracle and lament make clear. She possessed not only a strategic location but also great beauty and wealth. She was the Hong Kong of the ancient world, a bustling trading city at the crossroads of east and west.

Indeed, in terms of natural advantages, Tyre was far more suited to the description "the gate to the nations" (26:2) than was Jerusalem. Jerusalem may have been poetically described by the psalmist as being "beautiful in its loftiness, the joy of the whole earth" (Ps. 48:2). However, we should not assume that this is an "objective" description that could equally well have been found on the pages of an ancient Architectural Digest as on the pages of Scripture. Jerusalem's beauty was spiritually discerned, based on her election as "the city of our God" (Ps. 48:1). So too was her security, which rested not on the supposed impregnability of being an island, dwelling in the midst of the seas, but rather on the presence of God within her (Ps. 48:3). The result of that indwelling presence is described by the psalmist in an image that matches exactly that of Ezekiel 27: When the kings of the earth gathered against Jerusalem, "you destroyed them like ships of Tarshish shattered by an east wind" (Ps. 48:7).

But the psalmist's confidence must have seemed to the exiles to have been ill-founded. Jerusalem had not survived the assault of the nations, but on the contrary had herself been shattered. Ezekiel had been called to give the reasons for this in the first part of his prophecy: Jerusalem lay under God's judgment for her sins and as a result had been abandoned by his presence. God was no longer within her, which explained her destruction. But in the nature of the case, with the destruction of God's own city, the attractions of her rivals must have increased. It is one thing to proclaim that God is greater than mammon to people who are comfortably off; it is another to proclaim that to a people who feel themselves to have been abandoned by their God.

The symbolism of the sea. It is to such people that the prophet addresses his oracle against Tyre. To those tempted to be seduced by Tyre's prosperity, he proclaims Tyre's ultimate doom. The city whose strength comes from her location in the heart of the seas will be drowned in the heart of the seas. This is an image far more potent for the ancient reader than for the modern. The sea may impress us with its power when whipped up into a storm, but for the ancient reader it possessed a mythological status as the personification of the forces of chaos that continually opposed the forces of order and threatened to overwhelm them.

In ancient creation narratives, the Sea (Yam) was one of the principal opponents of the gods, who had to be overcome before the world could be established. The Deep ($t^eh\hat{o}m$) appears similarly in Genesis 1, albeit in demythologized form, as the precreation state of void and wilderness that God transforms into a place of order and beauty and life (Gen. 1:2; cf. Ezek. 26:19). In the Psalms, the seas frequently represent the forces of chaos that are ranged against God, though the psalmist affirms that God is mightier than the seas (e.g., Ps. 93:3–4). In the new heavens and new earth there will be no more sea (Rev. 21:1), for all chaos will be finally and permanently overcome.

Therefore, Tyre's fate of foundering like a ship in a great storm, going down with all hands, perhaps carries more affective weight for its original readers than it does for us. The sea was a more emotive image for them than it is for us. Yet even to us, the oracle underlines once more that even the most destructive, out-of-control forces in the world operate under the direct control of God. He is the One who brings many nations against Tyre, "like the sea casting up its waves" (Ezek. 26:3), and natural defenses and strength will avail nothing against God's judgment. The seductive power of wealth is thus defused by showing its ultimate insecurity and final end. Like those who traveled first class on the Titanic, with all its unparalleled grandeur, those who place their trust in this world are traveling on a comfortable oneway trip to nowhere. As John Newton put it in one of his greatest hymns:

Fading is the worldling's pleasure, all his boasted pomp and show.

Contemporary Significance

SEDUCED BY SATAN. We mentioned in the comments on chapter 25 that Satan has three basic strategies for undermining the faith of God's people: persecution, seduction, and deception. All three are addressed in Ezekiel's oracles against the foreign nations. Several of Israel's neighbors have acted in a hostile manner towards her, persecuting her in her hour of difficulty, as we saw in chapter 25. But in the form of Tyre, we see especially the second strategy: seduction. The greater space devoted by Ezekiel to addressing this strategy perhaps demonstrates its relative significance as a temptation to his audience.

We would do well similarly to ponder the particular combination of strategies that Satan favors against us and those around us. For those who live in affluent Western culture, seduction is certainly a prominent element in his armory. We should therefore take particular note of the fact that in Revelation 2–3, the letters to the seven churches of Asia Minor, the two churches about which Jesus is purely positive are those experiencing persecution. Those about which Jesus is purely negative, by contrast, all face the assault of Satan in the form of seduction. All too often, while persecution purifies, seduction sedates.

The heart of seduction lies in the promise of prosperity and wealth. In the temptations of Jesus, Satan offered him "all the kingdoms of the world and their splendor" if Jesus would simply bow down to him (Matt. 4:8). So too he comes to contemporary people and offers comfort, peace, and security through material prosperity: Get a good job with a good salary and fringe benefits and you'll be set up for life. This is the philosophy adopted by many around us. As the bumper sticker puts it: "He who dies with the most toys wins." Never mind about questions of right or wrong, of ultimate significance or values; do whatever it takes to feel good and to win. That is seduction.

God's answer to Satan's seduction. The answer to seduction is not to offer people a different way to feel better and win more, as some imitation versions of Christianity proclaim. The health and wealth gospel declares that faith is the key to unlocking your full potential, so that you can have whatever you want here and now. All you have to do is "name it and claim it." In a materialistic society such an approach will always find followers, but it is merely another brand of seduction.

The true answer to seduction is to open people's eyes to the shallowness of the "beauty" on offer. The Great Prostitute of Revelation 17–18, "Babylon," is modeled in many respects after Ezekiel's description of Tyre. She sits on many waters (17:1), she is the ultimate trading nation (18:12–13), and when she falls the kings of the earth and the sailors mourn (18:9, 17). "Babylon" here is a cipher for Rome, and her trump card is wealth and luxury, in short, materialism. She is the front cover of Cosmopolitan and Vogue rolled into one. However beautiful and powerful Rome may appear, however, the book of Revelation reveals the truth that her beauty is only skin deep and her power is merely temporary. Judgment is coming, which will uncover the true nature of all things and put them into proper perspective.

Today the Great Prostitute lives not in Tyre or Rome, but in Hollywood and along Madison Avenue; her seductive voice speaks not in Latin but with an American accent, drawing the world away from God and towards materialistic excesses. Her power is seen in the fact that the good news of Coca Cola is more widely proclaimed than the good news of Jesus Christ. Consumerism is making disciples in all nations through its seductive charms.

At the heart of seduction, however, is a lie: that what you see is what you get. And Satan, the eternal liar, is skilled at making us see things from their most attractive perspective. Like an artful angler, he hides the hook and shows us only the juicy worm. Not until too late does the fish discover the steel within. So also Satan attempts to seduce us by showing us beautiful things that compete for our attention, hiding the bitter fruit they bear. He offers the pleasures of adultery, hiding the pain of broken relationships that follow. He persuades us that our children can do just as well in day care, while to succeed in our careers requires us to put in long hours at the office or shop. He persuades us that we really "need" a bigger house, a newer car, and more clothes. He counsels us that we should buy now and pay later. Satan's tackle box is well equipped with lures, but the truth in each of these cases is that we will indeed pay later for what we buy now.

How does God wean our hearts from the seductiveness of this world? (1) One way is through what the Puritans would call the "strokes" and "crosses" of life, the ways in which God causes things not to go as we had hoped. Like a good father, God does not allow us to run wild, but graciously disciplines us, sometimes by opening our eyes to see the hook before we bite and sometimes by using the pain of the hook to bring us to our senses. Thomas Boston described the power of a "cross providence" to bring powerful conviction of sin in these terms:

As when one walking heedlessly is suddenly taken ill of a lameness: his going halting the rest of the way convinces him of having made a wrong step; and every new painful step brings it afresh to his mind. So God makes a crook in one's lot, to convince him of some false step he has made or course he has taken.⁵

These are never the pleasant experiences of our spiritual walk, but as the writer to the Hebrews reminds us, such discipline "produces a harvest of righteousness and peace for those who have been trained by it" (Heb. 12:11).

(2) The other way for us to learn to resist the attractiveness of Satan's seduction is to learn to fix our eyes on the truth, on Jesus. If Jerusalem's beauty was spiritually discerned even during its prosperous days, then it was not surprising that many would be seduced away by the apparent beauty of its rival during her humiliation at the time of the Exile. So also there are many today who are unable to discern the beauty of Christ crucified. Their eyes are blinded to the truth. The world still seems to offer far more attractive alternatives than the Son of Man.

But for all her attractiveness, the seductiveness of the Great Prostitute does not deliver long-term satisfaction. For the prostitute and her partners, sex is not an expression of a deep relationship, it is itself the relationship. When the sex is over, so is the relationship. So it is also with the seductive attraction of false worship. The false worshiper bows down to his or her idols—be they sex, power, family, or whatever—and says, "So long as you bless me and give me tangible rewards, I will give you worship in return." It is a fundamentally commercial deal. When idolatry ceases to "work for you," however, you go out in search of a new idolatry, a more attractive prostitute, who will give you the high you seek. But the true worshiper says with Job, "Though he slay me, yet will I hope in him" (Job 13:15). Such worship flows naturally and inevitably from a deep relationship and is not based on calculations of what the worshiper gets in return.

Faithfulness. The irony is that faithfulness is a better deal in the long run than idolatry. Adultery does not pay; the future belongs not to the Great Prostitute but to the Bride of the Lamb. She is the One who will come down from heaven adorned for her marriage to the Lamb. In heaven, the true beauty and splendor of Christ will finally be clear to all, but will be enjoyed only by those whose eyes have been opened by God to the beauty of Christ in his humiliation. They have come to know the grace of God demonstrated to us in this: that he who was rich became poor for us, that we might share his riches; that he who was glorious was humiliated for us, that we might share his glory; that he who was all-powerful became weak, that in him we might become strong. Those who are truly feasting their eyes on the beauty of the true Lamb of God, the Lamb that was slain, will not be so easily seduced by the tawdry imitations Satan offers.

THE WORD OF THE LORD came to me: ²"Son of man, say to the ruler of Tyre, 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says:

"'In the pride of your heart you say, "I am a god; I sit on the throne of a god in the heart of the seas." But you are a man and not a god, though you think you are as wise as a god. ³Are you wiser than Daniel? Is no secret hidden from you? ⁴By your wisdom and understanding you have gained wealth for yourself and amassed gold and silver in your treasuries. ⁵By your great skill in trading you have increased your wealth, and because of your wealth your heart has grown proud.

6" 'Therefore this is what the Sovereign LORD says:

"'Because you think you are wise, as wise as a god,

⁷I am going to bring foreigners against you, the most ruthless of nations;

they will draw their swords against your beauty and wisdom and pierce your shining splendor.

⁸They will bring you down to the pit, and you will die a violent death in the heart of the seas.

⁹Will you then say, "I am a god," in the presence of those who kill you?
You will be but a man, not a god, in the hands of those who slay you.
¹⁰You will die the death of the uncircumcised at the hands of foreigners.

I have spoken, declares the Sovereign LORD.' "

11 The word of the LORD came to me: 12 "Son of man, take up a lament concerning the king of Tyre and say to him: 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says:

"'You were the model of perfection, full of wisdom and perfect in beauty.

13 You were in Eden, the garden of God; every precious stone adorned you: ruby, topaz and emerald, chrysolite, onyx and jasper, sapphire, turquoise and beryl. Your settings and mountings were made of gold; on the day you were created they were prepared.

¹⁴You were anointed as a guardian cherub, for so I ordained you.

You were on the holy mount of God; you walked among the fiery stones.

¹⁵You were blameless in your ways from the day you were created till wickedness was found in you.

¹⁶Through your widespread trade you were filled with violence, and you sinned.

So I drove you in disgrace from the mount of God, and I expelled you, O guardian cherub, from among the fiery stones. ¹⁷Your heart became proud on account of your beauty, and you corrupted your wisdom because of your splendor. So I threw you to the earth; I made a spectacle of you before kings. ¹⁸By your many sins and dishonest trade you have desecrated your sanctuaries. So I made a fire come out from you, and it consumed you, and I reduced you to ashes on the ground in the sight of all who were watching. ¹⁹All the nations who knew you are appalled at you; you have come to a horrible end ²⁰The word of the LORD came to me: ²¹"Son of man, set your face against Sidon; prophesy against her ²²and say: 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says:

and will be no more."

" 'I am against you, O Sidon, and I will gain glory within you.
They will know that I am the LORD, when I inflict punishment on her and show myself holy within her.

23I will send a plague upon her and make blood flow in her streets.
The slain will fall within her, with the sword against her on every side.
Then they will know that I am the LORD.

²⁴" 'No longer will the people of Israel have malicious neighbors who are painful briers and sharp thorns. Then they will know that I am the Sovereign LORD.

I gather the people of Israel from the nations where they have been scattered, I will show myself holy among them in the sight of the nations. Then they will live in their own land, which I gave to my servant Jacob. ²⁶They will live there in safety and will build houses and plant vineyards; they will live in safety when I inflict punishment on all their neighbors who maligned them. Then they will know that I am the LORD their God.'"

Original Meaning

EZEKIEL 28:1–19 COMPLETES what the prophet has to say against Tyre. Then in verses 20–23 Ezekiel prophesies against the sister city of Tyre, namely, Sidon. He closes this chapter with a brief address to the Lord's own people (vv. 24–26).

The Third Panel (28:1–19)

CONTINUING THE THEMES found in the first two panels of Ezekiel's prophecy against Tyre (chs. 26–27), the third panel combines both straightforward prophecy and lament, this time directed at the ruler of Tyre, who in his person and fate acts as a kind of personification of the city. He is accused of overweening pride, of saying in his heart, "I am a god; I sit on the throne of a god in the heart of the seas" (28:2). He claims to exercise the divine authority that comes from sitting on the throne of the gods.²

The evidence on which the king of Tyre rests his claim to the status of a divine being is twofold: his wisdom and his wealth. In the first place, he claims to be as wise as a god, wiser than the ancient hero Danel (28:3). As we pointed out with reference to Ezekiel 14, it is disputed whether this is a reference to the famous biblical character Daniel, or to a person known from the Ugaritic Aqhat epic. The mythical Danel is a character of proverbial wisdom,³ but so also is the biblical figure, and he better fits the description as the one "from whom no secrets are hid," to borrow the language of the Book of Common Prayer (Ezek. 28:3; cf. Dan. 2:21–23, 47; 4:6, 18; 5:12).⁴ The king of Tyre apparently thinks of himself as surpassing this all-time great in the wisdom "Hall of Fame" and achieving levels of wisdom and knowledge that are reserved to the gods. This enormous wisdom, in his estimation, is what has brought him his great wealth. That his treasuries are full of gold and silver is attributed to his skill in trading (Ezek. 28:4–5); thus, along with his wealth his pride has grown enormously (28:5).

The Sovereign Lord will quickly put the king of Tyre in his place. His vaunted wisdom and claimed divine status will not help him when the true God brings the nations against him; they will draw their swords against his wisdom and beauty and quickly cut him down to size (28:6–8). The most objective demonstration of his human status will be his helplessness in the hands of those who capture him as they put him to death (28:8–10). What kind of god is he if he can be so easily slain? Far from being a god, he will go down to "the pit," dying the death of the slain in the chaotic heart of the seas (28:8). Here there is a clear echo of the fate of the city of Tyre itself in Ezekiel 26:19–20.

The king's destiny is underlined in the command to the prophet to raise a lament for the king of Tyre (28:12). A lament presupposes the death of the person concerned, thus emphasizing from the outset his humanity. Yet the lament (with perhaps more than a hint of sarcasm?) in its eulogy appears at the outset to take his claims of divinity seriously. It describes him as a "model of perfection" or, as the Hebrew translates literally, the "very seal of proportion." This phrase seems to identify the king of Tyre as the very epitome of perfection, full of wisdom and consummate in beauty (28:12).

In keeping with his claims of semidivine status, as one who sits on the seat of the gods (Ezek. 28:2), the king of Tyre is described as having been present at the beginning of the world in Eden, the garden of God, adorned with every precious stone (28:13).⁵ He was even anointed as a "guardian cherub" (28:14), one of the heavenly beings described as the Lord's throne-bearers in Ezekiel 1 and 10 and known from the account in Genesis 3 as the guardians of the sacred garden. He had access to the center of the divine presence, being "on the holy mount of God" and walking about among the stones of fire (Ezek. 28:14).⁷ These numerous, if sometimes oblique, references to the creation narrative set up the picture of the king of Tyre as the first (and therefore foremost) of all men, an Urmensch become Ubermensch (original man become superman). Greater even than Adam, he has not been made "a little lower than angels"; he claims to rank right up there among the divine beings.

But his greatness and privilege as the protological man simply serves to underline the greatness of his fall from grace. This possibility is inherently present in the Edenic imagery. Just as the image of the heavily laden merchant ship in Ezekiel 27 lends itself naturally to the image of the sinking ship, so the image of the Man in Paradise leads almost inevitably to the picture of Paradise Lost. The abundance of his trade brought with it not merely riches but also violence and pride; his "wisdom" became corrupt and led him into wickedness (28:16–17).

This wickedness, and the judgment it subsequently incurred, exposed the pretension of his pride. Far from being a self-sufficient divinity, his humanity and derivative status were laid bare when at the command of the one true God he was banished from the garden and from the presence of God (28:16). Far from being a god, who by a theophany might sanctify a piece of ground as a suitable site for a sanctuary, his very presence had the opposite effect, defiling sanctuaries (28:18). Cast down to the ground, he was made a public spectacle before the kings of the earth and consumed by fire from within (28:18).

The end result of this judgment is that the king of Tyre, like his city, will come to a horrible end and will be no more (26:19). Like the second panel, then, the third panel paints a glorious, hyperbolic picture of Tyre's present splendor. But that present glory merely serves to underline the depth of Tyre's fall when it comes, a fall that will affect both Tyre and her king. When the great ship Tyre sinks, her captain will go down to the depths along with her.

Oracle Against Sidon (28:20–23)

AFTER THE THREE-PANEL depiction of Tyre's judgment comes a brief oracle against Tyre's neighbor, Sidon (Ezek. 28:20–23). There is no particular charge leveled against her; presumably she is included in the general charges of rejoicing in Jerusalem's downfall and profiting from it. But her rejoicing will be short-lived, for she, like the other nations, will find that Judah's God is not to be trifled with. The Lord will gain glory for himself by executing judgments on Sidon—plague, bloodshed, and the sword on every side (28:22–23). As in the Exodus, he will gain glory from his execution of judgment on his people's foes (Ex. 14:4, 17–18). Then indeed the nations will experience personally the Lord's holiness and power.

This is, in fact, a significant aspect of the judgment on the nations. The power of the Lord's holiness has already been demonstrated in his execution of judgment on his own people. But his faithful love for his people requires him to demonstrate that Jerusalem is not finally cast off. The promise to Abraham that "whoever curses you I will curse" (Gen. 12:3) is still in force.

Address to the Lord's People (28:24–26)

As WE CONCLUDE the circular tour of judgment on Israel's immediate neighbors, the prophet is instructed once again to address the Lord's own people so that they may understand the reason for what they see happening. These words of hope form the central fulcrum for the oracles against the nations, showing that their purpose is to build hope in Ezekiel's immediate audience. The judgments on the nations that the prophet describes are ultimately for Israel's own good, so that when the full regathering of the nation takes place, she may dwell in safety, free from prickly neighbors (28:24).

Indeed, God will demonstrate his holiness—the distinctiveness of his being—not only by judging the nations but also by once again gathering his own people to the Promised Land. He will demonstrate his power by giving them peace and security in the land promised to the patriarchs in the sight of the nations all around (28:25). The people will once again be able to build houses and plant vineyards (28:26), long-term projects that speak of settled security. Then all nations will see that Israel is God's people and he is their God, which has been the goal of his covenant relationship with them from the outset (Ex. 6:7). This point is underlined in the modified version of the recognition formula used. Instead of the usual "then they will know that I am the LORD," the oracle closes, "Then they will know that I am the LORD their God" (Ezek. 28:26). Paradise, which the king of Tyre claimed and lost, may still be regained by God's own people.

A HEAVENLY CONFLICT DEPICTED? This passage has suffered from imaginative exegesis at the hands of the early church fathers, whose ideas have been given renewed currency in some contemporary expositions. These writers interpreted the depiction of Ezekiel 28, along with a similar passage addressed to the king of Babylon in Isaiah 14, as describing literally a heavenly conflict between God and the forces of evil. This conflict resulted in the fall of "Lucifer" and his followers from a primary place in the heavenly realms to the earth.

Such an interpretation ignores the metaphorical context of both passages, however. The king of Tyre is no more literally the first creature, the cherub of the garden, than Tyre itself is literally a merchant ship in Ezekiel 27. These images exploit the possibilities that are inherent in the situation of Tyre as an island or the claims of the king of Tyre to be a divine being in order to show that each image has a dark side. Ships can sink; paradise can be lost. In each case, the perfection of the initial state is magnified to hyperbolic proportions in order to underscore the calamity when it comes.

This means that just as there was never a literal ship that fit the description of the ship Tyre that actually sank (though it is in the nature of ships to sink), so also there need not here be reference to an actual perfect creature exactly matching the description of the guardian cherub, who was cast down to the earth. It is enough that there is a general knowledge of the fact that paradise, the home of the perfect, can be lost, an idea expressed not only in the biblical account of Genesis but in ancient Near Eastern myths. To use a contemporary analogy, the proverb "Pride goes before a fall" depends not on any particular fall, but simply on the fact that it is the general nature of the world in which we live for hybris to bear bitter fruit.

Agents of Satan. Nevertheless, it is also true that the powers that exist in this world do not always act alone. In some cases, they may act as agents of Satan in concerted opposition to Christianity. Jesus speaks of Christians being persecuted and brought before kings and governors for the sake of his name (Luke 21:12). The modern state may arrogate to itself semidivine status, claiming and receiving the ultimate allegiance of all citizens, just as Herod received the worship of the people of Tyre and Sidon (!) in Acts 12:22. In so doing, it is nothing other than a mask for the assaults of Satan on God's people.

But Christians will always own no other king than King Jesus, in the assurance that ultimately his is the name to which every knee will bow. Like the pretensions of the king of Tyre or King Herod, the pride that launches such totalitarian claims will inevitably ultimately be brought low by God. Such confidence in God's ultimate triumph, which is legitimately founded on this passage, is far more important to Christian perseverance than obscure metaphysical speculations about the origins and early history of the evil one.

Contemporary Significance

THE SEDUCTIVE POWER of wisdom. We have already addressed in our discussion of Ezekiel 26–27 the seductive power of material prosperity. What this section adds is the seductive power of wisdom and of power itself. The king of Tyre prided himself on his godlike "wisdom" as being the source of all his material prosperity. We too, in the modern world, are often in awe of the wisdom of "experts."

We live in a culture of specialization and increasing dependence on expertise." When we get sick, we no longer go just to a doctor but to a specialist family practitioner. If it is something serious, then we are immediately referred to a cardiologist or urologist or whichever specialist is appropriate. Even auto mechanics now specialize in particular makes of car or in oil changes or tune-ups. As a result, we have become dependent on the advice of "experts" in every sphere of life, from investments to child-rearing and marriage. We attend their seminars and rely on their expertise, often reassured by their impressive array of credentials.¹²

But the pursuit of wisdom on its own is not necessarily good. It was divine wisdom that the serpent promised our first parents in the garden: "You will be like God, knowing good and evil" (Gen. 3:5). The offer of autonomous wisdom was a lie, and the result was Paradise Lost. Yet men and women still seek to establish their own wisdom apart from God, whether by listening to an internal voice or seeking the guidance of the experts. In the New Age movement, the trends are often combined as "experts" charge $500 or more for weekend seminars that promise inner enlightenment, an empowering knowledge of self and the world, through which health, wealth, and wholeness may be attained.

The wisdom of the world may offer a God-like ability to succeed in everything we attempt while living lives free of pain and sickness. It offers a seductively attractive path to those who are suffering physically or otherwise lacking in some area of their lives. The wisdom of the world, however, is foolishness to God (1 Cor. 1:20). For the Christian, wisdom consists neither in consulting the experts nor in seeking inner enlightenment, but in consulting God and in living according to his Word. This way makes no promises of present wealth, health, or ease. The way of God's wisdom, however, is the only safe path back to Paradise Regained.

The seductive power of power. Nor is it enough to avoid being seduced by the wisdom of the world. Christians are also frequently seduced by the power of the world. The powers that be, whether political, intellectual, or economic, frequently oppose the truth of the Scriptures. In many conflicts, the gods of this age seem able to put more battalions onto the field than the God of the Bible. The temptation that faces the church in such situations is to attempt to fight power with power. In response to pagan political agendas, it is easy to get sucked into believing that the only correct response is a Christian political agenda. In response to the power of a consumer culture, many are persuaded that the answer is better marketing for the church.

The love of power can also infiltrate the church. Church leaders or denominational structures can easily be elevated six feet above contradiction. I was once told by a church leader with whom I disagreed over whether a practice was right, "The denomination has decided. What gives you the right to disagree?" The answer to his question (though unfortunately I did not have it on my lips at the time) is that Jesus is our king, not the church, and his wisdom is expressed in the Scriptures. If the Bible says so, I must believe it, no matter what the experts or the powers say. If the Bible denies it, then I may not think so, though all the world agrees. As Martin Luther put it in his famous declaration to the Diet of Worms: "Here I stand. My conscience is captive to the Word of God. I can do no other."

Jesus as the power and wisdom of God. The assurance of Ezekiel 28 is that it is those who take their stand on the Word of God and the wisdom of God who will ultimately stand, not those who kowtow to the wisdom and the powers of this world. Their strength is but a show, no matter how impressive it appears. It contains within itself the seeds of its own demise. But those who trust in Jesus have built their house on the solid Rock, who is more solid than even the contemporary rock of ages, Tyre.

That fact is true because Jesus Christ is both the power of God and the wisdom of God (1 Cor. 1:24). The message of the cross may be despised by those who are perishing, because it seems the way of weakness, but in reality it is the power of God (1 Cor. 1:18). The way of weakness that the crucified Christ represents is stronger by far than any human strength. He is the true model of perfection, who was with the Father in the beginning, the exact image of the invisible God (Col. 1:15). He was the one who was actually present in Eden, yet without sin. The king of Tyre might make great boasts of his divine status, but Jesus Christ really is one with the Father (John 10:30). He is the reality to which the king of Tyre blasphemously aspired.

But there was one key similarity between Jesus and the king of Tyre: Both died in humiliation, under the judgment of God. Yet even in this similarity is a crucial difference: Although Jesus was banished from the Father's presence on the cross, in his case the cause was not his pride but ours. Mine was the transgression that deserved the fate of the uncircumcised, under God's curse. His was the payment of the penalty that my desire to "be like God" incurred.

The ultimate destiny of Jesus and the king of Tyre are also radically divergent. The king of Tyre will fall to the underworld, never to return. Jesus has ascended to the right hand of the Father in glory. There he is crowned with many crowns and exalted above all names. What is more, he is united forever to his people, whom he won for himself through his death and resurrection. Therein lies our assurance and our hope. If we are exalted by the world like the king of Tyre, there are no guarantees of our remaining at the top. Those who reject the way of Christ in favor of the wisdom of the world are destined for the pit. But if instead we follow the way of suffering and affliction in company with Jesus, we will also be exalted with him and be with him for all eternity.

Jesus, the second Adam, the eschatological God-man, has paid for our original and actual sin once and for all on the cross. Through his death, he has regained Paradise on our behalf. As a result, we are assured of immortality in him (1 Cor. 15:45–54). Here and now we may only experience a foretaste, but some day we will experience the fullness of rest and blessing when the Lord reveals himself in the sight of the nations as "the LORD [our] God" (Ezek. 28:26).

Ezekiel 29:1-30:19

In the tenth year, in the tenth month on the twelfth day, the word of the LORD came to me: ²"Son of man, set your face against Pharaoh king of Egypt and prophesy against him and against all Egypt. ³Speak to him and say: 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says:

" 'I am against you, Pharaoh king of Egypt, you great monster lying among your streams. You say, "The Nile is mine; I made it for myself." ⁴But I will put hooks in your jaws and make the fish of your streams stick to vour scales. I will pull you out from among your streams, with all the fish sticking to your scales. ⁵I will leave you in the desert, you and all the fish of your streams. You will fall on the open field and not be gathered or picked up. I will give you as food to the beasts of the earth and the birds of the air.

⁶Then all who live in Egypt will know that I am the LORD.

"'You have been a staff of reed for the house of Israel. ⁷When they grasped you with their hands, you splintered and you tore open their shoulders; when they leaned on you, you broke and their backs were wrenched.

8" 'Therefore this is what the Sovereign LORD says: I will bring a sword against you and kill your men and their animals. 9Egypt will become a desolate wasteland. Then they will know that I am the LORD.

"'Because you said, "The Nile is mine; I made it," ¹⁰therefore I am against you and against your streams, and I will make the land of Egypt a ruin and a desolate waste from Migdol to Aswan, as far as the border of Cush. ¹¹No foot of man or animal will pass through it; no one will live there for forty years. ¹²I will make the land of Egypt desolate among devastated lands, and her cities will lie desolate forty years among ruined cities. And I will disperse the Egyptians among the nations and scatter them through the countries.

13" 'Yet this is what the Sovereign LORD says: At the end of forty years I will gather the Egyptians from the nations where they were scattered. ¹⁴I will bring them back from captivity and return them to Upper Egypt, the land of their ancestry. There they will be a lowly kingdom. ¹⁵It will be the lowliest of kingdoms and will never again exalt itself above the other nations. I will make it so weak that it will never again rule over the nations. ¹⁶Egypt will no longer be a source of confidence for the people of Israel but will be a reminder of their sin in turning to her for help. Then they will know that I am the Sovereign LORD.'"

¹⁷In the twenty-seventh year, in the first month on the first day, the word of the LORD came to me: ¹⁸"Son of man, Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon drove his army in a hard campaign against Tyre; every head was rubbed bare and every shoulder made raw. Yet he and his army got no reward from the campaign he led against Tyre. ¹⁹Therefore this is what the Sovereign LORD says: I am going to give Egypt to Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, and he will carry off its wealth. He will loot and plunder the land as pay for his army. ²⁰I have given him Egypt as a reward for his efforts because he and his army did it for me, declares the Sovereign LORD.

²¹"On that day I will make a horn grow for the house of Israel, and I will open your mouth among them. Then they will know that I am the LORD."

^{30:1}The word of the LORD came to me: ²"Son of man, prophesy and say: 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says:

"'Wail and say,
"Alas for that day!"

For the day is near, the day of the LORD is near—
a day of clouds,
a time of doom for the nations.

A sword will come against Egypt, and anguish will come upon Cush.
When the slain fall in Egypt, her wealth will be carried away and her foundations torn down.

⁵Cush and Put, Lydia and all Arabia, Libya and the people of the covenant land will fall by the sword along with Egypt.

6" 'This is what the LORD says:

" 'The allies of Egypt will fall and her proud strength will fail. From Migdol to Aswan they will fall by the sword within her, declares the Sovereign LORD.

7" 'They will be desolate among desolate lands, and their cities will lie among ruined cities.
8Then they will know that I am the LORD,

when I set fire to Egypt and all her helpers are crushed.

9" 'On that day messengers will go out from me in ships to frighten Cush out of her complacency. Anguish will take hold of them on the day of Egypt's doom, for it is sure to come.

¹⁰" 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says:

" 'I will put an end to the hordes of Egypt by the hand of Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon.

¹¹He and his army—the most ruthless of nations will be brought in to destroy the land.

They will draw their swords against Egypt and fill the land with the slain.

12 I will dry up the streams of the Nile and sell the land to evil men; by the hand of foreigners

I will lay waste the land and everything in it.

I the LORD have spoken.

13" 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says:

" 'I will destroy the idols and put an end to the images in Memphis. No longer will there be a prince in Egypt, and I will spread fear throughout the land.

¹⁴I will lay waste Upper Egypt, set fire to Zoan and inflict punishment on Thebes.

¹⁵I will pour out my wrath on Pelusium, the stronghold of Egypt, and cut off the hordes of Thebes.

¹⁶I will set fire to Egypt; Pelusium will writhe in agony. Thebes will be taken by storm;
Memphis will be in constant distress.

17The young men of Heliopolis and Bubastis will fall by the sword, and the cities themselves will go into captivity.

18Dark will be the day at Tahpanhes when I break the yoke of Egypt; there her proud strength will come to an end. She will be covered with clouds, and her villages will go into captivity.

19So I will inflict punishment on Egypt, and they will know that I am the LORD.'"

Original Meaning

AFTER THE SIX ORACLES against Israel's immediate neighbors (chs. 25–28), we reach the seventh, climactic oracle, which is delivered against Egypt (chs. 29–32). This oracle is itself made up of seven subunits (29:1–16; 29:17–21; 30:1–19; 30:20–26; 31:1–18; 32:1–16; 32:17–32). Like the substantial oracle against Tyre that preceded it, the word against Egypt addresses both the land of Egypt and its ruler and threatens judgment on both.

The First Oracle (29:1–16)

EZEKIEL 29 OPENS with a word of judgment against Pharaoh, who is addressed under the figure of a great sea monster (tannîn).² This sea monster was a well-known element of ancient Near Eastern mythology, a force of chaos that had to be tamed before the world could be created.³ The prophet Isaiah had already utilized the imagery of the sea monster to describe God's defeat of Egypt at the time of the Exodus (Isa. 51:9), while in Genesis 1:21 the great sea monster appears in demythologized form as simply another of God's creatures.

In Ezekiel, the mythical picture blends with the geographically appropriate image of Pharaoh as a great crocodile, resting secure amid the Nile streams, to give a picture of the ruler of Egypt as a superhuman, supernatural force of destruction. Thus far, Pharaoh would probably not have disputed the description. According to Egyptian records, the god Amon-Re said to Pharaoh Thutmoses III, "I cause them to see thy majesty as a crocodile, the lord of fear in the water, who cannot be approached." But just as the positive metaphor of the ship of Tyre in full sail lends itself to the negative picture of the ship of Tyre catastrophically wrecked, so also the image of Pharaoh as a powerful crocodile, even one of mythical proportions, lends itself to the picture of Pharaoh as the trapped crocodile, subdued by the Great Hunter. For both the ship and the crocodile, their watery fortress proves to be less than impregnable. Tyre's home "in the midst of the seas" (betôk hayyām) was no secure defense, and neither will Pharaoh's abode "in the midst of the Nile/streams" (betôk ye'ōr).

Thus, for all Pharaoh's boasts of divine power, claiming to have created for his own purposes the Nile, the source of all of Egypt's prosperity, he will be trapped with hooks like an ordinary crocodile (Ezek. 29:4). He will be brought out into the desert, the place of judgment (20:35), and there executed along with "all the fish of your streams," that is, either the nations allied to him or the members of his armed forces. Their bodies will be left dishonorably exposed to become food for wild animals, rather than being gathered for decent burial. Such a fate was commonly invoked as a curse in ancient Near Eastern treaties.

The reason for this act of judgment becomes clear in verses 6–7. Egypt has been an unstable support, a "staff of reed" to Judah. The term "staff of reed" is an oxymoron: A staff needs to be strong and reliable to support the weight placed on it, while a reed is by definition something thin and fragile (1 Kings 14:15). Egypt's sin was to appear to be a source of military support in Judah's struggle against Babylon, encouraging her to rebel against her overlords. Once the battle was joined, however, she stood at a distance, leaving Judah to her fate.

The image of Egypt as a "splintered reed of a staff" was already used centuries earlier in the Assyrian field commander's speech to Hezekiah's emissaries (2 Kings 18:21; Isa. 36:6). In that instance, it was an unfair and inaccurate assessment of the situation since Hezekiah had placed his trust in a much firmer support, the Lord (2 Kings 18:5). Nevertheless, as a judgment of the political dangers of trusting in Egypt, it was a true statement at most points in Israel's history.⁷

Though the sin of trusting in the staff of reed was primarily Judah's sin, yet the object of that trust is judged along with her. God's people should indeed have known better than to trust in Egypt, but Egypt too is not guiltless for soliciting their trust and then proving dangerously unstable, causing (in the imagery of leaning on an unstable support) their shoulders to become shattered and their hips to totter (Ezek. 29:7). Egypt's arrogant claims to creator status are a contributory factor in Judah's sin (29:9). As a result, she too will be judged by God and turned into an utter devastation, a devastated land in the midst of devastated lands. This total destruction will extend from Migdol on the northeast frontier all the way down to Aswan in the far south (29:10). The whole of Egypt will be uninhabited for forty years (29:11), which is not only the standard length of a generation in biblical terminology but is also the length of the Judean exile Ezekiel had prophesied in 4:6.

To underline the symmetry of Egypt's fate with those who trusted in her, her people will be scattered among the nations and dispersed among the peoples, just like Judah (12:15; 20:23; 22:15). Even more strikingly, they too will be gathered by the Lord from among the nations, brought back from captivity, and returned to the land from which they originated (29:14). But these similarities only serve to highlight the differences in their ultimate fates. Egypt will not be fully restored but merely reestablished as a shadow of her former self, confined to the distant areas of Upper Egypt (29:16). There it will no longer act as a source of temptation for Judah in her foreign policy. In their weakened state, they too will come to an awareness of God's sovereign power. Her "restoration" is not so much an act of grace on the Lord's part for Egypt's sake as it is a reminder of Israel's past faithlessness, which will never again be repeated.

The Second Oracle (29:17–21)

THE SECOND ORACLE in the sequence against Egypt is the latest of all the dated oracles, coming from the beginning of the twenty-seventh year of the Exile (29:17). It recognizes the relative fruitlessness of Nebuchadnezzar's campaign against Tyre, of which Ezekiel had spoken in chapters 26–28. Though the effort expended was great, with both helmet and shield leaving their marks on the relevant parts of the anatomy, the booty achieved at the end of the campaign was minimal (29:18). In compensation, since they were working for the Lord (29:20), the Lord will give Egypt's wealth as plunder for Nebuchadnezzar's army (29:19).

It has become almost a shibboleth in commentaries to see the purpose of this oracle as Ezekiel's explaining away the failure of his earlier prophecy against Tyre. According to Josephus, Nebuchadnezzar did indeed besiege Tyre for some thirteen years (586–573 B.C.). By the end of that time, Tyre's economic and political importance was destroyed, and the king of Tyre became a vassal of Nebuchadnezzar. The siege appears to have been a success, as Ezekiel had prophesied. However, the material rewards were not, according to Ezekiel, appropriate to the energy expended. It is this imbalance that the Lord now promises to redress.

If the passage had been intended as an apologetic against a failure of literal fulfillment, it is extraordinary that the prophet chooses such a minor part of his prophecy to defend. If he were confronted by literalists, insisting on a word-for-word fulfillment of his prophecy, one would have expected them to press Ezekiel on the major point that Tyre had not actually been reduced to a bare rock (26:4) but was still a viable city, rather than on the minor point that Tyre had not provided significant booty for her captors. In addition, an oracle with such a purpose would belong properly after the Tyre oracles, not in the middle of the oracles against Egypt.

In fact, the purpose of the oracle is quite different." There is no mention as such of any "failure" of an earlier oracle; on the contrary, the essential success of the oracle against Tyre is presupposed. Nebuchadnezzar did indeed, as Ezekiel prophesied, assault Tyre and bring her to ruin. The point being made here is simple: The worker is worthy of his hire, and Nebuchadnezzar is acting as the Lord's worker in his conquests, both of Tyre and Egypt. Just as he had succeeded against Tyre, so also he will succeed against Egypt, and this time he will receive payment in full.

Chapter 29 then closes with a brief oracle that reminds us that Israel remains the central focus of the prophet's interest, even in the oracles against the foreign nations. Commensurate with Egypt's reduction in significance will be a strengthening of the house of Israel. This turn in Israel's fortunes will result both in a recognition of the Lord as the agent of this change and in a recognition that Ezekiel has been the Lord's prophet: The Lord will "open your mouth"; that is, Ezekiel's testimony will be validated (29:21).¹²

The Third Oracle (30:1–19)

In this third oracle, the content of the prophecy of the first oracle (29:1–16) is essentially replayed in the form of a lament. The prophet is instructed to wail and mourn for the coming of the day of the Lord's judgment on Egypt (30:3–4). Egypt's allies, which were mentioned as sharing her downfall in the first oracle under the image of the "fish of your streams" (29:4), now come into focus as distinct nations. Ethiopia (Cush), Libya (Put), Lydia, all Arabia, Cub, and the people of the land in covenant with them will fall along with Egypt (30:5–6). The entire confederacy will be reduced to a shattered and burned ruin (30:6–9), made desolate at the hand of Nebuchadnezzar and his ruthless army (30:10–12). From Memphis, Tahpahnes, and Heliopolis in the north of Egypt to Thebes in the south, the cities of Egypt will be destroyed (30:13–19).

The summary statement in 30:19, "So I will inflict punishment on Egypt, and they will know that I am the LORD," evokes repeated themes of the Exodus narrative, where both "doing judgments" against Egypt (Ex. 6:6; 7:4; 12:12; Num. 33:4) and the knowledge of God (Ex. 7:5; 14:4, 18) are prominent. As in the Exodus, this act of judgment will strike at both the gods of Egypt and their earthly rulers (Ezek. 30:13). In the imagery of the cosmic Day of the Lord, the light will be turned to darkness and the proud strength of Egypt brought to an end (30:18). By this means, God will demonstrate conclusively his existence and power in front of a watching world.

Bridging Contexts

COMFORTING THE AFFLICTED. One of the dangers against which I warn aspiring preachers in our seminary is that of preaching against all the sins with which no one in their congregation struggles. It is relatively easy to warn the heterosexuals about the dangers of homosexuality, the teetotaler about the snare of alcoholism, the politically conservative about the hazards of liberalism, the rigidly orthodox about the perils of false teaching. All of these are indeed real concerns, but insofar as they are not a part of your congregation, to preach against them will merely instill a comfortable sense of "us" versus "them." "We" are those who are righteous, holy and free from sin (at least, from those sins); "they" are the filthy, abhorrent sinners.

Like the Pharisee in the temple, we continually remind God and ourselves of the sins of others, rather than recognizing the reality of our own sins (Luke 18:11). In the meantime, our more subtle sins of pride, self-centeredness, and lack of love may go completely unchallenged.

At first sight, it may appear that the oracle against Egypt falls into this category of sermon. Does it not address someone else's sins and threaten judgment on them, to the exclusion of any interest in Judah's misdeeds? Is Ezekiel selling out his responsibility as a prophet? Those who have read this far through the book will hardly think that a likely scenario. If the preacher's task is both to afflict the comfortable and to comfort the afflicted, few will accuse Ezekiel of unduly sparing the comfortable. But now it is time for Ezekiel to turn to the task of comforting the afflicted. The foreign nation oracles are part of that ministry of comfort.

But how precisely does this oracle against Egypt encourage the exiles of Judah? The first way is by assuring them of God's continuing concern for his own people. Egypt's fault lay not in a general tendency to raise false hopes of deliverance in people, but specifically in having falsely raised the hopes of God's people. Presumably, the Egyptian policy of encouraging rebellion against Babylon extended to all of the small nation states of the Levant. Indeed, the oracle mentions a number of nations who had, like Judah, thrown their lot in with Egypt, with what would prove to be fatal consequences. Yet God is not equally concerned with all of the peoples. It is not because Egypt had been a source of false hopes to Libya or the Arabians that she is judged, but because she had been the source of false hope to the house of Israel. God has a special concern with the fate of his own people.

God's concern for his covenant people. In the New Testament, the covenant people with whom God is concerned is no longer merely national, ethnic Israel but the spiritual "Israel of God" (Gal. 6:16), a new creation in which circumcision and uncircumcision are no longer of importance (6:15). In one sense, nothing has changed. God's people remain those whom he has called, claimed as his own, and redeemed out of bondage. The Old Testament people of God had experienced his salvation in the liberation from Egypt; the New Testament people of God are those who have experienced the new exodus accomplished by Jesus, leading his people out of their bondage to sin.

But the fullness of blessing achieved in Jesus is too great to be contained within ethnic lines. His calling is to be a light also to the Gentiles (Isa. 42:6; 49:6). He came so that those who were afar off under the old covenant might be brought near in him (Eph. 2:13), made heirs of the promised Holy Spirit (Acts 2:38–39), and ingrafted into the olive tree that represents the covenant community (Rom. 11:17–24). Now the Gentiles are no longer strangers and aliens but in Christ are fellow citizens with the Jews as God's people (Eph. 2:19). Israel has not been abolished or sidelined with the coming of Christ but rather has been eschatologically expanded by the inclusion of Jews and Gentiles together into the one new people of God, the church.¹⁵

God's anger continues to be expressed against those who lead his people astray. Egypt acted as a source of temptation for Judah; therefore she, along with Judah, will experience the weight of God's wrath. Similarly, Jesus warns his disciples, "Things that cause people to sin are bound to come, but woe to that person through whom they come. It would be better for him to be thrown into the sea with a millstone tied around his neck than for him to cause one of these little ones to sin. So watch yourselves" (Luke 17:1–3). Peter speaks of the swift destruction that awaits those who are false teachers (2 Peter 2:1). It is a fearful thing to lead astray from the true paths one of Christ's sheep, whether by our words or actions. God's action against Egypt will be swift and decisive, and will result in her removal as a source of temptation; even after her "restoration" she will never again be a stumbling block for God's people.

Factors in Egypt's downfall. But God's motivation to act against Egypt is not merely concern to punish those who led the house of Israel astray. He is also motivated by a concern for his own glory. Egypt, in the person of Pharaoh, had set herself up as a rival to the true God. Pharaoh depicted himself in semimythical terms as a godlike creature, who made and controlled the forces of blessing in nature, namely, the Nile. Such claims cannot be tolerated. God must and will act to cut the idols of Egypt down to size, just as he did earlier during the Exodus.

This time, however, it is not Israel but Egypt who will be brought up through the waters out into the desert, which will prove for them a place of judgment rather than salvation (Ezek. 29:4–5). Pharaoh's creatureliness will be demonstrated in the most incontrovertible of ways, death, followed by the dishonorable exposure of his body to the appetites of scavenging beasts. To a culture like Egypt, where postmortem care of the body, especially the body of a pharaoh, was regarded as a matter of nothing less than cosmic significance, this was the ultimate judgment.

Egypt's downfall will also provide the rewards for God's worker in the judgment, Nebuchadnezzar (29:17–21). God will be in no one's debt; even the unrighteous laborer is worthy of his hire. How much more, then, may the righteous and faithful servant expect to see a reward! Ezekiel himself serves as an example of this. His words of hope of restoration for Israel will be fulfilled, and then he will be honored accordingly as a true prophet (29:21). God's ultimate purpose will be seen to be not merely the destruction of the unrighteous but the salvation of a people for himself, through the fulfillment of the prophetic word.

The lament over Egypt. But what does chapter 30 add to Ezekiel's argument? We have noted above that in terms of content it essentially repeats the message of chapter 29. However, the format is different, in that the message is expressed in the form of a lament. Repetition is a device used frequently in the Bible to underscore the importance of a point and to drive it home. But this is not simply repetition, it is repetition with a twist: By repeating the threat of Egypt's downfall in the form of a lament, the message gains affective strength, impacting the emotions as well as the mind.

Because of the association with death and the sense of pain and loss that that event brings, laments carry strong emotional overtones. In this case, the playing of the funeral dirge before the actual death is a token and surety that the death will ultimately occur. Egypt and all her allies will certainly fall. This message is particularly important for the exiles to hear and learn because it underlines once again the reason for Judah's demise. Instead of trusting in the Lord as her strength and Redeemer, she turned to other supports, allying herself to Egypt. She is therefore directly comparable to Egypt's allies who are mentioned here by name, for the fate of all those in covenant with Egypt is to fall by the sword (30:6).

Contemporary Significance

THE ATTRACTIVENESS OF the world. Egypt was always an attractive place, seen from an Israelite perspective. In the minds of those in the desert generation, it was the place of a varied abundance of food: of meat and fish, of cucumbers, melons, leeks, onions, and garlic (Num. 11:5). Nostalgia overcame reality in painting the glories of their past existence before the Lord stepped in and saved them. Somehow the memories of the overseer's lash faded, drowned out in the aroma of spicy food. By comparison, their "saved" existence in the desert, with only manna to eat, seemed altogether bland.

The dangerous attractiveness of Egypt is a theme even as early as the patriarchal narratives. When there was nothing to eat in the Promised Land, there was food enough in Egypt (Gen. 12:10). When Lot chose the most promising land (even though it was outside the Promised Land), it bore a striking resemblance to Egypt (13:10). When the wife of promise was barren, her Egyptian maidservant turned out to be easily fertile (16:1–4). The way of obedience was always hard, while the way of Egypt always seemed easy. Similarly, when danger threatened during the period of the monarchy, Egypt was never far from Judah's thoughts as a potential savior. She, after all, had virtually unlimited resources of chariots and horses and men at her disposal, as Israel had experienced firsthand. Pharaoh Shishak, for instance, was once able to muster against Rehoboam twelve hundred chariots, sixty thousand horsemen, and men without number (2 Chron. 12:3). In comparison to the Egyptian option, what had the Lord to offer?

So too for us, the world has many powerful attractions, many idolatries that seem to offer us easy routes to security and success. There is the pursuit of political power, which says to us, "What could you not do if only you controlled the legislative process?" There is the pursuit of financial gain, which seems to offer personal comfort and the power to control your own destiny. There is the pursuit of fame and personal importance, which is perhaps a particular temptation to preachers and teachers. "What great things you could accomplish," it whispers, "if only you could preach in a larger church, where your message would be heard by more people."

Like Egypt, each of these idolatries promises us safety and success, if we will only throw in our lot with them. Like Egypt, however, if we place our trust in them, each of these will prove to be a broken reed, twisting and destroying our lives. For all their godlike claims to be able to create and sustain a prosperous universe, the reality never matches up to the prospectus.

How not to be deceived by Satan. Like Israel before him, Jesus faced the alluring attractiveness of the ways of the world. During a forty-day spell in the desert, Jesus was tempted to trust in alternative means of reaching his goals (Matt. 4:1–11). Even the form of the temptations that he faced echoed the temptations of Israel in the desert. Jesus' hunger paralleled Israel's need for bread in the desert, which the Lord answered by providing manna (Ex. 16). Unlike the grumbling response of his ancestors, Jesus replied to Satan, "Man does not live on bread alone, but on every word that comes from the mouth of God" (Matt. 4:4, citing Deut. 8:3).

Next the Israelites were thirsty, and we are told that "they tested the LORD" at Massah (Ex. 17:7); Jesus responded to Satan's second temptation by saying, "Do not put the Lord your God to the test" (Matt. 4:7, citing Deut. 6:16).

Then the Israelites made for themselves a golden calf and bowed down to it (Ex. 32), exactly what the devil wanted Jesus to do to him. Unlike his ancestors, Jesus was not willing to comply with Satan's request. He replied, "Worship the Lord your God, and serve him only" (Matt. 4:10, citing Deut. 6:13). Whereas Israel failed in the desert, striking out three times, Jesus endured faithfully, resisting the attractive but fatally flawed "Egyptian option."

He did so because he was not deceived by Satan. He saw clearly that things are not always as they appear. Satan offers a solution for our felt needs, immediate relief for the blister points of life. However, our felt needs are not always our real needs. Sometimes what offers temporary relief causes long-term problems. Jesus rejected Satan's quick-fix solutions in favor of a life lived in obedience to God's call, a path that led all the way to the cross. Why did he do so? Because he saw the ultimate realities of life: that men and women would be eternally lost without a Savior, someone who lived the life of perfect obedience in their place and who died the death their sins deserved. For Jesus, there was no "Egyptian option" in accomplishing our salvation, and so he followed the hard road.

Our thinking is often much more clouded. We feel the pain of the blister points of life and are tempted to find relief in whatever form it may be offered. Yet all too often that "relief" involves a compromise with the world. When danger threatens, we run to Egypt, not to the Lord. We do so only because we have forgotten the ultimate realities of life—that sin never ultimately delivers what it promises, that those who make a compact with the world will see the source of their hopes burned up. Like most purist anglers, Satan prefers fly-fishing to bait-fishing. He would rather hook you with something that looks good but is an absolute lie than allow you even the pleasure that he promised you while he is reeling you in. But if he has to, he will place a real worm on the hook and offer you "real" relief—a relief that lasts only until the hook is firmly embedded in your jaw.

Surviving the Day of the Lord. For the destiny of this world is ultimate destruction, just like Egypt. The Day of the Lord is coming, when this present world will be burned up, a day of judgment and destruction for the ungodly (2 Peter 3:7). The true nature of all things will be revealed. The "staff of reed" in which we have placed our trust will be shown up as a false hope. The remembrance of this judgment to come should have the same salutary effect on us as Ezekiel's prophecy of Egypt's destruction was intended to have on his original audience: "Since everything will be destroyed in this way, what kind of people ought you to be? You ought to live holy and godly lives . . . mak[ing] every effort to be found spotless, blameless and at peace with him" (2 Peter 3:11, 14). Egypt and all who trust in her will be destroyed.

Those who trust in the Lord will endure, however. The true prophet and the faithful servant of God may have to endure mockery and disbelief in the present. In the long run, however, God is not mocked, and he will be in no one's debt. At the same time as the true nature of the fickle reed is revealed, so also will be revealed the solid refuge that Christ represents for his saints. What he began with his obedience in our place in the desert, he completed with his obedience in our place on the cross, establishing redemption for his people and raising a horn of salvation for us, just as Zechariah, the father of John the Baptist, prophesied (Luke 1:68–69).

Ezekiel 30:20-32:32

IN THE ELEVENTH YEAR, in the first month on the seventh day, the word of the LORD came to me: ²¹"Son of man, I have broken the arm of Pharaoh king of Egypt. It has not been bound up for healing or put in a splint so as to become strong enough to hold a sword. ²²Therefore this is what the Sovereign LORD says: I am against Pharaoh king of Egypt. I will break both his arms, the good arm as well as the broken one, and make the sword fall from his hand. ²³I will disperse the Egyptians among the nations and scatter them through the countries. ²⁴I will strengthen the arms of the king of Babylon and put my sword in his hand, but I will break the arms of Pharaoh, and he will groan before him like a mortally wounded man. ²⁵I will strengthen the arms of the king of Babylon, but the arms of Pharaoh will fall limp. Then they will know that I am the LORD, when I put my sword into the hand of the king of Babylon and he brandishes it against Egypt. ²⁶I will disperse the Egyptians among the nations and scatter them through the countries. Then they will know that I am the LORD."

31:1In the eleventh year, in the third month on the first day, the word of the LORD came to me: ²"Son of man, say to Pharaoh king of Egypt and to his hordes:

"'Who can be compared with you in majesty?

Consider Assyria, once a cedar in Lebanon, with beautiful branches overshadowing the forest; it towered on high, its top above the thick foliage.

10" 'Therefore this is what the Sovereign LORD says: Because it towered on high, lifting its top above the thick foliage, and because it was proud of its height, ¹¹I handed it over to the ruler of the nations, for him to deal with according to its wickedness. I cast it aside, ¹²and the most ruthless of foreign nations cut it down and left it. Its boughs fell on the mountains and in all the valleys; its branches lay broken in all the ravines of the land. All the nations of the earth came out from under its shade and left it. ¹³All the birds of the air settled on the fallen tree, and all the beasts of the field were among its branches. ¹⁴Therefore no other trees by the waters are ever to tower proudly on high, lifting their tops above the thick foliage. No other trees so well-watered are ever to reach such a height; they are all destined for death, for the earth below, among mortal men, with those who go down to the pit.

15" 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says: On the day it was brought down to the grave I covered the deep springs with mourning for it; I held back its streams, and its abundant waters were restrained. Because of it I clothed Lebanon with gloom, and all the trees of the field withered away. ¹⁶I made the nations tremble at the sound of its fall when I brought it down to the grave with those who go down to the pit. Then all the trees of Eden, the choicest and best of Lebanon, all the trees that were well-watered, were consoled in the earth below. ¹⁷Those who lived in its shade, its allies among the nations, had also gone down to the grave with it, joining those killed by the sword.

¹⁸" 'Which of the trees of Eden can be compared with you in splendor and majesty? Yet you, too, will be brought down with the trees of Eden to the earth below; you will lie among the uncircumcised, with those killed by the sword.

"'This is Pharaoh and all his hordes, declares the Sovereign LORD.'"

^{32:1}In the twelfth year, in the twelfth month on the first day, the word of the LORD came to me: ²"Son of man, take up a lament concerning Pharaoh king of Egypt and say to him:

" 'You are like a lion among the nations; you are like a monster in the seas thrashing about in your streams, churning the water with your feet and muddying the streams.

³" 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says:

" 'With a great throng of people
I will cast my net over you, and they will haul you up in my net.

⁴I will throw you on the land and hurl you on the open field.

I will let all the birds of the air settle on you and all the beasts of the earth gorge themselves on you.

⁵I will spread your flesh on the mountains and fill the valleys with your remains.

⁶I will drench the land with your flowing blood all the way to the mountains, and the ravines will be filled with your flesh.

⁷When I snuff you out, I will cover the heavens and darken their stars:

I will cover the sun with a cloud, and the moon will not give its light.

⁸All the shining lights in the heavens
I will darken over you;
I will bring darkness over your land,
declares the Sovereign LORD.

⁹I will trouble the hearts of many peoples when I bring about your destruction among the nations, among lands you have not known.

10I will cause many peoples to be appalled at you, and their kings will shudder with horror because of you when I brandish my sword before them. On the day of your downfall each of them will tremble every moment for his life.

11" 'For this is what the Sovereign LORD says:

" 'The sword of the king of Babylon will come against you.

¹²I will cause your hordes to fall by the swords of mighty men the most ruthless of all nations.

They will shatter the pride of Egypt, and all her hordes will be overthrown.

¹³I will destroy all her cattle from beside abundant waters no longer to be stirred by the foot of man or muddied by the hoofs of cattle.

¹⁴Then I will let her waters settle and make her streams flow like oil, declares the Sovereign LORD.

15When I make Egypt desolate and strip the land of everything in it, when I strike down all who live there, then they will know that I am the LORD.'

¹⁷In the twelfth year, on the fifteenth day of the month, the word of the LORD came to me: ¹⁸"Son of man, wail for the hordes of Egypt and consign to the earth below both her and the daughters of mighty nations, with those who go down to the pit. ¹⁹Say to them, 'Are you more favored than others? Go down and be laid among the uncircumcised.' ²⁰They will fall among those killed by the sword. The sword is drawn; let her be dragged off with all her hordes. ²¹From within the grave the mighty leaders will say of Egypt and her allies, 'They have come down and they lie with the uncircumcised, with those killed by the sword.'

rested on their bones, though the terror of these warriors had stalked through the land of the living.

30"All the princes of the north and all the Sidonians are there; they went down with the slain in disgrace despite the terror caused by their power. They lie uncircumcised with those killed by the sword and bear their shame with those who go down to the pit.

³¹"Pharaoh—he and all his army—will see them and he will be consoled for all his hordes that were killed by the sword, declares the Sovereign LORD. ³²Although I had him spread terror in the land of the living, Pharaoh and all his hordes will be laid among the uncircumcised, with those killed by the sword, declares the Sovereign LORD."

Original Meaning

In the previous unit we examined the first three of the seven oracles that Ezekiel utters against Egypt. This present unit looks at the last four oracles. This section brings to a close the prophet's round of oracles against the nations.

The Fourth Oracle (30:20–26)

THE FOURTH OF the seven oracles against Egypt declares that God has already begun to act. The date formula in 30:20 places it shortly before the fall of Jerusalem; the oracle itself rules out the possibility of any relief coming from the Egyptian direction, since the Lord has "broken the arm of Pharaoh king of Egypt" (30:21). The historical background of this oracle lies in an apparent attempt by Pharaoh Hophra to intervene in the crisis of his day (Jer. 37:5); however, though this led to a withdrawal of Nebuchadnezzar's army in the short term, the hopes raised in the Judean capital were soon to be dashed. After dealing with the Egyptians, Nebuchadnezzar returned to finish what he had started in Jerusalem (Jer. 39:1).

The defeat of Egypt is described in terms of a breaking of Pharaoh's arm (Ezek. 30:21). The "arm" in the Old Testament is the part of the body through which a person acts. It is therefore a symbol of strength: A strong arm enables effective action, while a broken arm renders a person helpless (cf. Job 22:9; Ps. 10:15). The fundamental contrast in this oracle is between the broken arms of Pharaoh and the arms of Nebuchadnezzar that have been strengthened by the Lord (Ezek. 30:25). This bout is clearly not an equal contest. Ezekiel even anticipates potential objections that though Pharaoh's arm has been broken, it may be healed (30:21), or that though one arm has been broken Pharaoh still has another arm with which to fight (30:22). Even the faintest source of hope must be removed; the broken arm will not receive the medical treatment necessary for it to be healed. On the contrary, it will be broken again, along with the sound arm that remains (30:22). Egypt's power will be comprehensively destroyed, a prediction ultimately fulfilled in the conquest of Egypt by Cambyses in 525 B.C.

In the background of this struggle between two world powers, however, there is another actor. The "arm" that acts most frequently in the Old Testament is the arm of the Lord, notably in the Exodus, when he brought his people out of Egypt "by a mighty hand and an outstretched arm" (Deut. 4:34). This formula is a constant refrain throughout the Old Testament; in this passage the arm of the Lord is not directly referred to, but the Lord's action is everywhere evident. He is the one who will break Pharaoh's arms and strengthen Nebuchadnezzar's (Ezek. 30:22, 25). It is the Lord's sword that Nebuchadnezzar will draw against Egypt (30:25). It is the Lord who will scatter the Egyptians among the nations (30:26). The clash of the superpowers is under his control.

The Fifth Oracle (31:1–18)

THE FIFTH ORACLE against Egypt compares Pharaoh to a massive tree that is felled because of its pride. Who is comparable to Pharaoh in greatness? He himself recognized no equal, and in what follows Ezekiel takes his claims of greatness seriously. He is like a cypress (31:3)³ or a mighty cedar in Lebanon; there follows a graphic picture of a tree of supernatural proportions. The myth of a tree that constitutes the heart of ordered existence, with its roots in the subterranean depths and its topmost branches in the sublime heights, providing shelter for the entire animal world, was part of the lore of the surrounding nations.⁴

Here Ezekiel puts this mythical picture to use as a description of Egypt's greatness, like a mighty cedar in Lebanon, with its topmost branches in the clouds (Ezek. 31:3). Her roots were fed by the deep springs under the earth (thôm, 31:4). As a result, she grew higher than all the other trees of the earth, providing shelter for all the birds of the air and the beasts of the field (31:5–6; cf. Dan. 4:10–12). In plain language, she became the greatest of nations, the overlord of all the nations. In fact, her greatness surpassed earthly proportions; not even the trees of the jewel of original creation, Eden itself, could match Egypt's beauty. Here are echoes of the same exalted status attributed to the king of Tyre (Ezek. 28:13–14), and also of the same fundamental sin: pride (28:17; 31:10).

Pride once again precedes a fall from grace. In all the vivid word pictures used by Ezekiel in the oracles against the foreign nations, the nature of the glorious object described contains within it the seeds of its own destruction. Tyre was a majestic ship, but is now sunk (ch. 27). Her king was as glorious as the first man, a semidivine being in the Garden of Eden, but like Adam he was driven out (28:1–19). Pharaoh is a crocodile of mythical proportions, but will be hunted down like an ordinary reptile (29:1–16). Here now, Egypt is a great world tree, but it will be felled by the cosmic lumberjack.

It was the Lord who had raised Egypt to her elevated status ("I made it beautiful with abundant branches," Ezek. 31:9), but she considered her attainments something of which to be proud (31:10). The Lord can just as easily cast her down, as the personal pronouns indicate: "I handed it over . . . I cast it aside" (31:11). The agency of execution is human ("the ruler of the nations," 31:11), but the instructions come from on high. Broken and shattered, the tree no longer provides shade and protection for the birds and the beasts, as a king might for his people (Lam. 4:20); instead, its fallen branches are merely a convenient resting place for them (Ezek.

31:13). Just as her height was unparalleled in her time, so it will never again be surpassed; for all the dominant nations that come after her will share her mortality, treading along with her the way to destruction, bound for the underworld (Ezek. 31:14).

The cosmic scale of the tree is matched by cosmic mourning at its fall and descent into Sheol, the home of the unworthy dead.⁷ The cosmic springs are shut up, while Lebanon, the home of the mighty cedar, is darkened (31:15). The heights and the depths, the sources of light and subterranean water, are thus both clothed in mourning, a state also affecting those in between.

The nations of the world trembled at the sound of the tree's fall, whose echoes reverberated even into the underworld. Those of its predecessors who had envied it, described as "the trees of Eden, the choicest and best of Lebanon" (31:16), were gratified in its sharing of their demise, while those who had allied themselves to it went down with it to Sheol (31:17). There they joined those killed by the sword, whose unpeaceful end was thought in some way to carry over to their state beyond death. Ezekiel brings out the point of the word picture explicitly in 31:18. Though Egypt's splendor and majesty were unrivaled in all the powerful nations who went before (i.e., the "trees of Eden"), she too will share their fate in the underworld among those outside the peaceful community, among the uncircumcised and those slain by the sword.

The Sixth Oracle (32:1–16)

IN HIS SIXTH oracle against Egypt, Ezekiel returns to the image of Pharaoh as crocodile. This time the image is combined with that of a lion, with the emphasis more on the natural aspect of the imagery than the supernatural overtones of chapter 29. The lion and crocodile are two mighty beasts, who appear all-powerful (32:2). Indeed, both images were regularly appropriated by the pharaohs as positive self-descriptions.

Yet in spite of their strength, both may be hunted and killed. Though Pharaoh considers himself like a lion, the great Hunter has him in his sights. Once more through human agency ("with a great throng of people," 32:3), the Lord will cast his net over Pharaoh, a method of hunting suitable to either crocodiles or lions (cf. 19:8). His corpse will be thrown to the ground to provide a home and food for the birds of the air and beasts of the field, much as was the fallen cosmic tree in 31:13. At this point, the scale of Pharaoh's demise takes on semimythical proportions: His body is big enough to be spread on the mountains and fill the valleys, his blood enough to water the land and fill the ravines (32:5–6).

The images of cosmic darkness and universal mourning are invoked, both of which were present in the previous oracle (31:15–16). In an echo of the penultimate Exodus plague on Egypt, the plague of darkness (Ex. 10:21–22), the heavens will be darkened, and sun, moon, and stars will fail to give light (Ezek. 32:7). The peoples will be appalled, and their kings will shudder because of the scale of Egypt's devastation, fearing for their own lives (32:9–10).

In this final onslaught against Egypt, the king of Babylon will shatter her pride (32:11–12). The night of the first Passover was a mere firstfruits in comparison to this full harvest of God's judgment, for on that occasion only the firstborn of human beings and animals died (Ex. 12:29). Here, however, all people and animals are cut off from the land (Ezek. 32:13). The demise of the great animal-human of verse 2 is underlined by the ceasing of his thrashing around, muddying the streams (32:13). Now the waters of Egypt will flow as clear and smooth as oil, untroubled by any disturbance (32:14). Egypt will once again recognize the sovereign power of the Lord when he acts to strike down all who live there, this time with no exceptions (32:15). The lament is prepared; all that waits is the execution of the divine decree (32:16).

The Seventh Oracle (32:17–32)

THE FINAL ORACLE against Egypt, and the final oracle in the sequence of oracles against the nations, sums up everything that has gone before by means of a comprehensive tour of the underworld, which is to be Egypt's new home. Six nations are named as already there: Assyria, Elam, Meshech-Tubal, Edom, the princes of the north, and Sidon. Egypt is the climactic and completing seventh nation of the underworld.

Once again, the oracle draws out and expands an idea present in an earlier pronouncement (31:17–18), which spoke of Egypt's descent into the underworld and the company she would keep there. Here, however, the picture is presented in graphic detail. Egypt's future home will be among the unquiet dead—with those outside the covenant ("the uncircumcised")⁹ and those who fell by the sword (32:21). Though all these other nations were once mighty and had administered a reign of terror while they lived, now they bear the reproach for their iniquity. A place of punishment—"the pit" (32:24)—is prepared for all such, and Pharaoh certainly qualifies to join the club (32:28). For the time of the Lord's appointing, he too spread terror in the land of the living (32:32), but soon he will become merely a part of the terror that is the land of the dead. The Sovereign Lord has spoken (32:32).

THE FANTASY OF EGYPT. As with the preceding oracles against Egypt, so also these oracles only make sense against the background of what Egypt represented to Israel. Egypt frequently figured in Judean fantasies as a substitute for the Lord, providing chariots and horses to prop up Judean efforts to secure independence from the great world powers of the East. These fantasies must be shattered before the people can be restored; they need to see that only the Lord is able to deliver them from all dangers.

Ezekiel shatters the Judean illusions about Egypt by opening the people's eyes to Egypt's coming fate. Even though her present powers were indeed of mythical proportions—hence the use of mythical images of the great sea monster or world tree—her end will be the eminently unmythical fate of death. In fact, the situation is even worse than that, for her present power is much diminished. The Lord has already broken one of Pharaoh's arms and before long will break the remaining arm, as well as rebreak the broken limb, thus leaving Egypt helpless and unable to offer help to others. In the conflict between the Lord and the world powers, the Lord is always victorious. Moreover, in that struggle the Lord employs human agents to do his bidding, and Nebuchadnezzar is nothing less than the servant of the Lord, equipped with the sword of the Lord to execute judgment on the Lord's enemies (30:24). To stand against Nebuchadnezzar is to stand against the Lord and to incur certain death, as Egypt's allies will find out.

Ezekiel's description of the underworld draws on what would then have been a widely accepted three-layer view of the universe. The upper layer (heaven) was the home of the divine beings; the center layer was the "land of the living," while underneath lay Sheol, the realm of death and the dead. The Old Testament descriptions of this place are relatively sparse compared to the fullness of New Testament revelation. It is more accurate to characterize it as a place of "underlife" than a place of "afterlife," for there is nothing in that realm that deserves the epithet of "life." It is a place of shadows, of the experiencing by the unrighteous of the unsuffered consequences of a lifetime. If Egypt and her pharaoh rightly belong there, so also do all who trust in her. The unexpressed implication is that it will not be so for those who trust in the Lord.

The deceit of contemporary Egypts. In our context, Egypt does not hold the same attractions as it did for Ezekiel's hearers. For us, it is merely a geographical region, not a spiritual entity. However, the same basic temptations assail us, for we too have our earthly strongholds in which we place our trust, blindly worshiping and serving created things rather than the Creator (Rom. 1:25). The end of Egypt as a factor in our spirituality is not the end of the lie of self-sufficiency; rather, the lie has endless power to change into a new form and reshape for maximum appeal in each of our lives. For example, for some contemporary people the allure of Egypt is replaced by the allure of wealth. For those people, money seems to offer the same things that Egypt offered Judah: independence, freedom from outside controls and limits, the power to choose, and comfortable affluence. The core lie is the same; only the packaging has changed.

Yet the new idol is just as deceitful as the old—and for the same reasons. On the one hand, its power is not as great as we are tempted to believe. The mythical aura of invincibility that wealth carries in our society is just that: a myth. God can bankrupt the richest person, or in allowing them to possess wealth he can still deny them the blessings they thought it would give them: freedom, happiness, and independence. Many people who achieve great wealth nonetheless find their lives filled with a pervasive boredom. God continues to shatter the arms of the strongest idols of this world.

Yet even if the power of money were as great as its advertising copy claims, so that it really could buy happiness and satisfaction in life, death still remains as the great leveler and relativizer of all of this world's goods. As the grim Spanish proverb puts it: "There are no pockets in the shroud." On the day of death, the inability of wealth to deliver lasting blessings will become thoroughly evident, as deceased millionaires rub shoulders in the grave with paupers. There are no exclusive country club areas in either heaven or hell.

Wealth is, of course, not the only contemporary "Egypt substitute." There are perhaps as many claimants to the title as there are people. On all sides, we are presented with products and ideologies, philosophies and relationships, each of which asserts that it alone offers true freedom. Some are more self-evidently illusory in the present than others: the alcoholic's bottle and the crack addict's needle are more obviously deceptive in what they offer than the respectable middle-class idols of career, reputation, family, and possessions.

Yet ultimately any refuge apart from God is a delusion, professing a power that it does not have, promising much and delivering little. The most profound work of God in our lives is the Spirit's work of unmasking our own personal idolatries, the refuges in which we have come to trust rather than him. Often he does so by bringing us through repeated trials in a particular area of our lives that expose the true nature and impotence of our idols. Though the process may be painful, it is nonetheless an act of God's grace when he exposes the destitution of our idols in this life, lest we share their fate in death.

Contemporary Significance

In What do we trust? The declaration on U.S. bank notes is unequivocal: "In God we trust." Unfortunately, it is a single-mindedness that few of us, even as Christians, live out in practice. The temptation to trust in the paper on which the slogan is written rather than in the God of whom the slogan speaks is real. Yet on what does our faith in that piece of paper rest? The paper can be burned up, lost, or stolen. Even if the paper is retained, its value can be devastated through runaway inflation to the point where the note itself is virtually worthless. Moreover, even if none of these things happen, U.S. dollars are not the local currency beyond the grave. How foolish we are, then, to place our trust in money! Yet how many of us still believe unflinchingly in its power to bless us, and that possessing more of it will make our life more meaningful and desirable! The number of people who participate weekly in the various state and local lotteries demonstrates the power of that myth in our society.

Or consider the power of the myth of career. How many people have devoted their lives to finding a fulfilling and rewarding job? In the process, they may sacrifice precious relationships and outside interests on the altar of success, which they have defined as career progress. How many find, if they finally reach the top of the ladder, that they wish they had climbed a different one? Even if they are content with the ladder they have climbed and they receive the benediction of their idol, do its blessings last? Sooner or later, through retirement or death, the ladder is put away. The job is turned over to someone else. Where will they be then?

But perhaps these are altogether too obvious idols to deceive us. Perhaps we have instead sacrificed everything on the altar of family. What could be more noble than laying down our lives for the sake of our loved ones? Yet if our trust is in our family to provide meaning and value in our lives, then we too are headed for disappointment sooner or later. In the short term, we should remember that we are investing our love in fallen sinners. Even faithful Christians see their spouses commit adultery or their children rebel and run away, in spite of their best efforts. The pain and sorrow of such traumas are real and intense. But in the life of someone for whom family has become the controlling myth, they are more than intense; they are devastating. Life loses all its meaning, for meaning was determined by the sense of family.

Yet, tragic though it is, such a painful loss may be God's way of demonstrating the powerlessness of "family" to save. It is a broken reed, which wounds those who lean on it. Even those who do not experience that kind of disillusionment through broken family relationships must still face up to the reality of death. The ultimate dissolution of all earthly relationships is a fact that cannot be gainsaid. Relationships by blood or marriage may serve to gain us citizenship in earthly kingdoms, but they will avail us nothing when it comes to citizenship in the kingdom of heaven.

Escape from ultimate disappointment. In his book The Great Divorce, C. S. Lewis imagines a group of people on a day trip from hell to the borders of heaven. Hell is depicted as a gray, shadowy place, full of ordinary things like bus stops and fish-and-chip shops, but ultimately unreal. Heaven, on the other hand, is bright, sharp, and real. It is an uncomfortable place for the shadowy, unsubstantial people on the day trip. On their arrival, they are each faced with the choice of whether to stay in heaven and so gradually, painfully become "real," or to return to the comfortable shadowland. In each case, the decision boils down to a choice between retaining an idol and gradually becoming nothing more than a pale reflection of the idol itself, or allowing the idol to be killed, thus being set free to a new dimension of life. Lewis's allegory describes well the choice that we are faced within life: Follow the true God along the real path—often a painful decision but ultimately the way to life—or believe our idols when they tell us that we cannot live without them and settle for an empty promise now and ultimate disappointment.

I wonder how many of the painful experiences we encounter in life are God's direct challenges to the "Egypts" in our lives? Though they are painful, yet these "frowning providences" (as the Puritans called them) are still evidence of God's goodness and love for us. Thanks be to God that he often acts sooner rather than later to expose the powerlessness of that in which we have trusted to save ourselves. But how slow we often are to learn!

Ezekiel 33

THE WORD OF THE LORD came to me: ²"Son of man. speak to your countrymen and say to them: 'When I bring the sword against a land, and the people of the land choose one of their men and make him their watchman, ³ and he sees the sword coming against the land and blows the trumpet to warn the people, ⁴then if anyone hears the trumpet but does not take warning and the sword comes and takes his life, his blood will be on his own head. ⁵Since he heard the sound of the trumpet but did not take warning, his blood will be on his own head. If he had taken warning, he would have saved himself. ⁶But if the watchman sees the sword coming and does not blow the trumpet to warn the people and the sword comes and takes the life of one of them, that man will be taken away because of his sin, but I will hold the watchman accountable for his blood.'

⁷"Son of man, I have made you a watchman for the house of Israel; so hear the word I speak and give them warning from me. ⁸When I say to the wicked, 'O wicked man, you will surely die,' and you do not speak out to dissuade him from his ways, that wicked man will die for his sin, and I will hold you accountable for his blood. ⁹But if you do warn the wicked man to turn from his ways and he does not do so, he will die for his sin, but you will have saved yourself.

¹⁰"Son of man, say to the house of Israel, 'This is what you are saying: "Our offenses and sins weigh us down, and we are wasting away because of them. How then can we live?" ', ¹¹Say to them, 'As surely as I live, declares the Sovereign LORD, I take no pleasure in the death of the wicked, but rather that they turn from their ways and live. Turn! Turn from your evil ways! Why will you die, O house of Israel?'

12"Therefore, son of man, say to your countrymen, 'The righteousness of the righteous man will not save him when he disobeys, and the wickedness of the wicked man will not cause him to fall when he turns from it. The righteous man, if he sins, will not be allowed to live because of his former righteousness.' ¹³If I tell the righteous man that he will surely live, but then he trusts in his righteousness and does evil, none of the righteous things he has done will be remembered; he will die for the evil he has done. ¹⁴And if I say to the wicked man, 'You will surely die,' but he then turns away from his sin and does what is just and right—¹⁵if he gives back what he took in pledge for a loan, returns what he has stolen, follows the decrees that give life, and does no evil, he will surely live; he will not die. ¹⁶None of the sins he has committed will be remembered against him. He has done what is just and right; he will surely live.

²¹In the twelfth year of our exile, in the tenth month on the fifth day, a man who had escaped from Jerusalem came to me and said, "The city has fallen!" ²²Now the evening before the man arrived, the hand of the LORD was upon me, and he opened my mouth before the man came to me in the morning. So my mouth was opened and I was no longer silent.

²³Then the word of the LORD came to me: ²⁴"Son of man, the people living in those ruins in the land of Israel are saying, 'Abraham was only one man, yet he possessed the land. But we are many; surely the land has been given to us as our possession.' ²⁵Therefore say to them, 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says: Since you eat meat with the blood still in it and look to your idols and shed blood, should you then possess the land? ²⁶You rely on your sword, you do detestable things, and each of you defiles his neighbor's wife. Should you then possess the land?'

27"Say this to them: 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says: As surely as I live, those who are left in the ruins will fall by the sword, those out in the country I will give to the wild animals to be devoured, and those in strongholds and caves will die of a plague. ²⁸I will make the land a desolate waste, and her proud strength will come to an end, and the mountains of Israel will become desolate so that no one will cross them. ²⁹Then they will know that I am the LORD, when I have made the land a desolate waste because of all the detestable things they have done.'

³⁰"As for you, son of man, your countrymen are talking together about you by the walls and at the doors of the houses, saying to each other, 'Come and hear the message that has come from the LORD.' ³¹My people come to you, as they usually do, and sit before you to listen to your words, but they do not put them into practice. With their mouths they express devotion, but their hearts are greedy for unjust gain. ³²Indeed, to them you are nothing more than one who sings love songs with a beautiful voice and plays an instrument well, for they hear your words but do not put them into practice.

33"When all this comes true—and it surely will—then they will know that a prophet has been among them."

Original Meaning

AFTER THE JUDGMENT oracles of Ezekiel 1–24 and the oracles against the foreign nations in chapters 25–32, we finally get to the good news in chapters 34–48. The turning point in the saga is chapter 33, and it comes with the arrival among the exiles of the news of Jerusalem's fall. That bad news clears the ground for the proclamation of something new. Ezekiel 33 is a carefully constructed whole, with a chiastic movement that hinges around the confirmation of the fall of Jerusalem (33:21–22). Verses 1–11 find a counterpart in verses 30–33, with their emphasis on hearing or not hearing the prophetic word, while verses 12–20 share similar emphases on moral behavior with verses 23–29. The whole chapter should thus be seen as a response to the news of that central event of Jerusalem's fall.

In that respect, this chapter continues logically on from the end of chapter 24, where Ezekiel was told to expect a survivor ($p\bar{a}lit$)² to come bringing news of Jerusalem's demise (24:26). In chapter 33, the survivor arrives. Similarly, the removal of the prophet's dumbness, anticipated in 24:27, becomes a reality in 33:22. These references bracket off the oracles against the foreign nations (chs. 25–32) as a separate section that completes the judgment oracles of the prophet. In chapters 34–48 the prophet's focus is placed on oracles proclaiming the salvation and restoration of Israel. These distinctions are not absolute, of course; there is hope of salvation in chapters 1–32 and words of judgment in chapters 34–48. But the whole tenor of the prophet's ministry undergoes a dramatic paradigm shift, now that Jerusalem has fallen.

Ezekiel 33 opens with the depiction of the prophet as "watchman," just as did his oracles of destruction in chapter 3. On one level, this functions as a means of renewing the prophet's commission for his new ministry.³ However, the similarities between the two sections should not be overpressed. In chapter 3, the image functioned as part of a private message to the prophet, pressing on him the importance of taking his task seriously. In chapter 33, it is part of a public proclamation (33:2, 7), pressing in on the people their own responsibility for their fate and the real possibility, even now, of repentance and return.

The proclamation starts from the general statement of a commonly accepted fact, that when the Lord sent a judgment against a land, the watchman was responsible for the consequences only if he did not warn the people (33:2–6). From this general principle, Ezekiel moves to the specific case facing the people in verses 7–9: Clearly the Lord has sent judgment against his people, and Ezekiel was appointed as his watchman (33:7). No one who has read chapters 4–32 can doubt the prophet's faithfulness to proclaiming the judgment to come; he is free from any culpability in the death of the wicked.

But does this mean that there is now no hope for God's rebellious people? Having failed to heed the prophetic word of warning, does that mean that since judgment has come, they are as good as dead? This seems to have been the thought among at least some of the exiles. They are saying to one another: "Our offenses and sins weigh us down, and we are wasting away because of them. How then can we live?" (33:10). Now that Jerusalem is on the brink of destruction and they are finally taking the possibility of judgment seriously, despair is a real danger.

Ezekiel's answer to that was that the living God takes no pleasure in the death of the wicked but rather seeks their repentance that they may live (33:11; cf. 18:31–32). God's judgment is not a fixed, deterministic fate that operates regardless of human action, but rather is a response to actual human behavior. Even now, it is not too late to turn and be saved. The fundamental covenant choice of life or death is still open to the people (33:11). The prophet illustrates the reality of that choice by appealing to two case studies, familiar from chapter 18. In the first case, a righteous man "trusts in his [past] righteousness" and does evil; he will surely die and not live (33:13). In the second, a wicked man turns from his sins and does what is right; he will surely live and not die (33:14).

Although these are presented as two equal and opposite cases, it is evident from the context that the primary interest is the second case—the wicked person who may yet live. That is the situation in which the people find themselves in 33:10. The prophet's point is that neither judgment nor salvation is an automatic process, but each works itself out through a life of "righteousness" or "wickedness"—that is, a life lived in accordance with the terms of the covenant ("the decrees that give life," 33:15) or in violation of it.

The problem that the people face is not that of God's justice, of which they complain in 33:17. His ways are indeed just, even more than just, since the path to life is continuously held open to rebels. The problem is with the people's lack of righteousness; they have followed an unjust way (33:17). They have consistently chosen the path to death over the path to life. That is what makes it bad news that God will judge each according to his own way (33:20)! Nonetheless, the point of the case studies is that there is a remedy for the bad news. The possibility of repentance is Ezekiel's answer to despair, though the need for perseverance is also there to counteract any tendency toward presumption.

This is the context in which Ezekiel places the news of Jerusalem's destruction (33:21–22). A survivor brings an eyewitness testimony of the city's fall. This is the radical turning point in the fortunes of God's people and in Ezekiel's own life. His dumbness, which has been with him since his commissioning as a prophet in 3:26–27, is now removed, just as the Lord promised in chapter 24. The prophet has finally been released from his divinely imposed bondage. The possibility of a new beginning for God's people similarly exists. But which will they choose: life or death?

The prophet is not left long in suspense. The following two sections make it clear that the hearts of God's people have not been fundamentally changed even by this radical act of judgment. Both back home in Judah (33:23–29) and among the exiles (33:30–33), it is business as usual. Those who remain behind in Judah, inhabiting the ruins of God's judgment, see the situation as an opportunity for economic gain rather than personal and societal repentance. Claiming to be Abraham's children, they interpret God's covenant promise of the land to Abraham as an inalienable right, an unconditional covenant. If Abraham as one man was able to possess the land, how much more his many descendants still living in the land (33:24)?

Indeed, the example of Abraham was a pertinent one to those who experienced the devastation of the Promised Land. The prophet Isaiah had urged the people to Look to Abraham, your father, and to Sarah, who gave you birth.

When I called him he was but one,
and I blessed him and made him many.
The LORD will surely comfort Zion and will look with compassion on all her ruins;
he will make her deserts like Eden, her wastelands like the garden of the LORD. (Isa. 51:2– 3)

The promise to Abraham should indeed act as an assurance that God would not completely abandon Israel but would comfort Zion and look with compassion on all her ruins (cf. Mic. 7:18–19). But this assurance of God's covenant faithfulness is only relevant for those who are, like Abraham, covenant-keepers. Those who do not continue in Abraham's faithful ways cannot expect to experience the blessings of the covenant.

The people are, in fact, corporately in a situation analogous to the first case study described by Ezekiel. They are relying on earlier righteousness—in this case, that of Abraham—to see them through in the face of present disobedience. The prophet describes their disobedience in the stereotypical terms of "eat[ing] meat with the blood still in it and look[ing] to . . . idols and shed[ding] blood" (Ezek. 33:25), or "you rely on your sword, you do detestable things, and each of you defiles his neighbor's wife" (33:26). Should such covenant-breakers inherit the blessings of the covenant and possess the land? By no means! Rather, these covenant-breakers will continue to inherit the three classic curses of the covenant: the sword, wild animals, and plague (33:27; cf. Lev. 26:22, 25). The land will continue to suffer God's judgment until it becomes a desolate wasteland (Ezek. 33:28–29; cf. Lev. 26:32–33). All their hopes will come to nothing.

Nor are matters any better among the exiles. The news of Jerusalem's fall appears to have given Ezekiel's message a certain popularity and topicality. He is now the subject of conversation in the cities and doorways (Ezek. 33:30). To use a contemporary analogy, he is the toast of the talk shows. But the interest is superficial: The people listen to his words but do not put them into practice, regarding them as an intriguing phenomenon rather than a life-changing reality. His fame is like that of a pop star, whose declarations on spiritual matters may arouse curiosity but are scarcely accorded authoritative status. People may have been humming along to his tune, but they are paying no attention to the true meaning of his lyrics.

Time, however, will prove the power of the word of the Lord through Ezekiel: "When all this comes true—and it surely will—then they will know that a prophet has been among them" (33:33). In that day, just as all will know experientially the power of the Lord, so they will also be forced to recognize the authenticity of the Lord's prophet.

THE HARSH REALITIES of life. The people of Ezekiel's day were a people whose physical and psychological world had collapsed. The news of the destruction of Jerusalem was a paradigm-shaking reality. It was as if the sky had fallen on their heads. The central belief structures of their world crumbled, causing many of them to be faced with the temptations of overwhelming doubt and despair. These are not issues that are often addressed from the pulpits of our churches, where a relentlessly upbeat image of the Christian life is presented as the norm. "Smile, Jesus loves you!" is our slogan. Yet for many people, the outward smile conceals teeth gritted to endure the harsh realities of life. The temptations to doubt and despair are still there under the surface, but in our contemporary circles they are "the temptation that dare not speak its name."

The reality that life is not uniformly wonderful has, of course, always been true. However, the willingness to face up to that fact is something that varies from culture to culture and generation to generation, depending on that generation's experience. Thus the generation that grew up in Europe around the turn of the century possessed a strong corporate faith in the progress and perfectibility of humankind—only to have that faith decisively shattered in the trenches of the Somme and the mud of Passchendaele. The post-First World War generation knew firsthand what doubt and despair were. They knew how hard faith in the reality and love of God was in a brutal and bloody world.

On a smaller scale, a similar shift in the cultural landscape is taking place in our time. The Baby Boomers (those born between the end of the Second World War and 1960) have grown up in an age of unprecedented economic growth and social improvement. As a generation, they came to expect endless opportunities and affluence; in general, they believe that through hard work and education, anything is possible. Theirs is an essentially optimistic outlook on life, which is mirrored by the upbeat, "self-help" approach of many sermons.

The generation that followed them, however, commonly dubbed the "Baby Busters" or "Generation X," has grown up in a world of recession and divorce, of global warming and downsizing.⁶ As a result, in spite of their relative affluence, they are not an optimistic generation, but rather cynical and bored, bereft of meaning and purpose.⁷ Such a generation is not likely to be reached by pop psychology and pat answers, for they know all too well the meaning of doubt and despair. Douglas Coupland expresses his own experience of doubt and despair in these terms:

Is feeling nothing the inevitable result of believing in nothing? And then I got to feeling frightened—thinking that there might not actually be anything to believe in, in particular. I thought it would be such a sick joke to have to remain alive for decades and not believe in or feel anything.8

Not everyone of his generation shares these same feelings, of course. Personal experiences significantly shape each person in different ways. However, the church must recognize the general shift in cultural outlook to address the unchanging gospel in ways that still communicate. Part of that shift in our day will be learning to preach to the despairing in ways that speak to their particular needs and temptations.

A deep awareness of sin. The despair felt among the exiles was not simply the result of the hand fate had dealt them, however. It was the result of the evidence of God's judgment on his people. They despaired not simply because of their situation but because of their sin (33:10). Such a depth of awareness of sin is not common in our day. Few today ever reach the point of crying out in recognition of God's holiness, "How then can we live?" (33:10). Few come to the deep conviction that there is a God and there is judgment for sin and there may even be salvation, but that it may not be for them!

Such, however, was the experience of some past ages. For example, in the classic eighteenth-century work Human Nature in Its Fourfold State, Thomas Boston described the eleventh (!) stage in the conversion process in the following terms:

The man being thus far humbled . . . looks on himself as unworthy of Christ, and unworthy of the favour of God. . . . If you now tell him he is welcome to Christ, if he will come to him, he is apt to say, "Can such a vile and unworthy wretch as I be welcome to the holy Jesus?"

Here, doubtless drawing on his own extensive pastoral experience in a rural congregation in Scotland, Boston depicts a man who has been so crushed by the preaching of the law that he feels a sense of total despair. He feels his sin to be so great that even Jesus will not welcome him. Of course, at the root of such despair is pride rather than true humility, as Boston goes on to show. It is precisely such vile wretches that the Son of Man came to seek and save (Matt. 9:12–13). However, it is a mark of the prominent preaching by Boston and his contemporaries of the claims of the law of God on all people and the certainty of God's wrath against unbelievers that such feelings of despair were produced.

Boston was far from being a legalist, but he was not afraid to say from his pulpit, "O wicked man, you will surely die" (Ezek. 33:8). Sometimes the pendulum may indeed have swung too far in that direction, so that genuine believers lacked assurance of salvation, but that is scarcely a danger in most contemporary pulpits. We need to learn from the past how to preach for deep heart conviction of sin, until people cry out in our churches also, "What must I do to be saved?"

Are we getting through? Of course, not everyone will respond in such positive terms to the plain preaching of the law. There will be those who, like the remnant left in Judah, feel that all this preaching has nothing to do with them. Instead of appealing to Abraham, as Ezekiel's contemporaries did (Ezek. 33:24), in our churches they may appeal to the fact that they have grown up in the church, as have their parents before them. Such an appeal to tradition is not enough. Even though God promises to deal faithfully with the children of his people (Gen. 17:8; Acts 2:39), that promise does not work apart from their faith but through their faith. It is as the next generation is brought by the Holy Spirit to their own expression of faith in the God of their fathers that they inherit the promises of their fathers' God.

Others may respond in a superficially favorable way, praising the clarity with which the Word is being preached. They listen and listen, but never learn or do. For them, as for some of Ezekiel's hearers, the preacher is merely an entertainer, not a conveyer of life-changing truth. Like the seed that fell on rocky ground in the parable of the sower (Matt. 13:5–6), there is no substance to their claim to faith. Time will demonstrate that fact, as they wilt under the pressures of life.

Contemporary Significance

SUPERFICIAL OR GENUINE? What do we say to those whose world has caved in? What specific temptations and problems do such people face? Those living through the aftermath of personal or societal disaster face the danger of false hope of shallow and easy answers. Many people seem to think that suffering inevitably prepares one for sainthood. Suffering is not automatically redemptive, however, nor are all the promises of God's Word available equally to all without distinction. The blessings of a covenant relationship with God come only to those within the covenant community who are living a life of obedience to the covenant.

This means that there is no automatic salvation to be found in having prayed a particular prayer, or in having been received into the membership of a particular church, or in having been baptized (whether as a child or an adult). The promises made to Abraham are real and substantial, but they are only effective for those who are genuinely Abraham's spiritual children. Such people are justified by faith, just as he was, but specifically they are justified by a faith that works itself out in action, just as his did (James 2:20–24). A claim of faith without the works that go along with it is a false claim, and the hope that is based on it is a false hope. True saints are those who persevere in faith and action to the end. In an age of "easy-believism," this is a note that needs to be sounded more clearly in our churches. The law needs to be clearly preached to those who consider themselves comfortably within the covenant community, even though their lives demonstrate no evidence to back up their claim, to press in on them their need of Christ.

For some, a major life crisis may cause them to attend church, but only as superficial hearers. Like Ezekiel's audience, they may find the form of the message interesting and stimulating, but they never feel its power in their hearts as a life-changing reality. Those of us who are preachers need to be careful that we do not foster such shallow attention. In our day, there is a focus on "seeker-sensitive" services that will present the gospel in a way that will be attractive to such people. The task of the church, however, is not to assemble seekers but to make disciples.

The task of the preacher. We should certainly have services that are open and understandable to all who come, but we should never forget that our goal is to see these people move beyond being seekers to being those who are found in Christ. The seriousness of the message must never be obscured by the desire to make the medium more attractive. The preacher's task is not to entertain or inform but to plead passionately with men and women to flee the wrath that is to come on account of sin. The preacher is commissioned to call clearly for repentance and turning to Christ, to be a watchman rather than an entertainer.

But preachers must not only preach the law to confront the hypocrite, they must also preach the gospel to woo the lost sheep. They must answer the pressing question of the justice of God (Ezek. 33:17). In times of personal or societal meltdown, the question for many is, "Why are these things happening to me? What did I ever do to deserve it?" In Judah's case, the answer to that question was apparently simple: It is not the Lord's way that is unjust, but rather their own ways are unjust (33:20). The disaster that had befallen Jerusalem was the consequence of Jerusalem's sin, as Ezekiel had gone to considerable lengths to demonstrate before the city fell. But God's purpose even in this painful judgment was not death for the errant sheep but life; after all, the Lord has no pleasure in the death of the wicked. He does not commission his prophet to say: "Turn or burn; take it or leave it; the choice is entirely yours." Instead, he instructs his watchman to cry out: "Turn! Turn from your evil ways! Why will you die, O house of Israel?" (33:11).

Responding to life's struggles. Sometimes, as with Jerusalem, the catastrophic things that happen to you are the results of your own sin. In other cases, they are not directly the result of your own sin. In either event, however, your responsibility is the same: to heed the call to respond to the glory of God. Painful experiences may be the occasion for our eyes being opened to God for the first time, or they may be the call to demonstrate perseverance in the midst of the depths of our suffering. As Christians they are never, however, simply designed to crush us. In our deepest and most desperate struggles, the problem lies not in God's unfairness in placing these burdens on us, but rather in our unrighteousness that makes us resent our particular providence.

The profound news of the gospel is that whatever bad things happen to us in this life, God does not judge us as Christians on the basis of our own ways but rather on the basis of Christ's righteousness. The gospel is therefore good news to the despairing. Since God has loved us so profoundly as to send Jesus to die on the cross for us, what will he not give to us? The bruised reed he will not break; the smoldering wick he will not extinguish.

This was the painful truth to which Horatio Spafford testified in his famous hymn, "It Is Well With My Soul." After the death of his only son, he suffered the loss of his business holdings in the Great Fire of Chicago in 1871. Just two years later, his wife and four daughters were on board a passenger ship that sank in mid-Atlantic; only his wife survived. In a short period, virtually his entire world had been destroyed. Yet as he sailed to be with his wife, at the very spot where his daughters had drowned, he wrote these immortal words of faith in God's goodness to his people, no matter what happens:

When peace like a river attendeth my way, When sorrows like sea billows roll, Whatever my lot, thou hast taught me to say, "It is well, it is well with my soul."

Chorus:

It is well with my soul, It is well, it is well with my soul. Though Satan should buffet, though trials should come, Let this blest assurance control: That Christ has regarded my helpless estate, And has shed his own blood for my soul.

My sin—O, the bliss of this glorious thought, My sin—not in part but the whole, Is nailed to the cross and I bear it no more: Praise the Lord, praise the Lord, O my soul!

And, Lord, haste the day when my faith shall be sight, The clouds be rolled back as a scroll, The trump shall resound and the Lord shall descend: Even so—it is well with my soul.

Ezekiel 34

THE WORD OF THE LORD came to me: 2"Son of man. prophesy against the shepherds of Israel; prophesy and say to them: 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says: Woe to the shepherds of Israel who only take care of themselves! Should not shepherds take care of the flock? ³You eat the curds, clothe yourselves with the wool and slaughter the choice animals, but vou do not take care of the flock. ⁴You have not strengthened the weak or healed the sick or bound up the injured. You have not brought back the strays or searched for the lost. You have ruled them harshly and brutally. ⁵So they were scattered because there was no shepherd, and when they were scattered they became food for all the wild animals. ⁶My sheep wandered over all the mountains and on every high hill. They were scattered over the whole earth, and no one searched or looked for them.

⁷" 'Therefore, you shepherds, hear the word of the LORD: ⁸As surely as I live, declares the Sovereign LORD, because my flock lacks a shepherd and so has been plundered and has become food for all the wild animals, and because my shepherds did not search for my flock but cared for themselves rather than for my flock, ⁹therefore, O shepherds, hear the word of the LORD: ¹⁰This is what the Sovereign LORD says: I am against the shepherds and will hold them accountable for my flock. I will remove them from tending the flock so that the shepherds can no longer feed themselves. I will rescue my flock from their mouths, and it will no longer be food for them.

11" 'For this is what the Sovereign LORD says: I myself will search for my sheep and look after them.

¹²As a shepherd looks after his scattered flock when he is with them, so will I look after my sheep. I will rescue them from all the places where they were scattered on a day of clouds and darkness. ¹³I will bring them out from the nations and gather them from the countries, and I will bring them into their own land. I will pasture them on the mountains of Israel, in the ravines and in all the settlements in the land. ¹⁴I will tend them in a good pasture, and the mountain heights of Israel will be their grazing land. There they will lie down in good grazing land, and there they will feed in a rich pasture on the mountains of Israel. ¹⁵I myself will tend my sheep and have them lie down, declares the Sovereign LORD. ¹⁶I will search for the lost and bring back the strays. I will bind up the injured and strengthen the weak, but the sleek and the strong I will destroy. I will shepherd the flock with justice.

17" 'As for you, my flock, this is what the Sovereign LORD says: I will judge between one sheep and another, and between rams and goats. ¹⁸Is it not enough for you to feed on the good pasture? Must you also trample the rest of your pasture with your feet? Is it not enough for you to drink clear water? Must you also muddy the rest with your feet? ¹⁹Must my flock feed on what you have trampled and drink what you have muddied with your feet?

²⁰" 'Therefore this is what the Sovereign LORD says to them: See, I myself will judge between the fat sheep and the lean sheep. ²¹Because you shove with flank and shoulder, butting all the weak sheep with your horns until you have driven them away, ²²I will save my flock, and they will no longer be plundered. I will judge between one sheep and another. ²³I will place over them one shepherd, my servant David, and he will tend them; he will tend them and be their shepherd. ²⁴I the LORD will be their God, and my servant David will be prince among them. I the LORD have spoken.

25" 'I will make a covenant of peace with them and rid the land of wild beasts so that they may live in the desert and sleep in the forests in safety. ²⁶I will bless them and the places surrounding my hill. I will send down showers in season; there will be showers of blessing. ²⁷The trees of the field will yield their fruit and the ground will yield its crops; the people will be secure in their land. They will know that I am the LORD, when I break the bars of their yoke and rescue them from the hands of those who enslaved them. ²⁸They will no longer be plundered by the nations, nor will wild animals devour them. They will live in safety, and no one will make them afraid. ²⁹I will provide for them a land renowned for its crops, and they will no longer be victims of famine in the land or bear the scorn of the nations. ³⁰Then they will know that I, the LORD their God, am with them and that they, the house of Israel, are my people, declares the Sovereign LORD. ³¹You my sheep, the sheep of my pasture, are people, and I am your God, declares the Sovereign LORD.'"

Original Meaning

EZEKIEL 34 IS a dual oracle of judgment and salvation. It is an oracle of judgment on the shepherds and fat sheep who have oppressed the flock, and of salvation for the rest of the flock through the personal intervention of the Lord as their shepherd.

This chapter opens with an oracle against "the shepherds of Israel" (34:1–16). The title shepherd was a well-known ascription of both kings and gods in the ancient Near East. For example, the second millennium Babylonian king Hammurabi describes himself as "the shepherd who brings salvation and whose staff is righteous," while his much later successor

Merodoch-Baladan II is called "the shepherd who gathers together again those who have strayed." Frequently, in this role the earthly king stood as a representative of the divine shepherd who had appointed him. A similar notion of the relationship between the king and God was present in Israel. Thus, when the tribes came to David at Hebron to make him king over them, the basis of their action was the Lord's declaration concerning David: "You will shepherd my people Israel, and you will become their ruler" (2 Sam. 5:2).

In Ezekiel's oracle of judgment, however, the Lord is coming against his shepherds—the former kings of Judah—because they have failed to fulfill their role of shepherd properly. The proper task of a shepherd was to care for the flock, that is, to protect it from dangers on the outside and dissension within—gathering those who strayed, leading the flock to good pasture and clean drinking water, and taking special care of the poor and the weak. On the contrary, these shepherds have viewed their position as an opportunity for personal gain, ruling harshly and brutally, feeding only themselves, not the flock, and even slaughtering the choicest animals (Ezek. 34:2–6). The phrase "to rule . . . brutally" (34:4) is only found in two other passages in the Old Testament. In Exodus 1:13–14 it refers to the way the Egyptians treated their Hebrew slaves, while in Leviticus 25:43, 46 it is forbidden to treat a fellow Israelite in this manner. Ezekiel thus accuses the "rulers of doing what their own history should have taught them to abhor and what the law of Moses expressly forbade."

Because of the shepherds' sinful self-interest, judgment is coming on them (Ezek. 34:7–10). In the absence of a true shepherd, the flock has been scattered and plundered (34:8). But now the Lord will step in and remove the false shepherds from their office so that they can no longer feed themselves at the flock's expense. Their shepherding will be brought to an end as the Lord acts to rescue his sheep (34:10). Now the Lord will himself search out the flock and take care of them, gathering them from all the places where they were scattered (34:12).

This metaphorical image of shepherd and sheep is made from a concrete promise of return from exile in verse 13: "I will bring them out from the nations and gather them from the countries, and I will bring them into their own land. I will pasture them on the mountains of Israel, in the ravines and in all the settlements in the land." The day of clouds and darkness when they were scattered, the day of judgment,⁴ is over; now they can look forward to a return to the "mountains of Israel," the heart of the Promised Land. There they will experience the full blessing of the Lord's shepherding: He will feed them on rich pasture and cause them to lie down in safety; he will search for the lost and bind up the injured; he will establish justice, punishing the oppressors and strengthening the weak (34:16).

This last thought leads into a further oracle of judgment (34:17–22) against the "rams and goats" (v. 17) or the "fat sheep" (v. 20). These are the broader class of leaders of the community, who had oppressed the weak with violence and grasped the limited resources for themselves without considering the needs of those without influence or power.⁵ Even what they did not need for themselves they spoiled, thus denying it to others (vv. 18–19). They had abandoned the traditional responsibility of the upper class for the social well-being of the other classes.⁶ In the desperate times leading up to the Exile, the weakest went to the wall. To prevent that happening again in future, the Lord will intervene to execute judgment within his flock, judging between sheep and sheep (v. 22). He will thus deal with both external and internal dangers to the peace and security of his flock.⁷

As elsewhere in Ezekiel, we see in this chapter a double critique of the failures of the past: the divine response of punishing those responsible and the divine promise of intervention to reverse those failures.⁸ In concrete form, the intervention takes the form of setting up over them "one shepherd, my servant David," who will act as their "prince" (nās î, 34:23–24). This figure of a nās î is often taken as something less than a king, a kind of "apolitical messiah," who rules "among" rather than "over" the people.⁹ However, such a stress fails to note that the new shepherd is placed over the people (34:23). His relationship to them is not simply primus inter pares (first among equals) but shepherd to sheep, a relationship that involves authority as well as service.

Indeed, the change to be wrought in Israel's situation is not so much a change in the nature of the office as in the nature of the occupant. God's solution to a history of bad shepherds is not to replace shepherding with a better system, but to replace the bad shepherds with a good shepherd.¹⁰ This good shepherd will be like the great king David, the king after God's own heart (1 Sam. 13:14), the archetypal picture of a strong king ruling with justice and fairness.¹¹

This future ruler is not merely an ad hoc solution to the necessities of governing the restored people. On the contrary, it is nothing less than the fulfillment of the covenant with David. God promised David that he would "raise up" (Hiphil of qwm) his offspring to succeed him and that he would establish his kingdom (2 Sam. 7:12, 25). Solomon subsequently received the promise that, if he followed the pattern of his father David, his throne would be established (Hiphil of qwm) forever. Now that dynastic oracle will be fulfilled with the raising up (Hiphil of qwm) of a new David (Ezek. 34:23; cf. Jer. 33:14; Amos 9:11), who would be the Lord's servant and his people's shepherd.

In addition, the Lord will make "a covenant of peace" with his flock (Ezek. 34:25). In place of the curses of the Sinai covenant, which they have experienced while being under the judgment of God—wild animals, drought, famine, and the sword (Lev. 26:14–35)—they will now experience the blessings of the covenant: safety, rain in its season, fruitfulness, and peace (Ezek. 26:4–13). The state of experiencing the blessings that flow from a harmonious relationship with God is what makes this distinctively a "covenant of peace."

This covenant is thus not so much a "new" covenant as it is the experience of the blessings promised in the original covenant. In place of the monarchy divided by sin, God's people will be united under one shepherd. In place of an undistinguished procession of monarchs, they will be given a ruler after God's own heart, a new David. In place of famine, plague, drought, and the sword, they will see a new level of peace and prosperity so that they will no longer bear the reproach of the nations (Ezek. 34:29). Then indeed they will know that the Lord their God is with them—for blessing and not for curse—and that they are his people. They will be his sheep and he will be their God, the harmonious relationship celebrated in Psalm 100:3.

Bridging Contexts

THE SHEPHERD METAPHOR. Who is my shepherd? The answer to that question should be known even by Sunday school children. As Psalm 23:1

affirms: "The LORD is my shepherd." But the New Testament unfolds the answer further when Jesus asserts in John 10:11: "I am the good shepherd." Jesus is the tough yet tender leader of his flock, who protects his sheep against the dangers of marauders and knows each one by name (10:11–14). He is the one shepherd who unites in himself his flock (10:16). He is the good shepherd, who leaves the ninety-nine sheep on the hillside to search for the one lost sheep, and when it is found, brings it home rejoicing (Luke 15:4–6). Jesus is also the discerning shepherd, who separates the sheep from the goats on the final Day of Judgment (Matt. 25:32).

However, just as in the Old Testament the notion of God as the Chief Shepherd was combined with that of the king as the shepherd of the people, so also Christ presently rules through the leaders of the church, who are appointed as undershepherds (1 Peter 5:2–4). As Peter makes clear, this is a position that combines authority with service: They are to "oversee" the flock but not "lord it" over them. Unlike the bad shepherds of Ezekiel 34, they are not to serve for their own benefit. Like the Chief Shepherd, they will have to be on the lookout for marauding wolves while watching tenderly over the flock, committed to their care (Acts 20:28–29).

It is this special combination of toughness and tenderness that the image of shepherd is uniquely fitted to convey. Of the two aspects, the toughness involved in being a shepherd is easily missed today. We must heed the helpful insight of Alastair Campbell: "[In the Bible, the shepherd's] unsettled and dangerous life makes him a slightly ambiguous figure—more perhaps like the cowboy of the 'Wild West' than the modern shepherd in a settled farming community."¹⁴

The blessings of the new covenant. In addition, we should note that the blessings of the covenant we experience as Christians are different from those that believers experienced under the old covenant because we have a different relationship to the land in which we live. For them, the land of Canaan was in a special way "God's land," which they inhabited as his tenants. For that reason, the fertility of the land functioned, in Chris Wright's phrase, as a "spiritual thermometer" of the relationship between Israel and her God. When they were obedient to their covenant obligations, God's goodness was demonstrated in rainfall and abundant harvests; when they were disobedient, his displeasure made itself manifest in the lack of these things (Deut. 28). This provided a pictorial prefiguring of the final eschatological state of blessing for the righteous and curse for the covenant-breakers.¹⁶

Under the new covenant, what is decisive for us as Christians is the perfect obedience of Christ in our place (Heb. 2:17–18; 4:15–16). For this reason, even though by nature we are covenant-breakers, we may still possess every spiritual blessing in Christ (Eph. 1:3). The heart of these blessings is nothing less than peace, life in all its fullness. Now we have peace with God and with our fellow human beings, as Jews and Gentiles united together in Christ, who is our peace (2:14). Through his death on the cross, those who were once in separate sheepfolds—those "far away" and those "near" (2:13)—have now been welded into a single flock, "one new man" (2:15). Through that death, this peace is already a present reality in our lives (Rom. 5:1).

However, at present we only experience that blessing in a partial way; our lives are an ongoing struggle against sin, and we continue to live in a fallen world. This world is a place of ongoing tribulation (John 16:33). Sometimes those trials are the result of our own disobedience, sometimes not. Sometimes obedience results in material blessing, sometimes in persecution and hardship. But even in the midst of the trials of this life we may yet experience incomprehensible peace and inexpressible joy because of the nearness of the Shepherd (Phil. 4:5, 7).

Contemporary Significance

CEO or PASTOR? In the contemporary church, the image of minister as shepherd is rapidly becoming an endangered species. Our models of leadership are increasingly borrowed from business. In place of the traditional view of the minister as a "pastor," the minister is now viewed as the equivalent of the CEO of a major corporation or, to continue the agricultural metaphor, as a "rancher" overseeing a large sheep-producing enterprise. It is argued, perhaps correctly, that only thus can large churches be established and maintained.

But what is the theological cost of viewing ministry as management and pastors as professional organizers, albeit in charge of spiritual organizations? What is lost in the switch is the biblical vision of the pastor as a shepherd of a flock of souls. Such a vision is far from being a peripheral matter; in Thomas Oden's words, the shepherd image is the "pivotal analogy" for leadership in the Scriptures. ¹⁸ As we have moved from being pastors to ranchers, we have traded in the vocation of handcrafting saints for the business of mass-producing sheep. ¹⁹

But what does it mean for a pastor to be a shepherd? It is a unique combination of afflicting the comfortable and comforting the afflicted. The bad shepherds of Ezekiel 34 were criticized because they ignored the fat sheep who were oppressing the other sheep, while they lived comfortably off the products of the flock. In contrast, the good shepherd will both confront the fat sheep and tenderly care for the weak sheep (34:16).

Most of us who are shepherds fall far short of this standard. Sometimes, we don't challenge those who are comfortable for fear of stirring up conflict—after all, the fat sheep are often big givers who underwrite the church's budget (and pay our salaries). Nor do we always comfort the weak sheep as we should. Taking care of the weak sheep is hard, painful, time-consuming work, and we have been told that there are more important things to do with our time. As a result, we gradually turn into managers of the flock, and as long as the flock is growing in numbers, no one around us complains. God is against such shepherds, however. He is the one to whom we are ultimately accountable, and what will it profit us if we grow a sizable megachurch, yet neglect our calling to shepherd the sheep? We will stand under his condemnation.

The good shepherd. The good shepherd will know his flock by name; he will know their strengths and their weaknesses, their joys and their sorrows. He will be there to share in the joy of their wedding celebrations, to celebrate the birth of their children, to comfort them in their sickness, and to be there when they die. Like being a watchman, being a shepherd is a heavily responsible task; it is not a job where you punch in and out and work "professional hours" (see Gen. 31:38–40). But it is also a profoundly rewarding task. Who else gets to share in all of these profoundly important moments in people's lives? Who else gets to shape and influence people's lives in such a deeply significant way?

If we are to return to truly being shepherds, perhaps we need to reconsider our love affair with big churches. It is possible to lord it over a flock of thousands; it is possible to herd a flock of hundreds; but is it really possible to pastor a congregation of more than about two hundred?²⁰ At the very least, within larger churches we need consciously to create subcongregations of this size or smaller, in which real shepherding takes place, where loving concern and care is expressed and strong, scriptural accountability is exercised.

In our organizational chart, someone must be shepherding our sheep. Moreover, the leader of the larger congregation must resist the pressures to retreat into the role of superstar preacher or of vision-casting executive. Though such people may not be able to shepherd all of the people all of the time, they should certainly be shepherding some of the people all of the time and all of the people some of the time. Otherwise, there is a real danger that contemporary pastors will lose touch with their sheep and they with them.²¹

Jesus, the model. In all of this, Jesus is our supreme model of what it means to shepherd the flock. He did not act as the rancher of a large herd, comfortably managing a megaflock from a distance through intermediaries. He picked a small group of twelve disciples and lived together with them in a way that completely changed their lives. He ate with them and slept with them; he sweated with them and sat with them; he laughed with them and cried with them. He was their pastor.

In addition, Jesus also had a ministry to a larger group of people, to the thousands who followed him around. He confronted the self-righteous Pharisees boldly, pointing out how far the righteousness of which they were so proud fell short of God's standards. But the needs of the multitudes moved him to compassion, for he saw that they were "like sheep without a shepherd" (Matt. 9:36). As a result, he was never too busy to sit with ordinary people, even with tax collectors and sinners, finding out their concerns and worries while pointing them to their deeper spiritual needs.

In Jesus we see the perfect balance of comforting the afflicted and afflicting the comfortable that is the shepherd's task. He afflicted the comfortable. That is, to those who relied on their own righteousness, he was unmerciful in tearing away the fig leaves of their excuses, driving them to see their utter need of the gospel. But he also comforted the afflicted. The sinners and outcasts did not need to have the law preached to them; they had heard it too often on the lips of the Pharisees. They needed instead to be drawn to God. They needed to hear that God did not delight in their extermination but rather was wooing them to come to him so that they might live. They needed to know that there was a place in his flock for the adulterer and homosexual, the alcoholic and the drug addict.

Most of us who are pastors will naturally gravitate toward one style of pastoral ministry or the other. By temperament, we typically either draw people to Christ or we drive them to Christ. But the image of the shepherd calls us to a richer, more balanced view of our calling: as drawers and drivers, drivers and drawers, by all means winning those whom God, the Great Shepherd, is adding to his flock.

Jesus, the fulfillment of Ezekiel 34. But Jesus is not merely the model shepherd who makes contemporary pastors feel guilty by how far short we fall. He is himself the One of whom Ezekiel 34 speaks. He is the One in whom all the covenants of the Old Testament find their fulfillment. He is the ultimate Shepherd-King, who fulfills the Davidic covenant, as the crowds recognized during his triumphal entry into Jerusalem (Matt. 21:9). He fulfills the Mosaic covenant both as the Lawgiver, who speaks his authoritative word from the mountain (Matt. 5–7), and also as the One who has come to fulfill the law given from Sinai (Matt. 5:17). He is the Second Adam, who through his obedient life, death, and resurrection fulfills the covenant of creation (1 Cor. 15:45–49). He is the One who ushers in for his people the blessings of the covenant by being the covenant-keeper in our place. In him, we have peace with God; in him, we have peace with one another; in him, all creation finds peace.

All of these blessings have both a "now" and a "not yet" aspect to them. We see them in part now, but we do not yet see them in all their fullness. Creation still groans with anticipation as it awaits the revelation of the new heavens and the new earth and of ourselves as sons and daughters of God (Rom. 8:19–23). In the meantime our experience frequently continues to be "trouble or hardship or persecution or famine or nakedness or danger or sword" (8:35). But these are momentary light afflictions in comparison to the glory that awaits us (8:18). One day Christ will return, and all will be gloriously fulfilled as God gathers his worldwide flock from many nations into his presence. Then there will be no more suffering, no more pain, no more disharmony with God, my neighbor, or the world. As Revelation 7:17 puts it: he will lead them to springs of living water. And God will wipe away every tear from their eyes.

For the Lamb at the center of the throne will be their shepherd;

Ezekiel 35:1-36:15

THE WORD OF THE LORD came to me: ²"Son of man, set your face against Mount Seir; prophesy against it ³and say: 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says: I am against you, Mount Seir, and I will stretch out my hand against you and make you a desolate waste. ⁴I will turn your towns into ruins and you will be desolate. Then you will know that I am the LORD.

5" 'Because you harbored an ancient hostility and delivered the Israelites over to the sword at the time of their calamity, the time their punishment reached its climax, ⁶therefore as surely as I live, declares the Sovereign LORD, I will give you over to bloodshed and it will pursue you. Since you did not hate bloodshed, bloodshed will pursue you. ⁷I will make Mount Seir a desolate waste and cut off from it all who come and go. ⁸I will fill your mountains with the slain; those killed by the sword will fall on your hills and in your valleys and in all your ravines. ⁹I will make you desolate forever; your towns will not be inhabited. Then you will know that I am the LORD.

10" 'Because you have said, "These two nations and countries will be ours and we will take possession of them," even though I the LORD was there, ¹¹therefore as surely as I live, declares the Sovereign LORD, I will treat you in accordance with the anger and jealousy you showed in your hatred of them and I will make myself known among them when I judge you. ¹²Then you will know that I the LORD have heard all the contemptible things you have said against the mountains of Israel. You said, "They have been laid waste and have been given over to us to devour." ¹³You boasted against me and spoke against me without restraint, and I heard it. ¹⁴This is what the Sovereign LORD says: While the whole earth rejoices, I will make you desolate. ¹⁵Because you rejoiced when the inheritance of the house of Israel became desolate, that is how I will treat you. You will be desolate, O Mount Seir, you and all of Edom. Then they will know that I am the LORD.'"

^{36:1}"Son of man, prophesy to the mountains of Israel and say, 'O mountains of Israel, hear the word of the LORD. ²This is what the Sovereign LORD says: The enemy said of you, "Aha! The ancient heights have become our possession." '3 Therefore prophesy and say, 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says: Because they ravaged and hounded you from every side so that you became the possession of the rest of the nations and the object of people's malicious talk and slander, 4therefore, O mountains of Israel, hear the word of the Sovereign LORD: This is what the Sovereign LORD says to the mountains and hills, to the ravines and valleys, to the desolate ruins and the deserted towns that have been plundered and ridiculed by the rest of the nations around vou—⁵this is what the Sovereign LORD says: In my burning zeal I have spoken against the rest of the nations, and against all Edom, for with glee and with malice in their hearts they made my land their own possession so that they might plunder its pastureland.' ⁶Therefore prophesy concerning the land of Israel and say to the mountains and hills, to the ravines and valleys: 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says: I speak in my jealous wrath because you have suffered the scorn of the nations. ⁷Therefore this is what the Sovereign LORD says: I swear with uplifted hand that the nations around you will also suffer scorn.

8" 'But you, O mountains of Israel, will produce branches and fruit for my people Israel, for they will soon come home. 9I am concerned for you and will look on you with favor; you will be plowed and sown, 10 and I will multiply the number of people upon you, even the whole house of Israel. The towns will be inhabited and the ruins rebuilt. 11 will increase the number of men and animals upon you, and they will be fruitful and become numerous. I will settle people on you as in the past and will make you prosper more than before. Then you will know that I am the LORD. 12 will cause people, my people Israel, to walk upon you. They will possess you, and you will be their inheritance; you will never again deprive them of their children.

13" 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says: Because people say to you, "You devour men and deprive your nation of its children," ¹⁴therefore you will no longer devour men or make your nation childless, declares the Sovereign LORD. ¹⁵No longer will I make you hear the taunts of the nations, and no longer will you suffer the scorn of the peoples or cause your nation to fall, declares the Sovereign LORD.'"

Original Meaning

EZEKIEL 35 COMPRISES an oracle against the nation of Edom, under the figure of its central mountain, Mount Seir. At first sight, it might seem out of place among the surrounding chapters that speak of Israel's restoration. Ezekiel had already delivered a brief oracle against Edom in the oracles against the foreign nations (25:12–14), where Edom appears as one of the seven hostile neighbors of God's people. However, this larger oracle against Edom is linked together with the oracle that follows it (36:1–15) as a pair of contrasting panels of darkness and light.

Having spoken of the restoration of the monarchy in chapter 34, the central feature of the Davidic covenant, Ezekiel now addresses the future of the land of Canaan, the central feature of the covenant with Abraham. The issue at stake between Israel and Edom is nothing less than the possession of the Promised Land. As in chapter 34, where the prophet begins by critiquing the existing bad situation and announcing judgment on it (the panel of doom), after which he announces a message of the reversal of the situation (the panel of salvation), so here first comes doom pronounced on Mount Seir, followed by salvation pronounced on the mountains of Israel. The judgment of Edom is a necessary prerequisite for the restoration of Judah.

The chapter opens with an address through the prophet against Mount Seir, the symbol of Edom (35:2). Edom, the nation to the southeast of Judah, had apparently taken advantage of the power vacuum left by the destruction of Jerusalem to move into Judean territory and take it over. Her fortunes seemed on the rise, but that was not God's final word. Ultimately, God would act to bring Edom down. The Lord declared that judgment would come on Mount Seir, so that she would become "a desolate waste" (35:3), exactly the same fate he had earlier brought on the mountains of Israel (6:14).³

The reason for God's judgment is given in 35:5: Because of the "ancient hostility" ('ébat-'ôlām) between the two nations, the Edomites gave the Israelites over to the sword in their time of judgment. This hostility reached all the way back to the time of their progenitors, Jacob and Esau (also known as Edom), as recorded in Genesis 27–28. Even the establishment of peace between these two individuals (Gen. 33) did not allay the deep-seated grievances among their descendants, which stretched down throughout history, amplified rather than diminished by the passage of time. Thus, when Judah was under God's wrath and Jerusalem was judged, Edom saw an opportunity to reclaim the stolen birthright by helping the Babylonians. But their animosity will rebound on their own heads, says the Lord. Because of their "bloodthirsty hatred" (Ezek. 35:6), blood will in turn pursue them until they are utterly cut off. To match their perpetual enmity toward Israel, now they will become "desolate forever" (simmôt-'ôlām, 35:9).

The source of Edom's perpetual enmity toward God's people becomes clear in 35:10. The Edomites desired to possess the two lands of Israel and Judah for themselves and thus to reclaim by force the stolen birthright, in spite of the Lord's past presence there. This ambition will be thwarted by the Lord's intervention to protect the honor of his own name, which was linked to the gift of Canaan to his people (35:11–12; cf. Ex. 32:11–14). Far from their possessing the traditional Israelite inheritance, their own inheritance will be wiped out; just as they rejoiced at Israel's downfall, many nations will rejoice at theirs (Ezek. 35:15). Then indeed they will know that the Lord is the One who stands behind the assignment of the land of Canaan to Israel as a lasting inheritance (Num. 34:2); his present abandonment of the land is not permanent.

Lasting possession of the land is not achieved by Edomite power, nor indeed by Jacob's tricky strategies, but by sovereign divine election, backed up by the Lord's commitment to honor his own name (Ezek. 35:11). It is that divine election that makes the mountains of Israel the permanent "inheritance of the house of Israel" (35:15). Though the vassal Israel has been temporarily removed, the land of Canaan remains the rightful property of the Lord. The living God will not be mocked or trifled with (35:13). Edom's foolish boasting will ultimately be seen as the empty words of the godless, who think to overthrow God's kingdom, only to find themselves the object first of God's mirth and then of his wrath (Ps. 2).

If Ezekiel 35 gives the dark side of the future (i.e., the destruction of presently ascendant Edom), 36:1–15 gives the bright side: the return of God's people to the land of promise. The address to the "mountains of Israel" parallels the address to Mount Seir, as well as the earlier oracle of destruction to those selfsame mountains in chapter 6. Whereas Edom sought to possess the mountains of Israel, the "ancient heights" (bāmôt 'ôlām, 36:2), and will be brought down to the depths, Israel will return to possess the land that is now in the hands of many nations (36:3).

It becomes clear as the oracle progresses that Edom in Ezekiel 35 is merely one representative of the nations at large who oppose Israel and her God.⁷ Her fate is therefore representative of all who oppose God's plan; all who seek to benefit from Israel's misfortune will meet the same end at the hands of Israel's jealous God (36:5). Though the promise of the land to Israel may at present be in abeyance because of Israel's unfaithfulness, it has not been abrogated and ultimately will be fulfilled because of the Lord's concern for his name.8

Whereas in the past God's jealousy and wrath were poured out on the mountains of Israel so that they became the object of scorn for the nations, that scorn will be returned on the head of the nations (36:7). Israel has once again become "my people" ('ammî, 36:8). The mountains of Israel will burst forth with a primeval fruitfulness as the Lord turns his face toward them in blessing (36:9). People and animals will multiply and be fruitful for the Israelites (36:11), an echo of the creation mandate in Genesis 1:28. This re-creation will not merely be a return to the former status quo but will be something even better than their original state (36:11).

Historically, the mountains of Israel had not always been experienced as a land that "does flow with milk and honey" (Num. 13:27). Sometimes it had seemed to be, as the ten timid spies falsely reported, a "land [that] devours those living in it" (13:32). But just as this report was essentially false then, so also it continued to be false as it was repeated by the nations around Israel (Ezek. 36:13). The mountains of Israel, Israel's heartland, would once again be a place of prosperity and blessing, experiencing the positive fruits of divine election; no longer would it be a barren and undesirable place, under God's curse because of the people's unfaithfulness to their covenant overlord.

Bridging Contexts

EDOM AS A theological entity. To contemporary readers, Edom is a geographical entity, not a theological one. It may be faintly recognized as the name of one of Israel's neighboring states, and the diligent student or pastor may even be interested enough to look it up on the map printed in the back of a Bible to ascertain its precise location. But this approach misses the theological overtones that the term Edom had for the ancient reader. Edom was not merely another bothersome neighbor, engaged in occasional border skirmishes over disputed territory; Edom was the archetype of the nonelect, the very paragon of a nation raging against the Lord and against his anointed.

This relationship of antagonism between Israel and Edom was longstanding. It extended all the way back to the founders of the two nations, Jacob and Esau, who struggled with one another in the womb (Gen. 25:22). It was revealed to their mother, Rebekah, that this struggle was not a simple brotherly squabble, such as is known to all those who have more than one son, but was rather the consequence of a profound theological difference. The Lord said to her, "Two nations are in your womb, and two peoples from within you will be separated; one people will be stronger than the other, and the older will serve the younger" (25:23). In other words, the Lord had chosen for the line of promise to descend through the younger son, Jacob, so that the path of blessing for the older son, Esau, would lie in submitting to God's choice.

Unfortunately, Esau was not willing to follow that path. Although he counted his birthright and the promise that (humanly speaking) went with it such a light thing that he was willing to trade it for a bowl of stew (Gen. 25:29–34), yet when Jacob craftily tricked him out of his father's blessing, his thoughts turned to murder (27:41). Of course, Jacob himself was far from blameless in all of this; he was seeking to attain the promise by strategy rather than by faith. But from before the outset of his life, Esau appears as a man passed over by God, uninterested in the things of God and antagonistic toward the chosen line.

This remained Edom's subsequent posture toward Israel. When the Israelites were coming up out of Egypt, they asked simply for right of passage through Edomite territory, offering to pay for whatever they consumed. The Edomites, however, refused and sent out a large army to turn them back (Num. 20:14–21). Later on, in the time of David, the tables were turned, and Edom was conquered by Israel (2 Sam. 8:14). They remained subject to Israel until the time of Jehoram, at which point they rebelled and reestablished their independence (2 Kings 8:20). Given that history, it is perhaps understandable that they rejoiced over the fall of Jerusalem and cheered on the Babylonian destroyers (Ps. 137:7). But to oppose God's chosen people and to rejoice at their fall is to incur God's wrath, a wrath that in due time will be poured out on Edom as an example to all who oppose God.

Thus, when Isaiah depicts the coming world-shaking judgment on all nations, his language moves from cosmic destruction to the devastation of Edom (Isa. 34:2–10). Edom will be consigned to the eternally unquenchable lake of fire, whose smoke ascends forever and ever (Isa. 34:9–10), a judgment that is preparatory to God's ultimate acts of cosmic salvation (Isa. 63). Likewise, in Malachi 1, the ultimate proof of God's love for Israel is the destruction of Edom, who is termed "the Wicked Land, a people always under the wrath of the LORD" (Mal. 1:4; cf. Obad.). None of this extreme language can be properly understood outside the representative role of Edom as the symbol of the nonelect, who perpetually range themselves against the Lord and his people and will ultimately face the consequences.

This ongoing conflict provides the background for Paul's use of the example of Jacob and Esau in Romans 9. Paul appeals to the two brothers as an example of sovereign election: God chose Jacob over Esau before the twins had done anything good or bad (Rom. 9:11). Jacob is the archetype of the one chosen by God for blessing in spite of who he was; Esau is the archetype of the nonelect, passed over by God, who then proceeds to live out his life in enmity toward God and his people. The fruit of election is salvation by grace for the elect; the fruit of reprobation is a life of enmity against God that leads to final judgment. Both of these outcomes are, however, the result of the antecedent decision of God to have mercy on those on whom he will have mercy and to harden those whom he will harden (9:18).

Yet even though Edom as a nation is implacably opposed to God, the Lord's electing mercy is still experienced by individuals from that nation. For Deuteronomy 23:7–8 declares: "Do not abhor an Edomite, for he is your brother. . . . The third generation of children born to them may enter the assembly of the LORD." In other words, even the "hated" Edomite may be engrafted into the family tree of Israel, and the one who was "not my people" by grace may yet become "my people" (cf. Hos. 2:23). The electing grace of God knows no limits.

The land of Israel as a theological entity. In contrast to the destruction to be poured out on Edom and thus on all that Edom represents, the land of Israel is promised unparalleled fertility. Should we see a fulfillment of this in the present agricultural development of the desert areas of Palestine? To do so is to miss the significance of the Edenic overtones of the promise. It is not merely fruitfulness that is being promised to the mountains of Israel but specifically a return to the Eden-like conditions of blessing that accompany the presence of the Lord in the midst of his people. What is promised is nothing short of complete fulfillment of the blessings promised to the patriarch Abraham, of a land and its people blessed by the immediate presence of their God.¹⁰

The multiplication of people envisaged by Ezekiel (Ezek. 36:10–12) finds a partial fulfillment in the adding of multitudes to the kingdom of God through the carrying out of the Great Commission to make disciples of all nations (Matt. 28:19). This is the New Testament analogue of the creation mandate given to humanity in Eden to be fruitful and multiply (Gen. 1:28). Its ultimate fulfillment, however, still lies in the future, where the Edenic fruitfulness of the earth will be restored in the new heavens and a new earth, where God's presence is in the midst of his people forever (Rev. 21:1–3).

Contemporary Significance

ALL IS OF God's electing grace. God's people have never lacked for enemies. Throughout history, there have always been those only too eager to oppose and hurt God's chosen ones. At times, it may seem as if the oppressors of the church have the upper hand and are about to crush her utterly. How can believers know for sure during those hard times that such an outcome can never happen? The answer is the assurance of God's election and promise. God has determined from all eternity to save a people for himself, and that purpose must stand in spite of all that the forces of the evil one can throw against it.

Our assurance cannot rest on our own merits and strength or on our heredity; God did not choose Jacob because he was better than Esau or Israel because she was better than Edom. He chose them simply because of his own good pleasure and purpose. Nor did he choose the nation of Israel because he foresaw that they would be strong enough to withstand the fiery furnace of trials. Rather, in Israel's case they were in the fiery furnace precisely because of their own long history of sin. Not all the descendants of Israel are part of the true Israel (Rom. 9:6). Even some who by descent are from the elect people will prove themselves to be nonelect individuals by their unrepentant sin. Some of the vine branches will refuse to abide in the vine, to their own eternal destruction (John 15:6).

But in spite of Israel's sin and rebellion against God, the honor of his name required him to act to preserve for himself a people. Astonishingly, the way in which he has chosen to do so is by engrafting the Gentiles into a new nonethnic entity, the true Israel of God (Rom. 11:17, 26; Gal. 6:16). We were engrafted into the vine not because we chose him but because he chose us to bear lasting fruit for him (John 15:16). All is of grace, even our fruitfulness, so that no one can boast in the presence of God.

Hatred from the world. Even while we are assured of God's love, however, we may rest equally assured of the world's hatred. It will hate us because it hated our master, Jesus, first (John 15:18). Esau cannot abide God's election of Jacob, and the world cannot abide God's love for his saints. We do not belong to the world or fit in it; therefore, we should expect the world to exhibit an "eternal hostility" toward us for the sake of Christ (cf. John 15:20–21).

Those who oppose God and arrogantly attempt to injure his people face the certainty of judgment, however. God will act to protect his own people, and even where he temporarily withholds his protecting hand and allows painful experiences to befall us, that is not God's ultimate word. Jesus' ultimate word to those who are his people is, "Come, you who are blessed by my Father; take your inheritance" (Matt. 25:34). By contrast, his ultimate word to those who oppose him is, "Depart from me, you who are cursed, into the eternal fire prepared for the devil and his angels" (25:41).

There is, literally, no future in fighting God. This is true not simply for the irreligious Edomite, but for the most sincerely religious individuals who range themselves against God's people. Edom's problem was not that they lacked sincerity in their religious beliefs in their gods, but rather that their sincerely held beliefs were misguided. In the experience of the outpouring of God's wrath on them, they would come at last to acknowledge the painful truth of the reality and power of Israel's God, the Lord (Ezek. 35:15).

We can be thankful, however, that just as "not all who are descended from Israel are Israel" (Rom. 9:6; in other words, not all of the elect nation are elect individuals), so also not all who are descended from Edom are Edom (i.e., not all those who wickedly oppose God are headed for eternal torment). Otherwise, we would all be lost. But alongside God's sternness exists his mercy (11:22). God's present patience with unbelievers serves his purposes in election, for some of those who are at present blasphemers against God and persecutors of the church will ultimately be found among the elect, trophies of redeeming grace, which can extend even to darkest Edom.

The apostle Paul himself was evidence of this powerful work of God (1 Tim. 1:13), and church history abounds with similar examples. To give just one, the very Auca Indians who speared to death Jim Elliot and his four friends—missionaries who had come to share the gospel with them—were subsequently converted and discipled through the ministry of two of the widows, Elisabeth Elliot and Rachel Saint. Those who once sought to destroy the gospel of God were by grace ultimately brought to love the same gospel."

Properly understood, this electing grace of God should cause us as Christians to be lost in wonder, love, and praise that we have been chosen by God to become part of his people. We have been chosen not because of anything in us or because of what we can do for him, but simply because of his mercy. We who were once not his people have by grace been incorporated into the community of God's saints. As former Edomites who have been engrafted into the Israel of God, we of all people should therefore sing Charles Wesley's great hymn with renewed amazement:

And can it be, that I should gain an interest in the Savior's blood?Died He for me, who caused His pain?For me, who Him to death pursued?Amazing love! How can it be?That Thou, my God should'st die for me?

Ezekiel 36:16–38

AGAIN THE WORD of the LORD came to me: 17"Son of man, when the people of Israel were living in their own land, they defiled it by their conduct and their actions. Their conduct was like a woman's monthly uncleanness in my sight. ¹⁸So I poured out my wrath on them because they had shed blood in the land and because they had defiled it with their idols. ¹⁹I dispersed them among the nations, and they were scattered through the countries; I judged them according to their conduct and their actions. ²⁰And wherever they went among the nations they profaned my holy name, for it was said of them, 'These are the LORD's people, and yet they had to leave his land.' ²¹I had concern for my holy name, which the house of Israel profaned among the nations where they had gone.

²²"Therefore say to the house of Israel, 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says: It is not for your sake, O house of Israel, that I am going to do these things, but for the sake of my holy name, which you have profaned among the nations where you have gone. ²³I will show the holiness of my great name, which has been profaned among the nations, the name you have profaned among them. Then the nations will know that I am the LORD, declares the Sovereign LORD, when I show myself holy through you before their eyes.

²⁴" 'For I will take you out of the nations; I will gather you from all the countries and bring you back into your own land. ²⁵I will sprinkle clean water on you, and you will be clean; I will cleanse you from all your impurities and from all your idols. ²⁶I will give you a new heart and put a new spirit in you; I will remove from you your heart of stone and give you a heart of flesh. ²⁷And I will put my Spirit in you and move you to follow my decrees and be careful to keep my laws. ²⁸You will live in the land I gave your forefathers; you will be my people, and I will be your God. ²⁹I will save you from all your uncleanness. I will call for the grain and make it plentiful and will not bring famine upon you. ³⁰I will increase the fruit of the trees and the crops of the field, so that you will no longer suffer disgrace among the nations because of famine. ³¹Then you will remember your evil ways and wicked deeds, and you will loathe yourselves for your sins and detestable practices. ³²I want you to know that I am not doing this for your sake, declares the Sovereign LORD. Be ashamed and disgraced for your conduct, O house of Israel!

the day I cleanse you from all your sins, I will resettle your towns, and the ruins will be rebuilt. ³⁴The desolate land will be cultivated instead of lying desolate in the sight of all who pass through it. ³⁵They will say, "This land that was laid waste has become like the garden of Eden; the cities that were lying in ruins, desolate and destroyed, are now fortified and inhabited." ³⁶Then the nations around you that remain will know that I the LORD have rebuilt what was destroyed and have replanted what was desolate. I the LORD have spoken, and I will do it.'

So will the ruined cities be filled with flocks of people. Then they will know that I am the LORD."

Original Meaning

IT IS NOT ENOUGH for God merely to give Israel a new shepherd-leader and a renewed land. The nation had had good kings in the past and had lived in the land God had promised to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. But the people themselves had proved unworthy to inhabit the land. A total transformation was required if the regathering and return were to be a success. It is this subject to which the prophet now turns, giving the reasons why judgment was necessary in the first place and the reasons why mercy will surely follow.

The prophet begins by pointing out the motivation for God's wrath in the past. The people, while they lived in their own land, polluted it by their actions (Ezek. 36:17). As a result they could not remain in God's presence and he could not remain in their midst. They were unclean, which the prophet describes in terms of the ceremonial uncleanness caused by menstruation. In the law of Moses, this process was considered defiling to a woman, making her unable to take part in religious activities (Lev. 15:19–24). This is not because it was in any sense sinful but because any contact with the realm of death, through the loss of bodily life-fluids (e.g., blood or semen) or through contact with a corpse, renders one unfit to be in contact with the realm of life. Communication with the living God through the various Old Testament means of grace was impossible as long as one was in a state of impurity as a result of contact with death.

What Israel had done while they lived in their land was to turn it into a permanent place of death, thoroughly defiling it by means of bloodshed and idolatry, making it a place unfit for divine habitation by the living God (Ezek. 36:18). God had no choice but to bring on them the curses of the covenant they had broken, in wrath scattering them among the nations, just as he had threatened when they first entered the land (Deut. 29:22–28).

This action, however, created a new problem for God. He had promised to bring this people, who were called by his name, into the land of Canaan to possess it. He had established a relationship between himself, his people, and the land. Yet now the nations could see that the Lord's people were absent from his land (Ezek. 36:21). That three-way relationship had been broken. The conclusion drawn by the surrounding nations would be natural: The Lord's power was insufficient to bring about that which he promised.² He had given up on his people as a bad job. The final elimination of those people for their sins—what Moses had feared in Numbers 14:15–16 and had prayed against—had finally become a reality.³

Thus, as long as Israel was scattered among the nations, they continually profaned the divine name (Ezek. 36:20). This was now not because of anything particular they were doing, although there is no suggestion that the shock of exile in and of itself brought about a radical change in their behavior. Rather, they profaned God's name simply by being in exile instead of in the land of promise!⁴

All of which brings Ezekiel to the reasons for God's future mercy. If there had been no other reasoning involved for God than the necessity of dealing with Israel's sin, permanent wrath would have sufficed. Israel could simply and deservedly have been blotted out from the pages of history as an example of the power of God's holiness and his anger against sin. It is not because God shrinks from dealing out such judgment that he stays his hand from crushing Israel comprehensively and finally. After all, he had earlier repeatedly declared that he would not have compassion (hāmal) on sinners (5:11; 7:4; 8:18; 9:5, 10). As was the case for the people of Noah's day, the inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah, or the Amorites living in the land at the time of Joshua's assault, those whose sins were full could simply have been totally destroyed.

However, the Israelites of Ezekiel's day were not completely destroyed. Why not? Because though he has no compassion on them, God will nonetheless have concern (ḥāmal) for his name, which he had inextricably linked to Israel by entering covenant with them. Because of that sovereign, irrevocable act, mercy not only may but must be shown to Israel. The honor of God's name will be vindicated by a show of power among the nations when he brings Israel back to her land (36:21–23). The Lord will act, not for Israel's sake, but for the sake of his own name. The root of God's action in restoring his people is grounded not in his love (which might suggest something lovable about the object of his affections) but in a demonstration of his holiness.

But this act through which God's power is demonstrated involves not merely bringing Israel back physically to the land but also a total change in their nature. His people must be redeemed not merely outwardly but inwardly, effectively. Israel will indeed be gathered and returned from the nations to their own land (Ezek. 36:24). Then she will be sprinkled with clean water, symbolizing her cleansing from all her past impurities and idolatries, the things that had made the land unclean (36:25). In a similar way, Leviticus 15 prescribed washing with water to cleanse that which is unclean.

This outward act of initiation is then followed by a deeper, internal change, whereby Israel's heart and spirit will be made new. The "heart" and the "spirit" are the seats of thought and will from which actions flow. Unresponsive, unyielding stone will be replaced by warm, living, responsive flesh (Ezek. 36:26). That which has been defiled will be made clean. The Spirit of God, which brings life and power, will indwell them and create in them both the will and the ability to follow God's decrees and laws (36:27). Then, finally, they will be fit to live in God's land and be his people, and he in turn will not be ashamed to be called their God (36:28).

Then the Israelites will experience the blessings of the covenant, the fruitfulness of the land, rather than the covenant curse of famine that had made them a reproach among the nations (36:30). Such a salvation will not bring about pride in the renewed nation but rather a profound sense of shame, for they will realize that their salvation is not something they have merited or deserved in any sense. Rather, it is a free gift of sovereign grace. Nothing short of such radical divine intervention could have saved such a people.

In addition to the act of self-glorification that results in the restored people being returned to the land, God will also restore the land to a "better-than-original" state. It will become "like the garden of Eden," the ultimate symbol of fertility and fruitfulness (Ezek. 36:35; cf. Isa. 51:3; Joel 2:3). The garden land will be filled with restored cities; the places that once were torn down and desolate will be inhabited and fortified (Ezek. 36:35). In place of the one original 'ādām and his wife, the new garden land will be filled with "flocks of 'ādām," that is, numerous "people" who will fill the cities to overflowing (36:38). The fertility and fruitfulness will thus encompass the people as well as the land itself, to the point where it will be as crowded as Jerusalem used to be on the great annual festivals, when her streets were crammed with a mass of people and animals (36:38).

The chief blessing, however, will be that God will once more be responsive to Israel's petitions. In the past, he refused to be sought by the elders of his adulterous people (14:3; 20:3). His face was turned away from them and no intercession was possible. But in the future, that too will change. As a mark of Israel's restored status as God's people, he will permit himself to be sought by them to act on their behalf (36:37). To adapt the familiar language of 2 Chronicles 7:14, his people, who are once again called by his name, can now seek his face and God will hear from heaven and heal their land. The abundance of population will be proof of this favor of God that now rests on his people. Then indeed, they and the nations will know that the Lord has rebuilt that which he destroyed and replanted that which he desolated (Ezek. 36:36). God's holiness will then have been displayed fully both in the judgment of the wicked and in the gracious salvation and transformation of the people called by his name.

CEREMONIAL CLEANNESS AND uncleanness. The concept of ceremonial uncleanness is a distinctive feature of the Old Testament law. People and things were divided by nature into the categories of "clean" and "unclean," of "sacred" and "profane." Sheep, for example, were "clean" animals, which could be eaten, while camels were "unclean" and could not be eaten (Lev. 11:4).

These were not random divisions within the animal kingdom, nor were they categories motivated by hygienic considerations, a reflection of the relative safety of the meat of the animals concerned. Rather, the animals functioned as a means of holding up a mirror to society. Unclean animals formed the outer circle of the natural order. They were neither to be eaten nor sacrificed to God. Clean animals formed an intermediate category: All clean animals were fit to be eaten, but only some clean animals qualified for inclusion in the central circle, those that could be used for a "sacred" purpose by being sacrificed to God. Those that fit the criteria for this function had to be unblemished animals from a limited number of groups.

A similar ordering prevailed in the social realm and in the realm of sacred geography. On the outside of the circle were the nations, those who lived outside the Promised Land. They could observe God's great acts and act as witnesses of his mighty deeds. But unless they converted, they could not enter the inner circle of God's covenant people, Israel, and live permanently in the land. Even this inner group was subdivided, however, with a "sacred" minority who served as priests and had access to the inner areas of the tabernacle and temple. Membership of this group was limited to unblemished members of a particular subgroup (Levites who were descendants of Aaron). Only these people were qualified for the sacred purpose of approaching God. One of the responsibilities of the priests was to teach clearly to the people these distinctions between "clean" and "unclean" (Lev. 10:10–11; Ezek. 22:26; 44:23).

These were not entirely fixed categories, however. What was clean could become unclean, either temporarily or permanently. For example, a man could become unclean through a bodily discharge or through contact with a person so afflicted (Lev. 15:2–15). Anyone who thus came into contact with the realm of death was temporarily unfit for contact with the living God. Moreover, anyone who had incurred a certain kind of skin disease might become permanently unclean and be cut off from the covenant community (Lev. 13:45–46). Likewise, what was holy could become profane through inappropriate contact with the profane; and if the priests failed to be holy, they profaned the holy name of the Lord (21:6; 22:2).

What Israel had done through her idolatry and bloodshed was to move themselves as a nation from the category of "clean" to "unclean." The land had become defiled by their presence, just as a woman was defiled (temporarily) by her monthly flow of blood. They were therefore no longer able to inhabit the inner circle, the land of promise, from which they had necessarily been scattered (Ezek. 36:18–19). The punishment fit the crime: Having behaved like the unclean (the nations), they were now scattered among them.

But this was not—indeed, could not be—the final word. For the holiness of God's name was linked to his people, and therefore he would act to move them back from the outer circle to the inner circle. Physically, they would be regathered from among the nations. Spiritually, they would be purified with clean water to cleanse them from existing impurities and changed from the inside out to prevent a recurrence of uncleanness. Then they would be fit to live in the presence of the Holy One and to commune with him.

In the New Testament, the old categories of "clean" and "unclean" are radically revised. This epochal change was revealed in a vision to Peter in Acts 10, when he was shown all kinds of unclean food that he was instructed to eat. But his initial refusal, itself an echo of Ezekiel's refusal to eat unclean food in Ezekiel 4, was rebuked by God with the words: "Do not call anything impure that God has made clean" (Acts 10:15). A radical change had taken place in redemptive history with the death and resurrection of Christ and the pouring out of the Spirit on the church. At a stroke, the old barriers were broken down. The motivation for change was not that the dietary restrictions would form a barrier to the effective evangelization of Gentiles but that the old wall of separation between Jew and Gentile as God's people and outsiders had gone in Christ (Eph. 2:11–22). Now the nations could be included in the people of God, and the line between "clean" and "unclean" is determined not by ethnic origins but by faith in Jesus Christ.

It is important that we recognize the nature of this change, however. It is not that the line between clean and unclean, between holy and profane, has been abolished. Rather, it has moved. In Christ, men and women from all nations become "clean" and "holy." The goal of Exodus 19:6, the creation of a kingdom of priests and a holy people, is fulfilled in the church (Rev. 5:10). No longer are there any gradations of holiness within the holy people: All who are in Christ are sacred, and there is a genuine priesthood that belongs to all believers. For Christians every activity in life is sacred—from reading the Scriptures to emptying the garbage—for all is done to the glory of God. But all those outside of Christ are unclean and profane, no matter their genetic background or their religious fervor. Outside of Christ, their best and most self-denying endeavors are unfit for God's presence, suited only for the trash heap.

Concern for the name of God. In a similar fashion to the concept of ritual cleanliness, the concern for the "name" of God is likewise a distinctive concern of the Old Testament. The divine name Yahweh was revealed to Moses on Mount Horeb (Ex. 3:14), a decisive progress in the self-revelation of God. God's name was placed on the angel who went ahead of the Israelites into the Promised Land, which means that rebellion against him was tantamount to rebellion against God himself (Ex. 23:21). God's name also appeared as a virtual hypostasis of the Lord himself, whether coming against his people in judgment (Isa. 30:27) or dwelling in their midst in blessing at the central place of worship (Deut. 12:5, 11). The Aaronic blessing was intended as a means of putting God's name on the Israelites, so that they might receive his blessing (Num. 6:27).

In the New Testament, concern for God's name remains a central category. The Lord's Prayer includes the petition: "Our Father in heaven, hallowed be your name" (Matt. 6:9). The precise focus, however, has shifted. Now the name placed on God's people is the triune name of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit (28:19). There is no longer a central place of worship on which the divine name is placed and where the divine presence is experienced; instead, whenever two or three of his people gather in the name of Jesus, they experience his presence with them (18:20). God's children are all those who believe in the name of Jesus (John 1:12). Gentiles too are included in this people whom God has chosen for his name (Acts 15:14). By this act of salvation, accomplished through Jesus' death on the cross, the Father will glorify his name (John 12:28).

God's exclusive concern with his own name and glory may seem offensively self-absorbed to contemporary readers. We are used to beginning our theological reflection "from below" and celebrating the God who is "for us." But God is only for us because it brings glory to himself. Moreover, such self-absorption is as great a virtue in God as it is a flaw in human beings. For God to delight in his own perfections is entirely appropriate, since there is no one and nothing greater in which he can delight. To delight in anything less than himself would be idolatry, just as surely as it is idolatry for us as creatures to delight in anything less than our great Creator. Sanctifying his great name, exalting God above all things, is the only task fit for God himself and for humankind, whom he has created in his image.¹² LIFE CHANGES. The traditional sea shanty "What Shall We Do With the Drunken Sailor?" considers a number of methods of bringing about behavioral change in the inebriate. "Drag him in the longboat until he's sober" is one possibility; another is, "Put him in the scuppers and hose him all over." One doubts, however, that the methods adopted will bring about lasting life-change in the person. Other, more serious, methods of attempting to bring about change in people's lives exist in the contemporary world. These include Alcoholics Anonymous, "twelve-step" programs for those with various addictions, Weight Watchers and other programs for those whose problem is with eating, and a plethora of counseling resources for behavioral difficulties. Many people spend hours of their time and countless dollars of resources in seeking effective, lasting change.

The motivation for seeking change on the part of the person concerned is frequently the perception that their life is in some way dysfunctional. Such people feel they are not living life to the full, but instead are engaging in lifestyle choices that result in a diminished quality of life. If only they could solve their behavioral problem or find and fix its underlying psychological root, their life will surely be fuller and more meaningful. Then they will be "cured."

In contrast to this essentially medical model of the human predicament, Ezekiel has presented the Lord's diagnosis of Israel's situation. She is not so much sick and in need of a cure, as sinful and in need of purification. Through her past history of sin, she has made herself totally unfit to inhabit God's land and to exist in his presence. Because of her sin, she is offensive to a holy God. In the language that the apostle Paul applies to all of us, she is "by nature [the] object of [God's] wrath" (Eph. 2:3). Her lifestyle change is necessary not so much because she is missing out on living life to the full, but because she has forfeited the right to life itself. God's judgment has descended on her, and she has been scattered among the nations.

This raises the question, "Is such radical change possible?" In contemporary life-change programs, this question is invariably answered in the affirmative: Because of the infinite power of the human spirit, you can kick that habit, lose those pounds, win friends and influence people—at least, so the brochures assure us. This humanistic optimism often carries over into the church. So we assure people, "God loves you and has a wonderful plan for your life," as if that were the most natural and self-evident truth in the world. In consequence, it is not surprising to find that many people approach Christianity as if they were interviewing God for a job, checking out whether as a Deity he is up to the task of being "Lord of their life." They are seeking to determine whether Christianity will "work for them," on the assumption that God will be only too pleased to welcome them should they decide in his favor.

The Bible, however, gives us no reason to be so automatically sanguine about the prospect of our acceptance by God. Ever since the fall of Adam and Eve, there has been no "of course" when it comes to the question of the future of the human race. We have collectively walked the tightrope of total destruction by God's wrath several times. That we have survived as a race is not because we somehow merited God's favor or because God's love is more powerful than his wrath and he could not bear to see such delightful creatures as us utterly exterminated. The only reason for the continued existence of human beings on this planet is God's commitment to his eternal plan sovereignly to save for himself a people.¹³

What is more, just as Israel was maintained alive by God's firm determination to glorify himself in and through the people he had chosen, so it is also for us who make up the church. There is no "of course" about our salvation. By nature, we are deservedly dead and have no prospect apart from God's wrath. It might be a more biblical approach if instead of starting with the love of God, we begin our presentation of the gospel where Paul does in Romans: "The wrath of God is being revealed from heaven against all the godlessness and wickedness of men" (Rom. 1:18). That there is another way, as Paul goes on to unfold in what follows, is an astonishing testimony to God's determination to finish what he started, for his own glory and not for ours. Our salvation is entirely by grace.

Purification and renovation. Because of God's determination to finish what he started, we can be sure not only that his people will be saved but also that they will be fully sanctified. Israel must be cleansed and made holy if she is to stand in his presence. So also the church, God's new covenant people, must be purified from their sins and perfected in righteousness. The people who are saved not by works are saved through God's work, for good works (Eph. 2:9–10).

This work of God in believers is a two-stage process, just as it is depicted in Ezekiel 36.¹⁴ First there is an initial work of purification, which corresponds to the outward sprinkling of water on the restored Israel (36:25). Then there is an ongoing work of internal renovation, which Ezekiel describes under the figure of receiving the new heart and new spirit through the internal work of the divine Spirit (36:26–27). These two stages are both necessary to being a Christian, and this passage may well be the one that lies behind Jesus' statement to Nicodemus, "No one can enter the kingdom of God unless he is born of water and the Spirit" (John 3:5).¹⁵

(1) God's initial work involves the purification of our sins. In this work, we are the passive recipients of his action in washing away our sins, applying to us the merits of Jesus' work on the cross (Eph. 5:26). It is the necessity of this cleansing regeneration to which baptism points: When we are baptized, whether as adults or children, we testify to the need we all have for Jesus Christ, whose cleansing blood is symbolized in the water. Baptism points to the need for a change that can only come from the outside, for it can only be done by someone else. It is not so much a testimony of my decision for Jesus as an act of wondering faith that Jesus has decided for me.

Baptism is an act of faith in God's promises. When Abraham circumcised his children, he knew it was a circumcision of the heart that counted, not an external ceremony. This is the logic behind the baptism of the children of believers in Reformed and Presbyterian churches. When we baptize our children, we know that a baptism of the heart, a new birth through the Holy Spirit, is necessary. Simply applying water to the outside will not save. But in baptism we lay hold by faith of the goodness of God and claim for our children the promise of the Holy Spirit.

What grounds do any of us have as Christians for hoping that our children will grow up to believe the same things that we do? Perhaps some would say, "Well, I send my little Joshua to church; I read the Bible with him; I set him an example in Christian living." Now all of those things are good, but the only thing you can do for your child by yourself is make your child religious. Only God can give your child the new heart he or she requires. "Well, of course, he'll do that," you reply. But why should there be any "of course" about it? The only thing we pass on to our children as "a matter of course" is a sinful nature and a flawed example.

We can be grateful, however, that God has revealed himself as a covenant God, who deals faithfully with us as families as well as individuals (Gen. 17:7). This self-commitment is not simply a blessing for the old covenant order. As Peter told his hearers on the first day of Pentecost: "The promise [of the Holy Spirit] is for you and your children and for all who are far off"

(Acts 2:39). That is what people in the Reformed tradition proclaim joyfully to the world when they baptize little ones—that they too have a promise that they can look to God in repentance and faith and receive the promised Holy Spirit. They are acknowledging to themselves and their children that they cannot save themselves—but also that God can, and will, if they look to him in repentance and faith. He will do so, because he is a covenant-keeping God, who does not change and who brings about his determined purpose to save and sanctify a people for himself.¹⁶

(2) Thus, God's "wonderful plan" for our lives is not limited to taking us to heaven; it also includes bringing heaven into us, remaking us into a holy people. He is not content merely to wash his people of their past sins and to impute to them the righteousness of Jesus Christ, he also wills to work a perfect holiness in them. This is the second stage of God's great work in redeemed humanity: renovation. God's determinate plan is that we be perfect as he is perfect (Matt. 5:48), that when Jesus Christ returns, we be completely purified from all sin (1 John 3:2–6). To be sure, that purpose is not yet a present reality. Everyone living in this world does, in fact, still sin (1 John 1:8). But the Spirit has been poured out into our hearts, in a measure that Old Testament saints could only dream about, in order that the process might begin in us here and now in full assurance that on that day it will be completed.

To be sure, Old Testament saints also experienced the renewing work of the Spirit of God (Ps. 51:10–11).¹⁷ But in their experience the work was always partial, always provisional. Now that Christ has died and risen, the Spirit of God has been given to us in full measure, so that by him we might put to death the misdeeds of the body (Rom. 8:13). At present, we may experience only the firstfruits of the Spirit's work, and we await with eagerness the fullness of redemption (8:23). But just as we look forward to the day when we will be done with sin and long for its coming, so also that promise of God provides the incentive to holy living here and now (1 John 3:3).

A feeling of shame. Finally, God's "wonderful plan" for our lives does not exclude the possibility of shame over past sins. Renewed Israel was to "be ashamed and disgraced" over their conduct, even to the point of self-loathing for their "sins and detestable practices" (Ezek. 36:31–32). Modern people may view such self-loathing as psychologically unhealthy, urging the foundational importance of a high self-esteem.¹⁸

The Bible takes a different view of our position, however. As we grow in our appreciation of the gospel, we do not view ourselves in a better and better light. Rather, with Paul, we understand the true offensiveness of our sin, so that we come to view ourselves as the worst of sinners (1 Tim. 1:15). We grow to understand that, by nature, we are far worse than we ever could have imagined, that the wrath of God against my personal sin is fully justified, and that even in my best moments, in my most righteous acts, I deserve nothing other than utter damnation. My heart is indeed deceitful above all things and beyond cure (Jer. 17:9). As a Christian, the first thing I need to know, as the Heidelberg Catechism reminds us, is how great are my sin and misery. That knowledge should induce an appropriate level of sorrow and shame over my sin.

However, as Paul says in a different context, we should not grieve as those who have no hope (1 Thess. 4:13). Though we are indeed far worse than we could have imagined, the gospel reminds us also that in Christ we are far more loved than we could have imagined. It reminds us that though we are and remain sinners all our days on earth, we are at the same time as Christians justified sinners, who will one day certainly be glorified sinners, perfect in holiness. This is certain because it rests on God's unchanging and eternal decree, not on my fallible and failing efforts. And if God is for us, though the present struggle may be hard and long, the eternal outcome is secure.

Ezekiel 37:1-14

THE HAND OF THE LORD was upon me, and he brought me out by the Spirit of the LORD and set me in the middle of a valley; it was full of bones. ²He led me back and forth among them, and I saw a great many bones on the floor of the valley, bones that were very dry. ³He asked me, "Son of man, can these bones live?"

I said, "O Sovereign LORD, you alone know."

⁴Then he said to me, "Prophesy to these bones and say to them, 'Dry bones, hear the word of the LORD! ⁵This is what the Sovereign LORD says to these bones: I will make breath enter you, and you will come to life. ⁶I will attach tendons to you and make flesh come upon you and cover you with skin; I will put breath in you, and you will come to life. Then you will know that I am the LORD.'"

⁷So I prophesied as I was commanded. And as I was prophesying, there was a noise, a rattling sound, and the bones came together, bone to bone. ⁸I looked, and tendons and flesh appeared on them and skin covered them, but there was no breath in them.

⁹Then he said to me, "Prophesy to the breath; prophesy, son of man, and say to it, 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says: Come from the four winds, O breath, and breathe into these slain, that they may live.' " ¹⁰So I prophesied as he commanded me, and breath entered them; they came to life and stood up on their feet—a vast army.

¹¹Then he said to me: "Son of man, these bones are the whole house of Israel. They say, 'Our bones are dried up and our hope is gone; we are cut off.' ¹²Therefore prophesy and say to them: 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says: O my people, I am going to open your graves and bring you up from them; I will bring you back to the land of Israel. ¹³Then you, my people, will know that I am the LORD, when I open your graves and bring you up from them. ¹⁴I will put my Spirit in you and you will live, and I will settle you in your own land. Then you will know that I the LORD have spoken, and I have done it, declares the LORD.'"

Original Meaning

FROM AN ORACLE depicting flourishing garden-cities filled with vibrantly alive people (36:33–38), the prophet is transported into the darkness of the valley of the shadow of death in chapter 37. This is not the first time that the Spirit has led him out into "a valley" (37:1); this location also provided the backdrop for the prophet's vision of God's glory in 3:22. However, this time the sight that greets him is a scene of total desolation: The valley is full of bones, bones that are many in number and very dry in nature (37:2). But even "Death Valley" must be swallowed up in victory as Ezekiel sees the Lord fulfill in visionary form the promise of 36:27 to put his vivifying Spirit within his people.

The statement that "the hand of the LORD was upon me" (v. 1) links this vision together with the prophet's other visions (1:3; 3:14; 8:1; 40:1), inviting us to view this scene in their light. In the light of 3:22–23, it becomes clear that the valley was not just a random geographical location but a valley in exile. Yet, viewing the vision in the light of chapters 40–48 suggests the significance of the fact that it is a valley: The valley in exile forms the ultimate contrast to the "very high mountain" within the land of Israel (40:2). It is the place of death, from which Israel must be delivered before they can be brought into the land of life. This contrast is underlined by the verbs of motion by which the prophet is transported: He is "brought out" (Hiphil of $y\bar{a}s\bar{a}$) to the valley of death in 37:1 but "brought in" (Hiphil of $b\hat{o}$) to the land of life in 40:2.

First the prophet is confronted with a scene of total death. He is "led . . . back and forth" over the piles of bones (37:2); there must be no question of his having missed some flicker of life among the bones through having made merely a superficial inspection. Ezekiel's examination is thorough, his conclusions irrefutable: The situation is inimical to life. The valley is filled not merely with slain corpses, but with skeletal remains, and dry skeletal remains at that.

The Lord's question to the prophet, "Son of man, can these bones live?" (Ezek. 37:3a), seems redundant. Certainly, by the power of God corpses have been resuscitated before this in Israel, but only shortly after death, before decomposition occurred (1 Kings 17:17–24; 2 Kings 4:18–37; 13:21). It seems as if the prophet's earlier question, "Will you completely destroy the remnant of Israel?" (Ezek. 11:13), has now been answered in the affirmative. God's people have been utterly destroyed for their sin. The covenant curses have been executed and the corpses of the slain left unburied. No life remains in the bones. End of story.

Recognizing the sovereign power of God, however, the prophet is unwilling to give a negative answer. Rather, he turns the question back to God: "O Sovereign LORD, you alone know" (37:3b). In view of the overwhelming outpouring of God's wrath, he cannot answer, "Of course, Lord." Since the destruction of Jerusalem, which was the just judgment on her sins, there can be no "of course." God certainly has the power to bring the dry bones back to life; the question remains as to whether it is his will to do so. That question is swiftly answered in the affirmative: God wills that the dry bones shall indeed live.

The second question to be answered is then, "How shall these bones live?" The means by which that regeneration is brought about is through an infusion of the Spirit $(r\hat{u}a\dot{h})$ in response to the prophetic word. Thus, Ezekiel is told to prophesy to the bones and require them to listen to the word of the Lord; in response, the Lord will make breath $(r\hat{u}a\dot{h})$ enter them and bring them back to life, not as ghostly skeletons but as living flesh (37:5–6). Then the bones will know God's lordship.

The prophet obediently speaks the word and sees the power of God instantly unleashed. While he is prophesying, the bones come together and are clothed in flesh and skin—but still without life; there was no breath $(r\hat{u}ah)$ in them. It seems as if God's word has failed, as if the bones are after all too dry even for God. But almost before the thought has been framed, it is answered by a second command to prophesy. This time he is to prophesy to the wind $(r\hat{u}ah)$, which is invoked to come from afar, bringing life-giving breath to the people. Like the creation of the first 'ādām in Genesis 2, which was a two-stage process involving first his formation and then his filling with the breath of life, so the re-creation of this mighty army is a two-stage process of forming and filling. This underlines the difficulty of the recreation process and the central role of the Spirit in bringing new life to the restored people.⁴

But if the Spirit gives the power through which regeneration takes place, Ezekiel himself is the channel through whom that power is brought to bear. He himself personally experienced a similar infusion of the Spirit at the outset of his ministry. Twice, confronted with the awesome majesty of God, he was reduced to prostration (Ezek. 1:28; 3:23); each time the Spirit entered $(b\hat{o})$ him, raising him to his feet (2:2; 3:24). This is exactly what happens to the dry bones after they have been re-formed into bodies: The Spirit enters $(b\hat{o})$ them, raising them to their feet (37:10). What had first happened in his own life now happens to the renewed Israel through the means of the powerful prophetic word.

Another parallel with the earlier visions helps to make the power of the word even clearer. In Ezekiel 11, the prophet was shown a scene and commanded to prophesy to those involved. On that occasion, it was a word of judgment against the twenty-five men at the east gate of the temple (11:4). In both cases, while Ezekiel "was prophesying" (11:13; 37:7), the words had immediate effect, demonstrated in the death of Pelatiah (11:13) and the coming together of the bones (37:7). Just as the death of Pelatiah served as a graphic demonstration of the certainty of the coming judgment on Jerusalem, so also here the re-creation and restoration of the bones serves as a guarantee of what it symbolizes, the ultimate restoration of Israel as a nation.⁵

The oracle that follows the vision (37:11–14) merely serves to make explicit what the vision has already recounted. The dry bones are the whole house of Israel, who have come to recognize the seriousness of their situation. They are helpless and hopeless, cut off from God's life-giving presence (37:11). Without in the least contradicting this self-perception that their present situation is hopeless—indeed, reinforcing the accurateness of the idea—the Lord still affirms that there is nonetheless hope for the future.

There is a sure and certain future based not on what Israel can do but on God's determination to save his people. Twice, the Lord addresses them as "my people" (37:12–13). Though they are indeed dead, God can and will tear open their graves (shifting the metaphor slightly) and bring them up from the dead, giving them life through his Spirit and resettling them in their land (37:14). The promises of a new spirit and a return to the land made in Ezekiel 36:27–36 will indeed be fulfilled. Then they will know that the Lord not only speaks but acts, thus disproving the proverb of the skeptic, quoted in 12:22: "The days go by and every vision comes to nothing." Ezekiel's visions will come about, and the people will be restored to their land and revitalized, through the internal work of God's Spirit.

Bridging Contexts

FAMILIARITY LEADS TO misinterpretation. Of all of the prophecies of Ezekiel, this section is perhaps the most familiar to the average reader. This is not necessarily an advantage, however, because it means that common misconceptions may first have to be cleared away before the constructive work can be done.

At first sight, for example, Ezekiel 37 seems to be a proof text for the resurrection of the body, as many of the early church fathers (and early rabbinic interpreters) understood it to be. However, what the prophet is depicting is certainly not an expected universal resurrection. Otherwise, his answer to the question "Can these bones live?" would have been, "Most certainly," or, in similar vein to Martha's response to Jesus, "I know [they] will rise again in the resurrection at the last day" (John 11:24). The question posed by God to the prophet is not a universal philosophical one, "Will bones in general be resurrected?" In the context, it is the intensely particular question, "Will these bones live?"

The fact that this passage has been so widely misunderstood by interpreters from such a wide range of backgrounds raises a further point about the nature of visions. Visions, like parables, tend to be open-ended, full of imagery that is capable of diverse interpretations. The precision of logically constructed syllogisms is traded for the affective power of symbols. Some visions are deliberately open-ended, especially those dealing with the future. To avoid such misunderstanding, therefore, it is especially important to read visions within their context. If the vision itself is removed from the context of the biblical book in which it stands, as if it were a timeless statement of universal truths, misunderstanding is likely.

In a similar way, a single still photograph taken from a film might be open to many different interpretations, although, seen within the flow of the movie, its meaning may be univocal. In the case of Ezekiel 37, the context is twofold. The narrower context is the interpretation of the vision given by the Lord himself in 37:11–14. The broader context is the place of the vision within the book itself, as part of the message of restoration to a people who have experienced a full outpouring of the wrath of God.

Exactly what the Old Testament writers understood about life after death in general is still a much-debated topic. Certainly, there was no widespread expectation of bodily resurrection of the kind that appears in the New Testament. The shadowy underground land of Sheol was feared as a place of continued existence, though it can hardly be called life, from which the righteous hoped to be delivered by the Lord (Ps. 49:14–15). The righteous are never actually said to go there, however; though they may fear it as a possibility, it is ultimately the destination of those without God. But in general the Old Testament is vague about the future of the righteous.

In principle, the Old Testament is not opposed to the idea of a resurrection. Indeed, Jesus himself argued for the idea of resurrection from the fundamental Old Testament credo that the God who is the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob is the God of the living, not of the dead (Matt. 22:32). But the focus of the Old Testament is more centrally on the Lord's power over death, whether by rescuing the saints from its clutches (Ps. 18:4–19) or by the miraculous resuscitation of the dead (1 Kings 17:17–24; 2 Kings 4:31–37; 13:20–21). The resurrection (or, more precisely, resuscitation) of the bones in Ezekiel 37 has much more in common with the latter incidents from the ministry of Elijah and Elisha than it does with later ideas of a general resurrection of the dead on the last day.⁸

Neither is there a simple line of connection between this passage and the eschatological outpouring of the Spirit in the last days, predicted in Joel 2:28–29 and fulfilled on the day of Pentecost in Acts 2. That outpouring of the Spirit resulted in an extension of the gift of prophecy to all, as Moses had longed to see in Numbers 11:29. The infusion of the Spirit in Ezekiel results instead in renewed life and new power for right living, which is itself a promised prerequisite for life in the land (Ezek. 36:27–28).

Re-creating Israel. In summary, then, this passage is about the divine work of re-creating Israel through the prophetic word and Spirit. Though God's people have been justly judged and handed over into the realm of death for their sins, so that, humanly speaking, there is now no hope for them, yet God can bring life out of death. Because of his wrath, their death is real; because of his grace and his sovereign will to have a people of his own, however, their future prospect of life may be equally real. It is this that the prophet is called to proclaim to them. What he has first experienced himself he now announces to others: life in the Spirit through the power of God. The new creation that was begun in him will assuredly be brought to fulfillment by God.

What precisely does re-creating Israel mean, however? Does it directly anticipate the formation of the present political state of Israel, as some have supposed? To argue in this way is to miss the spiritual significance of the prophecy. For what is in view here, as the connections back to Ezek. 36:24–38 make clear, is something more than political autonomy for the descendants of Abraham. It is nothing short of the fulfillment of all Old Testament anticipations of eschatological fullness, all of which are fulfilled in Christ. It is in him that the new Spirit-filled Israel of God takes shape, an identity that is no longer governed by ethnic origins and circumcision, as the old Israel was, but rather by faith in the cross of Christ (Gal. 6:12–16).

Contemporary Significance

Is "LIFE AFTER death" possible? What happens when you die? This topic has ignited a great deal of interest in recent years, especially through the publication of several books recounting "near-death" experiences, in which a person felt as if he or she had died briefly and then returned to tell the tale.

What Israel faced, however, was not a "near-death" experience, but a "total-death" experience. It was not simply that their heart had stopped beating for a few moments and their brain waves had ceased; they had died and decomposed; their flesh had disintegrated, leaving only bones behind; and then those bones themselves had been left out in the sun to bleach. They were as dead as it was possible to be—and that while physically still alive, for they themselves said, "Our bones are dried up and our hope is gone; we are cut off" (Ezek. 37:11). They knew themselves to be dead while they lived, for they were cut off from the life-giving presence of the living God and therefore without hope.

That is a spiritual condition that by nature we all share. Paul reminds the Ephesians, and along with them all of us, "You were dead in your transgressions and sins, in which you used to live when you followed the ways of this world and of the ruler of the kingdom of the air" (Eph. 2:1–2). By nature, we are all cut off from God's life-giving presence. Subjectively, we may or may not be aware of that fact. We may feel that we are on top of the world and that life couldn't possibly be better, or we may despair of making any sense of the world in which we live. Objectively, however, we are equally dead, no matter how we feel.

Can such dead people live? Is it possible, not merely theoretically but actually, for people like us to be resuscitated and brought back to life toward God? That question cannot simply be answered, "Of course!" as if it were a trivial matter. Because of our sin we are under God's wrath, so the question is not merely "Can God in general raise dead people to life?" but rather "Will he raise rebels like us to life?" Thanks be to God, the answer for us is positive, as it was for Israel. Thus Paul tells the Colossians, "When you were dead in your sins and in the uncircumcision of your sinful nature, God made you alive with Christ" (Col. 2:13). In Christ, there is life for the spiritually dead.

How, though, is this new life received? It is received through union with Christ. In the preceding verse (Col. 2:12), Paul talks about how as Christians we have been buried with Christ in baptism and raised with him through faith in the power of God, who raised him from the dead. In other words, it is as we share an experience that Christ first experienced for us that we are brought from death to life. For Ezekiel, what happened to the bones had first happened to him. So it is with us: What God does for the Christian, he has first of all done for Jesus.

Jesus took on himself our death. The death that he died on the cross was no mere accident, nor even a means of demonstrating graphically the extent of his love for humanity. There on the cross, he took on himself the sins of his people and was cut off for them. The Lord of life was laid in the tomb; the body of the one who created the universe was laid alongside the bones of those whom he had made. Why? It is because God's wrath against sin demanded that a just penalty be paid. God could not simply wave a magic wand and make sin disappear. Sin had to be paid for. In order to accomplish that, Jesus was, as it were, laid among the dry bones of the valley for my sake. So now my baptism is a burial with him in that death, an identification with his death in my place.

But just as the dry bones in Ezekiel did not remain dead, so also Christ did not remain in the tomb! He burst forth with resurrection power, raised from the dead by God! Just as surely, if we have been truly buried with him in baptism, receiving the reality as well as the sign, we also are made alive in Christ. Our sins are forgiven; the hold of the law over us is broken, nailed to the cross (Col. 2:14). We are not dry bones any longer, but living, breathing, Spirit-infused children of God (Rom. 8:16). What Ezekiel saw in visionary form has now become a reality!

The consequences of life after death. What are the consequences of this fact? (1) There is no reason for Christians to despair. Once again, subjectively we may or may not be aware of that fact. We may feel inside every bit as despairing as Ezekiel's hearers of making sense of our circumstances. Yet that inner confusion does not shake the objective fact to which Scripture points us: If we have died with Christ, we will certainly live with him (Rom. 6:8). To be sure, we do not yet see the full implications of this identification with our resurrected Lord. We still wait for the redemption of our bodies from this sin-tarnished world, where things fall apart and people become sick and die. We cry out in pain because of the tragedies we experience. Yet in the midst of our pain we are called to wait with confident hope (Rom. 8:23–24).

The objective fact of Christ's resurrection is the source of our confidence. Indeed, the importance of the physical resurrection of Christ is not simply that it proves the survival of the soul in general, or that life goes on in some sense beyond the grave. Otherwise, the resurrection of Christ would have no more significance than other resurrections recorded in Scripture, such as that of Lazarus. On the contrary, the New Testament teaching is that the resurrection of Christ is something entirely new, something of pivotal importance for our faith as Christians (1 Cor. 15:12). C. S. Lewis puts it like this:

The New Testament writers speak as if Christ's achievement in rising from the dead was the first event of its kind in the whole history of the universe. He is the "first fruits," the "pioneer of life." He has forced open a door that has been locked since the death of the first man. He has met, fought and beaten the King of Death. Everything is different because He has done so. This is the beginning of the New Creation: a new chapter in cosmic history has opened.

Because Christ has been raised physically and gloriously to life, so also we will be raised physically and gloriously to life; the firstfruits provide the assurance of the full harvest (1 Cor. 15:20–23). Christian hope is therefore focused concretely on Christ in us, the hope of glory (Col. 1:27). Our sure and certain hope is that God's energy is at work in us to present us perfect in Christ (Col. 1:28). Even now we are indwelt by the Spirit of Christ who is at work in us, changing us into what we ought to be (Rom. 8:11).

(2) Since we are indwelt by the Spirit, we should walk according to the Spirit (Rom. 8:4, 12). Ezekiel was filled with the Spirit in Ezekiel 2–3 to equip him for his task; likewise, when the resuscitated bones came together, they became an army, not a debating club or a beach party. They were raised for a purpose. In a similar way, we as Christians have been regenerated and Spirit-filled in order that we too may serve, equipped by the gifts of the Spirit and dressed in the armor of God so that we may do his bidding in the world. We were re-created in Christ Jesus to do good works, which God prepared in advance for us to do (Eph. 2:10). In the appropriately martial imagery of Charles Wesley's hymn, our commission is as follows:

Soldiers of Christ, arise and put your armor on, Strong in the strength which God supplies, through his eternal Son.

Strong in the Lord of Hosts, and in his mighty power, Who in the strength of Jesus trusts is more than conqueror. Stand, then, in his great might, with all his strength endued;

And take to arm you for the fight, the panoply of God.
That, having all things done and all your conflicts past, Ye may o'ercome through Christ alone and stand complete at last.

Leave no unguarded place, no weakness of the soul; Take every virtue, every grace and fortify the whole. From strength to strength go on; wrestle and fight and pray;

Tread all the powers of darkness down and win the well-fought day.

Ezekiel 37:15-28

THE WORD OF THE LORD came to me: ¹⁶ Son of man, take a stick of wood and write on it, 'Belonging to Judah and the Israelites associated with him.' Then take another stick of wood, and write on it, 'Ephraim's stick, belonging to Joseph and all the house of Israel associated with him.' ¹⁷ Join them together into one stick so that they will become one in your hand.

¹⁸"When your countrymen ask you, 'Won't you tell us what you mean by this?' 19 say to them, 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says: I am going to take the stick of Joseph—which is in Ephraim's hand—and of the Israelite tribes associated with him, and join it to Judah's stick, making them a single stick of wood, and they will become one in my hand.' ²⁰Hold before their eyes the sticks you have written on ²¹ and say to them, 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says: I will take the Israelites out of the nations where they have gone. I will gather them from all around and bring them back into their own land. ²²I will make them one nation in the land, on the mountains of Israel. There will be one king over all of them and they will never again be two nations or be divided into two kingdoms. ²³They will no longer defile themselves with their idols and vile images or with any of their offenses, for I will save them from all their sinful backsliding, and I will cleanse them. They will be my people, and I will be their God.

²⁴" 'My servant David will be king over them, and they will all have one shepherd. They will follow my laws and be careful to keep my decrees. ²⁵They will live in the land I gave to my servant Jacob, the land where your fathers lived. They and their children and their children's children will live there forever, and David my servant will be their prince forever. ²⁶I will make a covenant of peace with them; it will be an everlasting covenant. I will establish them and increase their numbers, and I will put my sanctuary among them forever. ²⁷My dwelling place will be with them; I will be their God, and they will be my people. ²⁸Then the nations will know that I the LORD make Israel holy, when my sanctuary is among them forever.' "

Original Meaning

THIS PASSAGE CONTAINS a sign-act and a related oracle concerning the future reunification of God's people. It acts as a hinge, both summing up the oracles of hope in chapters 34–37 and looking forward to the establishment of the new sanctuary (chs. 40–48) after the final convulsion of evil in chapters 38–39.

The sign-act involves the prophet's taking two sticks, each of which he is to inscribe with a name (37:16). One is to be designated "Belonging to Judah and the Israelites associated with him" (i.e., the southern kingdom), while the other is to bear the message, "Ephraim's stick, belonging to Joseph and all the house of Israel associated with him" (i.e., the northern kingdom). Strictly speaking, the two rivals for first place among Jacob's sons are Judah and Joseph; hence the proper designation of the sticks as "Belonging to Judah/belonging to Joseph." Historically, however, the rivalry had become essentially a struggle between (the tribes of) Judah and Ephraim, who was Joseph's younger son and the dominant tribe in the northern part of Israel. For that reason, after the schism at the time of Rehoboam, the northern kingdom based in Samaria is frequently referred to as "Ephraim." This historical reality is reflected in the description of the second stick as "Ephraim's stick." Ezekiel is then instructed to join the sticks together in his hand so that they become one stick (37:17).

The writing on the sticks makes the symbolism of the act entirely transparent. Clearly, the reunification of northern and southern kingdoms is anticipated. The sticks ('ēṣ') inscribed with names of tribes recall the incident of Numbers 17:6–10, where the staffs (maṭṭeh) of the tribal princes are placed before the Lord and Aaron's staff is chosen. Here, however, far from choosing one from the many, the two sticks (scepters?)² will be merged into a single, united entity. Not only will the events of recent history be reversed, as has been the focus of Ezekiel 34–37 so far; in addition, the events of much earlier history will be undone. The divided kingdom will once again be undivided. The key word in this section is the word "one" ('eḥād), which occurs ten times.³

Because the action itself is so transparent, the expected question from the audience, "Won't you tell us what you mean by this?" (37:18), is not a request for illumination about the import of the various symbols. Rather, it is a question about the deeper significance of the sign. The Lord's reply, therefore, merely reiterates the sign without further explication, while adding the emphasis that "I" will accomplish all this.⁴ The solution to Israel's lengthy history of internal division is not to be found in the appointment of a binational committee to develop a "peace process" but in the divine act of reuniting his people.

What is more, the divinely effected reunion will address the issues raised by the original schism. Just as the division was caused by a failure in the area of servant leadership, with Rehoboam unwilling to serve the people as the older counselors advised (1 Kings 12:7), so also the reunion will be effected by the Lord's providing a single servant-leader, "my servant David" (Ezek. 37:24). Just as the division resulted in the setting up of separate sanctuaries (1 Kings 12:25–33), so also the reunion will result in a return to a single, divinely approved sanctuary in their midst (Ezek. 37:26). There will be no glossing over the differences; the reunion will be established on the basis of a fundamental new spiritual unity, effected by God in the hearts of his people. The Lord's hand is the place where the sticks are rejoined.

Unlike chapter 34, then, the mention of "my servant David" focuses not so much on the nature of the leader as on his significance as the foundation of unity. Just as David had earlier welded the disparate tribes into a united kingdom, so this new David will bring about renewed unity: one kingdom under one king (37:22). He will rule over a renewed people, who will no longer defile themselves with their idols and images, whether in the defiled

Jerusalem temple (Ezek. 8) or in the dual temples that Jeroboam set up in Bethel and Dan (1 Kings 12:28–33). These temples, which the biblical writers viewed as idolatrous from the outset, will disappear altogether. The nation will be purified and cleansed by God, thus allowing for a restoration of the covenant relationship between God and his people (Ezek. 37:23) and the blessings that flow from such a relationship (37:25). What is more, those blessings will be enduring, to "their children and their children's children . . . forever" (37:25). The covenant of peace will be "an everlasting covenant"; the sanctuary will be restored to their midst "forever" (37:26).

Because the work of purification and reunification is the Lord's, so also the glory will be his. Just as the destruction of the temple and the scattering of the people led to the Lord's name being profaned among the nations, so also the permanent restoration of the sanctuary to Israel's midst will result in the nations' recognizing that the Lord has endowed his people with a new level of holiness (37:28). The significance of the temple's restoration as crowning blessing, then, is this: It is objective evidence of the successful completion of the Lord's purposes to make for himself a holy people, a purpose announced already in 36:27 as the expected result of the outpouring of the Lord's Spirit. The enduring existence of the temple is a marker of that transforming work, for the sanctuary can only exist securely forever in the midst of a thoroughly sanctified community.

This chapter (and with it the section comprising chs. 34–37) closes with the prospect of renewed Israel's living at peace within their own land (37:26). This is the necessary precondition for the final onslaught of the forces of evil in chapters 38–39, in which God will demonstrate his power and commitment to his people by decisively rescuing them from their enemies. However, it is also the necessary prerequisite for the temple building plan of chapters 40–48.

In Deuteronomy 12:10, the Lord promised to give rest (Hiphil of nwh) to his people from their enemies all around them in the land, after which it would be time to build the central sanctuary. In accordance with that command, "after the LORD had given [David] rest" (Hiphil of nwh, 2 Sam. 7:1), he started to think about building a temple for the Lord in Jerusalem. Similarly, once the new, united Israel has been settled (Hiphil of nwh) in the land (Ezek. 37:14) and is at peace, then the nation's thoughts will naturally turn to temple building. Thus the promise of the Lord's sanctuary in the midst of his settled people is a fitting capstone to the prophecies of restoration. Though her enemies will once more descend on her (chs. 38–39), it is so that they may be defeated by the Lord, who will then establish his final temple (chs. 40–48).

Bridging Contexts

THE THEOLOGICAL SIGNIFICANCE of the temple. The temple is not a central category in contemporary Christian thinking. Where we do think of the Old Testament temple, we tend to think of it as simply the forerunner of the modern church building. Its broader political, social, and theological significance is largely lost on us.

In the ancient Near East, however, the state of a society's temples was considered a measure of its health and wealth and an indication of the favor of its gods. When a king was strong and prosperous, "blessed" by his god, that fact would often be publicly demonstrated through an ambitious program of public building works, of which a temple was a prime example. The building program itself could act as a focus of national unity and a sign of divine approval. In this context, a restoration of a people and of their monarchy without the visible symbol of divine presence provided by the temple would have been unthinkable.

In a similar way, the White House, the Capitol, and the other buildings in Washington, D.C., have a significance for Americans that goes far beyond their mere function as the seat of government. In a real sense, the buildings represent America, and to let them crumble would be unthinkable, even if other equivalent buildings had been erected to carry out their practical function. Thus, when the original presidential palace was destroyed in the War of 1812, it was a matter of national pride to replace it with a bigger and better building as soon as possible.

But there is more than one symbol of God's presence with his people in the Old Testament. The patriarchs experienced his presence in various ways, all of which were occasional rather than permanent. God's permanent dwelling in the midst of his people was not established until Mount Sinai, where Moses received the instructions for the tabernacle (Ex. 25–40). This dwelling was a mobile tent, appropriate for the people's condition as wanderers in the desert and for the early years of conquering the Promised Land. The temple that Solomon constructed at God's command was different. It was not merely the tabernacle on a larger scale, it was a glorious building, exuding permanence and stability—the suitable symbol for God's people at rest in God's land (1 Kings 6).

Ezekiel's vision of God's presence in the midst of his people is different again: It revolves around the establishment of a sanctuary ($miqd\bar{a}\dot{s}$), a place where they experience and respect God's holiness. It is the symbol of a holy God living in the midst of a holy people. This theme will emerge more clearly in the detailed description of the temple in Ezekiel 40–48, but it is adumbrated already in 37:28, where it is announced that the nations will come to recognize that the Lord sanctifies ($m^eqadd\bar{e}\dot{s}$) Israel when his sanctuary ($miqd\bar{a}\dot{s}$) is among them forever.

The idea of the holy. This connection between the "sanctuary" and "sanctity" or "holiness" has been largely lost today. It was strongly present in medieval and pre-Reformation cathedrals and churches, which were normally divided into three parts. There was the nave, which was accessible to everybody; the chancel, which was only accessible to priest and choir; and the sanctuary, which housed the altar, where only the priest entered.8 This medieval layout directly reflects the design of the Old Testament temple.

Reformation churches, which rightly emphasized the priesthood—and thus sanctity—of all believers, did away with these distinctions. They recognized that, as we saw in our discussion of Ezekiel 36, the old division of sacred and profane no longer runs through God's people, separating sacred priest from secular congregation, but rather now divides a people who are all holy in Christ from a profane world. The church building was assigned its proper new covenant role as the meeting house of the saints, not the house of God. In place of the central (but remote) altar, the building was redesigned to gather the people around the pulpit and communion table, reflecting the vision of God's people assembled to receive his Word rightly preached and the sacraments duly administered.9

The danger of this arrangement, however, is that we lose the necessary sense of holiness when we gather as God's people. As we will see in our study of Ezekiel 40–48, holiness is one of the dominating principles of the new temple. Certainly, in revising the architecture of their churches, nobody intended to lose the idea of holiness. The intention of the Reformers was rather to assert the holiness of all of life. In practice, however, we have all too often profaned all of life instead, leveling everything down rather than up.

Thus we may call the room in which we meet the "sanctuary," yet there is no sense of awe when we gather together as the church, no sense that it is the almighty and holy God himself with whom we are meeting. As a result, our individual lives are often similarly devoid of contact with the Holy One. Because we do not recognize the meeting together of the saints as a "sanctuary" in the biblical sense, we do not live the lives of sanctity that we ought.

Contemporary Significance

JESUS AS OUR TEMPLE. Church unity has become, in some quarters, the modern equivalent of the Holy Grail. It is the revered object of earnest searching and eager desire. There is good reason for this enthusiasm among Christians. Jesus himself prayed for his postapostolic followers to be one, just as he and the Father are one. His desire was that we might be brought to complete unity so that the world may know that the Father sent the Son (John 17:21–23). Though in the present we live in a world where Christians are fragmented and separated from one another, on the basis of the Scriptures we should be repeatedly saying to ourselves and to others: "This is not how the church ought to be." But it is not enough to be in favor of unity in the abstract; we must also be clear about the basis for this unity. In what is the unity of God's people to be grounded? Ezekiel 37 gives us the key answers.

Ezekiel's sign pointing to the reunification of God's people was grounded in the sovereign act of God's establishing one king over his people and one temple at the center of their worship. So also our desired unity as Christians, if it is to be genuine, must be grounded not in ecumenical study commissions and interchurch potluck dinners, but in Jesus Christ, who fulfills both aspects of Ezekiel 37 as our true temple and our true king. True Christian unity does not flow from the top down, with high-level ecclesiastical committees and denominational leaders showing the way, nor does it flow from the bottom up, coming by means of grass-roots initiatives by individual church members. Rather, it flows from the center out: It comes from Christ-centered people discovering that they are, in fact, servants of a common Lord and King.

Christ himself is our true temple because he accomplished in himself everything to which the tabernacle and temple of the Old Testament pointed. When the Word became flesh, he "made his dwelling [lit., tabernacled] among us" (John 1:14), manifesting God's glory in our midst, just as the Mosaic tabernacle was the place where God's glory was manifested in the desert (Ex. 40:34). In him, God's glorious presence is experienced in the midst of his people. Moreover, to act against his person is to do nothing less than to assault God's temple. That is why, referring to his own body in John 2:19, Jesus said, "Destroy this temple, and I will raise it again in three days."

Because Jesus is our temple, he himself is what unites his people together in worship. When Jesus met with the woman of Samaria, he prophesied an end to the divisions between Jews and Samaritans founded on their separate temples: "A time is coming when you will worship the Father neither on this mountain [at the Samaritan temple located on Mount Gerizim] nor in Jerusalem [at the temple on Mount Zion] . . . [but] in spirit and in truth" (John 4:21–24). This marks a radical change in the old order of things, which anticipated the nations' coming to worship God at Mount Zion. With the coming of Christ, the old division between Jew and Samaritan in worship is broken down, not by Samaritans coming to the temple in Jerusalem but by Jew and Samaritan alike being incorporated into Christ himself, as the final temple.

Likewise, Christ has broken down the old wall between Jews and Gentiles through his death on the cross, building both together into a new, holy temple to the Lord (Eph. 2:14–22)." There is but one temple of God in this age, the church, the body of Jesus Christ, in which Jews, Samaritans, and Gentiles are all brought together as one. As Galatians 3:28 puts it: "There is neither Jew nor Greek, slave nor free, male nor female, for you are all one in Christ Jesus."

True unity in the church. It is therefore necessarily a contradiction in terms when the church is divided on racial or ethnic lines. Churches and denominations ought not to be "homogeneous units," where Christians choose to meet together with others exactly like them. Rather, each church should strive to be a heterogeneous mixture of those for whom Christ died, an entity that transcends racial, ethnic, cultural, and class barriers, giving expression as a worshiping community to the unity that is ours in our common adoption into God's family. As J. K. S. Reid puts it:

The church is not an association or corporation of likeminded individuals; and its unity does not have only such strength as their likemindedness possesses and so can confer. On the contrary, its unity rests upon what Christ has done and is thus complete and inviolate.¹²

Jesus as our king. Our unity as God's people is also rooted in the kingship of Christ. Our fundamental, most basic Christian confession is "Jesus is Lord" (Rom. 10:9; 1 Cor. 12:3). It is because Jesus is the chief cornerstone that the entire building holds together (Eph. 2:20). The church is only one flock, because we are all under the one Shepherd (John 10:16). Jesus Christ is the true and only Head of the church, the One from whom all authority flows. The ascended Lord is the One who provides pastors and teachers for his church, so that we may all "reach unity in the faith and in the knowledge of the Son of God" (Eph. 4:13).

The division of Israel in Ezekiel's day was not between two equally valid opinions, between allegiance to two equally legitimate kings. There was no doubt in the minds of the biblical writers that the line of David was the legitimate line, so that unity could only come in the person of that line. The northern kingdom had to surrender their erroneous views for true peace to be established. In the same way, the age-old dispute between the Samaritans and Jews of Jesus' day was not a moot issue. There was a right answer to the theological issue as to where one should worship: Mount Gerizim or Jerusalem. The Jews had historically been right (John 4:22). Unity would come not through Jews and Samaritans forging a balanced compromise, representing the middle ground between them. Rather, it would be established through the Samaritans coming to the salvation that had been proclaimed to the Jews from the beginning and that had now found its fulfillment in Christ.

For that reason, there can be no unity or compromise with those who deny the lordship of Christ, whether through theological statements that deny the reality of Jesus as the Son of God, or through practice that demonstrates effective unbelief. We are not to welcome all professing Christians indiscriminately, as if what you believe was a matter of small importance. Instead, the New Testament teaches us that we are to refuse to have anything to do with those who teach false doctrine (2 John 10–11). Nor are we to ignore gross sin in our midst, but rather we should exercise appropriate church discipline on those who have sinned, for the sake of their souls (1 Cor. 5:1–5). For our oneness as God's people is based on the rule of Christ over his church and his work of building his saints together into a holy temple, fit for his habitation.

Some divisions may therefore continue to be necessary "to show which of you have God's approval," as Paul puts it (1 Cor. 11:19). There will presumably also continue to be doctrines about which real Christians disagree, which for the sake of peace and harmony in the present may necessitate different denominations. Nonetheless, we should not be in any doubt about God's desire for the church and his eternal purpose for the church—that we may all be one even as the Father and the Son are one (John 17:21).

That purpose will ultimately be accomplished by Christ's work of complete sanctification of his people. There will be no doctrinal disagreements in heaven, for we will all understand perfectly, even as we are perfectly understood (cf. 1 Cor. 13:12). In the meantime, given the clear biblical statements of God's purpose and plan, we all need to search our hearts and consider what we personally have done and are doing to give true biblical unity its fullest possible present expression. How are we responding to Paul's admonition to the divided Corinthians in 1 Corinthians 1:10?

I appeal to you, brothers, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that all of you agree with one another so that there may be no divisions among you and that you may be perfectly united in mind and thought.

Ezekiel 38–39

The word of the LORD came to me: ²"Son of man, set your face against Gog, of the land of Magog, the chief prince of Meshech and Tubal; prophesy against him ³and say: 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says: I am against you, O Gog, chief prince of Meshech and Tubal. ⁴I will turn you around, put hooks in your jaws and bring you out with your whole army—your horses, your horsemen fully armed, and a great horde with large and small shields, all of them brandishing their swords. ⁵Persia, Cush and Put will be with them, all with shields and helmets, ⁶also Gomer with all its troops, and Beth Togarmah from the far north with all its troops—the many nations with you.

7" 'Get ready; be prepared, you and all the hordes gathered about you, and take command of them.

8After many days you will be called to arms. In future years you will invade a land that has recovered from war, whose people were gathered from many nations to the mountains of Israel, which had long been desolate. They had been brought out from the nations, and now all of them live in safety.

9You and all your troops and the many nations with you will go up, advancing like a storm; you will be like a cloud covering the land.

10" 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says: On that day thoughts will come into your mind and you will devise an evil scheme. ¹¹You will say, "I will invade a land of unwalled villages; I will attack a peaceful and unsuspecting people—all of them living without walls and without gates and bars. ¹²I will plunder and loot and turn my hand against the resettled ruins and the people gathered from the nations, rich in livestock and goods, living at the center of the land." ¹³Sheba and Dedan and the merchants of Tarshish and all her villages will say to you, "Have you come to plunder? Have you gathered your hordes to loot, to carry off silver and gold, to take away livestock and goods and to seize much plunder?" '

¹⁴"Therefore, son of man, prophesy and say to Gog: 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says: In that day, when my people Israel are living in safety, will you not take notice of it? ¹⁵You will come from your place in the far north, you and many nations with you, all of them riding on horses, a great horde, a mighty army. ¹⁶You will advance against my people Israel like a cloud that covers the land. In days to come, O Gog, I will bring you against my land, so that the nations may know me when I show myself holy through you before their eyes.

17" 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says: Are you not the one I spoke of in former days by my servants the prophets of Israel? At that time they prophesied for years that I would bring you against them. ¹⁸This is what will happen in that day: When Gog attacks the land of Israel, my hot anger will be aroused, declares the Sovereign LORD. ¹⁹In my zeal and fiery wrath I declare that at that time there shall be a great earthquake in the land of Israel. ²⁰The fish of the sea, the birds of the air, the beasts of the field, every creature that moves along the ground, and all the people on the face of the earth will tremble at my presence. The mountains will be overturned, the cliffs will crumble and every wall will fall to the ground. ²¹I will summon a sword against Gog on all my mountains, declares the Sovereign LORD. Every man's sword will be against his brother. ²²I will execute judgment upon him with plague and bloodshed; I will pour down torrents of rain, hailstones and burning sulfur on him and on his troops and on the many nations with him. ²³And so I will show my greatness and my holiness, and I will make myself known in the sight of many nations. Then they will know that I am the LORD.'

^{39:1}"Son of man, prophesy against Gog and say: 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says: I am against you, O Gog, chief prince of Meshech and Tubal. ²I will turn you around and drag you along. I will bring you from the far north and send you against the mountains of Israel. ³Then I will strike your bow from your left hand and make your arrows drop from your right hand. ⁴On the mountains of Israel you will fall, you and all your troops and the nations with you. I will give you as food to all kinds of carrion birds and to the wild animals. ⁵You will fall in the open field, for I have spoken, declares the Sovereign LORD. ⁶I will send fire on Magog and on those who live in safety in the coastlands, and they will know that I am the LORD.

7" 'I will make known my holy name among my people Israel. I will no longer let my holy name be profaned, and the nations will know that I the LORD am the Holy One in Israel. ⁸It is coming! It will surely take place, declares the Sovereign LORD. This is the day I have spoken of.

9" 'Then those who live in the towns of Israel will go out and use the weapons for fuel and burn them up—the small and large shields, the bows and arrows, the war clubs and spears. For seven years they will use them for fuel. ¹⁰They will not need to gather wood from the fields or cut it from the forests, because they will use the weapons for fuel. And they will plunder those who plundered them and loot those who looted them, declares the Sovereign LORD.

11" 'On that day I will give Gog a burial place in Israel, in the valley of those who travel east toward the Sea. It will block the way of travelers, because Gog and all his hordes will be buried there. So it will be called the Valley of Hamon Gog.

¹²" 'For seven months the house of Israel will be burying them in order to cleanse the land. ¹³All the people of the land will bury them, and the day I am glorified will be a memorable day for them, declares the Sovereign LORD.

¹⁴" 'Men will be regularly employed to cleanse the land. Some will go throughout the land and, in addition to them, others will bury those that remain on the ground. At the end of the seven months they will begin their search. ¹⁵As they go through the land and one of them sees a human bone, he will set up a marker beside it until the gravediggers have buried it in the Valley of Hamon Gog. ¹⁶(Also a town called Hamonah will be there.) And so they will cleanse the land.'

17"Son of man, this is what the Sovereign LORD says: Call out to every kind of bird and all the wild animals: 'Assemble and come together from all around to the sacrifice I am preparing for you, the great sacrifice on the mountains of Israel. There you will eat flesh and drink blood. ¹⁸You will eat the flesh of mighty men and drink the blood of the princes of the earth as if they were rams and lambs, goats and bulls—all of them fattened animals from Bashan. ¹⁹At the sacrifice I am preparing for you, you will eat fat till you are glutted and drink blood till you are drunk. ²⁰At my table you will eat your fill of horses and riders, mighty men and soldiers of every kind,' declares the Sovereign LORD.

²¹"I will display my glory among the nations, and all the nations will see the punishment I inflict and the hand I lay upon them. ²²From that day forward the house of Israel will know that I am the LORD their God. ²³And the nations will know that the people of Israel went into exile for their sin, because they were unfaithful to me. So I hid my face from them and handed them over to their enemies, and they all fell by the sword. ²⁴I dealt with them according to their uncleanness and their offenses, and I hid my face from them.

²⁵"Therefore this is what the Sovereign LORD says: I will now bring Jacob back from captivity and will have compassion on all the people of Israel, and I will be zealous for my holy name. ²⁶They will forget their shame and all the unfaithfulness they showed toward me when they lived in safety in their land with no one to make them afraid. ²⁷When I have brought them back from the nations and have gathered them from the countries of their enemies, I will show myself holy through them in the sight of many nations. ²⁸Then they will know that I am the LORD their God, for though I sent them into exile among the nations, I will gather them to their own land, not leaving any behind. ²⁹I will no longer hide my face from them, for I will pour out my Spirit on the house of Israel, declares the Sovereign LORD."

Original Meaning

EZEKIEL 38 AND 39 form a single unit made up of two panels that describe the defeat of Gog (38:1–23) and the disposal of Gog (39:1–29). Together, the two panels depict the ultimate onslaught of evil against God's apparently helpless people and God's decisive intervention to deliver them from the threat to end all threats. While this depiction may not seem as likely to induce hope in the hearts of Ezekiel's readers as the idyllic descriptions of the future that precede it, it nonetheless serves the same essential purpose. If an enemy such as Gog cannot separate God's people from the good future he has planned for them, then neither can any lesser evil. In the words of Paul in Romans 8:35–39, as he reflects on the significance for daily life of the resurrection of Christ, which demonstrated God's victory over the final enemy, death:

Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall trouble or hardship or persecution or famine or nakedness or danger or sword? . . . No, in all these things we are more than conquerors through him who loved us. For I am convinced that neither death nor life, neither angels nor demons, neither the present nor the future, nor any powers, neither height nor depth, nor anything else in all creation, will be able to separate us from the love of God that is in Christ Jesus our Lord.

The Defeat of Gog (38:1–23)

THE ORACLE OPENS with a summons to Gog and his allies to arm themselves and to prepare an assault against God's people dwelling peacefully on the mountains of Israel (38:2–9). Gog has frequently been identified with a seventh-century B.C. king of Lydia, who appears under the name $g\hat{u}gu$ in the Annals of Ashurbanipal, also known to us as Gyges in the writings of the ancient Greek historian Herodotus.² However, in neither instance do the supposed comparisons shed much light on the biblical Gog: $g\hat{u}gu$ is merely one more in a line of minor kings who initially assisted the Assyrians, then rebelled against them, and was destroyed by the steamroller of the Assyrian army. From the perspective of the Assyrian annalist, he is a mere roadkill on the highway of empire.

Herodotus, on the other hand, seems more interested in the bizarre way in which Gyges acquired his throne than what he did after he gained it. He records in detail how Candaules, the king of Lydia, forced Gyges, who was his general, to view his queen in a state of undress in order to convince him of her outstanding beauty. The queen, when she became aware of what had transpired, was understandably distressed by her husband's unseemly behavior. In a response appropriate for a Greek history, she then required

Gyges to kill his master, which he in turn accomplished fittingly by hiding in the very same spot where he saw her naked. This is how Gyges became king of Lydia.³

Now this is material that has the elements of a splendid Shakespearean play (sex, violence, intrigue, a foreign location) but really doesn't help us much with our understanding of Gog. In neither of the above cases does the historical figure seem to justify the language of commentators describing Gog as "a great figure of the past . . . as we might speak fearfully of a new Hitler." Rather, the Gog of Ezekiel transcends historical categories and takes on mythical proportions, rather like the figure of Arnold Schwarzenegger in the movie The Terminator. He is the sort of person who when he drives up to your house would deliberately drive over your kid's toy truck in the driveway, just for fun. Gog is thoroughly "bad to the bone." You can easily imagine Ezekiel's Gog saying "Hasta la vista, baby!" before he blows someone away.

The biblical Gog is no mere historical figure, then, but rather a fear-inducing figure of cosmic proportions; and to make matters worse, he is not alone. He is the commander-in-chief $(n^e s \hat{i} r \bar{o} s)^6$ of a coalition of forces gathered from the ends of the earth. He himself is from the land of Magog, and he rules over Meshech-Tubal. His allies include Persia, Cush, and Put (38:5), along with Gomer and Beth Togarmah (38:6). It is no coincidence that together these make up a total of seven nations, and it is significant that they are gathered from the uttermost parts of the world known to the prophet. Meshech-Tubal, Gomer, and Beth Togarmah come from the north, Put (northwest Egypt) and Cush (southern Egypt) from the south and west, while Persia is to the east of Judah.⁷

There is a kind of cosmic reversal of Isaiah 2:2–4 here. Here Ezekiel foresees the nations streaming towards God's holy land in the latter days, not (as in Isaiah) to receive his law or to turn their swords into plowshares and spears into pruning hooks, but to take up their weapons in the "mother of all battles" against the Sovereign Lord and his people. But even such an act of rebellion is itself instigated by God. Though Gog and his allies are far from unwilling participants in the coming conflict, yet the controlling force in all this is the Lord, who directs them by "hooks in your jaws" (Ezek. 38:4).

Once the unholy alliance has been prepared by God, he will summon them against his restored people at a time of his own choosing. Israel is depicted in terms borrowed from Ezekiel 34–37: They have been regathered from the nations to the mountains of Israel; now they live in safety (38:8), a peaceful, unsuspecting, and undefended people (38:11), grown rich in livestock and goods (38:12). They are dwelling "at the center of the land [earth]" (38:12), a description that is theological rather than geographical. Literally, they are dwelling "at the navel of the earth," the location that had expressed Jerusalem's election in 5:5. This position at the center of God's favor, which Jerusalem had forfeited through her sin, has now been restored to the land.⁸

This description of the state of God's people underlines the motives of the evil alliance. They find no justification for their assault in Israel's behavior. Israel is at rest, trusting in the Lord, not in alliances with foreign nations. In that trust she is prospering, experiencing the blessings of covenant faithfulness. Yet trust in the Lord does not eliminate the possibility of conflict. The ungodly, who dwell in "the far north" (38:6, 15; 39:2), will cast greedy eyes in Israel's direction, encouraged by the traders from east and west (38:13), and will advance against them like an overshadowing cloud (38:9, 16).

But in spite of all his planning and preparation, Gog has fundamentally misread the match-up. It is not a matter, as he supposes, of his vast and well-equipped army ranged against a defenseless nation (38:14–16). Rather, by tangling with Israel Gog is taking on Israel's God; this is "my people" and "my land" that he is assaulting. The relationship between God, his people, and his land has been restored, and such an assault on the Lord's name will not pass unchallenged. Indeed, the only reason for Gog's being permitted to come—or, to put it positively as the text does, the reason for which Gog and his allies are brought against Israel—is so that the Lord may demonstrate his greatness and his holiness in defeating this monstrous alliance (38:16). As in the days of Pharaoh, Gog will serve as an object lesson for the nations of the Lord's power and of his love for his people.

Therefore, the judgment of God falls on Gog in Ezek. 38:17–22. The question of verse 17, "Are you . . . the one I spoke of in former days by my servants the prophets of Israel?" asks whether Gog is the "foe from the north" depicted in passages such as Jeremiah 4–6. The answer to that question has been variously rendered. The NIV, along with many commentators, clearly presupposes the positive answer: "Yes, you are." However, the form of the Hebrew question is entirely open and can be equally easily answered, "No, you are not!" Had Gog been the prophesied "foe from the north," he would have been coming at the Lord's commissioning to bring judgment on his faithless people. Nothing and no one would have been able to stand against him. But this foe, though geographically from the north, is coming not to bring judgment but to be judged. The prophecies of Jeremiah 4–6 have already found their fulfillment in the coming of the Babylonians; never again will God deal with his people in that way.

Instead, the judgments that earlier fell on his people now fall on their enemies. God's hot anger, zeal, and fiery wrath are all emotions of which Israel has felt the weight in the earlier chapters of Ezekiel. Now these same feelings are turned against Gog (Ezek. 38:18–19). The divine warrior will let loose a mighty earthquake, which will cause all creatures to tremble in his presence (38:19–20). The sword, plague, bloodshed, torrential rain, hail, burning sulfur—judgments, most of which were experienced first by Israel—are now experienced by her enemies (38:21–22). Now God will reveal his power and holiness to the nations not by the destruction of his unholy people but by the protection of his restored people (38:23).

The Disposal of Gog (39:1–29)

IN EZEKIEL 39 the focus shifts from the Lord's emotions to his actions, from the protection of his people to the utter destruction of his enemies. Ezekiel begins by announcing the slaughter of Gog (39:1–8). Like Goliath before him, his seemingly invincible power will be broken and his body left exposed for the birds of the air and the beasts of the field (39:4; cf. 1 Sam. 17:46). The fire of God's wrath will be poured out on his homeland and the homelands of his allies (Ezek. 39:6). The destruction they had planned to wreak on a people living "in safety" will return on their own heads (39:6; cf. 38:8).

Unlike past times when, because of his people's sins, the Lord had allowed his name to be profaned by bringing on them the catastrophe of exile (36:22–23), this time the Lord will act to prevent such profanation by defending his people against all assault. This too will demonstrate the holiness of his name by showing that his power to save is as mighty as his power to judge (39:7). The future salvation is as secure as the past catastrophic judgment: "It is coming! It will surely take place" (39:8; cf. 21:7).

Once God has decisively dealt with Gog as a threat, then for the first time Israel is called to act. She plays no part in winning the victory; she merely carries out the mopping-up operation of spoiling the corpses and disposing of the remains (39:9–16). The Israelites collect six kinds of weapons, which for seven years serve them for fuel (39:9). Ironically, these flammable materials seem to have been the only things not harmed by the descent of God's fiery wrath! Those who came to plunder are now plundered (39:10).

In addition to plundering the fallen, however, Israel will also be active in purifying the land by burying the corpses. The holy land must not be defiled by the ongoing presence of death. The whole house of Israel will be engaged in this burial process (39:12). After that, there will be a further period in which two squads of professional morticians will pass through the land, the first squad tagging human remains for the second squad to inter (39:15), until the whole of Gog's army is safely laid to rest "in the Valley of Hamon [the Horde of] Gog." Although the vocabulary is different, it is tempting to see in this army reduced to a valley of bones through the death-dealing activity of the Lord a reversal of Ezekiel 37, where the Lord's lifegiving Spirit turned a valley of dry bones into a living army.

The dramatic, though not the chronological, climax comes in 39:17–20. Here the birds and the beasts are invited to come to join in a kind of gruesome "messianic banquet." But on this occasion, instead of animals being slain to feed the appetites of the human guests from north and south and east and west, here the humans have been slain to feed the animals from all around.¹²

The lesson Israel is to draw from these chapters is explicitly laid out for them in 39:21–29. The Lord is sovereign in history, a sovereignty that is displayed before the nations in two separate movements. (1) In the first, God demonstrated his sovereignty by sending his own people into exile because of their sin and unfaithfulness (39:23). He hid his face from them, and as a result they became easy prey for all their enemies.

(2) But in the days to come a new period in Israel's history is beginning. God's people will return from exile; he will have compassion on them. This change in their fortunes will cause them to "bear their shame" ($w^e n \bar{a} s' \hat{u}$ 'et- $k^e limm \bar{a} t \bar{a} m$, 39:26). That is, they will take responsibility for their past actions when they are restored to their land and dwell in safety. Then they will know that it is the Lord their God who sent them into exile, and the Lord their God who returns them from exile (39:28). The tragic events of 586 B.C. will never repeat themselves, for the covenant-keeping God will pour out his Spirit on his people, as he once poured out his wrath on them, and he will never again hide his face from them (39:29).

Bridging Contexts

IDENTIFICATIONS THROUGHOUT HISTORY. Perhaps few Old Testament passages have seen so many attempts to interpret them in the light of current events as Ezekiel 38-39. This is hardly a new phenomenon. The church father Ambrose, writing in the late fourth century, confidently identified Gog as the Goths.14 In the seventh century, Gog and Magog were the Arab armies that threatened the Holy Land. 15 By the thirteenth century, Gog had become a cipher for the Mongol hordes from the East.¹⁶ William Greenhill, writing in the seventeenth century, records the opinion of some contemporaries who identified Gog as the Roman emperor, the Pope, or the Turks.¹⁷ In the nineteenth century, against the background of the tensions in Asia Minor that culminated in the Crimean War, Wilhelm Gesenius identified Rosh as Russia.¹⁸ This view was subsequently popularized by the Scofield Reference Bible, along with the idea taken from other sources that "Meshech" and "Tubal" are the Russian cities of Moscow and Tobolsk.¹⁹ During the First World War, Arno Gaebelein argued that Gomer was Germany.20

More recently, in response to the rise of Communism, these ideas have become the staples of popular dispensational end-times literature, to which has in some cases been added the contemporary threat of the Red Chinese, usually identified as "the kings from the East" in Revelation 16:12.21 With its vivid imagery and pictorial language, apocalyptic (or more precisely, proto-apocalyptic) literature such as Ezekiel 38–39 lends itself to a flexible application to whatever the contemporary dangers to world peace are perceived to be. In a world of much tribulation, there will always be a plausible explanation of why these times in particular fit the description of the biblical "end times."

There are numerous factual flaws in these identifications. In the first place, the earliest attestation of the name "Rus" (Russia) dates back to the mid-ninth century A.D. and is thought to have been brought to the area around Kiev by the Vikings.²² It is etymologically unrelated to the Hebrew term, and modern lexicons have universally rejected Gesenius's claim.²³ Nor can Meshech and Tubal be linked with Moscow and Tobolsk. Rather, they are to be linked with the Mushku and Tabal peoples of central and eastern Anatolia, who are well known in cuneiform texts from the first half of the first millennium B.C.²⁴

Gomer is similarly known to us from cuneiform texts as the warlike gimirrai (known from Greek sources as "Cimmerians"). This people apparently originated in the Crimea, but were pushed southward across the Caucasus by the Scythians at the end of the eighth century B.C.²⁵ Though the Babylonian Talmud does identify Gomer as the area of "Germania" (or "Kermania"),²⁶ the Targum Neofiti on Genesis 10:2 rather identifies Germania as the district of Magog! In addition, although Gomer may etymologically be related equally well to the Welsh (cymri) as to the proto-Germanic tribes,²⁷ yet one may observe that the Welsh have not typically played a significant role in the descriptions of the last days.

However, even if correct identifications were to be made on the basis of sound linguistic and archaeological data, attempts to isolate particular nations as "Israel's last enemies" fly in the face of what the text is saying. The point of Ezekiel 38–39 is not that at some distant point in future history these particular nations will oppose Israel, while others (America? Britain?) will rally to her aid. Rather, these seven nations from the ends of the earth, from all four points of the compass, represent symbolically a supreme attempt by the united forces of evil to crush the peace of God's people. This, not coincidentally, is the interpretation given to "Gog and Magog" in Revelation 20:8: They represent "the nations in the four corners of the earth," whom Satan gathers for the final battle against God's people, the city he loves.²⁸ Their defeat in Revelation is the prerequisite for the establishment of the new Jerusalem, the heavenly city of Revelation 21, which itself has many points of contact with Ezekiel's visionary temple in Ezekiel 40–48.

Ezekiel 38–39 in biblical context. The key to understanding what Ezekiel 38–39 are about—both for its original hearers and for us—lies in recognizing whereabouts in the book of Ezekiel we are at this point. The first twenty-four chapters of Ezekiel, after a brief record of the initial call of the prophet, prophesy an unmitigated pronouncement of judgment on God's people and city. Jerusalem and her inhabitants are finished because of their idolatry and other sins. The Lord has abandoned his people, and it is only a matter of time before they experience the full outpouring of his wrath through the Babylonians.

Ezekiel 25–32 then gives a series of oracles against the foreign nations, pronouncing judgment on those who participated or delighted in Israel's downfall. The presence of these oracles affirms that God has not turned his back on his people utterly. He has not switched sides and gone over to her enemies. The promise to Abraham given in Genesis 12:3, that "I will bless those who bless you, and whoever curses you I will curse," is still in effect—at least, the second half of the promise.

Then Ezekiel 33 records the turning point in the fortunes of God's people when the news of Jerusalem's fall comes to the prophet. Now God's wrath has been satisfied and there is a prospect of a new beginning. That new beginning is outlined in terms of a restoration of the leadership of the people (the shepherds, ch. 34), the land itself (35:1–36:15), and the people who indwell the land (chs. 36–37), culminating in the glorious statements of Ezek. 37:24–28:

My servant David will be king over them, and they will all have one shepherd. They will follow my laws and be careful to keep my decrees. They will live in the land I gave to my servant Jacob, the land where your fathers lived. They and their children and their children's children will live there forever, and David my servant will be their prince forever. I will make a covenant of peace with them; it will be an everlasting covenant. I will establish them and increase their numbers, and I will put my sanctuary among them forever. My dwelling place will be with them; I will be their God, and they will be my people. Then the nations will know that I the LORD make Israel holy, when my sanctuary is among them forever.

But there is a potential problem at this point. Perhaps Israel can be restored and returned to her own land. But what happens then? What is to say that the whole weary cycle of sin and judgment in the shape of an invading army will not begin all over again, as in the days of the book of Judges? It is this question that Ezekiel 38–39 seeks to answer. The purpose of the oracle against Gog becomes clear in 39:21–29; it is intended as a word of reassurance to Israel that the new order of existence promised in chapters 34–37 is not reversible. God will never again turn his face away from his people (39:29). Though trials of all kinds, even the worst imaginable kind, may and will come, they will do so only under God's good and sovereign hand.

The symbolism in Ezekiel 38–39. In fact, even identifying Ezekiel 38–39 as "proto-apocalyptic" may be leading us down the wrong interpretative path. For though these two chapters share a number of features with later apocalyptic, such as symbolism and a schematic view of history, they also have a great deal in common with nonapocalyptic writings. It is especially close thematically to the psalms of Zion's security, where the nations gather together against Jerusalem, only to be repulsed by the Lord (Ps. 2; 46; 48; 76).²⁹

The common motif of the attack by the nations against the Lord's dwelling place, the center of the earth, has been transferred by the prophet from Jerusalem itself to the mountains of Israel. This fits with his avoidance of the name of Jerusalem in his prophecies of restoration: Even the city of Ezekiel 48 bears a different name, while the mountains of Israel are for Ezekiel the heart of the Promised Land. The timeless present of the psalm has been transposed to the indefinite future of "after many days" (38:8), but the essential message of the psalmist remains unchanged. The conclusion of Psalm 46 sums up Ezekiel 38–39 equally well:

Come and see the works of the LORD, the desolations he has brought on the earth. He makes wars cease to the ends of the earth; he breaks the bow and shatters the spear, he burns the shields with fire.

"Be still, and know that I am God; I will be exalted among the nations,

I will be exalted in the earth."
The LORD Almighty is with us;
the God of Jacob is our fortress. (Ps. 46:8–11)

The significance in this correlation lies in the fact that the "last battle," as depicted in Ezekiel 38–39, is not qualitatively different from the everyday battles that face us. The "mother of all battles" differs only in terms of size from the ongoing battles that we as believers face from day to day, not in terms of kind. Just as "the Antichrist" is merely the last and greatest in a constant stream of "antichrists" (1 John 2:18), so also Gog and his foul friends who seek to destroy the restored Israel are simply the ultimate expression of a continual struggle in which Satan seeks to destroy the people of God (cf. Rev. 12:17).

Therefore, the message of Ezekiel 38–39 is not a coded message for those who live in "the last days," who by carefully unlocking its secrets will be able to determine the symbolic identity of the key participants in the final struggle. Rather, it is a word of encouragement to all the saints of all times and places that no matter what the forces of evil may do, God's purpose and victory stands secure. If God can defeat the combined forces of Gog and his allies and turn them into fodder for the crows and carrioneaters, how much more can he take care of us, whatever historical manifestation of the enmity of Satan we face.

The ultimate problem with the approach to the Bible that reads Ezekiel 38–39 alongside the morning newspaper in an attempt to correlate the events described in the two documents is that it assumes that unless we are living in the end times, these passages have nothing to say to us. In fact, whether or not these happen to be the final days of God's plan for the world, Ezekiel 38–39 addresses believers with a powerful message of hope. As we noted at the outset of this section, it functions in a thematically similar way to the empty tomb in the New Testament: It is God's ultimate demonstration of power and care for his people in the face of the worst possible scenario. In the light of the resurrection of Christ, why should we fear the more everyday challenges that life throws at us? Even death cannot separate us from such love.

Contemporary Significance

Contemporary doomsday scenarios. As we approach the end of the second millennium A.D., secular "apocalypses" abound. In our time, we see growing numbers of doomsday scenarios propounded, based around environmental or other perceived hazards to the future of life on planet earth. We worry about global warming and El Niño, about asteroids colliding with the earth, or about political instability in the Balkans, the Middle East, and the former Soviet Union. We fear the possibility of a holocaust created by nuclear or bacteriological warfare. As a reflex of our fears, we dream up cataclysmic adventures on the big screen, in which world peace and "life as we know it" is dramatically threatened, and then against all odds finally saved.³¹

This theme is treated in classic form in the movies The Terminator and its sequel Terminator 2: Judgment Day.³² In these popular films, Skynet, a computerized defense system in the "Star Wars" mold, reaches self-awareness and in response to attempts by humans to power it down, triggers a nuclear holocaust. Human resistance against the autonomous machines is led by the feisty messianic figure, John Connor (whose initials are hardly coincidental).³³ In an effort at a preemptive strike, the Skynet sends a mechanical assassin, one of the seemingly all-powerful terminators, back from the future to terminate his mother's life before his birth. Having failed with its initial attempt, in the sequel the system makes a second attempt on John Connor's life when he is a young adolescent.

Such popular apocalyptic scenarios have been around for a while. Over a century ago, in The War of the Worlds, H. G. Wells painted a chilling picture of an invasion of a hostile superior life-form from Mars, against which all human military technology was powerless, instantly vaporized by their "heat ray." This life-form fed on human blood and began a program of world domination, which would inevitably (it appeared) mean the end of any recognizable human civilization. Only the intervention of common bacteria, against which the advanced Martians had long ceased to require immunity, prevented the total massacre of the human race.

Wells was ahead of his time, out of step with the general optimism of the Victorian and Edwardian eras. Probably the first significant chink in the armor of a near-universal hope of invincible human progress occurred on April 15, 1912 with the sinking of the Titanic. With its descent into the icy depths of the North Atlantic, it took the lives of 1,513 people and created a fault line in the belief of unstoppable progress. The First World War and the depression that followed crushed forever the naive optimism of the previous generation. Together, those events brought us into the era in which we now live, which W. H. Auden dubbed the "Age of Anxiety." Since then, we have lived in the shadow of the end of the world.

Of course, as we noted above, we are by no means the first generation to have this experience. In the fifth century, when the Goths sacked Rome, those who lived through the event felt as if it was the end of the world. Similar threats to "life as we know it" in medieval Europe came from the Moors in the early Middle Ages and the Mongols in the late Middle Ages, and marked out those time periods also as ones of great anxiety. Throughout the course of human history the end of the world has been regularly threatened and has occasionally happened. To date, life goes on.

Living in the shadow of the end of the world. It is the habit of those who live in the shadow of the end of the world, or whose world seems to be ending, to tell themselves stories. These stories, in general, focus on how the end of the world is to be avoided. In The War of the Worlds, the final cataclysm is averted unexpectedly, almost accidentally (from a human perspective), through the protective forces of Nature, represented by the all-powerful microbes. In contrast, in the Terminator movies human ingenuity and determination triumph over brute strength, and thus humanity is saved.

Christians naturally, and rightly, respond to the general atmosphere of end-of-the-world anxieties by turning from the world's stories to God's stories. At times like this, many turn to the apocalyptic literature of the Scriptures, such as Ezekiel 38–39 or the books of Daniel and Revelation, seeking an infallible word from the Lord. But what do you do with these stories? Many contemporary Christians treat these passages as checklists on the road to Armageddon, providing a countdown on the road to the end of the world. However, as we have shown above, this is not how the passage was intended to be read. Rather, it is a dramatic statement of the central truth that no matter what the forces of evil may throw at God's people, in the final analysis God's purpose and victory stand secure. For all Gog's bravado, ultimately it is God who says, "Go ahead; make my day!"

Do you see how comforting this truth is for all of us? Christians have, historically, suffered a great deal for their faith. From the time of Nero, when Christians were dipped in pitch and set alight to illumine the emperor's pleasure gardens, down to the present day, when believers continue to be tortured and killed for their faith in Sudan and elsewhere, the spiritual forces of opposition are real. Often those forces are institutional rather than individual, an organized and orchestrated attempt to destroy the church. For those enduring such times of persecution, Ezekiel 38–39 provides a powerful message of hope.

(1) Although this world is a place of tribulation, God is in control. Gog has his own evil reasons for acting (38:10), but even his wickedly motivated plans can achieve nothing other than what God purposes (38:4). Gog comes intent on plunder, but he does so only because God's plan and purpose is to bring him. Gog's free will is the free will of a shackled lion. If you offer a lion a choice between a fresh green salad and a juicy piece of raw meat, he will choose the latter every time, without compulsion; it is his nature to eat raw meat. But the shackled lion only gets to eat raw meat when his keeper chooses to allow him to.

This is a perspective on persecution and martyrdom that we are not used to thinking about. We tend to assume that martyrdom is an unfortunate but necessary by-product of human free will, a sad fact of life in some parts of the world, but a sign that the world is out of order. Our problem is that we live in a dangerous world populated by lions roaming on the loose, so we tend to think. Not so. The Bible tells us that the lions are real, but they are shackled, or rather, to change the image slightly, they are leashed. They can assault Christians only whenever and wherever God allows them to exercise their natural appetites. What this means is that martyrdom is not merely an occasional abnormality in the church's existence with evangelistic possibilities; it is, at times, nothing less than the will of God for his church.

In other words, God himself may bring tribulation on his people, just as he brings Gog. The reason for that apparently strange fact is that the blood of the martyrs is not merely the seed of the church, but is a sign of the kingdom. It is not merely by our love that the world will know that Christians are Christ's disciples, but by our blood. The disciples are not greater than their master, who was brutally beaten and savagely murdered on a cruel cross. Jesus himself said:

If anyone would come after me, he must deny himself and take up his cross and follow me. For whoever wants to save his life will lose it, but whoever loses his life for me and for the gospel will save it. (Mark 8:34–35)

Jesus was not exaggerating or using hyperbole here. He meant exactly what he said. Martyrdom is a central part of God's strategy for bringing glory to himself through the church.

Thus, in Revelation 6:10, the martyrs under the altar cry out, "How long, Sovereign Lord, holy and true, until you judge the inhabitants of the earth and avenge our blood?" You might expect that the answer given to their question would be: "Until the salvation of the full number of the elect. There must be more time for the evangelization of the world." Indeed, that is not a wrong answer; as Peter says concerning the Second Coming, "The Lord is not slow in keeping his promise, as some understand slowness. He is patient with you, not wanting anyone to perish, but everyone to come to repentance" (2 Peter 3:9). But this is not the answer given to the martyred saints: They are told to wait until the full number of martyrs have been killed.

Our view of the world is turned on its head. Our automatic assumption is that God's will for us is peace and prosperity, at least if we are being good Christians, and that the obedient church should grow and prosper just like any well-run business. But we are wrong. God loves you and has a wonderful plan for your life . . . but that wonderful plan might mean torture and death for the faith, or simply a life that seems, from the world's perspective, "wasted" ("lost," in Jesus' terms). Ezekiel 38–39 reminds us that even the restored, renewed people of God can expect tribulation, not because the world is out of control but precisely because the world is in God's control; for when God's people cling to him in their darkest hour, against all odds, it brings him glory. God's glory is the primary goal of history, not our happiness and comfort.

This focus requires us always to lift our eyes above the human plane of activity to the divine. When we stay on the human level in our consideration of our sufferings and the sufferings of others, we end up like Job's friends, searching for some hidden reason within us for the suffering. Philip Yancey lists some of the reasons people come up with:

- God is trying to teach you something. You should feel privileged, not bitter, about your opportunity to lean on him in faith.
- Meditate on the blessings you still enjoy—at least you are still alive. Are you a fair-weather believer?
- You are under-going a training regimen, a chance to exercise new muscles of faith. Don't worry—God will not test you beyond your endurance.
- Don't complain so loudly! You will forfeit this opportunity to demonstrate your faithfulness to unbelievers.
- Someone is always worse off than you. Give thanks despite your circumstances.³⁵

The problem is that each of these approaches seeks to find some good that the suffering will accomplish within us or within our circle of friends and acquaintances. In the providence of God, that may be the case. But it may not. We are also the players in a cosmic drama acted out before the heavenly hosts. In that play, "every act of faith by every one of the people of God is like the tolling of a bell, and a faith like Job's reverberates throughout the universe." God himself may bring tribulation into our life to bring himself glory through our obedient submission, following in the footsteps of our Master.

- (2) God is going to win. This may seem a simple, even simplistic, point, but it is central to the thrust of the Gog narrative. No matter how big the opposition, how well organized they are, how powerful their weaponry, or how paltry the resources of God's people, ultimately the plans of God's enemies will come to nothing. As in Psalm 2, the nations may conspire together and the kings of the earth take a stand against God, but all their posturing causes mirth rather than worry in the heart of the Most High. Ultimately, no matter what Satan throws against the church, the full number of the elect from the north and south and east and west will be brought in and will sit down together at God's table to share in the heavenly feast.
- (3) God's victory means the ultimate destruction of all those who oppose him. Gog and his army end up as a massive array of corpses, scattered on the face of the earth. Their weaponry is useless against God's cosmic arsenal of fire and earthquake, hailstones and burning sulfur (Ezek. 38:19–22). Those who came to plunder will end up themselves plundered. Once again adopting the language of Psalm 2, Gog will be terrified in God's wrath, dashed in pieces like pottery, and destroyed along the way. It is foolishness to oppose God, and all who do so will come to a sticky end. Those who turn away from God and refuse the sacrifice of Christ have nothing to expect except certain judgment and the raging fire that will consume the enemies of God (Heb. 10:27). We need to take seriously his admonition: "It is a dreadful thing to fall into the hands of the living God" (10:31).

Do we fathom the significance of this reality for our neighbors, coworkers, and relatives who do not know Christ? In her article "A Stone Cold Fact," Joni Eareckson Tada presses us to see in concrete terms what this means:

Lord, do you mean my third-grade teacher? The women who run the day-care center where I take my child? My mailman? My housekeeper? The lady who teaches the quilting class down the street? The bank teller who's always telling me jokes? If these people don't know Jesus, they won't "rise to live." ³⁷

(4) God's victory means the ultimate security of those who trust in him. In Ezekiel 38–39, Israel does not have to lift a finger in her own defense. Those who take refuge in the Lord find blessing and security (Ps. 2:12); God is their refuge and strength, an ever present help in time of trouble (46:1). The certainty of God's victory should be a source of confidence for the believer as he or she faces an uncertain world: You are God's special property and he knows how to take care of his own. You are the apple of his eye, as Zechariah 2 expresses it. As the apostle Paul put it: "If God is for us, who can be against us? He who did not spare his own Son, but gave him up for us all—how will he not also, along with him, graciously give us all things?" (Rom. 8:31–32). Your confidence rests in this: that Almighty God has committed himself to those who trust in him and he will never give them up. Paul reminds us in another place: "I know whom I have believed, and am convinced that he is able guard what I have entrusted to him for that day" (2 Tim. 1:12). The God who will defeat the evil empire of Gog can take care of you also.

The central point. This last point is, it seems to me, the central thrust of Ezekiel 38–39, as the final verses of chapter 39 make clear. Why was Ezekiel 38–39 good news for Ezekiel's original audience? Because it made clear the fact that the events of 586 B.C. could never be repeated. Israel had once because of her sin so polluted the land that it had become totally unfit for divine habitation (39:23). But when God reverses that situation and regathers his people, he will pour out his Spirit in the same measure as he once poured out his wrath (39:29). This will bring about a radical change in the hearts of his people and in the security of his presence with them, such that he will never again hide his face from them. Though tribulations, such as the assault by Gog, will continue, they will no longer be marks of God's wrath but opportunities for God to uncover his power to the world.

Why is Ezekiel 38–39 good news for us? It is because this is precisely the relationship with God in which we, as Christians, stand. Once we too were objects of God's wrath because of our sins (Eph. 2:2–3). Our hearts were too polluted to receive his presence. But now, because of the work of Christ on the cross, we too have been gathered into God's people. We are no longer under condemnation, but have received the Spirit, by whom we have been adopted into God's family. Therefore, we have the settled assurance that God will never leave us nor forsake us (Heb. 13:5–6). Troubles may and will come. No matter where we are on God's "prophetic timetable," that reality remains unchanged. But to us as Christians, troubles come now not as visitations of God's wrath on us but as opportunities for God to uncover his power to the world.

There are two ways in which God may uncover his power to the world in our situation of distress. (1) That power may be uncovered by means of a remarkable deliverance, whereby we are rescued from the midst of our trials, as when Daniel was kept safe in the lions' den or Peter was set free from prison. In that case, we will have the testimony that will launch a thousand books.

(2) But that is not the only way in which God reveals his existence and power in the world. In other cases, God's power may be uncovered by enabling us to withstand tribulation firmly until the end, as when Stephen was given a vision of the ascended Jesus to strengthen him as the murderous stones pounded his body. Either way—whether we are delivered from our trials or endure suffering to the end for the sake of King Jesus—we find out for ourselves and demonstrate to the world and to the cosmic hosts the truth of the Lord's statement: "My grace is sufficient for you, for my power is made perfect in weakness" (2 Cor. 12:9).

Ezekiel 40–42

In the twenty-fifth year of our exile, at the beginning of the year, on the tenth of the month, in the fourteenth year after the fall of the city—on that very day the hand of the LORD was upon me and he took me there. ²In visions of God he took me to the land of Israel and set me on a very high mountain, on whose south side were some buildings that looked like a city. ³He took me there, and I saw a man whose appearance was like bronze; he was standing in the gateway with a linen cord and a measuring rod in his hand. ⁴The man said to me, "Son of man, look with your eyes and hear with your ears and pay attention to everything I am going to show you, for that is why you have been brought here. Tell the house of Israel everything you see."

⁵I saw a wall completely surrounding the temple area. The length of the measuring rod in the man's hand was six long cubits, each of which was a cubit and a handbreadth. He measured the wall; it was one measuring rod thick and one rod high.

⁶Then he went to the gate facing east. He climbed its steps and measured the threshold of the gate; it was one rod deep. ⁷The alcoves for the guards were one rod long and one rod wide, and the projecting walls between the alcoves were five cubits thick. And the threshold of the gate next to the portico facing the temple was one rod deep.

⁸Then he measured the portico of the gateway; ⁹it was eight cubits deep and its jambs were two cubits thick. The portico of the gateway faced the temple.

¹⁰Inside the east gate were three alcoves on each side; the three had the same measurements, and the faces of the projecting walls on each side had the same measurements. ¹¹Then he measured the width of the entrance to the gateway; it was ten cubits and its length was thirteen cubits. ¹²In front of each alcove was a wall one cubit high, and the alcoves were six cubits square. ¹³Then he measured the gateway from the top of the rear wall of one alcove to the top of the opposite one; the distance was twenty-five cubits from one parapet opening to the opposite one. ¹⁴He measured along the faces of the projecting walls all around the inside of the gateway —sixty cubits. The measurement was up to the portico facing the courtyard. ¹⁵The distance from the entrance of the gateway to the far end of its portico was fifty cubits. ¹⁶The alcoves and the projecting walls inside the gateway were surmounted by narrow parapet openings all around, as was the portico; the openings all around faced inward. The faces of the projecting walls were decorated with palm trees.

¹⁷Then he brought me into the outer court. There I saw some rooms and a pavement that had been constructed all around the court; there were thirty rooms along the pavement. ¹⁸It abutted the sides of the gateways and was as wide as they were long; this was the lower pavement. ¹⁹Then he measured the distance from the inside of the lower gateway to the outside of the inner court; it was a hundred cubits on the east side as well as on the north.

²⁰Then he measured the length and width of the gate facing north, leading into the outer court. ²¹Its alcoves—three on each side—its projecting walls and its portico had the same measurements as those of the first gateway. It was fifty cubits long and twenty-five cubits wide. ²²Its openings, its portico and its palm tree decorations had the same measurements as those of the gate facing east. Seven steps led up to it, with its portico opposite them. ²³There was a gate to the inner court facing the north gate, just as there was on the east. He measured from one gate to the opposite one; it was a hundred cubits.

²⁴Then he led me to the south side and I saw a gate facing south. He measured its jambs and its portico, and they had the same measurements as the others. ²⁵The gateway and its portico had narrow openings all around, like the openings of the others. It was fifty cubits long and twenty-five cubits wide. ²⁶Seven steps led up to it, with its portico opposite them; it had palm tree decorations on the faces of the projecting walls on each side. ²⁷The inner court also had a gate facing south, and he measured from this gate to the outer gate on the south side; it was a hundred cubits.

²⁸Then he brought me into the inner court through the south gate, and he measured the south gate; it had the same measurements as the others. ²⁹Its alcoves, its projecting walls and its portico had the same measurements as the others. The gateway and its portico had openings all around. It was fifty cubits long and twenty-five cubits wide. ³⁰(The porticoes of the gateways around the inner court were twenty-five cubits wide and five cubits deep.) ³¹Its portico faced the outer court; palm trees decorated its jambs, and eight steps led up to it.

³²Then he brought me to the inner court on the east side, and he measured the gateway; it had the same measurements as the others. ³³Its alcoves, its projecting walls and its portico had the same measurements as the others. The gateway and its portico had openings all around. It was fifty cubits long and twenty-five cubits wide. ³⁴Its portico faced the outer court; palm trees decorated the jambs on either side, and eight steps led up to it.

³⁵Then he brought me to the north gate and measured it. It had the same measurements as the others, ³⁶as did its alcoves, its projecting walls and its portico, and it had openings all around. It was fifty cubits long and twenty-five cubits wide. ³⁷Its portico faced the outer court; palm trees decorated the jambs on either side, and eight steps led up to it.

³⁸A room with a doorway was by the portico in each of the inner gateways, where the burnt offerings were washed. ³⁹In the portico of the gateway were two tables on each side, on which the burnt offerings, sin offerings and guilt offerings were slaughtered. ⁴⁰By the outside wall of the portico of the gateway, near the steps at the entrance to the north gateway were two tables, and on the other side of the steps were two tables. ⁴¹So there were four tables on one side of the gateway and four on the other—eight tables in all—on which the sacrifices were slaughtered. ⁴²There were also four tables of dressed stone for the burnt offerings, each a cubit and a half long, a cubit and a half wide and a cubit high. On them were placed the utensils for slaughtering the burnt offerings and the other sacrifices. ⁴³And double-pronged hooks, each a handbreadth long, were attached to the wall all around. The tables were for the flesh of the offerings.

⁴⁴Outside the inner gate, within the inner court, were two rooms, one at the side of the north gate and facing south, and another at the side of the south gate and facing north. ⁴⁵He said to me, "The room facing south is for the priests who have charge of the temple, ⁴⁶and the room facing north is for the priests who have charge of the altar. These are the sons of Zadok, who are the only Levites who may draw near to the LORD to minister before him."

⁴⁷Then he measured the court: It was square—a hundred cubits long and a hundred cubits wide. And the altar was in front of the temple.

⁴⁸He brought me to the portico of the temple and measured the jambs of the portico; they were five cubits wide on either side. The width of the entrance was fourteen cubits and its projecting walls were three cubits wide on either side. ⁴⁹The portico was twenty cubits wide, and twelve cubits from front to back. It was reached by a flight of stairs, and there were pillars on each side of the jambs.

41:1Then the man brought me to the outer sanctuary and measured the jambs; the width of the jambs was six cubits on each side. ²The entrance was ten cubits wide, and the projecting walls on each side of it were five cubits wide. He also measured the outer sanctuary; it was forty cubits long and twenty cubits wide.

³Then he went into the inner sanctuary and measured the jambs of the entrance; each was two cubits wide. The entrance was six cubits wide, and the projecting walls on each side of it were seven cubits wide. ⁴And he measured the length of the inner sanctuary; it was twenty cubits, and its width was twenty cubits across the end of the outer sanctuary. He said to me, "This is the Most Holy Place."

⁵Then he measured the wall of the temple; it was six cubits thick, and each side room around the temple was four cubits wide. ⁶The side rooms were on three levels, one above another, thirty on each level. There were ledges all around the wall of the temple to serve as supports for the side rooms, so that the supports were not inserted into the wall of the temple. ⁷The side rooms all around the temple were wider at each successive level. The structure surrounding the temple was built in ascending stages, so that the rooms widened as one went upward. A stairway went up from the lowest floor to the top floor through the middle floor.

⁸I saw that the temple had a raised base all around it, forming the foundation of the side rooms. It was the length of the rod, six long cubits. ⁹The outer wall of the side rooms was five cubits thick. The open area between the side rooms of the temple ¹⁰and the priests' rooms was twenty cubits wide all around the temple. ¹¹There were entrances to the side rooms from the open area, one on the north and another on the south; and the base adjoining the open area was five cubits wide all around.

¹²The building facing the temple courtyard on the west side was seventy cubits wide. The wall of the building was five cubits thick all around, and its length was ninety cubits.

¹³Then he measured the temple; it was a hundred cubits long, and the temple courtyard and the building with its walls were also a hundred cubits long. ¹⁴The width of the temple courtyard on the east, including the front of the temple, was a hundred cubits.

¹⁵Then he measured the length of the building facing the courtyard at the rear of the temple, including its galleries on each side; it was a hundred cubits.

The outer sanctuary, the inner sanctuary and the portico facing the court, ¹⁶as well as the thresholds and the narrow windows and galleries around the three of them—everything beyond and including the threshold was covered with wood. The floor, the wall up to the windows, and the windows were covered.

¹⁷In the space above the outside of the entrance to the inner sanctuary and on the walls at regular intervals all around the inner and outer sanctuary ¹⁸were carved cherubim and palm trees. Palm trees alternated with cherubim. Each cherub had two faces: ¹⁹the face of a man toward the palm tree on one side and the face of a lion toward the palm tree on the other. They were carved all around the whole temple. ²⁰From the floor to the area above the entrance, cherubim and palm trees were carved on the wall of the outer sanctuary.

doorframe, and the one at the front of the Most Holy Place was similar. ²²There was a wooden altar three cubits high and two cubits square; its corners, its base and its sides were of wood. The man said to me, "This is the table that is before the LORD." ²³Both the outer sanctuary and the Most Holy Place had double doors. ²⁴Each door had two leaves—two hinged leaves for each door. ²⁵And on the doors of the outer sanctuary were carved cherubim and palm trees like those carved on the walls, and there was a wooden overhang on the front of the portico. ²⁶On the sidewalls of the portico were narrow windows with palm trees carved on each side. The side rooms of the temple also had overhangs.

42:1Then the man led me northward into the outer court and brought me to the rooms opposite the temple courtyard and opposite the outer wall on the north side. ²The building whose door faced north was a hundred cubits long and fifty cubits wide. ³Both in the section twenty cubits from the inner court and in the section opposite the pavement of the outer court, gallery faced gallery at the three levels. ⁴In front of the rooms was an inner passageway ten cubits wide and a hundred cubits long. Their doors were on the north. ⁵Now the upper rooms were narrower, for the galleries took more space from them than from the rooms on the lower and middle floors of the building. ⁶The rooms on the third floor had no pillars, as the courts had; so they were smaller in floor space than those on the lower and middle floors. ⁷There was an outer wall parallel to the rooms and the outer court; it extended in front of the rooms for fifty cubits. ⁸While the row of rooms on the side next to the outer court was fifty cubits long, the row on the side nearest the sanctuary was a hundred cubits long. ⁹The lower rooms had an entrance on the east side as one enters them from the outer court.

¹⁰On the south side along the length of the wall of the outer court, adjoining the temple courtyard and opposite the outer wall, were rooms ¹¹with a passageway in front of them. These were like the rooms on the north; they had the same length and width, with similar exits and dimensions. Similar to the doorways on the north ¹²were the doorways of the rooms on the south. There was a doorway at the beginning of the passageway that was parallel to the corresponding wall extending eastward, by which one enters the rooms.

¹³Then he said to me, "The north and south rooms facing the temple courtyard are the priests' rooms, where the priests who approach the LORD will eat the most holy offerings. There they will put the most holy offerings—the grain offerings, the sin offerings and the guilt offerings—for the place is holy. ¹⁴Once the priests enter the holy precincts, they are not to go into the outer court until they leave behind the garments in which they minister, for these are holy. They are to put on other clothes before they go near the places that are for the people."

15When he had finished measuring what was inside the temple area, he led me out by the east gate and measured the area all around: ¹⁶He measured the east side with the measuring rod; it was five hundred cubits. ¹⁷He measured the north side; it was five hundred cubits by the measuring rod. ¹⁸He measured the south side; it was five hundred cubits by the measuring rod. ¹⁹Then he turned to the west side and measured; it was five hundred cubits by the measuring rod. ²⁰So he measured the area on all four sides. It had a wall around it, five hundred cubits long and five hundred cubits wide, to separate the holy from the common.

Original Meaning

IT IS CUSTOMARY for commentators, evangelical and critical alike, to apologize for Ezekiel 40–48. After the heady excitement of the re-creation of Israel in Ezekiel 37 and the apocalyptic battle of Ezekiel 38–39, worthy of the climax to an action-thriller movie of the Die Hard genre, the description of the dimensions of the new temple and the regulations for what kinds of sacrifices the prince can offer may seem tame stuff. However, this final vision forms the capstone and climax of the entire book and will, if properly understood, amply repay the labor of study.

As with the opening vision of Ezekiel (1:1–2), the present one opens with a double date formula: "In the twenty-fifth year of our exile, at the beginning of the year, on the tenth of the month, in the fourteenth year after the fall of the city—on that very day the hand of the LORD was upon me and he took me there" (40:1). Whereas the opening vision of the heavenly King on his throne had been dated from the exile of the earthly king, Jehoiachin, this vision of the heavenly city is dated from the destruction of the earthly city, Jerusalem.

Fourteen years have passed since that momentous, earth-shattering event, twenty-five since the beginning of the Exile. In these dates, especially the fact that the vision took place on the tenth of the first month, a reference to the Jubilee year is generally seen. On the tenth day of the seventh month, the Day of Atonement, every fiftieth year, the trumpets were to be blown announcing a specially holy year, a year of proclaiming liberty throughout the land (Lev. 25:8–13). All land bought and sold in the intervening period was to be returned to its original owners, so that those who had lost their land and been reduced to slave status might return to their ancestral heritage (25:13).

It is not too hard to see what correlation might be drawn by the exiles between their present landless, enslaved state and the predicament of many in former times who lived in between Jubilees. The tenth day of the first month of the twenty-fifth year of exile, as the halfway point to the next Jubilee, was a natural time of looking forward to the release that the Lord had announced in Ezekiel 34–37.

It was on this very day that Ezekiel saw his "visions of God," whereby he was taken up to a high mountain in the land of Israel (40:2). This journey to a high mountain has several precursors in Israelite history. It is equivalent to Moses' ascent up Mount Sinai to receive the law of God; indeed, Ezekiel is the only person in the Old Testament apart from Moses who imparts God's legislation to the people.² But Moses also received on the mountaintop a detailed design for building the tabernacle and establishing its worship; Ezekiel is likewise shown a heavenly sanctuary and instructed about the requirements for its worship.³ As with another mountaintop experience of Moses, this time on Mount Nebo in the Abarim Range (Deut. 32:48–52), Ezekiel surveys the Promised Land that has been prepared for God's people, though he himself will never enter it.⁴ But the "very high mountain" also represents Mount Zion, the mountain of the temple, concerning which Isaiah had prophesied (Isa. 2:2–3):

In the last days
the mountain of the LORD's temple will be established as chief among the mountains;
it will be raised above the hills, and all nations will stream to it.
Many peoples will come and say,
"Come, let us go up to the mountain of the LORD, to the house of the God of Jacob.
He will teach us his ways,

so that we may walk in his paths."
The law will go out from Zion, the word of the LORD from Jerusalem.

The literal Mount Zion was never particularly conspicuous for its physical elevation. But here, as in Ezekiel 38–39, we are dealing with theological geography rather than literal geography. The new temple, which appears "like a city" (40:2), is located in the theologically opposite terrain to the dry bones of Ezekiel 37: Just as there the dead are raised to new life, so also here the valley has been exalted and transformed into a "city" on a hill.

There on the mountaintop Ezekiel is met by an angelic figure, who will be his tour guide around the temple. This is not his first visionary guided tour of a temple; in chapter 8 he received a similar tour of the defiled Jerusalem temple and all its abominations, conducted by a similar figure. That vision culminated in the departure of "the glory of the LORD" from the temple (10:18), just as the vision in chapters 40–42 culminates in the return of that glory to the new temple (43:1–5). The focus of the temple vision, then, is the reversal of the divine abandonment of God's people that had culminated in the destruction of Jerusalem.

The angel is equipped with a linen cord (which is not again mentioned) and a measuring rod, to enable him to measure the various parts of the temple (40:3). The linen cord was presumably marked off in multiples of the measuring rod, to enable the measurement of longer distances.⁵ This measuring process is intended for Ezekiel's benefit; he is instructed to look and hear, to pay attention to all that he is shown so that he can tell the house of Israel what he sees (40:4). In other words, the purpose of his vision is instructional: He will see things he can then relate to his contemporaries, which will have meaningful content for them (see 43:10–12).

It is highly significant that the first thing the prophet sees on his tour is a wall surrounding the whole temple area (40:5). Walls have as their purpose regulating and defining space; they are there to mark territory as "inside" or "outside" and to regulate access to the "inside" space. Nor is this wall a minor obstacle; it is some ten and a half feet tall and ten and a half feet thick, providing a solid dividing line between the "holy," the area of the temple itself, and the "profane," the area outside. The function of this wall as a wall of separation between these two realms is apparent from the fact that the wall's height is mentioned, a dimension not provided for the other spaces. A wall depends on its height and thickness for its effectiveness in keeping people out, so these dimensions take on a particular importance.

If the wall is too thick to be broken and too high to be scaled, its effectiveness in restricting access will depend on its gates. But what gates this wall possesses! The three sides that permit access (there is no entry on the west side) are dominated by massive fortress-style gatehouses, almost forty-five feet wide and ninety feet deep (40:13, 15). The defensive nature of these gates is underlined by the fact that they have a portico or vestibule not on the outside, where one would expect it (and where it is on the inner gatehouses) but on the inside.

The gatehouses are further specified as having no fewer than six rooms for guards, three on each side. Similarly constructed gates have been excavated from the preexilic defenses of Megiddo, Hazor, and (probably) Gezer, though these gates were all smaller in scale than that which Ezekiel sees. To add to the sense of inaccessibility, there is a flight of seven steps to be climbed before the worshiper even reaches the gate (40:6, 22, 26). There is no doubt as to the initial impression that Ezekiel's temple is intended to have: It is a mighty fortress that clearly separates the sacred from the profane. §

The area of the outer court (O) is of little interest to the prophet or his angelic guide. It is passed over with a brief reference to a paved area (M) all around the court, with thirty rooms (K) opening off from it (40:17–19). These rooms are not sufficiently important to require definition of their measurements or purpose, though commentators have not been slow to fill in Ezekiel's silence. The single key measurement in the outer court is its breadth: one hundred cubits, or roughly 175 feet, from outer gateway to inner gateway (40:19). This substantial dimension is intended not so much to provide space for a massive throng of worshipers° as to provide a substantial buffer zone around the holy things in the inner courtyard.

The inner courtyard (N) itself is strongly separated off from the outer courtyard. It is defended by gates (B) exactly identical to those of the outer court, though with the portico on the outside rather than the inside (40:28–37). It is further elevated, probably by about eight feet, with the gates being approached by a flight of eight steps (40:31, 34, 37). There is no mention of a wall around the inner court. Some commentators have assumed that there must have been such a wall on the basis of the massive gatehouses controlling access to the inner court. However, K. Stevenson has pointed out that it was unnecessary to control access to the inner court by means of a wall because of its significantly higher elevation than the outer court. Absence of a wall would have allowed the worshipers there to view the ritual taking place at the altar of the inner court.

At this point, the prophet's progress inward is briefly halted, while his attention is drawn to the purpose of some of the spaces in the inner courtyard. There are rooms (I) beside the portico of each of the gates for washing the sacrifices (Ezek. 40:38),¹² while the porticoes themselves were used for slaughtering the sacrifices (40:39–43). The precise details concerning the function of these rooms underline the fact already that the primary function of this temple is as a place of offering sacrifice. In the exilic and postexilic situation the need for a sacrifice to atone for the people's sins and enable them to stand in God's presence became a dominant theme. In contrast, key descriptions of Solomon's temple highlight its importance not only as the location for sacrifice but also as the center for prayer (1 Kings 8:28–54; Isa. 56:7).

In addition to these rooms, the prophet also sees two¹³ rooms for the Zadokite priests (H), who have overall responsibility for temple and altar (Ezek. 40:44–46). These Zadokites are further defined as "the only Levites who may draw near to the LORD to minister before him" (40:46). Thus the function of both sets of spaces specifically identified within the inner court serves the overall thrust of the vision: separating off access to a restricted space, which is reserved for the priests, so that proper sacrifices may be offered. Both ideas of holiness and sacrifice are present in the summary statement of 40:47. (1) The inner courtyard is a perfect square, a hundred cubits in each direction, for the square is the shape of the holy. (2) At its geometric center is the altar (C), the only piece of furniture noted in the courtyard, which is the place of sacrifice.

Having briefly described the outer and inner courts, Ezekiel is led on to the central feature of the new temple complex, the temple structure (D) itself (40:48; 41:26). Its importance is marked in three ways. (1) It is located as the protected center at the heart of the complex, with walls and zones of controlled access all around it. Although it is the most protected area of the sanctuary, doors are sufficient in place of gates to protect its sanctity, since only the priests have access to the inner court.

- (2) The temple building is conspicuous in its elevation, as the highest point of an edifice that is itself on top of the high mountain. It is reached by ascending ten steps (see NIV note on 40:49), whereas going up to the outer court only took seven steps and up to the inner court from the outer court a further eight steps.¹⁷
- (3) Its key significance is reflected in the extent and nature of the description accorded to the building. It is the space of the temple complex that is described in most detail and with the most precise measurements; even the "open area" around it is defined as being twenty cubits (thirty-five feet) wide. The building itself and associated spaces make up another hundred-cubit square.¹⁸

The temple building is a tripartite structure, comprising portico, outer sanctuary, and inner sanctuary, whose architecture focuses attention on the inner sanctuary, that is, "the Most Holy Place" (41:4). This is the only square space within the temple building itself, and it is reached by passing through three openings of increasing narrowness. The door from the inner court into the portico is fourteen cubits (almost twenty-five feet) wide; the door from there into the outer sanctuary is ten cubits (seventeen feet) wide, while the door into the inner sanctuary is a mere six cubits (ten feet) wide. This design feature underlines the sanctity of the Most Holy Place,¹⁹ a sanctity so great (even before the return of God's glory!) that Ezekiel himself is not permitted to enter it. Instead, he remains outside, while the guiding angel goes in alone and measures it (41:3–4).

All around the temple building are no fewer than ninety rooms (J), on three levels (41:5–11), while behind the temple to the west there was a restricted area of twenty cubits breadth and a "building" (F) of unspecified purpose (41:10, 12). The rationale for this building may simply have been to protect the rear approach to the temple building; from now on no one would approach God "from behind," as it were.²⁰ Notice that no door or entranceway into the "building" is specified.

Returning to the description of the temple building itself, it is described as completely paneled with wood and decorated with images of palm trees and cherubim (Ezek. 41:17–18). This makes it more ornamented than the gates of the courtyards, which were simply adorned by palm trees (40:16). Palm trees were a common symbol of fertility and, along with cherubim, had been part of the decoration scheme of the first temple (1 Kings 6:29), which had also been wood-paneled. However, Ezekiel's decoration scheme is simpler than that of the first temple, which had a wide variety of other symbols carved on it, and the focus on the cherubim recalls the ominous presence of these enforcers of divine judgment in Ezekiel's opening vision.

The only piece of furniture mentioned within the temple building is an "altar" of wood in the outer sanctuary (E), which is designated "the table that is before the LORD" (Ezek. 41:22). This is presumably the table on which the "bread of the Presence" was laid out before the Lord (1 Kings 7:48). It is mentioned here because it will later be referred to as one of the places at which the Zadokite priests have the privilege of ministering (Ezek. 44:16), a situation that is the necessary corollary of its location in the outer sanctuary, where only they had access.

Having described the temple building, Ezekiel is now headed outward once more in his description of the complex. His attention is first drawn to a series of rooms for the priests (G), located north and south of the unnamed building behind the temple. The details of the construction of these rooms are not entirely clear, but they are built on three levels and it appears that the priests could enter at the top from the inner court (42:12) and emerge from the bottom into the outer court (42:9). This serves to underline the status of the rooms as boundary areas for activities that, if not properly contained, might violate the gradation of holiness.²¹ These, therefore, are the rooms where the sacrifices and sacred offerings were to be consumed (42:13).

Eating these offerings was both a privilege and a responsibility. It was a privilege in that it was a means of providing for the physical needs of the priests, who as Levites had no land of their own to farm (44:28–30). But it was also a responsibility, since the consumption of the sin offerings was the required way of disposing of the low-grade contaminated material produced by the purification process. The carcass of the animal was regarded as having absorbed impurities during the sacrificial ritual, which were then dealt with by being ingested by the priest.²²

In addition to eating the sacred offerings here, the priests were also required to leave the sacred clothes in which they had ministered in these rooms (42:14), so that they might not bring that which was holy into dangerous contact with the profane. Both of these restrictions represent a significant raising of the differential between priest and nonpriest when they are compared with the perspective of the book of Leviticus.²³

Having completed his tour of the inner court, Ezekiel was brought back out to survey the temple from the outside. Its overall dimensions are square, five hundred cubits by five hundred cubits (42:16–20). It might seem only natural that a sacred building would adopt the most sacred shape, but once more the stakes have been raised from the arrangements of the Mosaic and Solomonic eras. In the tabernacle, for example, only the Most Holy Place is square; the other external spaces are increasingly nonsquare. In Ezekiel's temple, however, the entire structure bears an increased level of sanctity that is expressed in its overall shape.

The final note on the layout of the temple brings us back to where we started, to the wall (42:20). This inclusion highlights the wall and its function: It serves "to separate the holy from the common" (42:20). Never again will the profane intrude on the realm of the holy as it did in the past. In the future, the lines will be clearly drawn. The walls must be clearly established, with a place for everyone and everyone in his or her place, so that the Lord can return to his place at the center of his people.

Bridging Contexts

THE ESSENCE OF Ezekiel's vision. Many commentators treat this portion of Ezekiel's prophecy as if it were the work of a harmless eccentric. Ezekiel, being a priest, was naturally interested in temples, just as some other people are interested in classical music, fly fishing, or motorcycles,²⁴ and so when it comes time to express his vision for the future, he lapses into what is for him the most accessible form of description. This is normally regarded as a somewhat regrettable choice on the priest-prophet's part, an unfortunate mode of self-expression. After all, who today is into temples?

The reader is thus frequently left with the distinct impression of the prophet as being at heart an earnest but dull bureaucrat, of the kind that in popular British mythology are associated with the European Community in Brussels. These faceless officials are believed to spend their time formulating endless petty regulations on how curved bananas are permitted to be or the maximum noise levels that may be emitted by domestic lawnmowers. True, there may possibly be some meaning and value to the work of these individuals, but precisely what that value is tends to escape us. In the same way, because this is part of sacred Scripture, commentators tend to affirm that there is meaning and value in this passage, but precisely what it is for ordinary people is frequently not clear.

Alternatively, on a dispensational interpretation, the significance of this detailed description of the temple building by the prophet is held to be self-evidently clear. These details form the necessary ground plan for the future millennial temple in Jerusalem. It is usually maintained that a competent architect could construct a building from Ezekiel's description.²⁵ This is undoubtedly true, though the architect would have to use a consecrated imagination to supply the many details that are lacking, most notably the height dimensions and construction materials,²⁶ and the present temple site in Jerusalem would need to have its topography radically revised.²⁷ However, on this interpretation, it appears similarly inevitable that contemporary Christian believers, who will by then (ex hypothesi) have been raptured, can find little of edification here.

Neither approach, it seems to me, has captured the sense of what Ezekiel is trying to do in these chapters. What we have in Ezekiel 40–48 is nothing less than the visionary reordering of an entire new world, following on the creation of the new people of God in chapter 37 and the birth pangs of chapters 38–39.28 It is a view of heaven from halfway there, as the semi-Jubilee date indicates, showing a people living with the absence of God a vision of what his presence would be like. It is, in time-honored ancient Near Eastern tradition, a tour of the house that the divine warrior built on completion of his cosmic victory.29

Like the account of Genesis 1–11, this cosmogony revolves around the idea of separation and order, but this is significantly a new Eden without a fall. This is a paradise with walls,³⁰ to prevent new humankind from being driven from the presence of God (as in Gen. 3), or from driving God from their midst (as in Ezek. 8–11). Though the form may be unfamiliar to us, it is neither the nostalgic musings of a frustrated priest nor the precise notations of an inspired architect. It is a literary piece describing, in symbols drawn from temple categories, the brave new world of the future as a challenge and encouragement to God's people in Ezekiel's day and for us in the present (43:10–12).

A theology of Bible "worlds." Since Ezekiel 40–48 is a description of a new "temple-centered" world, in order to understand its significance we need to read it in the light of the other "worlds" the Bible describes. The first "world" was, of course, the world as originally created, a garden world without walls (Gen. 2). There was no fence there around the forbidden tree of the knowledge of good and evil. There was only the fence of God's word, which said: "You are free to eat from any tree in the garden; but you must not eat from the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, for when you eat of it you will surely die" (2:16–17). There was no sacrifice in that world, for there was no sin to be atoned for or impurity to be cleansed.

But then sin entered the world. The man and the woman were driven from the Garden of Eden, and the presence of God was closed off to them. All of humanity was placed on the outside because of sin, and they were barred from returning by the cherubim, though God promised that this state of alienation would not persist forever, for he would win back a people for himself (Gen. 3:15). It was at this time, after the Fall, that sacrifices began to be offered, though ironically the first sacrifice resulted in further sin and a further driving away from God's presence (4:11–12). The human race had started out on a path that would lead them ever further away from God, as the "progress" of Genesis 1–11 shows.

But with the world of Abraham, God began to reverse this trend. He called this patriarch out from his pagan roots and brought him into the land of promise, where God appeared to him. Abraham responded by setting up altars and offering sacrifices (Gen. 12). God promised to be his God and the God of his descendants after him (17:7). But God's presence with the patriarchs was spontaneous and sporadic. He appeared to them only briefly and intermittently. He did not live permanently with his people until after the exodus from Egypt. At Sinai he gave instructions for a tabernacle, a building with (flimsy) walls and regulations limiting access to protect his sanctity, so that he might live in the midst of his people. Now only the priests had access to the Holy Place and only the high priest to the Most Holy Place—and that only once a year. When the temple was built in Solomon's time, the flimsy walls were made permanent, and the rules of access were solidified.

By Ezekiel's day, however, all of that had broken down. The rules limiting access to God's presence had been flouted, allowing uncircumcised foreigners to penetrate the very heart of the temple (Ezek. 44:7). What is more, the wall of separation between the residence of the earthly king and the heavenly king had never been clearly drawn (43:8), so that the Jerusalem temple frequently functioned as if it were the private royal chapel under the control of the reigning king. To cap it all, the persistent idolatry of the people throughout the land had penetrated the sanctuary and totally defiled it (chs. 8–11). Simply returning to the old ways of doing things was not a possibility. Thus, Ezekiel was given a vision describing an entirely new kind of temple, a temple with radically raised walls, radically heightened standards of holiness, and a radical focus on sacrifice.

When the Jews returned from exile and rebuilt the temple, what they constructed did not resemble Ezekiel's ground plan. This was true not simply in terms of scale, where practical necessities would have been a hindrance. Even in terms of the regulations and perspectives that could easily have been adopted, Ezekiel's plan was not embraced by those who constructed the second temple.³¹ Should we therefore look to a future millennial temple in which to see these provisions of heightened sanctity fulfilled? I don't think so. Rather, we should do what it seems to me the New Testament does and see how the goal of Ezekiel's temple finds its fulfillment in Jesus Christ.

Christ as the fulfillment of Ezekiel's temple. For Christ himself is the new temple. He is the dwelling of God among humankind, the glory of God made manifest (John 1:14). In one sense, with the incarnation of Jesus, the solid walls of the Old Testament temple have once again become flimsy material for the sake of portability, just as was the case with the tabernacle. Thus John states, "The Word became flesh and made his dwelling [eskenosen, lit., tabernacled] among us" (John 1:14). But the walls needed to be flimsy not just for the sake of mobility but also so that they could be torn down in a final cataclysmic temple-cleansing, achieved through the breaking of his body on the cross. That was the "temple" of whose destruction Jesus spoke in John 2:19, when he said: "Destroy this temple, and I will raise it again in three days." There on the cross the radical focus on sacrifice of Ezekiel's temple found its full expression, as the new temple itself was made a complete sacrifice for sin, by which God's people were cleansed once and for all.

But in Christ the radical separation of the holy from the profane of Ezekiel's temple also found its fullest expression. Just as the temple of Ezekiel was in the midst of the people, yet was no longer able to be defiled by them, so also the Son of God lived in the midst of a sinful world, yet remained undefiled (Heb. 4:15). In him the light shone out clearly in the darkness, and the darkness could not in the least compromise it (John 1:5).

In addition, since the church is Christ's body, it is also the new temple. This means that we too as the church are called to share the radical focus on sacrifice of Ezekiel's temple. We do this not by reintroducing the physical sacrifices of the old order, which pointed forward to the coming of Christ, but by celebrating their fulfillment in the once-for-all sacrifice of Christ.

Our lives and our proclamation must center on the message of the cross: the reality of Jesus Christ crucified for us (1 Cor. 1:18–23). Reflecting the order of Ezekiel's temple, we too are called to recognize the difference between the holy and the profane, to separate ourselves from the sin that so easily besets us (Heb. 12:1) and the ties that improperly bind us to unbelievers, who keep us apart from God (2 Cor. 6:14–7:1).

There are, however, differences between our position as Christians and the arrangement of Ezekiel's temple. Most notably, the walls have been moved. While we are to build a wall of separation between ourselves and sin, and even in some situations between ourselves and sinners, now the walls between Christians have been torn down. Now there are no privileged classes of priests who have closer access to God, while ordinary Christians are stuck in the outer court. Now we are all part of a holy priesthood (1 Peter 2:5). Now the greatest wall of all, the wall separating Jew and Gentile, has been torn down. As they are incorporated into Christ, both are together on the inside of the new temple (Eph. 2:14–22).

These similarities and differences find striking focus in the new Jerusalem of Revelation 21, the final, eschatological "world" of biblical revelation. That this visionary "Holy City" is modeled on the temple of Ezekiel 40–48 is indisputable: John is carried away to a great and high mountain to see this city (Rev. 21:10), and he too is accompanied by an angel with a measuring rod (21:15). The city is square, with a great high wall around it and prominent gates, while a river of life flows from its center (22:1). All of these features come directly from Ezekiel 40–48. Yet the differences from Ezekiel's vision are equally striking. The city of Revelation has no temple (21:22), there are twelve gates around the perimeter (not three, as in Ezekiel's temple), and they stand perpetually wide open to the nations (21:12, 25).

What has John done with his predecessor's vision? He has shown how the same themes (separation of the holy from profane and sacrifice) look when they are viewed through the lens of fulfillment in Christ. There is still the same radical separation between the holy and the unholy on which Ezekiel insisted. The wall around Paradise has not been knocked down but has been raised even higher and made even thicker (Rev. 21:17). But now, in place of Ezekiel's multiplicity of walls, there is only one wall. The final separation has taken place between the righteous and the unrighteous. The righteous—those "whose names are written in the Lamb's book of life" (21:27) and "who wash their robes" (22:14)—have completely free access through the gates of the city to its very heart, the tree of life before the throne of God (22:2, 14). The unrighteous, the cowardly, the unbelieving, the vile, the murderers, the sexually immoral, those who practice magic arts, the idolaters, and all liars (21:8, 27; 22:15)—all of these are permanently on the outside (22:15).

The reason why there is no temple and no walls inside the city is because the entire city has become a giant Most Holy Place, a perfect cube in shape (Rev. 21:16) and covered with pure gold (21:18), just like the original tabernacle. The place to which no one had access in Ezekiel's temple, not even Ezekiel himself, is the place to which all Christians have access in the new Jerusalem. Unlike Ezekiel's temple, there is no altar in this "new world" because the sacrifice has been accomplished once and for all on the cross. The Lamb has been slain, and, risen from the dead, is at the heart of heavenly worship.

Thus, Ezekiel's temple points forward clearly and unequivocally to the salvation that God accomplished in Christ. Ezekiel's vision is not a heavenly construction plan that we are to establish on earth as part of a program of building the kingdom. Rather, the prophet saw something that already exists in heavenly form as a depiction of the kingdom that God himself is constantly engaged in building. This is not "spiritualizing" in the conventional sense of the word, whereby heavenly truths are deduced from earthly realities, but rather the reverse. Ezekiel's vision is precisely a vision of a heavenly truth that found its earthly realization in the incarnation of Jesus Christ. As Edmund Clowney put it: "It is not so much that Christ fulfills what the temple means; rather Christ is the meaning for which the temple existed." If this statement is true of the literal temple of the Old Testament, how much more for the symbolic temple of Ezekiel's vision: Christ is the meaning for which Ezekiel's vision exists.

Contemporary Significance

A NEW KIND of SOCIETY. In Robert Bly's new book, he argues that we have entered an entirely new kind of society in the 1990s, which he calls "the sibling society." We live in a world, he argues, where grown-ups act like adolescents and adolescents see no reason to grow up. It is a society where hierarchical barriers are increasingly swept away in an across-the-board leveling-down process. Parents no longer hold authority over their children, husbands no longer hold authority over their wives, bosses no longer hold authority over their employees. Everyone is now leveled out into one great egalitarian mass.

One aspect of this change, functioning as both cause and effect, is the rise of day care and a distinct youth culture. Both of these modern innovations tend to move children from a network of relationships that revolve around home and family into a network of relationships that revolve around peers. The home with its historic authority structures and natural formative influence of the behavior of parents on their children has been replaced by the peer group. For better or worse, I am what I am largely because I copied or rebelled against the example of my parents. For many in the next generation, this will no longer be the case. One of the producers of Melrose Place put it like this:

This generation has the ability to socialize in packs. . . . At age two, they were taught to get along with others [in day care] and what it means to respect others and somebody's space. So they value those friendships more than family because they spend so much time with them. The people I know from that age group just love being in groups.³⁵

This societal change is reflected in the television shows created for them. It is no surprise that we have gone from the family-centered genre of shows like Leave It to Beaver and The Brady Bunch to the pack-centered genre of Friends and Seinfeld. We have moved from the old patriarchal society, with its inherent structures, into an amorphous sibling society.

Of course, not everything about this change is bad, as Bly recognizes. The old patriarchal structures in some cases permitted and even encouraged the abuse of wives, children, and employees. If you doubt that, just read a few nineteenth-century novels. In Wuthering Heights, for instance, there is a multigenerational pattern of systematic and public wife and child abuse, which would be barely conceivable in modern society. It is no loss that there are laws to protect workers against bosses like Ebenezer Scrooge in Dicken's A Christmas Carol.

Nor was the old patriarchal society necessarily more "Christian" than the new sibling society. In the patriarchal society God was frequently conceived as distant and remote, so that for many people (in practice if not always blatantly proclaimed to be such) it could be said, "God is dead." In the 1990s no one except the old-fashioned proclaims the death of God. Instead, for the average non-Christian, God has been absorbed into myself—hence the rise in introspective spiritualities of self-awareness and self-realization. In both cases, however, God is still experienced as being absent. Because of sin and idolatry, there is no experience of the living presence of God in their lives or in their surroundings, and nothing else can ultimately fill that hole. Beauty can never be beautiful enough, relationships can never be strong enough, money can never make you rich enough, power can never be absolute enough; in all of us, in whatever kind of society we live, there is a deep-seated sense of loss and absence caused by the absence of God.

Responding to the "absence" of God. Ezekiel's visionary temple addresses the believer who lives in a world in which God seems absent. His answer is to lift the veil and show us the black-and-white realities of the world as it really is, the heavenly order of things. In this world there is a place for everything, and everything (and everyone) is in its place. In Ezekiel's vision, society has been reordered and transformed. But most significantly, it is a world where God is once more in his place, for the entire description of Ezekiel 40–42 leads up to the climactic reentry of the glory to the temple in chapter 43.

What does it mean for God not to be "in his place"? For the exiles, it meant a world that had fallen apart, a world that like Humpty-Dumpty had toppled off the wall, and all the king's horses and all the king's men could never simply put him back together again. God had packed his bags and left. God had abandoned them. The sky had fallen and they walked in thick darkness.

This is a description of reality that Ezekiel does not counter. Instead, he affirms that all this is true, but there is more. To the exiles who cry out in pain, "Our bones are dried up and our hope is gone; we are cut off" (37:11), he responds with a vision in which the bones are not merely dry, but very dry. To a people sick and tired of invaders, he reports the future approach of the invader to end all invaders, Gog of Magog (chs. 38–39). But in each instance, as also in his description of the new temple, God is active to restore his people. The dry bones can yet live. The hordes of Gog will end up as mounds of corpses. The temple they had defiled can and will be restored.

But the future is not, and cannot be, simply the past rewritten. Instead, in the new order of things there will be high walls built around Paradise to keep the sins of the past from being rewritten. In an adapted symbolism, the cherubim are stationed again to keep the sinners out, aided by high walls and (human) guards. God's holiness will not, and must not, be compromised in any way. The new temple is supremely the place where sacrifices are offered to maintain the renewed covenant relationship between God and his people.

How is this encouraging for Ezekiel's hearers or for us? How is it good news to hear that there will now be a high wall between God and all who lack perfect holiness? The answer is that it is not good news—unless you have considered the unthinkable alternative: that God would no longer be present in the midst of his people at all. To those who knew that it was their total depravity and defilement of the temple that caused God to depart from them, even this limited presence was good news indeed.

Yet we who are in Christ have been given far more! We have direct access to the very throne of grace, where Jesus himself intercedes for us at the right hand of the Father (Heb. 4:16; 7:25; 8:1). There are no walls that keep us out of God's presence, not because we are more holy in ourselves than Ezekiel and his hearers but because we have been credited with the perfect righteousness of Christ in place of our filthy rags. His once-for-all sacrifice has effected the transition that turned us from aliens and strangers, without God and without hope in the world (Eph. 2:12), to insiders who are able to "approach . . . with confidence" (Heb. 4:16). Should we not therefore rejoice at the greatness of the salvation accomplished for us and strive to be pure, even as our Lord Jesus was pure?

But we should also remember that one wall still remains and that many are still outsiders to God's grace. Some live beyond the sound of gospel proclamation. Others have heard the gospel proclaimed over and over again, yet have repeatedly rejected it. Nothing and no one impure can ever enter God's heavenly holy city. Even the most moral person, if he or she does not believe in Christ, is outside the wall; left to themselves, such people must perish utterly. Our calling as priests of the new temple is to teach these people too the one way to holiness through trusting in Christ, seeking to draw them into the new world we have been given, where Paradise once more stands open to God's people and the tree of life is freely accessible to all.

THEN THE MAN brought me to the gate facing east, ²and I saw the glory of the God of Israel coming from the east. His voice was like the roar of rushing waters, and the land was radiant with his glory. ³The vision I saw was like the vision I had seen when he came to destroy the city and like the visions I had seen by the Kebar River, and I fell facedown. ⁴The glory of the LORD entered the temple through the gate facing east. ⁵Then the Spirit lifted me up and brought me into the inner court, and the glory of the LORD filled the temple.

⁶While the man was standing beside me, I heard someone speaking to me from inside the temple. ⁷He said: "Son of man, this is the place of my throne and the place for the soles of my feet. This is where I will live among the Israelites forever. The house of Israel will never again defile my holy name—neither they nor their kings—by their prostitution and the lifeless idols of their kings at their high places. ⁸When they placed their threshold next to my threshold and their doorposts beside my doorposts, with only a wall between me and them, they defiled my holy name by their detestable practices. So I destroyed them in my anger. ⁹Now let them put away from me their prostitution and the lifeless idols of their kings, and I will live among them forever.

¹⁰"Son of man, describe the temple to the people of Israel, that they may be ashamed of their sins. Let them consider the plan, ¹¹ and if they are ashamed of all they have done, make known to them the design of the temple—its arrangement, its exits and entrances—its whole design and all its regulations and laws. Write these down before them so that they may be faithful to its design and follow all its regulations.

12"This is the law of the temple: All the surrounding area on top of the mountain will be most holy. Such is the law of the temple.

13"These are the measurements of the altar in long cubits, that cubit being a cubit and a handbreadth: Its gutter is a cubit deep and a cubit wide, with a rim of one span around the edge. And this is the height of the altar: ¹⁴From the gutter on the ground up to the lower ledge it is two cubits high and a cubit wide, and from the smaller ledge up to the larger ledge it is four cubits high and a cubit wide. ¹⁵The altar hearth is four cubits high, and four horns project upward from the hearth. ¹⁶The altar hearth is square, twelve cubits long and twelve cubits wide. ¹⁷The upper ledge also is square, fourteen cubits long and fourteen cubits wide, with a rim of half a cubit and a gutter of a cubit all around. The steps of the altar face east."

¹⁸Then he said to me, "Son of man, this is what the Sovereign LORD says: These will be the regulations for sacrificing burnt offerings and sprinkling blood upon the altar when it is built: ¹⁹You are to give a young bull as a sin offering to the priests, who are Levites, of the family of Zadok, who come near to minister before me, declares the Sovereign LORD. ²⁰You are to take some of its blood and put it on the four horns of the altar and on the four corners of the upper ledge and all around the rim, and so purify the altar and make atonement for it. ²¹You are to take the bull for the sin offering and burn it in the designated part of the temple area outside the sanctuary.

²²"On the second day you are to offer a male goat without defect for a sin offering, and the altar is to be purified as it was purified with the bull. ²³When you have finished purifying it, you are to offer a young bull and a ram from the flock, both without defect. ²⁴You are to offer them before the LORD, and the priests are to sprinkle salt on them and sacrifice them as a burnt offering to the LORD.

²⁵"For seven days you are to provide a male goat daily for a sin offering; you are also to provide a young bull and a ram from the flock, both without defect. ²⁶For seven days they are to make atonement for the altar and cleanse it; thus they will dedicate it. ²⁷At the end of these days, from the eighth day on, the priests are to present your burnt offerings and fellowship offerings on the altar. Then I will accept you, declares the Sovereign LORD."

Original Meaning

WE NOTED IN the previous section the similarities between the world-constructing vision of Ezekiel 40–48 and Genesis 1–2. A further similarity emerges in Ezekiel 43–46 as the account of the formation of the different spaces in chapters 40–42 is followed by an account of their filling, just as the spaces formed in days 1–3 of Genesis 1 were subsequently filled in days 4–6. An empty temple is, by itself, worthless; it was made to be occupied. The logic of the description starts from the center with the filling of the Most Holy Place (Ezek. 43:1–9) and ends at the corners of the outer court, with the description of the activities in the kitchens (46:24).

The return of the glory of the Lord to the new temple is the high point of chapters 43–46. This return, which reverses the abandonment of the temple and its destruction described in equally visionary form in chapters 8–11, is the fulfillment of the central promise of restoration: the Lord dwelling in the midst of his people forever (37:26–28). The connection with the previous visions is made explicit in 43:3: "The vision I saw was like the vision I had seen when he came to destroy the city and like the visions I had seen by the Kebar River."

The glory returns to the temple through the east gate, from the same direction in which it had earlier left (Ezek. 10:18–19).² Whereas its departure was slow and halting, however, its return is rapid and direct. On its return, the glory of God not only fills the temple, as it had filled the Solomonic temple at its consecration (1 Kings 8:10–11), it even causes the land itself to shine (Ezek. 43:2). As with the other visions, the prophet's response to the revelation of God's glory is to fall on his face (43:3b).

The overwhelmed prophet is once again picked up by the Spirit and dropped in the inner court, in order for him to hear the word of the Lord (43:5). That word is an assertion of the Lord's kingship and of his "liv[ing] among the Israelites forever" (43:7). As King, the Lord is marking out his territorial claim to the areas defined in the vision, with the new temple as his throne room and footstool.³ But what is new is not the Lord's claim to kingship or the area over which he makes that claim, it is the assertion that his kingship will be exercised there forever.

In order to ensure that his reigning presence remains with his people forever, it is necessary to guard against any repetition of the abuses of the past. This involves once more redefining the nature of the areas around the divine throne room and limiting access that might endanger their sacredness. In the past, the house of Israel and their kings had defiled the Lord's name by their prostitution (i.e., their spiritual adultery with the gods of other nations, as in ch. 23) and by setting up memorial stelae⁴ to their monarchs within the temple grounds (43:7–8).⁵

There is no room for these stelae in honor of the human king in the place dedicated to the worship of the divine King. Henceforth they will be banished. Indeed, the whole former social geography of the temple mount, where the house of the divine King was merely a (smaller) neighboring residence to the palace of the human king, will be swept away. Because the former kings defiled the Lord's name by their detestable practices, their position in the future kingdom will be further removed from the center.⁶ This is a necessary precondition for the Lord's perpetual dwelling in the midst of his people (43:9).

Verses 10–12 sum up the rationale for the temple vision: Ezekiel is being shown these things so that he can relay them to his own generation. They must consider the design and "be ashamed of their [former] sins." The temple vision is not a building plan or a prediction of the future but rather a powerful symbol that addresses the people in Ezekiel's day. What specifically about the temple design is to move them to shame? They must consider in particular its "plan" (43:10), its "arrangement," its "exits and entrances," along with its "regulations and laws" (43:11). In other words, the temple vision is a pedagogical tool that speaks by its shape and size, and particularly by its permission or denial of access ("exits and entrances"). These regulations all serve a single overriding purpose: that the whole area all around the temple may be most holy. In order for God to continue to live in their midst forever, regard for his holiness must govern not simply access to the Most Holy Place, but the entire temple mount (43:12).

Removal of sinners to a safe distance is only one aspect of maintaining the holiness of the temple area; the other, more positive, aspect is through the reestablishment of the sacrificial system. For this reason, Ezekiel's attention is now drawn once more to the altar in the inner court, the central piece of furniture mentioned in the earlier tour. The importance of this altar to Ezekiel's plan is evident not merely from its detailed description but also from its place at the geometric center of the temple complex. The contrast is made clearer by the fact that in the tabernacle the altar was the least sacred of the cultic articles, located in the outer court; its geometric center pointed rather to the ark.⁸ Once more this represents an overall raising of the standards of holiness compared to the old ways, assigning the altar an equal sanctity to the furnishings of the Most Holy Place.

The nature of this altar is a three-or four-layer square construction, depending on whether the $h\hat{e}q$ (v. 13) is interpreted as a "gutter" (NIV) or a "base" (NRSV). The dimensions of the altar are 18 cubits by 18 cubits (31.5 feet square) at the lowest level and 14 cubits by 14 cubits (24.5 feet square) at the highest (43:13–17). At each corner of the top level there are projections, or "horns," to which blood is applied during some aspects of the ritual (43:20). The whole edifice stands nine cubits (about fifteen feet) high and is approached by a flight of steps from the east. This is a reversal of the normal ancient Near Eastern practice whereby the priest faces east when offering sacrifices. In Ezekiel's temple the priest faces west, toward the Most Holy Place, thus avoiding any suggestion of a repetition of the sun worship of 8:16, the crowning abomination of the earlier temple vision.
